TO THE QUEEN.

MADAM,

THE deſervingly Immortal CYRUS, once the Terror of the Eaſtern World, his Ambition yet unſatisfi'd, and his Aſiatick Conqueſts too narrow a Bed of Honour, As the conſummating Triumph to his finiſh'd-Victories, begs leave to take his Reſt of Glory under YOUR MAJESTIES Sacred Roof. For indeed, there are those Contingencies of Fate attending even Records and Monuments; thoſe Periods to mouldring Marble, and ruſting Leaves of Braſs, that the Memories of the Great Dead are only ſafe in the Hands of the Greater Living. Their Honourable Reception ſo heightens our Veneration, and the Pride and Renown of Paſt Ages is ſo indebted to the Countenancing Authority of the Preſent, that Remoter Antiquity ſeems in a manner to ſupport its whole Grandeur, and borrow its Recognition from that only Royal Act of Grace. The Remains therefore of the Great CYRUS, as in all Duty bound, prefer a Nobler Repoſitory in the Cloſet of the Fair MAJESTY of Britain, before a Semiramis's mis's Temple, or an Eaſtern Chronicle.

But theſe Inviting Advantages are not the only Potent Charms that bring Him a Suppliant for YOUR MAJESTIES Royal Umbrage. For introduced into that Illuſtrious Preſence, his Surveying-Wonder beholds Your Stately Walls adorn'd with Trophies ſo nearly reſembling his Own, that the aſtoniſhed Conqueror, once the Guardian Genius of protected Iſrael, Judah's rous'd Lyon, and the Deliverer of the People of GOD, meets that Affinity of Glory in the Triumphs of the Great NASSAU; as carries a more Attracting Influence. Yet all this while, though never was Hero more honour'd then CYRUS, RUS, raiſed up by the Particular Call of the Almighty, in no meaner a Cauſe than the Relief and Succour of his own diſtreſſed Temple and Altars, and dignifi'd with no leſs a Title than HIS SERVANT. However, as a Champion of that God he knew not, like a fainter Phoſphorus to a brighter Sun, He finds the Glories of the Perſian, infinitely outſhin'd in thoſe of the BRITISH WORTHY, as being the Succeſſes of that Dearer Darling of Providence, whoſe KNEE, alſo bends, where his ARM Fights.

But for His full and complete out-doing CYRUS in all the Points of Honour, there wants only His conſummating that laſt Reſerve of Heaven, when after a happy Concluſion of his Commiſſion'd Arbitration between the Croſs and the Creſcent, His Leading-Arm to Scourge the Tyranny of Europe, ſhall fill the Weſtern Annals with as large a ſhare of Fame, as CYRUS ever ſwell'd the Volumes of the East. With theſe Conſiderations, he cannot pay a juſter Homage, than to the far-renowned Throne of Britain, ſo nobly fill'd with that Rich Portrait of Himſelf on one hand, and a fairer Divinity than his admired MANDANA on the other.

'Tis with this Plea, the Hiſtory of the GRAND CYRUS is Addreſs'd to YOUR MAJESTY. The only guilty Bluſh not to be hidden, is, That 'tis preſented by no Worthier Hand, when laid at YOUR MAJESTIES Sacred Feet by the trembling Adoration of

THAT moſt Incomparable Romance, ſo well known under the Title of ARTAMENES, or the Grand CYRUS, having withdrawn it ſelf for ſome time from the Publick, for want of another Impreſſion, is now ſent forth a Second time, in hopes to meet the ſame Reception which the Former had, as well for the Fame of the Author, as the Noble Subject of the Hiſtory: Of which it may be truly ſaid, That never any thing was Writ with more Wit and Paſſion, than this may juſtly claim; and therefore not unworthy the moſt Ingenious and Refin'd Underſtandings. For our Author has ſo laid his Scenes throughout the whole Work, as to touch at the moſt Remarkable Affairs of his Time. For the Intrigues and Miſcarriages of War and Peace are better, many times, laid open and Satyriz'd in a Romance, than in a downright Hiſtory, which being oblig'd to name the Perſons, is often forc'd for ſeveral Reaſons and Motives to be too partial and ſparing; while ſuch diſguis'd Diſcourſes as theſe, promiſcuouſly perſonating every Man, and no Man, take their full liberty to ſpeak the Truth. Other Writers of this nature there are, who to tickle the ears of their Readers, make it their Buſineſs to embelliſh their Works with ſtrange and forced Inventions, not caring for a Reputation farther than among the Ignorant, which are indeed the greater Multitude. Theſe Men deceive their Readers, and by repreſenting to their Fancies the Imitation of Impoſſibilities, lead them into the wrong Path of following Example; which never can be deſign'd to put us upon more than is in the Power of Mortals to perform: Whereas Monſieur SCUDERY, a Perſon of great Underſtanding, profuſe Fancy, and clear Judgment, purſues exactly the Truth of Hiſtory in moſt things; and where he deviates a little, 'tis only to accompliſh his Particular Worthy, with the Virtues of Many: urging nothing either improbable, or impoſſible. And therefore you ſhall find the Author himſelf making an early Proteſtation in the Perſon of Chryſantes, That all was pure Truth which ſhould be related in the Hiſtory of Artamenes; and that if he ſhould chance to fail, or leſſen the Truth, it was the Modeſty of Artamenes, which had accuſtom'd him to ſpeak part of his Glory, and never to aggrandize the Greatneſs of his Atchievements.

If you ask what the Subject is; 'Tis the Height of Proweſs, intermix'd with Virtuous and Heroick Love; conſequently, the Language Lofty, and becoming the Grandeur of the Illuſtrious Perſonages that ſpeak; ſo far from the leaſt ſully of what may be thought Vain or Fulſom, that there is not any thing to provoke a Bluſh from the moſt modeſt Virgin; While Love and Honour are in a Seeming Contention, which ſhall beſt inſtruct the willing-ear with moſt Delight.

As for the Alteration made in the Bulk of the Volumes, we conſulted the Practice highly approv'd in France and other places beyond Sea, and lately much in uſe in England, of contracting cumberſome Folio's into a far leſſer Compaſs, chiefly for the convenience of the Reader, by reducing them into ſo many ſmaller Diviſions, as render them much more portable than before, and conſequently leſs troubleſome Companions for thoſe that travel, or when their leiſure hours invite 'em to delightful Converſation, under the pleaſing Shades of Summer, with the Renowned Artamenes. For whoſe ſake, and for their own Benefit, we hope the Readers now-a-days, will be no leſs indulgent in the Reception of theſe leſſer Volumes than in the former entertainment of the larger Folio.

ARTAMENES;

OR, THE

GRAND CYRUS.

PART I. BOOK I.

THE Conflagration of Sinope was ſo great, that the very Sky, the Sea, the Valleys and Tops of Mountains, tho far remote, were all illuminated by its Flames: ſo that notwithſtanding the black mask of Night, all things might mournfully be diſcerned: never was object more terrible to Spectators than this; Twenty Ships might be ſeen burning all at once in the Port; which tho floating in the midſt of water, did belch up Flames as high as Clouds: Theſe affrighting Flames being blown by the bellows of an impetuous wind, did oft times bend toward the Town; and as if but one huge faggot were ſet on fire, ſeem'd to conſume it all. They flaſht from place to place in an inſtant; and there was ſcarce one Quarter in all the Town, which by a dire communication did not feel its fury. All the Tackling, Cordage and Sails being ſet on fire, flew horribly into the air, and fell down again in ſparks upon the houſes, which being thus conſumed, are forc'd to yield unto this mercileſs Element, and tumble down in thoſe Streets, unto which they were before an Ornament. The hideous multitude of flames which ſtream'd through ſeveral ſtreets, and which had more or leſs fury, according to the ſubject upon which they ſeiz'd, did ſeem to Combat one with another, by reaſon of the whirling wind which countermoved them; ſometimes mingling together, ſometimes parting, as if they did diſpute about the Glory of deſtroying this ſtately Town. Amidſt theſe Lightning flames, one might behold whole Clouds of Smoke, which by their diſmal dusky colour, did add much terror to this doleful Spectacle: Alſo the great abundance of ſparks (of which we ſpoke before) whiffling up and down the Town, like enflamed ſtorms of Hail, was doubtleſs moſt horrid to all beholders. Near this confus'd combuſtion, there was a Caſtle ſeated at the lower end of the Town, built upon the top of a ſturdy Rock, which did ſhoot it ſelf into the Sea; unto this the flames had not yet reached, but did every moment threaten it, becauſe the violent wind did waft that way: It was likely the fire would firſt ſeize upon the Gate thereof, becauſe the houſes near it, were moſt enflamed, and neareſt ruin. In the midſt of theſe fiery flames one might perceive ſome Churches and great Stone-houſes, which gave more reſiſtance than the reſt, and retained ſo much only as might teſtifie the Magnificence of their Structure, and move Compaſſion for their inevitable ruin. In ſhort, this terrible Element devoured all, or at leaſt ſeem'd ſo near it, that the ſad ſight of ſuch a diſmal chance, did move both terror and compaſſion in all beholders.

The Amorous Artamenes, in the head of Four thouſand men, marching out of a low Valley, covered with a thick Wood, was much ſurpriz'd with wonder at this dreadful object, and ſeem'd ſo amazed, that he was not able to expreſs his wonder by his words: He looked upon the Town, viewed the Gate, he caſt his eyes upon the Sea, which ſeemed all fire, by reflection from the Clouds; he gaz'd upon the Mountain tops, and ſaw all the Plains plainly; he lifted up his eyes to Heaven; he had not power either to ſpeak, or go any further, as if he were unſatisfied whether what he ſaw was real, or elſe but a deluſion of his Phantaſie. Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Aglatidas, Araſpes and Feraulas, did ſee this fatal flame, but tho they were near him, durſt not ſo much as look upon him. Artamenes turning his Horſe on to a little higher ground, did from thence perfectly perceive, that this Town which ſo burned, was the very ſame which he intended to ſurprize that very night; and according to his provident Intelligence, brought hopes with him, to relieve his Princeſs, which the King of Aſſyria there detain'd a Priſoner. He being thus extremely tranſported with Paſſion, began to expoſtulate with the Gods; Is it poſſible, ſaid he, you can be ſo cruel and unjuſt, as to conſent unto the Loſs of the faireſt Princeſs that ever was? and that you ſhould Predeſtinate her ruin, at that very inſtant, when I undoubtedly reſolved her ſafety? In ſaying this, he advanc'd a little forward; none but Chriſantes and Feraulas followed him; Alas my Friends (ſaid he, beginning to gallop, and commanding the reſt to follow) how Lamentable are my Deſtinies? and unto what a diſmal ſpectacle have they brought me? Come follow, follow me my friends, and let us dye in the ſame Flames which have ſeiz'd upon my illuſtrious Princeſs: Can it be (did he ſuggeſt unto himſelf) that theſe Flames which now I behold, dare offer to deſtroy my moſt ador'd Mandana? But why do I ſay, can it be? No, no, alas, it is too too true to be doubted: The Gods, I ſee, have kindled too great a Fire for her to eſcape it; had it been their pleaſure to have preſerved her, ſurely they would have Pumpt up the Waves of the Sea, to quench the Flames; and never have permitted her to incur this danger: But alas, ſaid he, moſt injurious Rival; Canſt thou endeavour thine own ſafety, more than hers? has not thy unworthineſs caus'd her deſtruction? If I did behold my divine Princeſs (ſaid he in turning towards Chriſantes) in the hands of a Tyrannick Prince, who was in the head of a hundred thouſand men, ready to ſacrifice her before my eyes, I ſhould not apprehend ſo much deſpair as now; for then I ſhould have an Enemy before me which I might aſſault, tho not vanquiſh; but here I have nothing to do in the world, but to throw my ſelf into theſe flames which have conſum'd my Princeſs. After theſe expreſſions he paſſed ſilently on a little farther, and ſeeing none near which could underſtand, but Chriſantes, he violently broke thus into Paſſion: Oh Heavens, ſaid he, am not I acceſſary to the death of my deareſt Princeſs? Is it not for the affection that ſhe bears unto me, that ſhe her ſelf hath cauſed this Conflagration, rather than ſhe would fail in her fidelity to me, the unfortunate Artamenes? But oh ye Gods, if it be ſo, then I do confeſs I have deſerved all my miſfortunes, and am worthy of my worſt reſentments: Chryſantes ſeeing him ſtand ſtock ſtill in a ſilent melancholly poſture, drew near him, and endeavoured to chear him up: But then Artamenes, going on, and looking back with ſo ſad an aſpect as might move compaſſion out of inſenſible ſtones, ſaid unto him, No, no, Chriſantes, ſuch diſaſters as theſe are not capable of any conſolations; there is no way for me but one, and that I'll immediately take: yet this poor comfort remains, that the ſame fire which conſum'd both my Princeſs and my Corrival, which mixed both her Innocency and his Crime together, and which deprived me both of the Object of my Hate and of my Love, ſhall alſo deſtroy Me for company, and mingle the aſhes of my adored Princeſs with mine together. In ſpeaking this, all the ſigns of abſolute deſpair appeared in his face; his tone was ſadly mournful, and all his actions ſeemed preparations for preſent death. Day now began to dawn; the Sun's approach did ſomewhat mitigate the horror of the accident; the Sea, the Valleys, the Mountains, aſſume again their natural colours; and the face of this ſad Scene ſeemed ſomething to change complexion. Feraulas obſerved two remarkable paſſages, and hinted unto his Maſter; Sir (ſaid he) do you not diſcover a Galley in the Sea, which ſtrives with all its power to row from this unfortunate Town? And do you again obſerve, how every one endeavours to extinguiſh thoſe flames which flaſh towards the great Tower that is over the Portal of the Caſtle? I do obſerve them both (anſwered Artamenes). Certainly (ſaid Chriſantes) theſe are infallible ſigns that the Princeſs is not yet periſhed, but may happily be preſerved, either in this Galley, or that Tower which the flames have not yet touched. Alas! (cry'd out Artamenes ſuddenly), I ſhould be happy, and begin to breathe ſome hopes again, if this were ſo. By this time they were approached near the Town, where he diſcovered many men, ſtriving to ſtop the fire from catching hold of the Tower. Beſtir thy ſelf (cry'd he out, and mended his pace), moſt unhappy Rival, and endeavour the ſafety of our Princeſs; aſſure thy ſelf, that if thou doſt preſerve her from this danger, I will forgive thee all the injuries thou haſt done me. This Prince did not continue long in the ſame reſentments; for one while he was all Prayers and Vows in behalf of his Miſtreſs; another while all Curſes and Imprecations againſt his Rival. Preſently after, looking upon the Galley, and diſcovering ſome Women upon the Deck, he was then in an extaſie of Joy. But upon ſecond thoughts, conſidering, that tho the Princeſs were one of theſe upon the Deck, yet as to him ſhe was for ever loſt; then he began to reaſſume his firſt deſpair. Afterward, when he viewed the Tower, and obſerved how the Sea and Fire did wholly environ it, and that happily his Princeſs might be in it, then he changed his apprehenſions, and gave order, That thoſe Troops which came to deſtroy the Town, ſhould now preſerve it, and help to extinguiſh the flames. Artamenes being in no diſpoſition to go back again, ſent Feraulas to take command of his Men, and to march ſpeedily after him. Coming near the Town, they found the air very fiery hot, and heard ſuch hideous noiſe, that none but Artamenes himſelf would enter; the roaring of the Sea, the rumbling of the Wind, the flaſhing of the Flames, all theſe, added to the horrid noiſe of whole Houſes tumbling, which were ſhaken into heaps of earth; the lamentable complaint of living, and the cruel cries of dying men: all theſe diſmal dins, which were anſwered by an Eccho from the Mountains, did make a moſt mournful and horrid harmony, if I may call a ſound ſo full of ſad confuſion a harmony. But all this could not divert the intentions of Artamenes; for he being now near the Town, and all his Men drawn up in a Body, he addreſſed himſelf, and ſpake unto them in theſe winning words: Imagine, my fellow Soldiers, that it is I which is in that Tower; that it is I my ſelf who am at the very brink of periſhing, between fire and water, and that it is I whom you come to ſave: Or, to expreſs my ſelf a little better, Imagine, I ſay, that your King, your Princeſs, your Wives, your Fathers, and your Children, were all incloſed within this Tower, and with Artamenes ready to periſh; let all theſe dear Relations rowſe up your ſpirits unto a gallant deportment: you muſt (my Companions) do as never yet was done; you muſt deſtroy your Enemies, and yet you muſt ſave them; you muſt fight againſt them with one hand, and ſave them with the other: In ſum, you muſt attempt all manner of ways to preſerve that Princeſs who may be your Queen, and deſerves to be ſo of the whole World. After this, Chriſantes, Araſpes, Aglatidas, and Hydaſpes, who had each of them the command of a thouſand Men, came unto Artamenes, to receive their ultimate Orders: Feraulas was admitted unto Council, who was no mean Agent in the buſineſs; who alſo had tranſacted for Intelligence within Sinope, and unto whom Artucas had promiſed to deliver up a Port of the Town that ſame night. Feraulas gave his Vote, That it was expedient to proceed in the very ſame manner as if the Town were not on fire, and, without any further Inquiſition, to march ſtraight unto the Gate by Mars his Temple; becauſe, ſaid he, if perchance this accident has not put the whole Town into a general diſorder, we may perhaps find reſiſtance at any other place; it being always a cuſtom upon ſuch accidents to double their Guards, leſt the Fire ſhould proceed from ſome deſign of their Enemies: whereas, on the contrary, if you proceed this way, we are ſure to find no oppoſition; for if Artucas and his Complices be not all conſum'd in fire, we ſhall certainly have their aſſiſtance; and altho they ſhould be all periſhed, yet we are certain to find none in that place to obſtruct our paſſage. This advice was good, and founded all reaſon. Afterwards it was put to the Queſtion, What courſe was moſt commodious whereby to gain the foot of the Tower? Aglatidas obſerved the fire to ceaſe on that ſide of the Gate, becauſe the Ships being ſooner conſumed than the Houſes, it muſt therefore conſequently follow, that the fire muſt ſooneſt ceaſe there alſo; therefore he conceived it the moſt convenient courſe, to take the way of the Port, becauſe then they ſhould have but one ſide to Guard, and becauſe that alſo this way was the eaſieſt to go unto the Foot of the Tower. Artamenes, who thought each Minute an Age till he was there, would contradict nothing, leſt he ſhould loſe time; he marched himſelf firſt, and gave Command through the Army, to divulge it about the Town, how he had no other deſign in coming thither, but to preſerve the Princeſs; inducing the People thereby to refuſe Reſiſtance, and not impede his Plot. They all begin to March; Feraulas guided Artamenes (who was, like the reſt, on Foot), unto the Gate by Mars's Temple; and there they found him whom they ſought for, who was in ſuch deſpair of Artamenes coming (for this ſad Sight had much retarded him), that he was careleſs whether he threw himſelf into the Flames, or lived any longer. He no ſooner ſpied them he long'd for, but he caus'd the Gates immediately to fly open. The Guards at the place were very thin; for maugre his Commands, moſt of his Men ran away to ſee in what Condition the Fire had left their Houſes, their Wives, their Fathers, and their Children; ſo that they found no great difficulty in becoming Maſters of that Guard; yet they found enough to do in defending themſelves from Fire. Artamenes, in marching through the inflamed Streets, expoſed himſelf unto extraordinary Danger, and was many times in hazard of being overwhelmed with falling fiery Houſes; tho the Object was terrible to him when he was without the Town, yet it ſeemed much more horrid when he was within; they marched with Swords in their right Hands, and Bucklers in their left; they had hotter Service in preſerving themſelves from burning Coals, which continually tumbled upon their Heads, than from the Darts of their Enemies. Upon the unexpected Arrival of Artamenes, all they who ſurviv'd within the Town, did begin to double their Lamentations and Amazement: Many of the Grandees, who before were buſy in quenching the Fire of their own Houſes, did quit that Charitable Office, and endeavoured to Muſter into Arms, to make ſome Reſiſtance; but alas, neither Arms, nor Captains, nor Soldiers, nor any thing fit for Oppoſition, can be found in ſo confus'd a Diſorder: In ſome places, Men were pulling down their own Houſes to preſerve their Neighbours; others threw their Plate, their Jewels, and their richeſt Things out at Windows, in hopes thereby of ſaving ſomething: Mothers without any care of Goods, or Houſes, or any thing, might be ſeen running about the Streets with Hair burning off their Heads, and nothing left, unleſs in either Arm a Child. In ſhort, the Sight was ſo ſad and terrible, that if Artamenes had not been ſo tranſported as he was, with vehemency of Paſſion, doubtleſs he would have ſtopt his Courſe, to have ſuccoured them, ſo worthy were they of Pity, and ſo ſenſible was he of their Miſery. Nevertheleſs, he marched on; the Report of his Arrival was every where divulged: Aribees, the Governor of Sinope (who uſed his Endeavours to prevent the Fires catching hold of the Tower, and who upon this occaſion had Rallied moſt of the Men and Soldiers which ſurviv'd) was at his Wits end, and involved into ſuch Anxieties of Mind, that he knew not whether was moſt Expedient, to fight Artamenes, or to quench the Flames; for thus he argued, What will all my Services advantage the King of Aſſyria, tho I ſhould get the Victory, whilſt he in the mean time is ruin'd by the enraging Flames? On the contrary, What ſhould I get by quenching the Fire, whilſt in the mean time I am taken a Priſoner by Artamenes? I, who am his mortal Foe; I, who betray'd the King my Maſter; I, who tranſacted the Conveyance away of the Princeſs his Daughter; I, who mov'd the People to Revolt: No, no, let us Fight with Artamenes, who is as terrible to the King of Aſſyria, as

Fire, or Flames, or any thing elſe can be; let us provide for our Preſervation that way: In ſaying ſo, he gave Command, that all they who were quenching Fire, and with Engins pulling down the fired Houſes, ſhould now take up Arms, and thoſe Men who had none, to provide them with all ſpeed, and take them where ere they found them; let Fire rather hurt their Houſes than not ſuccour him. When Artamenes had paſſed through a great part of this pitiful Town, and marching along the Port, he came unto the Foot of the Tower, did wonder to ſee none quenching the Flames, and was amazed when he ſaw Aribees with Reſolutions to fight him: What (cried he out) do I come to quench the Fire, and muſt I now hinder it from being extinguiſhed? No, no, my Friends, it muſt not be; upon that he gave Command, that ſome of his Men ſhould help to extinguiſh the Fire, whilſt with the reſt he fought with thoſe whoſe Office it was to have done it: When all was thus ordered, he advanced towards the main Body of his Enemy, in the Head of which was Aribees. Artamenes turning his Eye towards the top of the Tower, there he eſpied the King of Aſſyria, who ſeem'd to be in a very deſperate Condition, as if he were indifferent whether he caſt himſelf into the Flames, or Sea. The ſight confirmed Artamenes in his Opinion, that his Princeſs was alive, and therefore he gave ſecond Orders of quenching the Fire; then he marched with the reſt and Charged his Enemy, who received him with great and deſperate Reſolutions; ſo ſoon as they joyned, he got ſight of their General. Aribees (ſaid he aloud) I come not to Fight, but to Puniſh thee; the fault ſhall be thy own, if I do not procure thee a Pardon from the King of Medes, upon Condition thou wilt ceaſe Arms, and help to preſerve thy Princeſs, and mine. But Aribees, who thought his Crimes too great to be pardoned, in lieu of Anſwer, did run at him with his drawn Sword, and began a Fight in the midſt of Fire; the Fight was more terrible to him than the Fire, for Blows fell from an invincible Arm, in whom Love, Hate and Revenge, did kindle more than accuſtomed Valour at this time, altho he was ever the moſt Valiant Man alive. Hidaſpes, Artucas, Chriſantes, Aglatides, and Araſpes drew near Artamenes; as for Feraulas, his Orders were to quench the Fire. The King of Aſſyria all this while did at once behold that, which would produce his Safety, or his Sorrow; his Weal, or his Woe; and would either loſe his Life, or kill his Enemy. Artamenes caſting up his Eye often towards the Tower, ſaid to himſelf, I ſhould be infinitely happy, if my Princeſs did but ſee what I do to preſerve her; were I certain, that She were an Eye-witneſs either of my Victory, or of my Death, I ſhould deſire no more. Mean while, the Fight was furious; in the midſt of Fight, Artamenes mind was much upon Feraulas, and his Orders in quenching the Fire. In Concluſion, he undertook a ſingle Combat with Aribees, amidſt all this Confuſion, which indeed, was an Act too Opinionative and Hazardous; for tho this Traytor had to deal with the Gallanteſt of Men; yet deſpair might by chance have done that in him, which true Valour might do in the other; yet for all this, Artamenes fought full of hopes, and was confident that after this, there was nothing but a few Walls between him and his Princeſs. Indeed his Acts were Miracles, he ſlew all that ſtood in his way, and wounded Aribees in ſo many places, that in concluſion, he had no other Reſolutions but to render himſelf, if upon a ſudden an enflamed Houſe had not faln upon the place of Combat, ſo that Aribees was covered with its ruin'd Rubbiſh; and all Men thought he had periſhed both by Fire and Sword, as deſerving double Puniſhment for his perfidious Rebellion. Artamenes alſo, who tho he had received but few Wounds from his Antagoniſt, yet thought himſelf in a dangerous ſtate, when he was ſurrounded with Flames and Smoke; and certainly, had he not ſhielded his Head with his Helmet, he had inevitably periſhed, his Coat of Arms was burnt, and a thouſand to one but he had been Smothered in this Adventure. The fall of this Houſe did raiſe ſo thick a Duſt, a Smoke ſo black, and a Cloud of Sparks ſo fiery, that for a long time nothing could be diſcerned upon the place. That which moſt vexed Artamenes in this Accident, was, that Aribees, who was upon the very point of Submiſſion, had retreated forty or fifty Paces, and thereby eſcaped his Revenge: Artamenes touched him with the Point of his Sword, but by a miracle of Fortune miſſed him, and now found no Enemy amidſt theſe fatal Ruins. After this Accident, all they who had dependance upon Aribees, were all amazed and fled. But this Hero Artamenes runs after them, and cries aloud, that he came with Intentions to ſave, and not to hurt them. In concluſion, he perſuaded them to lay down Arms, and truſt to the word of a Conqueror, who heretofore had given Teſtimonies of his Generoſity; and ſo in a ſhort time, all ſeem'd to be on one ſide. Artamenes encouraging his Men, did ſhew them by Example what they ſhould do, and himſelf quenched the Fire. All the People wondered to find ſo Charitable an Enemy; his Soldiers pull'd down Houſes with their Engines of Artillery; they did employ their Bucklers and Helmets in carrying Water to throw upon the Fire. In ſhort, they neglected nothing which might be thought expedient in the buſineſs. Every Captain did admirably demean himſelf in this Encounter; amongſt the reſt, Aglatides ſeem'd rather to Fight for Death than Victory, ſo couragiouſly did he expoſe himſelf unto the Fury of the Fight and Fire: Mean while, Artamenes ſeeing the Fire decreaſe, was infinitely tranſported with Joy and Hope to ſee his deareſt and faireſt Princeſs She is (ſaid he in his heart) within this Tower, and if I be not the moſt unfortunate Wretch that ever liv'd, I ſhall preſently bleſs my Eyes with the ſight of her, my moſt adored Princeſs. I may chance have the honour from her own Lips to be termed her Liberator; and now I hope to ſee both the Object of my Love, and of my Hate. The Fire is now extinguiſhed, and he approached under the Walls of the Tower; he gave Orders to ſecure all Avenues and Ports of the Town; as he began to demoliſh the Walls of this Tower, not yet knowing whether he ſhould meet with any Oppoſition; he ſpied a Man of good handſome Deportment, who opened the Gate unto him, and in lieu of diſputing his Entrance (which indeed he had done, had he not known Artamenes from the Battlements of the Tower) he reverently addreſſed himſelf, and in a paſſionate manner ſaid, Sir, If the Name of Thraſibulus be not quite forgotten, do him the Honour to uſe all your endeavours to prevent the Ruin of a moſt Illuſtrious Perſon, of whoſe ſafety we ſhall utterly deſpair, unleſs your timous Aſſiſtance help it. Artamenes ſuppoſed it to be the Princeſs who was in ſome Extremity, and therefore did not inſiſt upon the nicety of Ceremonies with Thraſibulus, whom he preſently knew by his Voice: Come along my old Conqueror (ſaid he to him), let us haſte to relieve this Illuſtrious Perſon. As ſoon as ever he had uttered theſe Words, he ran haſtily up the Stairs, and many followed; among the reſt, Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Aglatides, Thraſibulus, and Feraulus; but they all, except Thraſibulus, wondered to ſee no Soldiers in the Tower, nor in any other place of the Fort: Araſpes by Order from Artamenes ſtaid at the Gates, to prevent Surpriſals: Artamenes was ſo tranſported with deſires of ſeeing the Princeſs, that he was at the top of the Tower before the reſt; but, O Heavens, how ſadly he was ſurpriſed with Amazement, when in lieu of the Princeſs, he found none but the King of Aſſyria, who was his Rival, and Raviſher of the Princeſs, alſo his utter Enemy! An unarmed Enemy ſunk in Sorrows: Artamenes turned toward Thraſibulus, and askt him, if this was his Illuſtrious Perſon he meant? He ſeeing all the Company following, with deſire to come up to the top of the Tower, and conſidering with himſelf, that his Diſcourſe with the King of Aſſyria, would not be fit for all publick Ears, beckned unto them to retire: Then he asked where the Princeſs was, imagining She might be in ſome lower Room of the Fort; but he was much more ſurpriſed with Wonder, when the King of Aſſyria ſaid unto him, You ſee Artamenes, a Prince more unfortunate than your ſelf,ſince he is the cauſe both of your Diſaſters,and his own. You may ſee (ſaid he, ſhewing him the Galley which was not yet far off, by reaſon of contrary Wind) another Raviſher of your Princeſs, more guilty than my ſelf, becauſe he profeſſed Amity and Friendſhip unto him, whereas I never gave you the leaſt hope of any Love from me. What (cried out Artamenes in looking upon the Galley, and not regarding his Enemy) is not the Princeſs here in your Power? No, no, anſwered the King of Aſſyria ſighing) the Prince Mazares, that moſt perfidious Mazares, hath Raviſht her both from me and you, and hath rob'd you of the Glory of your Victory; but ſince you cannot ſatisfy your Love in ſeeing your Princeſs, ſatisfy your Hate, and take a full Revenge upon me your Rival-enemy; you ſee I am not in Condition to oppoſe you: I was reſolved, as ſoon as this Galley was out of ſight, ſince I could not follow it, to caſt my ſelf either into the Flames or Sea, and ſo finiſh my Misfortunes, rather than fall into the Hand of you my Rival Enemy. The Enemies of Artamenes (anſwered this generous and ſad Prince) have never any cauſe to fear him, but when they have Arms in their Hands. The Condition in which I find you, is your Umbrage from the Heat of my Anger, and preſerves you from the Fury of my Reſentments. After theſe words, poor Artamenes was ſo ſadded with Sorrow, as never Man was more. He ſees his Princeſs Raviſhed away the ſecond time, but cannot follow, ſince all the Ships were conſum'd, ſo that there appears no poſſibility of Relief or Revenge upon this ſecond Raviſher. He looks upon his firſt Rival Raviſher, and ſees him in his Power, and ſees him unarmed, and without any deſign but Death. Artamenes has now no Heart, he ſees his Diſaſters are without either Parallel or Remedy; he had ſometimes ſome thoughts (had not the generoſity of his Soul ſtayed him) of ſatisfying his Revenge upon his Rival, and ſometimes upon himſelf; he was ſo ſurrounded with Sorrow and anxious Cogitations, as he neither knew what he ſhould, or what he would do. Preſently he heard the King of Aſſyria ſay, I ſee, Artamenes, Fortune is your good Friend, and the very Winds are obedient unto your Wiſhes, in blowing back the Galley to the Shore, ſo that happily you may ſafely receive your Princeſs again. Artamenes looking towards the Sea, did plainly perceive the Galley was forced by contrary Winds ſo near back again, that Women might perfectly be diſcovered upon the Deck; and might eaſily ſee how Sailors tug'd with all their Strength, to part the Violence of the Waves, keeping themſelves as far from Land, as they could, by force of Oar. At this ſight, Joy might be ſeen to ſparkle in the Eyes of Artamenes; but as for the King of Aſſyria, ſad Sorrow and Deſpair ſeem'd to be all his Hopes: knowing well enough, that tho the favourable Wind did waft the Galley ſafe into the Port, yet the Sweetneſs of that Fortune would be all Artamenes, and not his; yet he cheered up himſelf with hope of ſeeing Mazares puniſhed. I hope you will permit me (ſaid he to Artamenes) that if it be the Pleaſure of the Gods to make you happy, in ſafe reſtoring you the Princeſs, to ſave you the labour of puniſhing this Raviſher, be pleaſed, but to allow me Combat with him, and furniſh me with a Sword, and I will promiſe you, that immediately after my revenging Victory, I will force it through my own Heart; by this means I ſhall permit you to enjoy that Happineſs quietly, which as long as Life is in me, I ſhall always diſturb. This Revenge muſt I reſerve unto my ſelf, (replied Artamenes) yet in conſideration of that Reſpect which I bear unto the King of Aſſyria, and his Misfortunes, I will deprive my ſelf of that Satisfaction, which I could find in revenging my ſelf upon his own Rivalſhip: But as for Mazares, I muſt reſerve the Puniſhment of his perfidious Fact unto my ſelf. After this, theſe two Rivals, without any more memory of old Hate, applied themſelves to obſerve the Galley, both wiſhing Happineſs to the Princeſs, and Curſes upon the Raviſher, as if both of them had one and the ſame Intereſt. This Object had ſuch pleaſing Influence upon their Eyes, their Spirits, and their Imaginations, as that now they ſeem to be very good Friends. But in concluſion, they ſee the Sea begin to change colour, the Winds riſe, the Waves boiſterous, ſometimes toſſing up the Galley as high as Clouds, and ſometimes bulging it to the bottom of the Sea with its Surges. This ſad Sight had likewiſe the ſame Effect upon both their Minds, and moves them equally unto Paſſion; Artamenes look'd upon the King of Aſſyria with an unexpreſſible ſadneſs, and the King of Aſſyria look'd upon Artamenes with a Face full of black Deſpair; the Equality of their Misfortunes did ſuſpend all their Cogitations; and they apprehended all that Love could imagine dolorous and reſentive. They ſaw, if the Wind continued where it was, that the Galley would be driven againſt the foot of that Tower wherein they were, and ſo Daſh all in Pieces; ſo that now they begin to fear what before they deſired, wiſhing the Winds would now ſecond the Prayers of the Raviſher, and blow them far from Land: Mean while, the Storm encreaſeth, and according to the ordinary capricious Inconſtance of the Sea, a Whirlwind did upon a ſudden ſo interſhock the Waves, as the Galley was carried far from the Town with incredible Celerity; ſo that theſe two Rivals loſt the ſight of it, and with it all their Hopes, and their Hearts. What fears of Shipwrack theſe two Illuſtrious, but Improſperous Princes, did Reſent, is not imaginable. Fain they would exclude Mazares, out of their Prayers for Mandana; but rather than She ſhould want a wiſh of ſafety, they Pray for both, and Repent them of their firſt Deſires. Now, when that Object, which before did take up their paſſionate Reſentment of each other, was out of ſight, they began to conceive of one another as two Rivals, and two Enemies. Artamenes was upon Departure, with Intentions of committing the King of Aſſyria into ſafe Cuſtody, when the King began to ſpeak thus unto him; I know Artamenes, that your Birth and Quality is equal unto mine; I am ſure of it by infallible and moſt certain grounds: I do retain much Confidence in your Generoſity, of which I have had ſo much Experience, and of which, maugre my hate, I have been a long (tho tacit) Admirer. Therefore I will both believe and hope, that you will not deny me one Favour wich I ſhall deſire. As you are my Rival (ſaid Artamenes) I ſhould deny you all your Deſires; but as you are the King of Aſſyria, I can deny you nothing, ſo it be not prejudicial unto the King whom I ſerve, nor his Daughter whom I adore; and be confident, I will deny nothing which will not Wound my Honour, or my Love: I oblige my ſelf unto it by the Word of a Man, whom you ſay is not Inferior to your ſelf, altho it paſs not ſo in the Opinion of the World: Demand then what you pleaſe, but firſt conſider well with your ſelf, leſt, againſt my Will, you ſhould provoke me to a denial. The King of Aſſyria, as ſoon as Artamenes had ſaid ſo, replied, I know that I am in your Power, and you may transfer me into the Hands of Ciaxares; I know again, it will be of much Advantage unto him, to get that King unto his Fetters, a great part of whoſe Kingdom he hath Conquered: But I know you too Noble to triumph over me, or to inſult over your Captive-Rival, whom you cannot chuſe but know to be a Man of Soul, ſince he hath meaſured his Sword with yours; ſuffer me therefore, to have ſo much Honour as to contribute my Endeavours towards the Puniſhment of our Common Enemy, and of Releaſing the Princeſs: And I do oblige my ſelf by Promiſe, that if it pleaſe the Deſtinies to be ſo propitious unto me, as that I ſhall find out the Illuſtrious Mandana, yet I will never tranſact any thing unto your Prejudice, until firſt the Fate of Arms in Duel have decided our Fortunes. I confeſs Artamenes, (ſaith he further) that my Requeſt is ſomething difficult, yet if your Soul be not capable of any but eaſy things, I ſhall conceive you unworthy to be my Corrival. 'Tis true, (replied Artamenes) but I cannot conſent unto your deſire: It is much more eaſy for me to determine our Controverſy by the Sword, than Conſent unto your Liberty; nor is it in my Power ſo much, as perhaps you imagine. As my Love is not inferior unto yours, Artamenes (replied the King of Aſſyria) ſo my deſire of Combat is no leſs violent in my Soul than yours; yet I would not Fight for the Enjoyment of the Princeſs, ſince She is not in a Condition to be the Prize of the Conqueror; but Artamenes, our beſt and moſt expedient courſe, is to purſue the Raviſher of Mandana, and to contribute both our Endeavours jointly together for her Freedom, ſince our Intereſts unto her are ſo equal. Do you not apprehend, that if both of us ſhould fall in Combat, then would the Glorious Mandana remain in the Poſſeſſion of our Common Rival, without either Protection or Defence? At theſe Words, Artamenes paus'd, and then replied; Doubtleſs, it was not juſt to Expoſe our Princeſs unto ſo much hazard; nor is it fit for me, who am entruſted by the King of Medes with his Army, to diſpoſe ſo peremptorily of ſuch a Priſoner as the King of Aſſyria; all that I can with Honour and Safety promiſe, is, to employ the beſt of my Endeavours for his Releaſe. But to teſtify in the mean time, how deſirous I am to Encounter ſo Gallant an Enemy, and that I will, if poſſible, procure his Freedom; I do now engage my Honour, never to pretend any thing unto the Princeſs, altho She were in my Poſſeſſion, tho the King of Medes ſhould conſent unto it, and She her fair ſelf were pleaſed with it, before the Fate of Arms has rendred me a Conqueror in Combat with you. I cannot deny (ſaid the King of Aſſyria) but your Arguments are convincing, that you have Reaſon to Treat me as you do, and that my Requeſt was unreaſonable: And, tho you be Wiſer than I am, yet I beſeech you confeſs, I am more Amorous, ſince I have loſt ſo much Reaſon, which you have retained. I muſt Diſpute with you (replied Artamenes) that Controverſy more obſtinately than the other. Then the King of Aſſyria without any further Replies, did entreat him to endeavour his Releaſe, which once happily obtained, might much conduce to the Safety of the Princeſs. Upon this Artamenes retired, and committed the Guard of the Aſſyrian King unto Araſpes, commanding to Treat him with all Obſervance and poſſible Civilities, waiting upon him unto his accuſtomed Lodging, and ſo at this time they parted. Artamenes marched through all the Streets, kept the People in good Order, and quite quenched the Fire; he ſent out ſeveral Men, to ſee if they could diſcover any happy tidings of that Galley, which had carried away his Princeſs: He diſpatched Poſts unto Ciaxares, with Intilligence of all Adventures, and employed all the reſt of the day in giving out Orders: At Night he retired unto that Chamber where his Princeſs was wont to lie, which he knew to be the ſame by the Information of Thraſibulus, unto whom he applied himſelf with as much Civility, as the Inquietude of his Mind would permit him; he gave Order for the Reparation of his Ships, which had been torn by the Tempeſt, and conſumed by Fire: He related unto Artamenes, how the King of Aſſyria did Treat him with much Reſpect, and permitted him to lye within the Caſtle, where he did ſee the Princeſs Mandana; and how the laſt Night, they were all very apprehenſive of that noiſe which the burning of Ships did cauſe; and how the King of Aſſyria call'd for his Sword, and never reſted in a place; that he having a deſire to go unto the Princeſs's Lodging, found it lockt, but found no Soldiers which uſed to guard the Fort, and eſpecially that Place; that he call'd for his Servants, and broke open the Chamber-door, but found no Body in it; afterwards, when he deſired to go out of the Fort, he found it a thing impoſſible, by reaſon of the Fire: That after all this, he often went unto the top of the Tower, where too deeply reſenting his Diſaſters, he reſolved every Minute to throw himſelf either into the Fire, or the Water. Thraſibulus could make no further Relation, becauſe he arrived at Sinope but the day before; ſo he left Artamenes in his Chamber, who at their parting aſſured him, he would move the King to make him ſatisfaction for his Ships which had been burnt: Thraſibulus did highly commend his Moderation, becauſe in all theſe ſudden and unexpected ſad Diſaſters, he did not deject himſelf by unprofitable Sorrows, but couragiouſly endured this ſo conſiderable a Loſs. Artamenes did wake away the Night in ſuch diſturbed Imaginations, as cannot be conceiv'd by any but himſelf. Behold (ſaid he in his melancholly Mind) the place where my Princeſs is abus'd! Me thinks I ſee her with a doleful Memory think upon me, and where perhaps She mourns for the misfortunate Artamenes! Without doubt She hath ſpoke ſomething concerning me; for by what other way was it poſſible the King of Aſſyria could know that Artamenes was more than real Artamenes? I, who during the time I was in the Court at Cappadocia, paſſed for no other than ſuch a one as Philidaſpes, a ſilly Knight, tho perhaps I was as Amorous as he, and by conſequence as unlike to delude: But alas, my moſt divine Princeſs! how fatally comes it to paſs, that I ſhould be here in your Priſon? And that I ſhould find your Raviſher here, but not you? I find a Rival, upon whom I cannot with Honour exerciſe my Revenge; I have lamentably loſt a Princeſs, whom I know not how to follow; her Beauty, which was my higheſt Glory and only Happineſs, I find now to be cauſe of my dire Diſaſters, and her own miſerable Misfortunes; She has met with many Adorers, but yet they are ſuch, as are without becoming Reverence. In what places ſoever She came, She procured Rivals unto me, and Enemies: Ah Divine Eyes! (cried he out) how comes it to be poſſible you ſhould infuſe ſuch injuſt, and ſo irregular Reſentments? You, I ſay, which never charm'd my Heart with any other Thoughts, but thoſe of Fear and Reverence? I, who never durſt preſume ſo high, as to ſay, I lov'd you; I, who never look'd upon you, but was Planet-ſtruck, and Trembled; I, who have long, long adored you in the Secret of my Soul; I, (I ſay) who had rather dye a thouſand Deaths, than any one of all my Actions ſhould in the leaſt degree incur your Diſpleaſure: But for all this, you are Courted by Hearts who are moſt unworthy of you; Hearts that never ſtudy that Reverence which is your due, but aim only at their private Satisfaction; for my part, I cannot repent me of my humble Paſſions; and in ſpite of this Misfortune fortune in miſſing this Soul of Life, I had rather be Artamenes than Mazares; not but that he is happy in his very Crime, for he ſees her, ſpeaks to her, and has the opportunity to diſcourſe of his Paſſions; but doubtleſs her Anſwers are all Diſdain; and thoſe Eyes which are his Glory and Delight, will become his Puniſhment when they ſparkle Anger at him. In a word, I had rather lodge innocently in the heart of my Princeſs, than lie an Offender at her feet. But, Oh Heavens! (cry'd he out, in a ſudden paſſion) will you permit this terrible Tempeſt to continue, and be her ruin? As he was muſing thus in theſe melancholly imaginations, he heard a great noiſe without; and preſently Chriſantes coming haſtily into the Chamber, Sir (ſaid he) the King of Aſſyria will eſcape; or, to ſpeak truth, I think he is gone: for Araſpes hearing a noiſe in the King's Chamber, within which (out of reverence unto him) he did not lie, opened the door, but found no King: We went all immediately out, and ſearched diligently; we find, that under his window, which is directly oppoſite unto a fire-ruin'd Houſe, there is a great heap of ruinous rubbiſh, which hath filled up the Mote under the Caſtle in that Quarter, ſo that it raiſed up a high hill of combuſtible ruins, by which we ſuppoſe the King eſcaped. Artamenes, tho he was much moved at this unpleaſant news, yet ſent out Orders immediately unto all the Ports of Sinope, and went himſelf to ſeek his Priſoner. As he was at one end of the Town, he diſcovered a Troop of Men in Arms at the other end, and who endeavoured to become Maſters of the Port: He haſted thither, but all too late, for the King of Aſſyria was already gone, and had charged through the Court of Guard. Theſe were ſome who were commanded by Aribees, and who every one did believe to be dead; but he did lie cloſe under the rubbiſh of that ruin'd Houſe, which ſeem'd to bury him alive. This man, to gain more time for the King of Aſſyria's eſcape, began a Skirmiſh, notwithſtanding all the Wounds which he had formerly received. Artamenes no ſooner ſaw him, but ſaid, What, Traytor, art thou riſen again to betray thy Maſter? if thou wilt eſcape with thy life, then thou muſt give me my death. In ſaying ſo, he made at him with ſuch a furious impetuoſity, as Aribees, tho courageous enough, was forced to retreat a little; yet it was but to retard his death one moment longer. for Artamenes did preſs ſo ſore upon him, as he had enough to do to defend himſelf, and muſt needs fall under the Valour of him who never fights but conquers: In concluſion, he beſtowed upon him ſuch a fatal blow acroſs his body, that, in ſpight of his Curaſs, he fell at his feet. Before he died, he confeſſed, that being ſo concealed under that heap of rubbiſh, he rallied as many of his men as he could, and hid them amongſt the ruins of Houſes; and having in the interim enquired what Chamber the King of Aſſyria did lye in, he got up to his Window in the beginning of the Night, by that heap of Cinders and half-burnt Wood which was under it, and ſo with as little Noiſe as poſſibly he could, he helped the King of Aſſyria to eſcape. At the end of this Confeſſion, this perfidious Wretch loſt both his Speech, and his Life together. All his Complices ſeeing him in ſo ſad a Condition, betook themſelves to their Heels. Artamenes could purſue the King no further, by reaſon of the Nights obſcurity. Upon his return unto the Caſtle, he ſent unto Ciaxares, to advertiſe him of the Accident, and ſpent all the Night in Contemplation of all the mutable and capricious humours of his Fate; he was much amazed, when he conſidered all his Adventures, and that one ſo Young ſhould be the Subject of ſuch Viciſſitude in Fortune. Whilſt he was thus deep in Thought, and walking in his Chamber, (for his turbulent Mind would not permit him Sleep) he found upon the Table a very rich Table-book, whoſe Leaves were of Indian Palm; but, Oh Heavens! into what an Extaſy was he wrapt, when upon the opening it, he found the Hand of his Princeſs; he looked upon it again moſt earneſtly, and the more he lik'd the Lines, being now fully perſuaded it was her Hand, and thus began to read.

The Princeſs Mandana to the King of Aſſyria.

R*Emember*, Sir, you told me a hundred times that you could deny Mandana nothing; if you think upon that, you will not accuſe the generous Mazares of any Infidelity, ſince he was moved at my deſire to Act as he did; not that he has any other Intereſt in my Liberty, than ſuch as Virtue does infuſe into Souls well deſcended. Reſolve then to Pardon him that Crime, which to ſpeak truly, does in ſome ſort Reflect upon your own Advantage, ſince it is a means to leſſen my Averſion, by the Teſtimony which you gave me of your Love. Know, that I will Protect him in my Father's Court, who hath Protected me in yours. Know alſo, that it is by the Pardon of Mazares, by which you may obtain yours from Mandana, and may find more room in her Eſteem, then ever you could in her Affection.

Mandana.

As ſoon as Artamenes had read this Letter, he preſently repented of his Malignity againſt Mazares, and now made as many Prayers for his Safety, as he had before for his Ruin: Appearances (ſaid he) are fallacious, and it is too much raſhneſs to Cenſure upon the Actions of another, without moſt certain Knowledge. Would not any one have concluded Mazares the moſt unworthy Man upon Earth, and that his Infidelity unto the King of Aſſyria, had no other foundation, but his unjuſt Love? But it ſeems, that Pity and Compaſſion were the only Motives which prompted him to this Tranſaction: I perceive it is not his Fault, I am not the happieſt Man in the World; but if the Tempeſt do not prevent me, I ſhall hope to enjoy my Divine Treaſure; in the mean time, I ſhall reſent the Actions of Mazares, as having no other deſign in them, than ſuch as conduce unto the Liberty of my Princeſs, tho it was my croſs Fortune to come too late to Relieve her; but, ſaid he, what imports it, by what means good Fortune come, ſo I enjoy it? I will therefore in this hope revive, and reſolve to become a Friend unto Mazares, in Protecting him againſt the King of Aſſyria. After he had thus reaſoned with himſelf, and ruminated upon what his Princeſs writ; he looked if there were any more within the Book. But, alas, he found that which he expected not, it was a Letter from Mazares to the King of Aſſyria, and thus Indited.

Mazares Prince of Saces, to the King of Aſſyria.

I Will now no longer conceal my Crime, but will ingenuouſly diſcover unto you how great it is: I have not only been Perfidious unto you, but have alſo deluded her, whom of all the World I moſt adore, which is, the Princeſs Mandana*: She thinks I endeavour to leſſen her Misfortunes, whilſt my Aims are only for my ſelf. In ſhort, my Sin is againſt her as well as you, and it proves alſo againſt my ſelf, ſince for ought I ſee, all my Endeavours are ineffectual. But what ſhould I do? It was Love conſtrained me, and I muſt obey. If you be truly Noble, you will pity me without any thoughts of Revenge, unleſs upon your Self, as well as me. Yet I muſt tell you, that I ſhall be ſufficiently Puniſhed by* Mandana*, as long as* Artamenes keeps ſuch ſtrong Poſſeſſion of her Heart, and denies Admittance unto you, unto me, and unto all the Princes in the World, except him: It is againſt the Law of perfect Generoſity, to Puniſh me for that Crime, of which your ſelf is Guilty.

Mazares.

What's this, I ſee, Said Artamenes! I expected to find a Friend, and in the turning of an Eye, I have found a Rival; and a Rival too, who perhaps has uſed my Name, and abuſed my Princeſs in conveying her away, She ſuppoſing it to be my deſign, which he tranſacts for himſelf: But moſt Glorious Princeſs, can I hope for ſo much Bleſſedneſs, as to be entertained into your Heart, as Mazares thinks? If it be true, then I am the moſt happy, and the moſt unhappy Men, both together, that ever breath'd; happy in having tha Honour which all the Princes in the World cannot deſerve; and unhappy in having a Title unto that Treaſure which I can-not poſſeſs. Capritious Fortune, which orders all Occurrences, does never afford me any good, but She makes me more Reſentive of it by a Deprivation; as if Sweets would not Reliſh, unleſs I Taſted the Bitter alſo: I ſhould never have known, that I was thus Loved, unleſs by the Extremity of my Misfortunes, I had been thus brought to hate my Life, and wiſh my Death. Whilſt he was in theſe Contemplations, one came and told him, that no Intelligence could be learnt all along the Sea-coaſt, concerning that Galley in which the Princeſs was; this gave him ſome Hopes to mingle with his Fears of her Shipwrack, and did ſo elevate his Spirits, that he admitted of the Company of his Commanders in the Army, who followed him. Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Aglatides, Araſpes, Feraulas, and Thraſibulus, that famous Greek, all came into his Chamber, where Artamenes entertained the laſt of theſe more particularly, and told him how ſorry he was, that he could not ſo readily as he deſired, furniſh him with Ships; but if it were ſo, that his Deſigns at Sea, were only to ſecure himſelf from his Enemies, (as ſome ha formerly hinted unto him) then he would promiſe him a ſafe Sanctuary in the Court of the King of Medes; and did further oblige himſelf, to remit him unto his former Eſtate, as ſoon as he had found out the Princeſs his Daughter. Thraſibulus returned him moſt humble Thanks for this obliging Offer, and accepted it, ſince this was all he was able to do for the preſent. The Valour, and winning Qualities of Artamenes, had poſſeſſed this Man's Soul with ſo muc Love, ever ſince he firſt knew him, that this happy meeting proved an Antidote unto him, againſt hi former Misfortunes. After Artamenes had thus honoured him, he went out with him, and all the re of the Officers, into the Streets of the Town, whe the Fire was quite quenched, yet all the rude Rub

bli

biſh remained; the ſad Sights which every where appeared, great Beams half burnt, whole Houſe quite demoliſh'd, and ſuch lamentable Objects, infuſed ſuch melancholly Imaginations into them all, as it was impoſſible to think of any thing but Sadneſs in a place ſo diſmally Diſmantled; there they ſaw ſome Men ſearching for their Treaſure which was buried among the Cinders of their Houſes. Others, who are compoſed of a more tender Diſpoſition, were raking among the Ruins, for the Bones of their burned Kindred and Friends. Artamenes was much mov'd with theſe mournful Spectacles; he commiſerated and comforted all he met, and promiſed unto the Inhabitants in general, that nowithſtanding their Rebellion, he would move the King to Rebuild their Town. Feraulas then preſented a Man unto him. who brought a Letter from the King of Aſſyria: He took the Letter, broke open the Seal, and reading it in a low Voice unto himſelf, found theſe Words.

The King of Aſſiria unto Artamenes.

I Commend your ſcrupulous Virtue, which would not permit you to make uſe of your Generoſity: Doubtleſs you could not well have conſented unto the Liberty of your Priſoner, who deſired it; unleſs you had failed in that Duty which you owe unto the King of Medes. As I will be juſt to you; be not you unjuſt to me; nor blame a Prince, who had not made an eſcape, had you truſted him upon his Parole; nor can he think he hath committed a Crime, ſince he eſcaped your Guards with intentions to endeavour the delivery of our Princeſs. To teſtify unto you, that in breaking my Priſon, I have not broken the Conditions of our Treaty; I do here promiſe you again, That I will advertiſe you of all Paſſages, and that I will make no War upon the King of Medes, but afford him ſome Auxiliaries: And that which is moſt difficult for me to perform; I promiſe you not to ſpeak a word more of my affection to the Princeſs, though it ſhould be my happy fate to deliver her; nor will I think it was your neglect which gave me my Liberty: Keep Promiſe with an Enemy, if you would have him keep promiſe with you.

The King of Aſſyria.

Artamenes read this Letter with a double reſentment, both of joy and ſorrow; he was well pleas'd with the King of Aſſyria's Promiſes, for the Princeſs might as ſoon fall into the hands of Labinet, as his; but on the other ſide it much griev'd him, that he ſhould, in the face of all the People, receive ſuch a Letter from the King of Aſſyria as he muſt not ſhew unto Ciaxares, for many reaſons therein contained, and therefore he would not impart it unto any. When he was come into his Chamber, he took a leaf made of the bark of Cedar, or ſome ſuch like (for the Ancients were not acquainted with Paper) and writ theſe words.

Artamenes, to the King of Aſſyria.

I Will never fail where once I Promiſe, but ſhall account it as a due Debt, which muſt and ſhall be Paid: Be confident, that I will punctually Perform every circumſtance which was agreed upon between us; I wiſh we were now in a Condition to diſpute the Prize of which I am unworthy, which yet none ſhall ever enjoy but by the Death of Artamenes.

When this Letter was ſealed, he gave it unto the ſame man who brought the other; who drawing nearer, whiſpered him in the ear, and told him how he had Command from the King of Aſſyria to acquaint him, That if he had any occaſion to ſend unto him, he was retired unto Pteria, a Town whereof Aribees had been Governour, as well as of Sinope, and that it was now committed unto his Fidelity; After this the man departed. Artamenes went out alſo, and continued his walk round the Town; he went unto the Temple, which he moſt preciſely viewed, ſince it was the place where firſt began his Love: upon his departure from thence, not well knowing whither he went, or what he did, he continued his courſe along the Sea ſide, where the Gally which conveyed away his Princeſs did once ſtand: whilſt he continued his melancholly walk, with his two faithful Companions in all his Adventures, the wiſe Chriſantes, and the valiant Feraulas, Was ever time ſo ill imploy'd (ſaid he to them) as ſince we came to Sinope? It is impoſſible to be more toſt and croſt with multitudes of ſad events, than we have been: The time is tedious alſo in conſideration of the ſmall or no utility which any of our tranſactions have produced ever ſince. I came with hopes to relieve my Princeſs, and alas, I find her in moſt eminent and dreadful danger, where I cannot bring her any Aſſiſtance: When I gave any credit unto thoſe fears which ſeized upon my Soul, then was I ready to caſt my ſelf into the Flames, and be reduc't to aſhes, as well as the Town; on the other ſide, when I rows'd up my Soul, what pains did I take to relieve my Princeſs? I fight, I quench the flames, and puzzle my ſelf; but when all is done, in lieu of my Princeſs, I find her Raviſher, and find him in ſuch a condition as I cannot take Revenge, without a ſtain unto mine Honour. And then again, I find another new Raviſher of my Princeſs, and in ſuch a Place as is inacceſſible: Preſently, I find my Rival-Priſoner make an eſcape; and muſt pray for Mazares, whoſe Ruin I deſire. Oh Deſtinies, cruel Deſtinies! who order all our Fortunes; I beſeech you, make me either abſolute Happy, or abſolute Miſerable; and toſs me not continually between Hopes and Fears, between Life and Death. Sir (ſaid Chriſantes unto him) after ſo many Misfortunes which you have either ſuffered or prevented, you muſt hope to ſurmount them all. And it is to be hoped (added Feraulas) after all theſe croſs events, Fortune will be weary of her obſtinacy, and give over. During all this time, the Heavens were clear, the Wind ſoft, and the Sea ſerene; the Waves daſh gently upon the banks, and in a calm temper, ſeem'd to be obedient unto that Supream power which preſcribed them their limits. Artamenes was much pleaſed with this Halcion ſerenity; he was as much tranſported with Joy as the Raviſher himſelf could be. In concluſion, he looked along the Sea ſide, and ſaw many People aſſembled together, who by their buſie Actions, did ſeem to be much amazed: Artamenes was exaſperated with much Curioſity, and changing colour upon a ſudden; What can theſe People be doing, ſaid he to Chriſantes and Feraulas? Sir, anſwered they, Perhaps they are Fiſhers, and are untangling and drying their Nets upon the ſhore: whilſt they were walking towards them, Feraulas ſpied upon the Water ſide, ſome Wreck of a Ship; but beckned unto Chriſantes, not to take any notice of it unto their Maſter; who was ſo intent upon thoſe Men by the Sea-ſide, that he took no notice of what Chriſantes and Feraulas had ſeen; yet he had hardly gone twenty Paces further, but turning his eye towards the water which was upon his left hand, alas he ſaw it all covered with broken planks intermingled with Cordage and other wreck, and amongſt the reſt a dead Corps. Oh what horror did Artamenes apprehend! he ſtood ſtone ſtill; lookt upon the wreck, viewed the Corps; gaz'd upon Chriſantes and Feraulas, and durſt not move a ſtep further towards thoſe Men, who were not above forty Paces from him, fearing to find there the dead Corps of his deareſt Princeſs. Feraulas ſeeing him in this perplexity, ſaid unto him, What Sir, do you think there was no Ship upon the vaſt Ocean but this, that you ſhould be thus troubled at it? do you not conſider, that Shipwrack is a thing moſt common? This is the cauſe of my Grief, anſwered unhappy Artamenes; if theſe misfortunes were Rare, I ſhould not Fear ſo much. Then, maugre all his apprehenſions, he drew nearer thoſe Mariners, whoſe Trade it was to look for Wreck, and thrive by the misfortunes of others: Artamenes enquired of them, what they knew concerning this fatal Accident; one of them anſwered, that they ſuppoſed it to be ſome Galley which periſhed this laſt night in the Tempeſt, as might be conceived by what the Sea brought to the Shore, and by what they had collected from a handſome and well-faſhioned Man, who was taken up and carried into a Cabbin ſome hundred paces from the Shore; and who violently refuſed all thoſe aſſiſtances which we endeavoured to afford him. Artamenes without any further inquiſition, went to the Cabbin, where he found them all Officious to help this half dead Man; he preſently knew him to be Mazares; for he had often ſeen him at Babylon in the Court of Nitocris, Mother to the King of Aſſyria, ſo that he perfectly knew him to be the Raviſher of Mandana: He lay upon a Bed more drown'd in Tears, than Water of the Sea; and more changed by his Deſpair, than by Shipwrack. This dejected Prince did ſometimes lift his Eyes up to Heaven, and ſometimes caſt them down upon a Rich Scarf which he held in his hand, and which Artamenes did know to be the Scarf of Mandana; becauſe ſhe had heretofore refuſed him the Honour to beſtow it upon him. This ſight had ſuch a ſad operation upon the Heart of Artamenes, as he reſolv'd to live no longer. But when Sorrow had ſilenc't his Tongue; he underſtood that Mazares, who ſeem'd to be at his laſt Gaſp, and ſtriving to ſpeak, cried out as loud as his Weakneſs would permit; Oh Miſerable remainder of my Fair Princeſs, why did I not periſh with her, ſince I could not preſerve Her? Alas, alas, What do you do unto me? Why do you ſhew me the Mournful Reliques of my Unfortunate Princeſs, whom I have deſtroyed? Oh ye Gods, who guide our Deſtinies, and are not ignorant of my endeavours to preſerve Her, why did not you aſſiſt me? At this Artamenes drawing nearer, whoſe Grief, Anger, Rage, Deſpair and Love, would not permit him to reſolve, whether he ſhould kill this more than half-dead Man, or no; or whether he ſhould Charge him with his Crime, or further inform himſelf how this Fatal Accident happened. Sometimes he was in that Cruel Reſolution; and ſometimes he would queſtion him; Sometimes he would Lament his Princeſs, and ſometimes accuſe the Gods; ſometimes he would kill his Rival, and ſometimes Himſelf: his Tears and Lamentations would ſometimes break forth whether he would or no, and that ſo paſſionately, as Mazares underſtood who he was, by ſome who pronounced the Name of Artamenes. He then turned himſelf with as much precipitance, as a man in his feeble condition could do; and beholding Artamenes with a moſt Pitiful and Reſentive Aſpect: Is it you, ſaid he, who was the moſt Happy Man in the Affection of a great Princeſs, and whom I have made the moſt Unfortunate by her Ruine? Is it thou (anſwered Artamenes with a heart wounded through with wo) who by thy injurious Act, has undone the World, and deprived it of Her who was the Faireſt and Moſt Illuſtrious in it? It is I, replied the Unfortunate Prince, with his Eyes drown'd in Tears, who am the ſame unworthy wretch you ſpeak of, and who would immediately puniſh my ſelf for it, if I had but ſtrength enough; but Death I hope ere long will do it for me: Methinks I find you too Calm; I ſhould be obliged unto you, if your hand would undertake that Office. Thoſe who firſt found me Floating upon the Water, I believe, do know I did not much court them to preſerve me; for it is infinitely againſt my will to live after the Death of this Divine Princeſs. But is it certain, ſaid Artamenes, that the Princeſs is Dead? Did you ſee her periſh? Did you uſe all your power to preſerve her? Did you not part from her? Did you ſee her in the Water? Did you ſee her Dead? I ſaw her upon the Galley (anſwered the ſaid Mazares), I ſaw her fall into the Sea, and I caſt my ſelf after her; I took hold upon her by this Scarf, and held her up a long time upon the Waves; but oh, ye cruel Gods, one rouling Billow unlooſed this fatal Scarf, and parted us, ſo that I could never ſee her more. Ask me no more after this, what I did, or what I thought, for I deſired Death, and freely bequeathed my ſelf unto the Waves, not valuing my Life at any rate; and at laſt, I was found floating upon the Water by theſe charitable Men, who brought me into this Cabbin. Now Artamenes, you have all I can inform you of; here unhappy Prince, ſaid he, take this Scarf, which more belongs to you than me; I deſire nothing in this World, but the Glory to dye by your hand, if you would pleaſe to honour me ſo much; Mazares pronounced theſe laſt Words ſo faintly, that every one thought him dying.

Artamenes ſeeing him in this ſad Condition, took the Scarf which feebly fell from the Hand of this faint Prince, and he went away from this deſpicable weak Enemy, who was not worthy of his Revenge, having too ſadly ſatisfied his Curioſity. He dolefully droopt as he walked along the Sea-ſide, being followed by Chriſantes and Feraulas, who obſerved as they went, whether they could eſpy any thing belonging unto this dead Princeſs. He commanded the Mariners to go all along the Shore, and among the Rocks, to ſee what they could diſcover; never was Man in ſo pitiful a plight as poor Artamenes. Chriſantes and Feraulas had not hearts to ſpeak unto him; nor did he himſelf know that they were near him: He lowr'd, and look'd upon the Water, ſuppoſing every thing he ſaw, to be the dead Corps of his deareſt Princeſs; he would ſometimes ſtride a moſt precipitate pace, and then upon a ſudden ſtop, and ſtand in a deadly Dump; after he had in vain walked very long by the Water-ſide, he ſtept upon a ſmall Rock which ſtretched it ſelf a little into the Sea, to ſee if the Waves would reſtore unto him, that which they had taken away; and commanding every one to continue their Queſt, there remained none with him but Chriſantes and Feraulas, who, ſay what he could, would not leave him. But alas, what lamentable Expreſſions did poor Artamenes uſe? What did he think? Am I not, ſaid he, the moſt unlucky Man that ever liv'd? Can a more horrid Torment be imagined than this, which by the Tyranny of my Fate I now endure? Ah, my faireſt Princeſs, was it the Intentions of the Gods only to ſhew you upon the Earth? Did they make you to be the Wonder of the World, and muſt not we all Adore you? Ah! alas, alas, ye furious fatal Flames (cried he out, looking upon the Town, whoſe Ruins might be ſeen far off), what cauſe have I to curſe you for the loſs of my unparallel'd Princeſs! I know too well, it was your oppoſite Element which gave me my dire and diſmal loſs; yet mercileſs, tho you be, you would have left me her precious Aſhes, that ſo mine might have had the Glory to be mixed with them; but the rigor of my Fate is ſuch, that this inexorable Element of Water will not render me my Princeſs, either alive or dead, altho it is her will to ſave the Life of her Raviſher, and my Rival; had the Fates left this Rival in ſuch a ſtate, as I might without blemiſh unto my Honour have ſatisfied my Revenge, it had been ſome light Conſolation amidſt my grand Misfortunes; but this barbarous Element retains my Princeſs, and ſaves my Rival, only to tell me the ſad News, how he ſaw her in inevitable Danger, and left her in the Arms of Death; that he ſaw her in ſuch Reſentments of me, as I durſt never hope for, and at laſt loſt his Tongue, ſo that I could gather from him nothing but deſpair. You have this comfort yet remaining (ſaid Chriſantes), that he could not ſay he ſaw her Dead, that ultimate and fatal Syllable was not yet pronounced; alſo, it may rationally be hoped, (added Feraulas) that the ſame Fate which followed Mazares, might alſo follow her; and haply hers much better than his, for She hath no reaſon to wiſh her own Death like him; yes, Sir, it may very well be She lives, and hath no ſad Reſentments, but of you. Ah, Chriſantes, ah Feraulas, (cried he out) this poor pittance of Hope which remains at the Root of my Heart, may chance to cauſe a greater Evil. Yet if this were not, you might be ſure, my Friends, that without any further Cries, or Tears, or Sighs, I would preſently follow my moſt adored Mandana; there is not any thing but this faint hope, which reſtrains me; and tho it be a good Preſervative, and a Cordial Antidote againſt all Misfortunes, yet it is too weak to hinder me, if I once were fully perſuaded my Princeſs were periſhed. Alas Chriſantes, methinks I ſee her in the Sea, how diſdainfully She receives help from her Raviſher; methinks I ſee that boiſterous Wave take her from him, who when he had ruin'd her, would then too late preſerve her; methinks I ſee the Waves (oh ye Gods, what ſhould I ſay, what ſhould I think!) Smother her, and Sink her to the Bottom of the Sea. In ſaying ſo, Tears did flow; he kiſt the Scarf with profound Sorrow, and ſadly ſaid, Oh thou which heretofore was the height of my Ambition to wiſh for, and thought thee the greateſt Honour I durſt preſume to Aſpire unto; I could never believe that I ſhould reſent thee with ſo much Sadneſs: All I deſire from thee now, is to Inſpire me with Courage enough to Vanquiſh thoſe who are Enemies unto my King, and my Princeſs. I look upon thee now, as a Motive unto my Memory of Mandana, which will double my Deſpair, and haſten my Death. Now Chriſantes, ſaid he, do you not now wonder at the odd Contrivances of my humorous Fate? That I ſhould receive more Teſtimonies of my Divine Mandana's Affection to me from my Rival, than from her ſelf? Her ſevere Virtue did diſtribute her Favours with ſo much Wiſdom and Reſervedneſs, that I my ſelf could never preſume of ſo much happineſs, as I underſtood from the King of Aſſyria, from Mazares's Letter, from Mazares himſelf, and from Mazares Dying, who all do tell me, I had a greater Share in her Heart, than ere I could hope for: But, oh ye Gods, why do you afford me ſo great a Bliſs, ſo much certainty of her Affection, ſince She in whoſe Election my Felicity conſiſts, is not in a condition to Love; and ſince I muſt abandon Life, Hope, and all which can be called happy! After he had thus vented his Sorrow, he was a while Silent, ſometimes looking upon the Sea, ſometimes whether thoſe he had ſent to ſearch, were returned; and ſometimes caſting his ſad Eyes upon the Scarf. Chriſantes ſeeing the Day was much ſpent, would perſuade him to walk toward the Town, because the Day was far ſpent. This reaſon, tho it had Argument enough in it to perſuade him, yet it could not have cauſed him to remove, if he had not ſeen at a good diſtance off, Thraſibulus, Araſpes, Aglatides, Hidaſpes, and many others coming towards him, who out of Civility did retire, to give him the Liberty of enjoying his Thoughts; but after they had a reaſonable time abſented themſelves, they drew near; he no ſooner ſaw them, but he roſe up, and looking upon Chriſantes and Feraulas, ſaid, What ſhall I do to perſuade theſe Men that my Paſſion for the Princeſs is for her, as the Daughter of Ciaxares, and not as the Miſtreſs of Artamenes? Happily you may (ſaid he unto them) but certainly, my Friends I cannot; I know if Mandana could appear at this inſtant, She would command it, and would charm my Tears. As ſoon as he had ſpoken, Thraſibulus and all the Company came near, ſo that he became ſilent, and met them. They perceived ſome odd Adventure had chanced; and becauſe he was infinitely beloved of all, eſpecially thoſe who had near Relations unto him, they changed Countenances alſo, and did participate of that Grief, whereof they knew not the Cauſe; they were ignorant of it a good while, and it was a very Death unto Artamenes to tell them: Feraulas ſaved him the labour, and by a ſhort Relation told them the ſad News; he was very brief, leſt, if he ſhould aggravate the matter, Artamenes would not be able to contain himſelf, but would give too many Teſtimonies of what he deſired to conceal. Thraſibulus lamented the loſs as much as poſſible; Hidaſpes being more concerned, as having Intereſt in the Houſe of Ciaxares, was deeply perplexed; Araſpes alſo did ſadly reſent it; Aglatides, who naturally was of a Melancholly Compoſition, did beſt ſympathize with Sorrow, and was ſo ſad, as if he had a particular Intereſt in the Princeſs. Artamenes, who thought the Town would be a better Umbrage for his Grief, than where they were, becauſe he might retire into his Chamber under pretence of Writing unto Ciaxares, therefore he walked on, giving Order unto Feraulas, to take them which came with Thraſibulus, and go ſeek out for Intelligence, either of the Safety or Loſs of the Princeſs. All the way he paſſed to the Town, he obſerved much Silence; mean while, every one got Information of the Accident. There was an univerſal Condolement for the Princeſs, and of thoſe eminent Excellencies in her; her amazing Beauty, her trancſendency of Spirit, and her Divinity of Soul. Some lamented the King her Father, and his ſad Reſentments; others ſorrowed that ſuch an Illuſtrious Race as the King of Medes, ſhould extinguiſh in the Princeſs, by ſo fatal a Chance. In ſhort, they all lamented, and amongſt them all, none knew who had leaſt Cauſe to complain: Hidaſpes ſpeaking to Chriſantes, ſaid unto him, This Accident makes me remember what Grief the King of Perſia my Maſter reſented, when he firſt received the ſad News of Young Cyrus's Shipwrack, who as you know better than I, was a Prince of the moſt ſuperlative Hopes in the World; and queſtionleſs Ciaxares will be as ſenſible of the Princeſs, his Daughters Misfortune, as Cambiſes was of that Prince, his Son's. I did extreamly lament that Loſs, for tho I was not ſo nearly concerned as the King his Father, yet I could not chuſe but as much bewail him. Chriſanees diverting this Diſcourſe, ſaid unto the ſad Artamenes, That happily the Meſſenger, whom he ſhould ſend unto Ciaxares, would find him forward on his March, he having Muſtered together his Men when he came away, with intentions to follow preſently after. Aglatides, whoſe Thoughts were all compos'd of Love and Melancholly, addreſſing his Speech unto Artamenes, I aſſure you, ſaid he, altho I be the Subject of Ciaxares, and by conſequence an Enemy unto the King of Aſſyria; yet I cannot chuſe but pity the laſt, as one who when he ſhall hear of this ſad Accident, will think himſelf the moſt undone Man upon Earth; for (ſaid he) tho he was not beloved, yet he was a Lover, and Love doth ſo exceed all the other Reſentments, which either Nature, Reaſon, or Friendſhip can give, that there is no Compariſon between them. As for my part, ſaid he, if in lieu of a Lover, who was hated, as the King of Aſſyria was, I ſhould know a Lover which was beloved, who had ſuch a Loſs, I am perſuaded my very Pity of him would endure unto my Death. But as the Virtue of the Princeſs was too reſerved ſerved to expreſs any Affection unto any one, therefore I muſt needs lament the King of Aſſyria, who indeed really deſerves it. Artamenes was too much troubled to Anſwer unto this urgent Diſcourſe; and tho he had Power to reſtrain his Tears, yet he had not enough to ſtop his Sighs; he only told Aglatides, that the Princeſs was ſo full of all admirable Virtues, as that all who knew her, did adore her; and therefore all thoſe who had that happineſs, muſt needs lament her, whether Medes, Perſians, or Aſſyrians. Then Artamenes, becauſe he grew weary of all Company, did go ſome thirty Paces before all the reſt. Mandaua was the Subject of every ones Dicourſe, but of Artamenes Grief. Every one commended the Affectio nwhich Artamenes bore unto the King his Maſter. Altho that ſad Accident had as ſad an Influence upon them all; yet ſome amongſt them had never ſeen the Princeſs, and ſome again had never been in Love, ſo that a vaſt difference might be obſerved between their Loſs and his, and they were ignorant of the main principal Cauſe of his Grief.

When they were come into the Town, Artamenes went into his Chamber, and diſmiſſing all his Attendants, remained ſadly by himſelf alone, entertaining nothing but Deſpair, by calling to Memory all his dire Diſaſters: He took Mandana's Scarf, which he found in the Hands of Miſerable Mazares, and lock'd it in his Cabinet; but all his care in keeping it, was rather an Addition to his Deſpair, than any Conſolation to him in his Sorrows; and to augment his Injury, he recalled into Memory every ſlight Favour that ever he had received from his Princeſs. This great Soul, whoſe Thoughts had never any Reflection but upon Heroick Atchievements, did upon this occaſion permit the Idea of ſo many hardy Combats, ſo many victorious Battels, and ſo many glorious Triumphs as he had obtained, to come freſh into his Imagination, to the end his Deſpair might be more excuſable, and that they might better colour the Weakneſs which he ſhould diſcover in this Adventure; he reſented all his Atchievements, chievements, as performed in the Service of that Miſtriſs, whom now he thought not to be in this World. The Memory of theſe were great Additions unto his Miſery; if it can be conceived poſſible any Addition can be unto a Sorrow, which from the firſt Reſentment was extream and unſupportable. He could not reſolve with himſelf, whom he ſhould ſend to carry this ſad News unto the King of Medes, and far leſs could he reſolve to tell the diſmal Story with his own Mouth. In ſuch confus'd and anxious Thoughts did he paſs away all that Night, as he could not determine any thing upon it. In the Morning, Feraulas coming to him, Artamenes asked him what news of Mazares, and whether he recovered that Weakneſs wherein laſt Night he left him? Let ſome run, ſaid he, to know, and if he be able, let him be brought hither; he gave this Order very haſtily, not knowing almoſt what he ſaid; but a while after, News was brought, that the Fiſhermen in whoſe Tent Mazares lay, did report, That Mazares never revived out of that Sound in which Artamenes ſaw him, but died immediately after his Departure our of the Tent. The report of his Death, infuſed various Imaginations into Artamenes; he admired Divine Juſtice in deſtroying a Prince, whom he knew to be moſt Criminal, and murmured againſt thoſe rigid Gods for ruining a Princeſs whom he knew moſt Innocent. And as his Spirits were wholly taken up with the Grandure of his Loſs, ſo he made no ſtrict Inquiſition concerning the Funerals of Mazares; the very thoughts of his Raviſher were ſo tormenting to him, that he did quite obliterate his Memory. Amidſt theſe reſtleſs Thoughts, News was brought, that it was ſuppoſed Ciaxares was upon his March with all his Army near the Town; for a great thick Duſt ariſing out of a Valley, was diſcovered from the top of the Tower, which could be nothing elſe but the March of his Troops. This News did much ſurpriſe Artamenes, but much more, when he ſaw Andramias arrive, who informed him, that within a little more than an hour Ciaxares would be in Sinope; Artamenes then began to beſtir himſelf, and ſo diſcreetly, that he was in ſome hopes to hide part of his Sorrow; he Commanded all the Officers to draw up into Battalia; he mounted himſelf on Horſe-back, and was followed by Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Araſpes, and Aglatidas; he Marched to meet the King, who when he was within the ſight of Sinope, left his Army, and marched in the Company of the King of Phrygia, of the King of Hircania, of Perſodes, Prince of the Caducians, of the Prince of Paphlagonia, of the Prince of Licaonia, of Gobrias, Gadates, Timocrates, Artabaſes, Madates, and Aduſias, who were Perſians and Grandees amongſt the Homotimens, like as Hidaſpes and Chriſantes, who accompanied Artamenes; never was Meeting more ſad than this; Ciaxares ſeeing the Town ſo ruin'd, could not chuſe but Sigh; Artamenes ſeeing Ciaxares, unto whom he muſt be a Meſſenger of ſuch ſorrowful News, had not the heart to move towards him, yet ſtirring a little, and the King coming very faſt, they were preſently within thirty Paces of each other. Then Artamenes, and all who Accompanied him, alighted, and went on Foot to meet the King. Artamenes, notwithſtanding his Sorrow, preſented Thraſibulus unto him; then Ciaxares giving them all his Hand to kiſs, Commanded them to Mount, and calling Artamenes unto him, he began to Diſcourſe of their Tranſactions in general; and to aggravate their Miſfortunes, he told Artamenes that he underſtood Mazares had carried away his Daughter. Sir, ſaid ſad Artamenes, you will think your ſelf more unfortunate when you ſhall know that Mazares lives not, and that it may be——At theſe words, Artamenes penſively pauſed, and could tell no further. Ciaxares looking upon him with a moved Aſpect, ſaid to him, What, Artamenes, have you any more ill News yet to tell me? Sir, anſwered Artamenes, the News is ſo very bad, I dare not tell it; I beſeech your Majeſties patience until we arrive at the Town, before you be further informed; for your Sorrows will be leſs ſeen in your Cloſet, than in the open Field; Ciaxares wondred at his dark Diſcourſe, and looking him in the Face, he perceived ſuch ſigns of Sorrow in his Eyes, that he durſt not preſs him any more, to relate that which rather than his Life he deſired to know, leſt if he found what he feared to be true, he ſhould diſcover too much Weakneſs before all theſe Illuſtrious Princes. He gazed in the Eyes of Artamenes, and conſulted with his own Reaſon, and winded all his own Thoughts to gueſs at it; but it was eaſy to be perceived by Artamenes's Deportment, and by his Silence, that he much feared to relate all he knew, and Ciaxares durſt not enquire of that whereof he was ignorant. Mean while, thoſe which came with Ciaxares, and they who came with Artamenes talking together, the Accident was divulged amongſt them: The ſad News cauſed many Murmurs and Mourning Exclamations amongſt them, ſo that the Noiſe reaching the Ears of Ciaxares, he knew well enough there was ſome ſtrange Adventure happened, which he muſt know. Being come to the Town, the Soldiers which Artamenes brought with him, obſerving the Orders which they received, made a Guard for the King to paſs through; and tho Ciaxares did extreamly long to ſatisfy his Curioſity, yet would not before all the World, but ſilently went on till he came to the Caſtle. As for his Army, he ordered it to Incamp in the Valley, which was between a great Hill and the Town, and which was ſpacious enough to lodg them, tho they were a hundred thouſand Men. The King was no ſooner lighted, but Artamenes Conducted him unto the beſt Chamber of the Caſtle; he was no ſooner there, but he carried him into a Cloſet: Come my Dear Artamenes, ſaid he to him, what ſtrange News have you to relate, which yet I have not been acquainted with? This demand did much ſurpriſe Artamenes; yet ſeeing there was no Remedy, he was conſtrained to acquaint him with the Princeſs ſad Fortunes; he could not contain, but his Tears went before his Tongue: Ciaxares ſeeing his Tears trickle down his Cheeks, ſaid to him, What would your Tears tell me Artamenes? Is my Daughter dead? Then Artamenes with a profound Sadneſs, told him in few Words, all he knew concerning ing Mandana's Shipwrack: The Report ſtruck Ciaxares to the Soul; never did Father expreſs more Tenderneſs and Grief for a Daughter, than he. Artamenes ſeeing he might now well weep it out, and not be obſerved by Ciaxares, who was blinded with his own Tears, began and continued it ſo long, as never was Sight more ſad; he ſpoke not a Word to Ciaxares by way of Comfort, neither could Ciaxares find any fault with the Tears of Artamenes. Was there ever (ſaid this Mourning Father) any Prince more unhappy than I? Could not I have foreſeen my Misfortune by ſo many Oracles, told unto Aſtiages, that the Scepter which he bore and left unto me, ſhould ere long be transferred into the Hands of a Stranger? Might not this have informed me, that I having but one Daughter, ſhould inevitably loſe her? Alas, Aſtiages turmoiled himſelf, and turned every Stone to deſtroy them who might uſurp the Crown; but he never dreamt of preſerving her who ſhould loſe it in loſing her Life! Is there no hope remains? Is it certain, ſaid he, She is quite gone for ever? Well, well, ſaid he, my dear Innocent Daughter ſhall not dye unrevenged. The Gods who have puniſhed Mazares one of her Raviſhers, hath taught me what I ſhall do unto the King of Aſſyria: He ſhall dye, he muſt, and that immediately. As he is the cauſe that the Illuſtrious Race of the Fam'd Dejoca, is extinct in the Perſon of my Daughter, ſo ſhall the King of Aſſyria's alſo extinguiſh in his own. The Gods, no not the very Gods ſhall prevent his Death, nor mitigate my Fury. Artamenes amazed at this Expreſſion, ſaid, Sir, did you not meet with him, whom I ſent to acquaint you with the King of Aſſyria's Eſcape? What do you ſay, Artamenes, that the King of Aſſyria is——(replied he angerly)? I ſay, Sir (ſaid he), That I ſent one to acquaint you with the King of Aſſyria's Eſcape; how (replied Ciaxares angerly), is not he in my Power? Is he at Liberty? Ah! no, no, it cannot be; I cannot believe he is gone; I cannot eaſily think Artamenes will ſuffer a Priſoner of ſuch a conſequence to eſcape. It is too true (anſwered Artamenes faintly), it was my ill, and his good Fortune to eſcape my Guards: But, Sir, ſaid he, let not this trouble you ſo much; for if it were as eaſy for me to regain my Princeſs, as it is to give you the Death of the King of Aſſyria, your Deſires ſhould have Satisfaction. Ciaxares was not pleaſed with this Reply, and tho he always loved Artamenes, and had great Obligations towards him, nor did he ever entertain the leaſt Suſpition of his Fidelity; neither did he believe this Accident proceeded from any other ground, than from his Negligence and Improvidence; nor yet could he in all his Tranſactions accuſe him of the leaſt Fault; yet he reſented this Eſcape but odly, and went out of the Cloſet without ſpeaking one Word. Then finding all the Commanders and Grandees, who followed him in the Chamber, he diſcourſed unto them concerning his lamentable Loſs, with much Conſtancy, tho with much Sorrow, and every one of them according to their ſeveral Relations, did teſtify how they ſhared in his Miſfortune with him, always hinting unto him, that as long as the Corps was unfound, there was ſome hopes remaining: As for Artamenes, he retired a while into another Chamber, where ſeveral Complements paſſed between him and all the Princes which came with Ciaxares, for they all honoured and eſteemed of him, as much as of the King whom they ſerved. Mean while, Ciaxares was very deſirous to have all the Paſſages concerning the King of Aſſyria's Eſcape to be made more apparent unto him; he underſtood that Artamenes ordered Araſpes to Command the Guard over the King of Aſſyria, and that Araſpes was one whom Artamenes loved; yet do what he could, he could not diſcover that Artamenes had any Conſent in his Eſcape: But amongſt thoſe who came with the King, there was one who was an intimate Friend of Aribees; this Man, when he underſtood that Aribees was Dead, entertained much hatred againſt Artamenes, who finding out by chance that the King of Aſſyria had writ unto him, acquainted Ciaxares with it: Ciaxares ſent immediately for Artamenes; he no ſooner ſaw him, but he asked him very ſharply, why he did not acquaint him ho the King of Aſſyria did write unto him concernicg hi Eſcape: Artamenes was much ſtartled at this Queſtio becauſe the Letter contain'd ſuch Matter as muſt no be made known, and ſtood a good while before he anſwered: at laſt he told Ciaxares, That it was not ſtrang he ſhould forget a thing of ſo poor importance as tha ſince he had ſo many Paſſages of ſad Concernment t acquaint him withal; and ſince the Letter contain' nothing, but how the King of Aſſyria told him he ha not tranſgreſſed the Laws of Generoſity in making a Eſcape, ſince he was not truſted upon his Parole. W ſhall be better ſatisfied, ſaid Ciaxares, by the Letter i ſelf, than by Words. Sir, replied Artamenes, I ſhoul moſt willingly ſatisfy you; but as I was walking yeſterday by the Sea-ſide, hearkening after News of th Princeſs, I unfortunately loſt it, and I ſuppoſe it fel into the Water: Artamenes made this Anſwer ſo coldly, that it moved Ciaxares to tell him roughly, contrary to his Cuſtom, that he thought this Chance ver ſtrange, and in plain terms, that the managing of thi Buſineſs did not pleaſe him. Artamenes, who bor much Reverence unto him as the Father of his Princeſ and who knew he had reaſon to ſay as much as he did therefore he did ſilently withdraw; and becauſe Ciaxare turned his back, and would hear no more, he went ou of the Room.

Night being come, ſome Commanders retired to the Camp. All the Princes were lodged in the Caſtle, and faireſt Houſes of the Town, which the Fire had ſpared Ciaxares did paſs over the Night with reſtleſs Mind but Artamenes much more, who beſides his own Paſſions did participate of the King's, notwithſtanding his Jealouſy and rough Deportment towards him. It ſeems Fortune obſerves no mean, neither in her Favour, nor her Frowns, but Exalts her Favourites unto the higheſt Top of Felicity, and Sinks thoſe whom ſhe is diſpleaſed with, into a Gulf of Miſery. Thus ſhe dealt with Artamenes, who now ſeem'd to faint under the preſſure of this diſaſterous Accident, and thought Himſelf and his Honour deeply concerned. The next Morning Ciaxares ſent for him into his Cloſet; when he was come, there appear'd more Anger than Grief in his Countenance, which plainly told Artamenes there was ſome freſh misfortunate Storm ariſing; but as the State ſtood with him, he valued his Life, and his Death, at the ſame rate, and was indifferent whether of them ſhould be his Fate. The Violences of Ciaxares, and his angry Looks, did not much trouble him, but he reverently asked him if he would Command him any Service; Ciaxares anſwered, yes, he would ſee the Letter which the King of Aſſyria writ to him; and looking upon him with Eyes full of Anger: Look you, Artamenes, ſaid he, ſee how Innocent you are of the King of Aſſyria's Eſcape; expound unto me this myſterious Riddle, which I cannot underſtand. Artamenes was wonderfully aſtoniſhed at it, becauſe he ſaw it was the ſame Letter which he writ unto the King of Aſſyria, and which he gave unto that Man who brought the King of Aſſyria's Letter unto him; yet to be better ſatisfied, he opened it, and read the very ſame words Verbatim, which he had written. As he was reading, he often changed Colour, and was as long about it as he could be poſſible, thinking in the mean time for ſome handſome Reply; for he plainly ſaw, that if he did not ingenuouſly Paraphraſe upon the Letter, his Honour would receive a great Blemiſh, ſince it would ſeem, as if he had been Perfidious unto his Maſter, and held Correſpondence with his Enemy: On the other ſide, he thought, that if he ſhould diſcover his Love, then he ſhould too much traduce the Honour of his Princeſs, which he valued at a higher rate than his own. Ciaxares, who had not yet ſounded him to the Bottom, was diſpleaſed at his long Silence. What look you for, Artamenes (ſaid he unto him) in that Letter? Is it for ſome fine Excuſe you are ſo long pumping? Speak I ſay, and explain what you have writ from the firſt to the laſt Syllable; in ſaying ſo, he took the Letter out of Artamenes hands, who all this while behav'd himſelf with much Reverence: Sir, ſaid he unto Ciaxares, if I could produce the King of Aſſyria's Letter, your Majeſty might ſee I am not ſo guilty as you ſuppoſe me; nor that theſe Compacts between us are of ſuch a ſtrain as you may imagine. If you be not faulty, then inform me better, ſaid Ciaxares, ſuppoſing he had ſome ſecret Reaſon in his Heart, which happily might juſtify him. Ciaxares opening the Letter, read aloud what Artamenes had writ, and looking Sternly upon him, how Expound you theſe Words, ſaid he unto him,

> I will never fail where once I Promiſe, but ſhall account it as a due Debt, which muſt and ſhall be paid; be confident, I will punctually perform every Circumſtance which was agreed upon between us.

Speak Artamenes, ſaid he, tell me what you have promiſed the King of Aſſyria: and indeed, how could you promiſe him any thing without Breach of Duty to me? Sir, anſwered Artamenes, you know there hath been ſome ſmall Difference between the King of Aſſyria and me. There is alſo ſome Tranſactions between us, which do not at all concern your Majeſty; and that the love of Honour hath a long time made us Corrivals. Tell me then (ſaid Ciaxares, aſperating his Speech) what Colour can you Gloſs upon theſe Words at the end of the Letter?

> I wiſh we were in a condition to diſpute for that Prize of which I am moſt unworthy, yet, which none ſhall ever enjoy but by the Death of
> Artamenes.

What Prize is this, Artamenes, which is ſo dear unto you? I told you Sir, anſwered he, that Glory and Honour is the Prize, and the only Cauſe of all the Differences and Tranſactions which the King of Aſſyria hath, or ever ſhall have with Artamenes. It is for the firſt Rank in point of Valour, for which I will contend as long as I live. For my part, ſaid Ciaxares, after all your plauſible Expoſitions, I cannot conceive what Prize you ſhould contend for, unleſs my Crown, or my Daughter; and which of theſe ſoever it be, it makes you equally culpable; yes, and you Artamenes, much more in fault than the King of Aſſyria, ſince her Quality may pretend to both; but your Condition, by all appearances, is far below them. Sir (replied Artamenes faintly), by this Argument, you may ſuppoſe that the King of Aſſyria would never contend with me about ſuch a thing, unto which I could never pretend. You ſpeak (replied the King) in a Tone ſo diſſonant unto your Condition, that it doth rather confirm my Jealouſy, then extenuate it; for tho the King of Aſſyria be my Enemy, yet he is a King, and in that reſpect you owe him more regard than is fitting for your Diſcourſe. When I have a Sword by my ſide (anſwered Artamenes, who could no longer contain), it may be I ſhould make a King look about him, as well as another Man; you know ſome, who can inform you whether I ſpeak truth or no; and he, whoſe part you ſcorn to take, can tell you ſomething, if he had not a very bad Memory. I do not queſtion your Gallantry (ſaid Ciaxares), nor make any doubt of your Valour, but I have ſome cauſe to ſuſpect your Fidelity. Your Majeſty needs not to doubt of either, if you did but know me well (ſaid Artamenes). It cannot be imagined his Faith ſhould be corrupted, who hath had ſo commanding a Power as I have had. Why then (replied the King) do you not make your Actions more clear and intelligible, ſince you are ſo Innocent? I beſeech your Majeſty (anſwered he), preſs me no more to diſcover a thing, which I neither ought, nor can reveal. It is ſufficient, ſaid he, that the Gods have ſo often imployed my Hand to ſupport that Scepter unto which you think I pretend, and kept your Crown upon your Head. Upbraid me not with your Services (retorted Ciaxares angerly), for if you remember what once you were, and what now you are, you will acknowledg ledg they have not been ill-rewarded: I have remem bred them too much, and if I had loſt the Memory o them, perhaps you had ere now loſt your life. Conſum no more time in contriving Excuſes to palliate you Crimes; I ſhould be as glad as you, that you coul purge your ſelf from them. Sir, replied Artamene I am far from Upbraiding you with my Services, fo they have been ſo inconſiderable, I ſhould not ſo muc as have thought upon them, but in Vindication of my injured Innocency. Can you produce any proof o your pretended Innocency, ſaid Ciaxares to him? Yes anſwered Artamenes, from Arguments drawn from my Virtue, if you were capable of knowing it. Well (replied Ciaxares), you will not then diſcover unto me what this Correſpondence is, which you hold with my Enemy, and Raviſher of my Daughter. Sir, (anſwered the Innocent Artamenes) you ſhall never know that Artamenes, this Man whom it ſeems you know not; the Man, who as you are perſwaded would betray you; the Man whom once you loved, that this Man did ever hold any Intelligence or Correſpondence with your Enemies. I ſhall in time make you confeſs (replied Ciaxares) for it is apparent enough, both by your Letter, and your Diſcourſe; and as the Knowledg of every Particular in this cloſe Conſpiracy is neceſſary to my own Safety, and Good of my Kingdom; ſo perhaps, when you are in a cloſe Priſon, ſafer than that wherein you kept the King of Aſſyria; then, I ſay, you may perhaps better inform me. Sir, anſwered Artamenes, (without any Paſſion or Tranſportation) Priſons and Puniſhment cannot compel Artamenes to Reveal what he hath a mind to Conceal. My Priſon ſhall thus far comfort me, that I have exchanged my Sword for Fetters, in a time when your Majeſty have no Potent Enemies to moleſt you; ſo that thus loſing me, you have but loſt an unprofitable Servant. I underſtand you very well, (replied Ciaxares in much Choler) you cannot forbear upbraiding me with your Services. Then going to the Chamber-door, he call'd for the Captain of the Guard, and Commanded him to Conduct him unto his Chamber, and keep him ſafe upon forfeiture of his Life. The Captain, who dearly loved Artamenes, and who knew how great a Favourite he was, ſtood amazed at the Command, not well knowing whether he ſhould obey or no; and finding ſo ſudden a Revolution in the Fortune of one, who the very day before, was the only Man in the Kingdom, and who ordered the Deſtinies of Kings and Princes, as he pleaſed; he was ſo confounded, that he knew not what to do. But Artamenes obſerving his Aſtoniſhment, Come (ſaid he) let us go, (giving him his Sword) and pay this laſt Service unto the King, thereby teaching the reſt of his Subjects to Obey with a willing Mind, more courſe Commands than theſe. In ſaying ſo, he made low Obeiſance unto the King, and followed Andramias with as ſlow a Motion, as if he had been free. After this, the King Commanded to ſecure Araſpes, and was obeyed. It were a very difficult task to relate fully, how Artamenes reſented this Paſſage, and what ſtrange Thoughts he apprehended. The King of Medes alſo had much Reluctancy for what he did. Artamenes did more wonder at the odneſs of his Fate, than lament it. The King repented almoſt every Minute of what he had done: What ſhall I do, ſaid he, with this Offender, who hath done me ſo much good Service, and whom I love ſo well, who hath ſtolen away the Hearts, both of my Friends and Enemies? This Offender, I ſay, who all the World eſteem, yet none knows where he was born; who ever met with ſo croſs an Accident? Can it be imagined that Artamenes, by whoſe Valour I have obtained ſo many Victories, and conquered ſo many Kings and Countries, ſhould wound his Honour with Treachery? On the other ſide, what can I conceive of this Letter, which puzzles him to explain, and the Crime is ſo great, that his Pretence and Colours cannot hide his Correſpondency with the King of Aſſyria: No, no, ſaid he, Artamenes is guilty; and tho it be either in matter of Love, or matter of Ambition, he is Culpable, and deſerves Puniſhment. The worſt is, loving him as I do, I ſhall grieve more for him, than he will for himſelf; but ſaid he ſuddenly, the Sorrows which I reſent for the loſs of Mandana, will quit me from that of Artamenes; and my Soul will be ſo ſenſible of the one, that there will be no room for the other. But let us uſe all Expedients to bend this obſtinate Spirit, let us do what we can to make him confeſs his Fault, that ſo we may have occaſion of Pardon.

Whilſt Ciaxares was thus arguing the matter with himſelf, Artamenes, whoſe amorous Soul could not be ſeparated from the Memory of Mandana, was more troubled at her Shipwrack, than his Priſon; and entertain'd more ſad Apprehenſions of her loſs, than Sorrow for his own. Do your worſt, you rigid Deſtinies, ſaid he, you cannot afflict me more; my Soul is not ſenſible of any Sorrow, but for Mandana, therefore I defy you; multiply your Penalties upon my Perſon, and I will not complain of your Injuſtice. Since my Princeſs wants a Tomb, it is no matter tho I languiſh in a Dungeon; the worſt is, it can but hinder me from a more high and generous Death. Ah faireſt Princeſs, ſaid he, whether you inhabit amongſt the Dead, or amongſt the Living, in Heaven, or upon Earth; if you could but ſee the unhappy Artamenes in Ciaxares Priſon, you would reſent it with Wonder and Sorrow; however, I complain not of his Severity or Injuſtice, ſince I ſeem culpable in his Eyes; and indeed, I am ſo, but it is in a far different manner than he apprehends it. I am culpable, deareſt Princeſs, but it is againſt you, indeed I am, I confeſs it, I am culpable in Loving you, not as you are the Daughter of the King of Medes, but as you are the faireſt Angel that ever lived. As you are the Daughter of a great King, it was lawful for me to Love you; but as you are Mandana, I muſt Love you, and not reveal it; I muſt Suffer, and not complain; I muſt Adore you in my Death, and muſt dye Dumb, and not ſpeak a word of Love; yet, alas Mandana, (cried he out) I fear I am the cauſe of your dire Misfortunes; for if I had not loved you, and your Soul not poſſeſſed with any thoughts of Grace towards me, then perhaps you might have plac'd your Affection upon that great Monarch of the World, and without all theſe Misfortunes have been Queen unto the King of Aſſyria; then, ſaid he further, I ſhould not have been ſo happy in the Glory of her Love, nor would you have had any thought of Artamenes, the unfortunate Artamenes, a Lover, whoſe obſervant Paſſions never offended againſt the Laws of Virtue, by any exorbitant Deſires; and whoſe obſequious Soul was ever obedient unto your Will, whoſe Life and Death is conſecrated unto your Service. In ſum of all, I will dye (my Princeſs) and never let Ciaxares know what the ground is of Artamenes Correſpondency with the King of Aſſyria. Think not this (my Divine Mandana) a ſmall Sacrifice, which I am reſolved to offer unto you in the Carriage of this Affair. The deſire of Glory, is a Paſſion as well as Love; a Paſſion moſt violent and imperious; yet for all that, I muſt value the Honour of my Princeſs above it. What tho' Ciaxares think me perfidious, it is no matter, ſince I am not ſo; I know the King of Aſſyria, tho my Enemy, will vindicate me; and tho he be my Corrival, yet he will ſpeak in my behalf. Believe on, Ciaxares, and think me a Traytor as long as you pleaſe, ſince you do not know the true ſtate of the Matter; for tho my Princeſs was moſt Innocent, and her Virtue had but too much ſtrictneſs in ſo pure an Affection; yet for all that, Ciaxares and the cenſorious Court, it may be, will never believe that I could be ſo long diſguiſed without her conſent. If I ſhould diſcover who I am, it would more confirm Ciaxares in that Opinion which he entertains, that I aſpire unto the Crown, altho I am not born ſo far from a Crown as he imagines. Alas, ſaid he, how rigid are my Deſtinies! I am afraid to juſtify my ſelf, tho it be moſt natural to do it; my Fears to offend my Princeſs, tranſcend my fears of Infamy, altho the fear of Infamy ſhould be above all other whatſoever; and tho never any did more greedily thirſt after Glory than Artamenes; but why ſhould I fear it, as long as I have the Teſtimony of my own Conſcience, and the Teſtimony of my moſt mortal Enemy? The gods, who are Protectors of oppreſſed Innocency, will ſurely vindicate me after I am Dead: they who now Accuſe me, will then Juſtify me, by ways which I cannot apprehend. Truth in concluſion will be found the ſtrongeſt. Whilſt Artamenes and Ciaxares were thus tormented in their own melancholly Reſentments, all the Court, and all the Army were angred at the Accident: The King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caduſians, the Prince of Licaonia, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Hidaſpes, Chriſantes, Aglatides, Thraſibulus, Madates, Megabites, Aduſius, Artabaſes and Feraulas; all theſe were wonder-ſtruck at the Impriſonment of Artamenes; and not only theſe Princes and Captains, but alſo all the Inhabitants of Sinope, and the whole Army, all theſe did ill reſent it. As ſoon as the News was divulged, all the Kings, Princes and Commanders, went unto the Lodging of Artamenes, but were denied Entrance. Ciaxares ſent for them all, and told them, That he was compelled for the good of his Affairs to Arreſt Artamenes, and commanded them to have a care that the Soldiers, who he knew loved Artamenes very well, did not Mutiny. He told them, that this Tranſaction would conduce much to the ſafety of the State, and the good of all the Princes his Allies. This far-fetcht Diſcourſe made no Impreſſions at all upon their Spirits; but all of them unanimouſly did beſeech him to act warily in this buſineſs of ſo great importance: You know, Sir, ſaid the King of Phrygia, and I do believe it an abſolute impoſſibility, that Artamenes ſhould betray you; you may remember, Sir, that the time was, when we were at Variance, and I fully perſuade my ſelf, if any ſuch thing had been tranſacted by him, I ſhould have known it. The King of Hircania ſeconded, and ſaid, it cannot ſink into my belief, that ever he can be guilty of any treaſonable Deſigns. No, I warrant you, ſaid Hidaſpes, I would not believe it, tho he himſelf would ſay it. If my Head would be accepted as a Gage for his Innocency, ſaid Aglatides, I would throw it at your Majeſties Feet. If ſo much

Innocency

Innoceny as he carries about him, had half the Army for his Accuſer (ſaid the Prince of the Caduſians) the Army of Artamenes would confound them all, if they ſhould reſiſt. I ſhould ſhamefully be-ly my own Eyes, and my own Knowledg, ſaid the Prince of Licaonia, if I ſhould witneſs againſt him. I do not think, ſaid the Prince of Paphlagonia, that there can any one in the World be found, who can or dare accuſe him. I am his Complice, ſaid Chriſantes, if he be Criminal; and yet I am moſt certain, that I am far from any Treaſon; I have ſeen his Soul ſtand firm amidſt the Cloud of his Misfortunes, and cannot think it ſhould ſhrink in the Sun-ſhine of his Proſperity. It is neither credible, nor poſſible, cried Madates and Megabites, both together. If your Majeſty would be pleaſed to bring his Accuſers face to face, I ſhould ſoon ſtop their Mouths, ſaid Feraulas.

In ſhort, all theſe Princes, and all the Captains, one after another, and ſometimes all together, did ſtrive who could plead with ſtrongeſt Arguments in behalf of this unfortunate, yet famous Artamenes; one put him in mind of his Victories, another of his Generoſity; one extoll'd his Valour, another his Fidelity. In concluſion, they all fell off from the Reverence which they owed unto Ciaxares, becauſe he would not allow Artamenes time to Anſwer in his own Defence. The King was then much tranſported with Paſſion, and ſhewed unto them the Letter which Artamenes acknowledged to be his own Hand; and ſaid unto them in great Fury, Look, I pray you, whether he, whom you ſo violently defend, be ſo Innocent, as you ſuppoſe him. The King of Phrygia read the Letter, and upon the firſt Apprehenſion, did think it a little odd; yet for all that, he could not alter his Mind, no more than all the reſt which heard it; after they had a while conſidered that appearances were falacious, but no proofs, they all unanimouſly concluded with one Voice, (tho they could not well argue it) that ſtill Artamenes was Innocent; and that he was ſo conſiderable a Perſon, as tho he were culpable, yet the King ought not to loſe him upon a ſlight occaſion. So we do apprehend it (anſwered Ciaxares) yet notwithanding, I would have you know, that in this Juncture of time, when the Soldier is Inſolent and ready to Revolt, it is not ſafe to countenance turbulent Spirits too much. When the Kings, Princes and Commanders, perceived the King ſo much in Paſſion, they would preſs him no more: And the Valour of Artamenes had made ſo perfect a purchaſe of all their Hearts, and made them all either his very Subjects, or Allies; therefore they would never quit their Reſpect unto him, nor ever become Unſerviceable unto him whom they ſo much loved, as doubtleſs they had done, if they had exaſperated that Spirit, which was already too apt to kindle. Therefore they left Ciaxares to ruminate upon the matter, and gave him time to recollect what he had done, and what was beſt hereafter to be done. Mean while Chriſantes and Feraulas, upon their departure from the King, did vent a thouſand Proteſtations in behalf of their Maſter's Innocency, and ſtuck cloſe to their Reſolutions of Conſtancy in his Service; they proteſted to periſh, rather than one of ſo high a Soul ſhould ſuffer ſuch Injuries. There was nothing they ſtuck at, but this Letter, and Artamenes had this good fortune, that every one believed there was ſome myſterious Matter in it, which he himſelf would clear. There was not one that could believe him to be Guilty, for there was no probability that he ſhould comply with that Man, whom he endeavoured to Conquer, and whoſe Empire he ſtrove to overthrow.

The Officers had much to do to keep the Soldiers in Order; they ſo tampered with them, that they left them in a diſpoſition to be at Artamenes Service, whenever he ſhould need them; they were glad to give them good Language, and deſire their Patience, telling them that Artamenes would be preſently at Liberty; and that if they ſhould raſhly go about to deliver him, it would make his Condition worſe; ſo that mixing Commendations of Artamenes with their plauſible Perſuaſions, they cheriſhed them, and prevented their Revolt both together, and did ſuppreſs their Violences which yet did not need, without loſing their Loves. But for all this, the whole Camp, and all the Town did ring in his Commendations; the Name of Artamenes Ecchoed every where; the Medes, the Perſians, the Cappadocians, the Phrygians, the Hircanians, the Caduſians, the Paphlagonians, and all other Nations, whereof the Army was Compoſed, all cried up Artamenes, and made Songs and Elogies, every one in his own Language, and after his own Cuſtom, in Commendations of Artamenes, and who but Artamenes in every Mouth? There was not a Captain in that vaſt Army, which vaunted not of ſome Honour which he particularly had received from Artamenes; nor was there a Common Soldier which did not brag that Artamenes knew his Name, and himſelf too. In ſum, Artamenes was the Subject of every one's Diſcourſe; every Soldier left the Camp, and went into the Town to learn how ſquares went with Artamenes; and every Inhabitant of the Town went into the Camp, to incite the Soldiers in behalf of their beloved General Artamenes; there was not one to be found, only except this Friend of Aribees, who tranſacted privately and prejudicially to Artamenes in incenſing the King againſt him; every one except him, I ſay, was a well-wiſher unto Artamenes. It was this Man, who had not only got knowledg that the King of Aſſyria had writ unto Artamenes; but it was he alſo, who gave the Letter unto the King of Medes. Chriſantes and Feraulas did much admire which way Ciaxares ſhould come by it; but Heaven, which would have Crimes always diſcovered, made it evident at laſt; they much beat their Brains, and turned every Stone to find it out, but could not. But thus it fortun'd, the Meſſenger whom the King of Aſſyria ſent unto Artamenes, and by whom Artamenes returned this Letter in anſwer unto the King of Aſſyria, did in his return back, meet with one who was Brother unto Aribees, who falling into diſcourſe with this Meſſenger, asked him whither he Travelled, and from whence he came? And by degrees ſcru'd out of him, what his Buſineſs was; this Brother ſo tampered and ſuborned the Meſſenger, that he ſhewed unto him the Letter; and when he had read it, did by his permiſſion Copy it out; he alſo told the Meſſenger, that he might do a moſt excellent piece of Service, not only unto all Medea, and all Cappadocia, but unto Aſia alſo, and indeed unto all the World, if he would return back again to Sinope, and carry this Letter unto a Friend of his, who waited upon Ciaxares (the very ſame Man, who was ſo cloſe an Enemy unto Artamenes); he further told this Meſſenger, that it would be a moſt acceptable piece of Service unto the King, ſo that he need not doubt of being largely Rewarded; and that the King of Aſſyria, who ſent him, would alſo be much pleaſed at it, he having ſo great an Intereſt in the Ruin of Artamenes; and that the King of Aſſyria would be as well pleaſed with the Copy, as the Original, and that he himſelf would carry the Copy to the King of Aſſyria, whilſt he did return unto Sinope, and carry the Original unto this Friend of his. He perſuaded him not to ſcruple at the Ruin of an Ambitious Man, whoſe Aims were at Univerſal Monarchy; a Man whom all Men ſeem'd to Love, but their Loves did proceed from Fear; ſo that if ever Fortune ſhould frown upon him, he would aſſuredly be Ruin'd without recovery, and that all things would then look with new Faces; and that thoſe who were now in appearance his deareſt Friends, would then become his utter Enemies; and that for his part, he would be ſure to have the Benediction of all the World, if by his means this Deſign were brought about, which tho it was great, yet might ſafely be negotiated without any danger at all; for all the difficulty was in delivery of this Letter unto the King; and if that were done undiſcovered, then all the Peril was paſt. In ſhort, this Brother of Aribees, whoſe Name was Artaxes, did know well enough how to deal with him he ſpoke unto; ſo that giving a bag full of golden Perſuaſions unto him, he gull'd this poor ſilly Mercenary Wretch to do as he would have him.

Artaxes writ unto his Friend, how he had met with an admirable Expedient to be revenged for the Death of his Brother, and deſired him by all means to put it into Execution; and that for himſelf, he would go unto Pteria, a Town not far off Sinope, whither the King of Aſſyria was retired, and would tranſact with that Prince againſt Artamenes, and there wait upon the ſucceſs of that Deſign, which he had now committed unto him, not daring to appear at Court.

This Mercenary Meſſenger arrived at Sinope, found out that Friend of Aribees and Artaxes; found him diſpoſed according unto his Wiſh, and proſecuted the Deſign ſo cloſe, as he brought it unto that ſtate wherein you find it. It is a very remarkable Paſſage, that this Meſſenger, who was fully perſuaded he ſhould act an univerſal Good unto all Aſia, in Ruining Artamenes, did to his great Aſtoniſhment find, in lieu of a general Joy, that he had cauſed an univerſal ſadneſs; and how he had brought all things into ſo great a Diſorder and Confuſion, as it was hard to reduce them into their former Tranquillity. This Man, who certainly had a Soul as ſimple as ſinful, was much moved and angred he ſhould be ſo gull'd as to ſwallow ſuch a Gudgeon; ſo that he did abſolutely reſolve to Addreſs himſelf unto the Friends of Artamenes, and acquaint them, it was he who had incenſed Ciaxares againſt Artamenes. This Man repaired firſt unto Feraulas, and ingenuouſly confeſſed all the Paſſages, but with ſuch ſigns of ſad Remorſe, that altho he was the Man who had brought his Maſter's Life in danger, yet he would not treat him hardly. Then after he had ſoundly chid him for his firſt Act, he much commended him for his ſecond, and reſolved to make more uſe of him in diſcovery of this ſecret Enemy unto Artamenes. He preſently acquainted his Maſter with it, tho Ciaxares had forbid any ſhould ſpeak unto him; for the Captain of the Guard being fully ſatisfied concerning Artamenes Innocency, did not obſerve his Order ſo exactly, but he gave him liberty of entercouſe by Letter. Artamenes was glad when he knew how this Letter came unto the Hands of Ciaxares; for tho Great Souls, who are incapable of Crimes, cannot eaſily believe others are more culpable than themſelves; yet he entertained ſome light kind of Jealouſy, that the King of Aſſyria had a hand in the buſineſs; and the thought of that, did much torment him. For, ſaid he, if by happy Fate, Mandana ſhould be alive, and ſhould accidentally fall into the King of Aſſyria's hands; then what Confidence, ſaid he, can I have in the Word of ſuch a Prince, who is guilty of ſo perfidious a Fact? All this while Chriſantes and Feraulas endeavoured to uſe all means that Fortune would afford them, towards the Preſervation of Artamenes; and found it to be a very difficult buſineſs; for as the caſe now ſtood, they knew not whether or no it became their Duty, to acquaint Ciaxares with the truth of Artamenes's Story, and all his Adventures; they ſaw it would Accuſe him one way, and Excuſe him another; yet they conceived, that his Life would be leſs in danger, as a Lover of the Princeſs, than as a Friend unto the King of Aſſyria; his Quality, which was much above what it ſeem'd to be, did appear unto them to be but an ill Expedient, thereby to advantage him. They were full of ſo many Fears and Doubts, as they knew not what to reſolve upon, or to imagine: In concluſion, they thought it not fit or juſt to truſt intirely unto their own Opinions in a Matter of ſo high Importance; nor to charge themſelves ſolely with the Event of an Affair, whereupon depended the Safety or Deſtruction of the moſt Eminent Man in the World. Therefore they concluded it moſt fit and ſafe to make Choice of ſome principal Perſons, and other ſtrange Princes, who were moſt Affectionate unto Artamenes, and whom he had moſt obliged, to be of their Councel. They thought it beſt to let theſe know, that he whom they ſo well loved, was much more worthy of their Affection and Aſſiſtance, than they thought him to be; and to deſire their Advice, what courſe were beſt to be taken in this Tranſaction. They had a great deſire to ask the leave of their dear Maſter, before they went to work; but that was ſo nice a thing to truſt unto, as they would not hazard it; for he ſeem'd to be ſo careleſs of Life, that they thought he would not take the pains to preſerve it, or uſe the beſt expedients for it; and therefore they did imagine, he would never conſent they ſhould reveal him. In their laying a foundation for this Deſign, they reſolved, not to truſt this Seceret unto any but Perſians, and ſtranger Princes, and not to impart it unto any Mede, upon any condition; becauſe they being Subjects unto Ciaxares, might perchance diſpence with the Laws of Friendſhip, and reveal it, or at leaſt obſerve them with ſome Reluctancy and Scruple. So when they had fully reſolved upon this Deſign, they ſought out Opportunities to put it in Execution; and they hoped to receive this Satisfaction from it at the leaſt, that they had not neglected any expedient which might preſerve him, who is the moſt fortunate and unfortunate Man, both, that is in the whole Univerſe.

PART I. BOOK II.

THE Deſign which Chriſantes and Feraulas undertook, was ſo Juſt, that Fortune, who is an Enemy to Virtue, and was much incenſed againſt the Illuſtrious Artamenes, did ſeem to ſmile in lieu of frowning upon it. Theſe two faithful Servants intending to Aſſemble together thoſe who had been deareſt Friends unto their Maſter, excepting againſt Medes, made choice of the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caducians, and Thraſibulus, whom Artamenes ſent to viſit ſince his Arreſt; Aduſias and Artabaces, met alſo in Council; likewiſe all the reſt of the Princes, except the King of Phrygia, who kept near Ciaxares, in hopes to mitigate his Choler; who notwithſtanding all endeavours to the contrary, was in all Diſcourſes concerning Artamenes, much incenſed againſt him. In concluſion, the King of Hircania addreſſing himſelf unto Chriſantes, did entreat him, That ſince he had ſo great a Share in the Friendſhip and Affection of Artamenes, and had alſo ſo long a time been related unto him, he would be pleaſed to inform them of all his Adventures, ever ſince he came into the Court of Ciaxares; alſo acquaint them with his Birth, to the end that thereby they might happily find out ſome Conveniency which might conduce unto his Preſervation, by the Intereſt of that Prince, under whom he was born a Subject; or at the leaſt, to make uſe of ſome handſome Pretence, which might keep Ciaxares in ſome ſuſpence, until his Anger was a little over. Furthermore, Hidaſpes added, That Ciaxares's Army, conſiſting of ſo many ſeveral Nations, he might perchance be one of them; if ſo, it were good to know his Country, becauſe it would be a ſtrong Motive unto Ciaxares to be reconciled unto him, for by that conſequence he might win the Hearts of all thoſe who have the Honour to be born in the ſame Country, under the ſame Laws and Prince, that Artamenes is; if he ſhould prove to be born in an Enemies Country, then Ciaxares, it may be, conſidering he hath a Man of that Concernment in his Power, will be ſooner induced to preſerve him, as a means to draw ſome Advantage from his Enemies by it. As ſoon as Hidaſpes had delivered his Vote, all the reſt did concur and approve of it. Perhaps (added Thraſibulus) by the knowledg of his Story, we may come to diſcover the Reaſons why Artamenes held Intelligence with the King of Aſſyria, and what the Cauſe may be, that he will not Reveal it to Ciaxares; for theſe are the two myſterious Labyrinths which moſt amaze us. Sirs (anſwered Chriſantes) I apprehend it as a good Omen, that you ſhould thus prevent the Intentions of Feraulas, and my ſelf, for we came unto Hidaſpes with the ſame deſign, and to Aſſemble together all you whom good Fortune has thus happily brought unto this Houſe: The Sequel of my Diſcourſe will inform you, why we made choice of Hidaſpes's Houſe; and why we thought it fit, that ſo many famous Medes as were Friends unto Artamenes, do not meet here. In a word, Sirs, we come to tell you who Artamenes is; Chriſantes had no ſooner ſpoke that laſt Syllable, but all the Princes interrupted him with Acclamations of Joy, and Expreſſions of Hope to have him of their Nation: No, ſaid the King of Hircania, I ſhall not be ſo happy as to have that Honour; the Prince of the Caduſians ſaid the ſame, and all deſired it, but tacitly confeſſed they were all unworthy to be Soveraigns over ſuch a Subject, yet that he himſelf deſerved to be Monarch of the whole World. In concluſion, all the Princes were full of Impatiency till they knew it; and commanded that the Door ſhould be ſhut, leſt the Narration ſhould be diſturbed; they ſit down and preſſingly deſire Chriſantes to begin: Some did put it to the Queſtion, Whether it were not fit they ſhould ſtay for the King of Phrygia; but the major part did ſo burn with deſire to know the Original of him, who had ſo highly demean'd himſelf, that they would not permit ſo long delay, but did double their Entreaties, that Chriſantes would ſatisfy their longing deſires. After he had paus'd a while, and recollected into his Memory, the Idea of ſo many great Exploits, as he had ſeen him perform, reſolving to follow the Courſe which was concluded between Feraulas and him, he began the Story.

The Hiſtory of ARTAMENES.

MY Task is to ſpeak things ſo wonderful, that I conceive it convenient to prepare you beforehand, leſt you ſhould be ſtartled with Admiration; for indeed, Sir, (ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf to the King of Hircania) the Birth and Life of Artamenes, is ſo full of extraordinary glorious and tranſcendent Circumſtances, as will hardly find belief in thoſe, who only hear and have not ſeen them; therefore I think fit to proteſt unto you, That all is pure Truth which ſhall be related unto you; and if I ſhall chance to fail or leſſen the Truth, it is the Modeſty of Artamenes, which hath accuſtomed me to conceal part of his Glory, and never to aggravate the greatneſs of his Acts. Nevertheleſs, Sir, this Artamenes, whoſe Valour and Virtue has rendred him ſo Famous, is not leſſened by the Greatneſs of that Prince who gave him Life. For, Sir, when I ſhall tell you, that this Artamenes was before his birth, predeſtinated by the Gods to be a Terror unto all the Kings of the Earth, and that he is no other than CYRUS, Son of Cambiſes, King of Perſia; I ſhall tell you nothing but what is moſt true, and what I ſhall very eaſily make appear. At this, Hidaſpes, and all preſent, cried out, What (ſaid they with one Voice) is Artamenes, CYRUS? Is Artamenes Son to the King of Perſia? Artamenes (replied Chriſantes) is the very ſame I tell you; and by conſequence of the moſt Illuſtrious Family in the World, ſince his Predeceſſor the Valiant Perſeus ſeus, derives his Pedigree from the Son of Jupiter. But (ſaid Hidaſpes) did not you confirm me in that Opinion which all the World had of his Shipwrack? And did not you your ſelf tell me how you changed Maſters after his Death? And that he whom you then waited upon, was called Artamenes? Moſt true, replied Chriſantes, I confeſs I did ſo, but I did it by the Command of Cyrus, who deſiring to paſs under that Name, obliged me to call him ſo, and I will phraſe him ſo throughout moſt of this Relation, to the end you may more eaſily underſtand it. In the Sequel and Concluſion of this my Diſcourſe, you ſhall know what were his Reaſons which moved him to aſſume this Dignity. I muſt needs ſay (ſaid Hidaſpes) you have great reaſon to prepare thoſe which hear you, againſt wonder. But (ſaid Artabaſes) thoſe have loſt their reaſon, who ſuſpect the truth of it, when they ſhall conſider on what affectionate terms of familiarity, Chriſantes and Feraulas were linked unto him. There need not many Arguments (ſaid the King of Hircania, ſpeaking to Hidaſpes, Aduſius, and Artabaſes) to perſuade me that Artamenes is Cyrus; it were more difficult to think that ſuch an extraordinary Man ſhould be of a common Extraction. For my part (ſaid Thraſibulus) I have had ſome ſuch thoughts ever ſince the firſt day I knew him; for his high Actions would not permit me to doubt of his Quality. Perſodes, Prince of the Caduſians, applying himſelf unto Hidaſpes, Artabaſes, Aduſius, Chryſantes, and Feraulas, ſaid unto them, You are ſo highly honoured in being Subjects unto ſuch a Prince, that I muſt needs think your glorious Servitude excels my Sovereignty; and that it is a greater Honour to obey Cyrus, than to Command a hundred thouſand Men. Hidaſpes was ſo inflamed with deſire of knowing more preciſely all particulars concerning the Life of him, whoſe firſt Adventures he had been well acquainted with, as he deſired Chriſantes to begin his Story, from the firſt departure of Cyrus out of his Father's Court. But becauſe Thraſibulus knew nothing, and the other Princes never heard of the Paſſages in the Court of Aſtiages, only by common Vogue, which often is a liar, therefore it were more expedient he ſhould begin his whole Story, ſo that the Memory of thoſe who knew the Paſſages, might be revived, and Thraſibulus who was altogether ignorant in them, might be informed. Chriſantes then, after a little Silence in contriving the method of his Diſcourſe, and turning towards the King of Hircania, began thus.

Sir, I will not abuſe your Patience in Repetitions of Artamenes's moſt glorious Deſcent: It will ſuffice to ſay, his Name is Cyrus, and derived from the illuſtrious Race of Perſides. This is enough to inform you, That there is not one more Noble in the World: Cyrus hath this Advantage above others, that he is Sovereign of a People (if it befit a Perſian to ſay it) amongſt whom Virtue is loved, and Vice abhorred with ſuch diſguſt, that it dares not appear unleſs under a cloak of Virtue: Artamenes moreover (for ſo I will call him yet) has the Glory to be ſubject unto a Prince and Princeſs, whoſe Applauds fills the Story of all Nations, ſo that he derives nothing from them, but what is moſt Noble and Heroick. Now ſince the Hiſtory of the King of Medes, does much conduce to the clearing of my Relation, I ſhall be forced to fetch far off a Foundation to build the reſt of my Diſcourſe upon. Be pleaſed to remember, how the Ancient Kings of Aſſyria, became Lords of all higher Aſia; and how the wiſe and famous Deiocus, Son of Phraortes, did incite his Country-men to rebel againſt their Tyrant Kings; and after he had got the Sovereignty of the Medes into his own Power, reſtor'd it into the Hands of a Mede again. You know, Sir, that this Great and Generous Prince, was lineally Deſcended from the Ancient Kings of Medes, and that it was he who ordained ſuch excellent Laws, who built the ſtately Town of Ecbatane, and who reduced under his Obedience all the ſtate of his Anceſtors, which were the Bruſſians, the Paratecenians, the Struchatians, the Ariſentines, and the Budiens. After Deiocus, who reigned Fifty three years, Phraortes his Son, inherired the Crown, and reigned ſo peaceably, as if the Aſſyrians had never uſurped. But being not content to ſit quietly in the Throne of his Predeceſſors, he began to make War againſt the Perſian, a People ſo ruſted with more than a whole Age of Peace, that they finding themſelves aſſaulted by a moſt Martial People accuſtomed to Conquer; and to prevent the utter Deſolation of their Country, complied with them; and Peace was ſo concluded, that the two Crowns of Perſia and Media were inſeparably intereſted; ſo that as often as Phraortes ſhould ſtand in need of their Aſſiſtance, they were obliged to lend it. Here, Sir, was the firſt Connexion of the Medes with the Perſians. I need not relate, how Phraortes, ſwell'd with Ambition, pronounced War againſt the King of Aſſyria, who ſlept ſecurely in a Downy-bed of Peace within his own Dominions. Nor how, after he had reigned two and twenty years, and beſieging the Town of Minos, periſhed in the attempt: nor how after his Death Ciaxares his Son, the firſt of that Name among the Kings of Medes, ſucceeded in the Kingdom; nor how Fortune was ſometimes a Friend, and ſometimes a Foe unto this Prince: for I know you are not ignorant, how in giving Battel to the Libians, when he was at the very point of being Victorious, it became ſo accidentally dark upon a ſudden, that it was impoſſible for him to continue Fight, and finiſh his almoſt gotten Victory. You know alſo, that in beſieging the Town of Minos, (of which we ſpake before) intending to revenge the Death of his Father Phraortes, who was killed before this Town, and being at the very point of taking it, Medeas King of the Scythians, appeared with an Army of a Hundred thouſand Men, within ſhot of his Camp. You know alſo, how this King loſt the Battel unto the Scythians, and his Empire with it, but got again into the Throne; for this Invaſion of the Scythians laſted not above eight and twenty years. You know alſo, that this Ciaxares not changing his Reſentments with his Fortunes, revived the War with the King of Aſſyria. and at laſt became Maſter of the Town of Minos. Then, Sir, you know, how this firſt Ciaxares was Father unto Aſtiages, whom he left a quiet Inheritor of his Dominions; but as this Prince was born in a turbulent time, ſo I believe that the reſtleſs ſpirit of the Father was tranſmigrated into the ſoul of the Son, and imprinted ſuch melancholly thoughts in this Prince his Son, as cauſed him to paſs his life with much inquietude; and was pattly a cauſe of all thoſe thwartings in Artamenes his fortunes: He was married very young, and in a manner doubtleſs extraordinary, though out of my memory. The Battel which the King his Father loſt unto Aliattes King of Lydia, by reaſon of that obſcurity which blinded both Armies, was a cauſe of his marriage; for after ſo ſtrange an accident, the King of Medis conſulted with the Prieſt, and Aliattes went unto the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, which by reaſon of the Oracles there, was grown in great repute: Theſe Princes were told by the Prieſt, and by the Oracle of Diana, that the Gods did expreſs by this remarkable ſign, they were not pleaſed with the war, but that they ought to reſolve upon terms of Peace. The King of Sicily, who was a mediator in the matter, did ſo negotiate between them, that the King of Lydia, who had but one Daughter, Siſter of Cræſus, ſhould marry her unto Aſtiages, the ſon of his enemy: So you may collect by this, that the marriage which was made up ſo ſoon after the war of Lydia, gave me (ſome ſay) cauſe to ſay, that this Prince, born when the Stars had ſuch tumultuous influence, received from them ſuch troubleſome Inclinations. As for his Reign, Sir, becauſe it is ſo late ſince it ended, it would be ſuperfluous to relate it. Let it ſuffice to tell you, how he knowing that none of his Predeceſſors, ever ſince the Famous Deiocus, had enjoyed their Kingdom in Peace, therefore he always ſtood upon his guard, and feared ſome Revolt: You know, Sir, that he had by the Queen his wife, and ſiſter of Cræſus, Ciaxares who now reigns, and retains the invincible Artamenes priſoner: You know alſo that he had one Daughter called Mandana, an admirable Beauty, of great vertue and wiſdom: That long ſince the Queen his wife died, and with her all his affections to any other, ſo that he would never marry more: Since this loſs, all his thoughts are upon his young Son Ciaxares, and his young fair Daughter Mandana; endeavouring to keep himſelf peaceable within his own limits, without any attempts upon his Neighbours: And tho he had the good fortune never to be in any conſiderable actual war, yet he had to be in continual preparations for it; ſometimes againſt his ancient enemy the King of Aſſyria, ſometimes againſt his Allies, and ſometimes againſt his own Subjects; yet for all theſe inquietudes, which his perpetual turbulencies did procure him, his Court held up the proudeſt head in all Aſia. For (as you know) the Medes were always addicted to Magnificence and Pleaſures, Aſtiages eſpecially, who was moſt of all devoted unto all manner of Diverſions of his Melancholly and Penſive cogitations. Ecbatane was the fitteſt ſeat for it of all places in the world. This Prince therefore, ever ſince the birth of his Son Ciaxares, did always every year celebrate a certain day of publick Jollity. It was his Cuſtom to go himſelf unto the Temple to thank the Gods for his Son, and offer Prayers for his Preſervation: The young Prince Ciaxares was then about ſixteen, and the Princeſs his Siſter about fourteen years of Age. When one of theſe Feſtival Ceremonies were obſerved, there chanced a ſtrange Accident, which did much diſturb their Devotion and Jocundry; for as Aſtiages was going out of his Palace in the morning unto the Temple, and carried with him the Prince his Son, upon a ſudden the brightneſs of the day became all dully dim, and the Sun ſo eclipſed, as it caſt ſuch a black obſcurity over the face of the whole Earth, as none could almoſt diſtinguiſh each other; that little light which was, gave ſuch a glooming ſhadow, as was moſt terrible to them all: This Accident extreamly troubled Aſtiages. The People took it for no good Omen; for tho thoſe which ſaw this Eclipſe, had ſeen others alſo; yet this was much more affrighting than they, as well becauſe it was much greater, as becauſe it happened upon ſuch a remarkable day: Inſomuch as they did think it more than a meer curſory and natural accident, and concluded ded it to be a Comet, or ſome ſign from Heaven, by which the Gods did portend and advertiſe the King and People of ſome important matter. Some remembred that terrible darkneſs which affrighted Ciaxares the Father of Aſtiages; and then none made it any queſtion, but it was an advertiſement from Heaven, to move the two Kings of Medes and Lydia unto Peace, and therefore they thought this Comet to ſignifie ſome ſuch thing. To be ſhort, every one vented his peculiar fancy, and explained the meaning of it according to his own capricious humour: Some ſaid it might preſage the King's death; others feared the deſtruction of the Empire; ſome the loſs of the Prince his Son; and all did augure Mourning conſequents. But although this obſcurity did much amaze them, yet that which followed this Eclipſe did abſolutely confound them; for after it had continued thus dark four compleat hours, the Sun, contrary to its common natural courſe, diſcovered it ſelf all at once in an inſtant; and was ſo hot, ſo clear, and of a Light ſo tranſplendent, as it blinded all them who durſt gaze upon it: The heat no leſs extream than the brightneſs, for it was ſo exceſſive, as the people thought all the earth ſet on fire. All this while Aſtiages, who was always naturally too apprehenſive and ſuperſtitious of ſuch Accidents, and was fully perſuaded that the Prieſts knew almoſt all things future; therefore he aſſembled them together, and commanded them to conſider ſeriouſly, what might be the meaning of this Prodigy: Doubtleſs, Sir, you know how theſe men lead their lives, which afford them leaſure enough to contemplate theſe Celeſtial Signs; and have ſo deep an inſpection into the influence of Stars, that they can by them oftentimes divine long before, what ſhall afterwards come to paſs. The Gods alſo, do ſometimes inſpire them by ſecret ways which are unknown unto the Vulgar: Their Anſwers are as certain as Oracles, and have this advantage above them, that they have much more clearneſs, and far leſs riddle in them than Oracles uſe to have: ſo that Aſtiages having got them together, as I formerly ſaid; and after they had prayed unto the Gods, and contemplated the Stars, they told the King, (having prepared him beforehand to receive patiently whatſoever they ſhould tell him, leſt he ſhould break into any violent Paſſion) That according unto their Speculations, thoſe Gifts, and that Knowledg which they had received from Heaven, this great Eclipſe, which had ſuch ſupernatural Cauſes, did ſignify either his own Death, or the Prince his Son, or the declining of his Sovereign Authority. As for the two firſt of theſe, they told him, that they could not conceive it ſhould be either of them; becauſe they had heretofore, according to his Commands, calculated both their Nativities, and had collected ſeveral Aſtronomical Obſervations concerning both their Lives; they always found and concluded, that both their Lives ſhould be long; therefore they muſt by conſequence conclude, that it portends decay in Dominion; and that univerſal Revolution threatens all Aſia, particularly Meden; and that it ſhall be upon them ſuddenly, unleſs they make ſome happy uſe of thoſe Advertiſements which Heaven does ſignify unto them, as Ciaxares his Father had done before him. Aſtiages was Planet-ſtruck with this Diſcourſe; and conceiving that out of fear, the Prieſts had not revealed all they knew, did preſs them further to declare their full knowledg. In concluſion, they told him, that in their Opinion it was to be feared the extraordinary Brightneſs which followed the Darkneſs, and the Sun's ſo ſudden diſcovering it ſelf in an inſtant, did ſignify that the Prince his Son, following too much the Counſels of Ambitious Spirits, would one day uſurp his Crown. The Darkneſs did ſignify his Power, which ſhould alſo be obſcured; and the Brightneſs did ſignify the ſudden Splendor of the young Prince: But yet, for all this, there was a Remedy; for the Gods did not admoniſh Men in vain. But that the King his Father, when he was forewarned, did appeaſe them in making Peace with Lybia. And ſo likewiſe ought he to render himſelf ſubmiſſive unto them, by Sacrifices, by Prayers, and by his Virtues; and that he ought to have extraordinary care in placing wiſe and prudent Men about the young Prince, ſuch as ſhould infuſe ſapient Inſtruction into him, and root out of his Mind all thoſe corrupt Seeds, which ill-diſpoſed Men had ſown. The King no ſooner heard what theſe Magick-Prieſts had ſaid, but he was fully ſatisfied; for tho his natural Diſpoſition was always prompt, and ſuperſtitious in ſuch things; yet he had ſome apparent colour for this, becauſe Ciaxares his Son did begin to put forth ſome ambitious Buds, and all his inclinations were Grandure and Dominion; alſo he had many about him, who fomented this natural Propenſity; ſo that the thoughts of Aſtiages no ſooner reflected upon him, but he imagined him in his Throne, ſnatching the Scepter out of his Hand, and throwing him into Priſon. You may imagin, Sir, how diſguſtive this Diſcourſe was unto the Soul of a Prince, who priz'd his Crown above his Life; but who in ſpite of all jealous Reſentments, did yet retain the Affection of a Father towards a Son. In the mean while, he charged the Prieſts not to publiſh what they had told him; fearing that it might cauſe his Ruin if they did; and that if his Son ſhould come to the Knowledg of it, he might chance think it no Crime to make bold with the Crown, ſince it ſeem'd to be the pleaſure of the Gods to have it ſo; therefore he gave expreſs Command unto them, that they ſhould tell the Prince his Son, and divulge it unto all the People, how this Eclipſe had nothing extraordinary in it; that the Circumſtance of Day upon which it happened, was a meer Caſualty, from whence no ill Conſequences can be drawn; and that they ſhould not ceaſe their Prayers unto the Gods for his good Fortune: the Prieſts were obedient to his Commands, but he did not reap that profit from their Obedience which he expected. For ſince the People were told it threatned no evil, they apprehended and feared much more. The young Prince did imagine, that perhaps the Magicians found it foretold his Death; ſo that both Court and People were in great Diſorder. The King did all he could to teſtify he harboured no ill Apprehenſions in his mind; yet for all that, in the midſt of the feaſting Jollities, which were ſumptuouſly prepared for his Diverſion, and diſguiſe of his melancholly thoughts, one might ſee him troubled, and his mind much diſquieted. His heart was poſſeſt with two Paſſions at once; Paternal affection towards a Son, contending with Jealouſie of his Sovereign Authority: So that it was eaſie to conclude, he was not at peace within himſelf. He loved the Crown as well as he did his Son; and perhaps was biaſſed on that ſide more than the other, as the ſequel preſently after made it appear; for adviſing with himſelf by what expedients he ſhould divert the young Ciaxares from his aſpiring thoughts, he concluded the beſt was to ſend him far off from Court, where the Grandees of State were always reſident, and who all looked upon him as one who one day ſhould be their King, which was dangerous to a diſpoſition too apt already to hearken to ill counſel; yet this reſolution of removing him, was not without much anxiety and ſorrow: For he feared leſt this courſe ſhould more incenſe Ciaxares; for (ſaid he to himſelf) as long as he is with me, and under my eye, I ſhall need no ſpies to obſerve his Actions, I ſhall my ſelf be a witneſs of them; but when he is in a far-off Country, whom ſhall I truſt to be his Protector? May it not be well ſuppoſed, that many ill-diſpoſed perſons will there ſpeak aloud, that which here they dare not ſo much as think? In concluſion, Sir, when he had throughly argued the matter, and weighed every Circumſtance, he conceived he had found out a ſafer courſe than to remove him; for when he remembred that the King of Cappadocia had but one Daughter living, under the Tuition of the Queen her Mother, he thought that if he could bring about a Match between her and his Son Ciaxares, it would be an excellent way to remove him, without giving him any occaſion of complaint, and without any appearance of any cloſe deſign in it. Moreover, it might probably be conjectured, that the putting one Crown upon his Son's head, would ſatisfy his young Ambition, on, from Aſpiring unto the other, and ſtifle all uſurping Deſigns againſt his Father: To be ſhort, he apprehended ſo much advantage in this Match, as he bended all his endeavours to bring it about. I will not trouble you, Sir, with relating all the Paſſages in tranſacting it, nor the Rubs he met withal in the Negotiation; for I do ſuppoſe you are not ignorant of a Law in Cappadocia, which permits not their Kings to Marry their Daughters unto any ſtrange Princes, leſt their Kingdom ſhould become ſubject unto the Dominion of a Foreigner; yet Aſtiages acted his part ſo well, and with ſuch good ſucceſs, as the Marriage was concluded; for he found it out by chance, that Ciaxares was born in Cappadocia: For the Queen his Mother going a Pilgrimage to viſit a famous Temple which was in that Country, fell ſick when ſhe was great with Child, and was delivered of Ciaxares within the Confines and Juriſdiction of Cappadocia. At laſt, he married his Son Ciaxares unto this young Queen, whoſe Beauty and Virtue might be rated at a higher value than her Crown. As ſoon as ſhe was married, the Queen her Mother died; the People reſented her Death as a Puniſhment for not preciſely obſerving the Fundamental Law of the Land. Mean while, Aſtiages is ſecure, finding his Son wondrous well pleas'd with his Condition; alſo that the Crown of Cappadocia, and the Virtue of the Princeſs his Wife, did highly contribute unto his happineſs, and that Ciaxares ſo eſteemed of it. After this Marriage, all Pleaſures and Delights do bid adieu to Ecbatane. The young Princeſs Mandana, Daughter to Aſtiages, will needs depart from that Court, wherein ſhe was ſo adored; for ſince the abſence of the Prince her Brother, there was none could obtain any thing from the King her Father, but by her Interceſſion.

Amidſt this calm Serenity and univerſal Quietneſs, Aſtiages had a moſt odd and horrid Dream, which is talked on by every one. As he was in Conſultation again with his Prieſts, concerning the Accidents of his Life, they told him how they found, that all their former

Prediction was in a likelihood to fail; but that infallibly, the Princeſs his Daughter ſhould have a Son, who would make himſelf Maſter of all Aſia, and by conſequence ſhould poſſeſs this Throne in lieu of his Son Ciaxares; and who, to conclude, ſhould cauſe a general Revolution. Aſtiages, contrary to his old Cuſtom, had much ado to belive a Tale ſo unlikely to prove true, and for a long time rejected the Prieſts, thinking all their Predictions to be no better than Lies, ſince they ſo failed him in their firſt. But thoſe extravagant Viſions, and Operations of his Phanſy, did perplex him ſo many Nights together, that he began to think again, that there might be ſome truth in their Speeches; yet this had not cauſed him to fear the Menaces of theſe Signs ſo much (tho Dreams were much conſiderable among the Medes, eſpecially their Prieſts, who believed them to be the ordinary ways by which the Gods did communicate themſelves unto Men) if other Signs alſo had not concurred, and augmented his Fears, and ſeemed to authoriſe them. The Princeſs Mandana, who knew nothing of all theſe Paſſages, being one Night in her Cloſet, which was illuminated by many Lamps of Criſtal, it was told her, the King her Father intended a Viſit, for Aſtiages was reſolved to entertain himſelf with her, in hopes to temper his diſturbed Mind, by the moderation of this Princeſs Society; who, without doubt, was as virtuous as ever any: He no ſooner was ſetled in the Room, but all the Lamps did immediately of themſelves extinguiſh, only one, which was juſt over the head of Mandana, which ſtill retain'd its Light, and doubled that which all the other had loſt. Aſtiages more troubled at this Prodigy, than at all his Dreams, conſulting afreſh with his Magicians, who aſſured him, that this was an infallible ſign his Sovereignty ſhould ceaſe, and be all in Subjection unto that one Son, which Mandana ſhould be Mother of, according unto the Dreams which before they had interpreted unto him: The next day after, when the Princeſs was at the Temple, the Earth quaked, and all the Ornaments of the Church for (thought he) though her reſolution perhaps for the preſent be ſo, yet Artambaſes in concluſion will win upon her, or perchance make head againſt me without her conſent; ſhe is young and fair, and by conſequence may be tempted beyond her green reſolutions, therefore it is dangerous to confide in her words; though I ſhould incloſe her, Love will break the ſtrongeſt walls, and deliver her either by power or policy. If I ſhould let her be at liberty, they would court her before my face againſt my will; ſo that I know not what to do, or what to think upon: but at laſt, ſince he had no mind to deſtroy her, he thought it the beſt courſe to marry her; yet to marry her ſo, as in all likelihood there might be no fear of what the Fates threatned. After he had a-while thus wandred in his own diſcompoſed thoughts, he remembred himſelf of Cambiſes, who lately ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Perſia by his Father's death; him Aſtiages thought moſt fit to be his guard from all his fears: For (ſaith he) I am ſure the Perſians are not ambitious: but they are juſt, and contented with their own, without any thoughts of enlarging limits: they ſecurely reſt themſelves upon the downy Beds of peace, and will never diſturb that ſoft repoſe in any hopes of uncertain conqueſts: Moreover I know Cambiſes in particular doth as much exceed other Princes in point of moderation, as the Perſians in general exceed all other People of the World. He governs his People by Laws, not Will: So that he is a Father as well as a King unto his Subjects. Moreover, the Kingdom of Perſia is not ſo abſolute, but that it retains ſome ſhadow of a Commonwealth, where many will not ſoon be induced to undertake a War, as one ſingle man may be: nor hath Ambition ſo predominate an influence upon a Senate, as it hath over the mind of an abſolute Prince. In concluſion, Sir, (not to lengthen my ſtory with what is not abſolutely neceſſary) be pleaſed to know, that the King of Medes reſolved upon this Marriage, and preſently propounded it to Cambiſes, who reſenting it with much joy, ſent his Ambaſſadors unto Ecbatane to court the Princeſs. Aſtiages, who himſelf procured the Match, you may be ſure would not refuſe it, but preſently conſented, and ſent the Princeſs his Daughter into Perſia: She, according to her accuſtomed vertue, is all obedience; and in a ſhort time after, thought her ſelf the happieſt Princeſs in the World, when ſhe found her Husband owner of ſo many admirable qualities, and received from him ſuch ample teſtimonies of his affection towards her.

To be ſhort, Aſtiages, according to all appearances, ſeemed to reſt in much ſatisfaction and ſecurity; and Ciaxares his Son was likely to ſucceed him in peace: Alſo the Princeſs his Daughter was ſetled in ſo calm a Countrey, that according to all prudential appearances there was not any reſemblance of a War to ariſe. But this ſerenity laſted not long in the ſoul of Aſtiages: Mandana was no ſooner ſetled, but he repents of the Match, and endeavours to get her again into his power. That which ſtirr'd up his jealouſie, and begot new fears, was, becauſe all the Sacrifices which he offered unto the gods, did ſeem to be all rejected: And the Magicians, who ſince his dreams had much buſied themſelves in contemplation of the Stars, and obſervation of other Cœleſtial Motions, did all unanimouſly conclude, That the great Revolution which threatned Medea, was at hand; and that they did every day more and more freſhly diſcover the malignancy of thoſe Conſtellations which did portend a dire confuſion to it: Inſomuch, as that there was more neceſſity to prepare how to endure it, than ways how to prevent it.

Things ſtanding thus, Aſtiages ſent to entreat Cambiſes, that he would be pleaſed to permit the Queen his Wife to come unto him. The Queen, although ſhe was well acquainted with the humorous diſpoſition of the King her Father, did deſire her Husband, that he would be pleaſed, ſhe might have leave to pay this ſatisfaction unto him who gave her life; for ſince ſhe knew her Father's reſtleſs Soul, ſhe was in ſome hopes to qualify him: And though ſhe loved Cambiſes infinitely, yet ſhe was contented rather to leave him for a time, than cauſe a War between him and her Father, which might chance to ariſe upon a refuſal. Cambiſes, altho extremely tender over the Queen his Wife, was yet ſo complacential as to ſend her into Medea in an Equipage befitting her quality. And to make her appear more glorious in the Medean Court, where ſhe was brought up, than before ſhe did; the King, her Husband, conducted her to the Frontiers, and there bid her adieu with as much affectionate ceremony as is imaginable: As for Mandana, ſhe feared the King her Father would keep her for the ſatisfaction of his mind, and to free himſelf from all his jealouſies and fears; ſo likewiſe her Soul was ſenſible of much ſorrow, when ſhe feared alſo that her Husband would not ſo part with her: but for this time they parted, Cambiſes to Perſipolis, and melancholly Mandana to Ecbatane, where at firſt ſhe was received with abundance of Joy, ſo that Aſtiages was more at hearts eaſe than he could have imagined. Before ſhe was married, many diſſuaded him from it; but now ſince ſhe was married, and ſo far from her Husband, he could not conceive any thing poſſible to diſturb his quiet. He foreſaw that if he ſhould retain her long, and ſhe deſirous to depart, perhaps a War might thereupon ariſe betwixt him and the Perſian; but he valued that leſs, than to ſee Mandana in a condition to have a Son: ſo then all was fill'd with welcomes, feaſts and jocundry; inſomuch as the Princeſs began to be in ſome hopes ſhe ſhould be deceived in her former fears. Yet amidſt all theſe pleaſant diverſions, her health began to impair, and viſible marks of indiſpoſition appeared in her complexion: ſhe believed the cauſe might proceed from her wearineſs in her journey, or from the change of (though her native) air; only it might be her reſentments of her Husband's abſence; but within a little after, ſhe certainly perceived ſhe was with child; and this troubled her ſo much, as ſhe fell abſolutely ſick: for ſhe concluded it queſtionleſs, that her Father would not ſuffer her to return in that condition: and if ſhe ſhould ſo chance as to be delivered of a Son in Ecbatane, the beſt of her expectations would be an exchange of his Cradle for a Priſon; or ſo ordered, that ſhe ſhould not have the diſpoſal of her own Child. Sometimes ſhe imagined her Husband angry with her for concealing from him her Father's humour; and ſo many troubled thoughts did diſturb her, as ſhe ſtood in need of all her Conſtancy to conceal her Melancholly: Mean while, ſhe reſolves to conceal her Condition as long as ſhe can: ſhe keeps her Chamber continually, and for the moſt part, her Bed. A while after ſhe complains of the Air in Ecbatane: and intends a requeſt unto the King her Father, that ſhe may return into Perſia, or elſe that he would be pleas'd to permit her to go unto a fair Houſe in the Country, about ſome five miles from Ecbatane, conceiving that place was moſt fit to conceal her condition in: But as ill-luck would have it, one of the Phyſicians which came to viſit her, diſcovered the truth, in ſpite of all her care to conceal it: for ſhe often complained of ſo many untrue Diſtempers, thinking thereby to delude them, and divert them from knowing the true cauſe, as made them more inquiſitive. The Phyſician, hoping to be a welcome Intelligencer, told Aſtiages ſhe was with Child: ſo that when the Queen preſented her deſires unto her Father, ſhe was handſomely denied, and told, this was much better Air; ſo that if ſhe were in Perſia ſo ill as ſhe is, he would wiſh her in Medea for recovery of her health; this being both her native, and incomparably better Air than that of Perſipolis, therefore he would by no means have her think of return: That he would moſt willingly conſent unto her deſires of going into the Country, if he could be perſuaded it were better; for Ecbatane had more pleaſant Gardens by much, and the Court was fitter for diverſion of her melancholy, than any Country ſolitude could be: therefore he deſired her to remain where ſhe was. Preſently after, all her Women about her are removed, and others put in their rooms: The time of her delivery drew near, and Aſtiages is fuller, if fuller poſſible can be, of new fears: In few words, Sir, Mandana is delivered of a Son; and timorous Aſtiages cauſeth his confident Harpagus to take it, with expreſs charge to carry it cloſely into ſome remote Mountain, and there leave it amongſt Tygers in the Wilderneſs: This Prince was ſo inhumane, as he would have preſently killed him, but the Gods reſtrained him from a Fact ſo foul: Harpagus being ſomewhat leſs cruel than he, would not at that time do it, but faithfully promiſed it ſhould be done: and not daring to be ſeen in the deſtruction of this Infant, he committed it unto the execution of a Shepherd called Methridates, who dwelt at the bottom of a great Mountain in the Wilderneſs; whom he ſent for, and commanded him to do with this Child as he had received charge. And be pleas'd to know, Sir, that this Shepherd carried this Child away, which was the faireſt that ever eye beheld: During the time that this Shepherd was at the town with Harpagus, his Wife chanced to be delivered of a dead Child: the Shepherd brings this live one to her, which preſently began to laugh upon her; ſhe took it in her arms, and forſaking the Corps of her own dead Child, took the care of this fair Little one, and would never let her Husband reſt until he conſented: As for the dead Child, he threw it out amongſt the wild Beaſts, to be there torn in pieces. This poor Nurſe, whoſe name was Spaco, thought no more of the dead one, but reſolved to become Nurſe unto the other, who ſhe knew to be of ſome high quality, by the Mantle in which the Child was lapt, it being made of cloth of gold. You may ſee, Sir, It had been an eaſie matter for Methridates (living at the foot of a deſart Mountain far off, but towards the North of Ecbatane, and the Euxean-bridge) to have put this Child to death, and never fear diſcovery in a place ſo rude and deſart: And you know, Sir, as well as I, that all the parts of Medea towards Aſpires, are mountainous wild Foreſts covered with Woods, and fill'd with ſavage Beaſts.

Be pleaſed, Sir, to know further, that this Methridates, putting his own dead Child into the Cradle, which was very rich, and which brought Mandana's, ſhewed it unto thoſe which Harpagus ſent thither to ſee it: Theſe men taking it, carried it unto their Maſter Harpagus, who having acquainted Aſtiages with it, received orders to entomb it amongſt the Kings of Medea. Thus you ſee, Sir, the Son of a Shepherd in a Royal Sepulcher, and the Son of a great King in a Shepherd's poor Cottage: Know alſo, how Aſtiages cauſed it to be divulged about the Court, that Mandana's Son died of ſome Diſeaſe, and told the ſame unto the Princeſs: he ſent alſo unto Cambiſes to condole the loſs: But poor Mandana all this while, although ſhe did more than ſuſpect the truth, yet ſhe with much ado continued in her Conſtancy, and took no notice: And though the deep melancholy which dwelt in her eyes, did witneſs as much; yet ſince it could not be helped, ſhe would not diſcover the cauſe, nor infuſe any jealouſies of it into her Husband's thoughts. The better to colour her grief, ſhe deſired a ſecond time leave to go into the Country, which now without any repugnance is conſented unto: And Aſtiages ſent afterwards unto her, to let her know, that if ſhe pleaſed, ſhe might return into Perſia; for he had this conceit, that it was the firſt Son of Mandana only, whom he had to fear, which being ſecured, he was then glad to be rid of the Mother, whom if he ſhould detain any longer, would by her extremity of ſorrow draw a thouſand reproaches upon himſelf. As ſoon as this Liberty is obtained, ſhe preſently returns to Cambiſes, unto whom ſhe opened not a ſyllable of her troubled ſoul, but attributed the alteration of her Complexion unto her abſence from him, and her ſorrows for the death of her Son. I am forced, Sir, to be a little longer than is fitting in the relation of my Maſter's ſtrange Infancy, who though all this while in a poor Shepherd's homely Cottage, was notwithſtanding apprehenſive of thoſe Glories which belong unto a Kingdom: Be pleaſed, Sir, to know in few words, that this young Prince, though then unknown unto himſelf, or any elſe, to be one, did then act the part of a King, and cauſed himſelf to be called ſo amongſt all the Neighbours Children which played with him, when he was but ten years of age: He made himſelf feared, loved and obeyed amongſt them, as if he had been really their abſolute Prince: One day, having puniſhed one of the Boys, whom he called Subjects, for ſome offence committed, the Father of that Child ſo puniſhed, chanced to be an Officer in the King's Houſe; who coming to the knowledge of this paſſage, and wondring that this young poor Shepherd's Son ſhould act the part of a King ſo well, told Aſtiages of it, and infinitely extolled the beauty and boldneſs of this Child: The King caus'd him to be ſent for, and asked the Child why he puniſhed the other Boy: the Child did return ſo quick an anſwer, as ſtruck the King into a wonder, ſeeing him ſpeak unto a King with as much confidence, as if he had been among the Boys. Moreover, Aſtiages was infinitely aſtoniſhed, to ſee this Son of a poor Shepherd ſo much reſemble his Daughter Mandana, as never two were more like: Indeed, he had ſome ſecret ſuſpicions in his ſoul, which told him, it was the ſame that he ſuſpected it to be. In concluſion, Sir, Aſtiages could not be ſatisfied, until he ſent for the Shepherd himſelf out of his Cottage, and asking him in a terrible tone, and with ſtern looks, where he got this Child; the poor ſimple Methridates, thinking the King had known the paſſage, and being terrified with the King's looks and queſtion, confeſſed the whole ſtory. The King, in ſpite of all his fears, could not chuſe but like and love this admirable Child; and after he had aſſembled all the Magicians, they told him (whether it was the truth of their thoughts, or whether it was their pity that moved them to diſſemble, I know not) that the Royalty which this Child had exerciſed over the Boys, was an infallible ſign that the Gods had heard their Prayers, and that all the Dominion which this young Prince ſhould have over the Medes, was limited and confined unto that which he hath exerciſed over the Boys, ſo that there needs no more fears of him: They further told him, that the Gods do ſometimes threaten great Princes by theſe Prodigies, only leſt they ſhould forget that duty which they owe unto them: And in concluſion they told him, That if he would be pleaſed to follow their Advice, he ſhould ſend this young Prince unto the King of Aſſyria his Father. Aſtiages, who conceived many affectionate thoughts of this Child, was glad of the Advice, and being himſelf of a weak ſoul, relied much upon the judgment of theſe Magicians, and was fully perſuaded, that this imaginary Royalty was the fulfilling of his Dream; and truly, Sir, as the caſe ſtands now with Artamenes, it is apparent that Aſtiages has no reaſon to fear Cyrus: yet though he permitted this young Prince to live, whom he named Cyrus, he would not pardon Harpagus, for he baniſhed him the Court and Kingdom: This man, who would neither be abſolutely pitiful, nor abſolutely cruel, is left without ſupport or refuge, and compell'd to the rigor of a long Exile. Neverthelesſ (as I know you are not ignorant) Aſtiages ſent Cyrus unto Cambiſes his Father, writing this Excuſe unto him; That to prevent certain malignant Conſtellations which threatned this Child, he out of his affection was forced to hide him, and cauſe his ſorrows in divulging him dead; but this ſorrow will quickly change it ſelf into a double recompence of joy, when he ſhall ſee him living, ſo well, and ſo amiable. Cambiſes received him with unexpreſſible joy; and the wiſe Mandana gave as many thanks unto her Father Aſtiages, as ever ſhe received cauſes of diſpleaſure from him; though ſhe had learned the truth of the ſtory by the information of Harpagus, who was fled thither, and told her all, in hopes thereby to procure himſelf Protection. And though ſhe could not be convinc'd, that Aſtiages was ſo innocent as he made himſelf, yet by the knowledg of what was paſt, ſhe was inſtructed how to prevent the like for the future: Mean while, the young Cyrus is in Perſipolis: for joy of whoſe welcome, both publick and private Sacrifices are made throughout all Perſia; and for whoſe Education, all men of high parts throughout the whole Kingdom are imployed. When Ciaxares heard of theſe Paſſages, he ſent unto Cambiſes, and the Queen his Siſter, to congratulate their good Fortunes in finding their Son; and he writ in an high Complement unto the Queen, how he wiſht his Daughter Mandana might hereafter become worthy to be the Miſtreſs of Cyrus, whoſe fame fill'd all the World. This young Princeſs was born unto the King of Cappadocia, about three years after the birth of Cyrus; and had the Name of her Aunt, Mandana, given unto her.

Now, Sir, to tell you how young Cyrus was educated, would but abuſe your Patience; for his high Atchievements ſince, does ſufficiently demonſtrate it to all the World. I ſhall only tell you, that both the King and Queen's endeavours were with all poſſible care to infuſe ſuch good diſpoſitions as now appears to be in him: For all men find, in all his actions, and his words, ſomething ſo ſweet, ſo high, ſo complacential, and ſo full of goodneſs, as it is an abſolute impoſſibility to know him, and not to love him. He was marvellous well proportioned, exceeding fair; and as this charming Symmetry did from his very infancy appear in all parts of his body, yet his ſoul and ſpirit was infinitely above it. Perhaps you know, that in Perſipolis there is a pleaſant, ſpacious place, called the place of Liberty, in one Quarter thereof ſtands the King's Palace: None inhabit within this Square but Grandees, and wiſeſt ſort of Perſians: for Wiſdom in that Nation is no leſs valued than Nobility by deſcent, which alſo is in very high eſteem: It was within this famous Quadrangle, wherein none but Perſons of great Wiſdom and Nobility did live, that the young Cyrus was educated. Amongſt us, all private men do breed their Children with as much care, as if they were to be all Kings; and are perſuaded, that to be men, and to be virtuous, are terms inſeparable: Cyrus coming out of a poor uncouth Shepherd's Cottage, unto this moſt famous and learned Academy, it was a wonder that Nature ſhould furniſh him with as much prudence and wiſdom, as if he had been brought up here from his Cradle. He had for his Tutors in Vertue, the wiſeſt that could be cull'd out of the Old Doctors: Active young men for the exerciſe of his body, and a younger ſort for his recreation, which were well educated in all virtuous qualities: Great care was had to prevent all ſorts of vicious Perſons from coming about him, leſt they ſhould chance to corrupt his own natural ſweet Inclination; for they knew well that if the ſoul of a Prince, who muſt rule over a People, be once poyſoned, the People alſo will be infected though here he ſaw none but examples of Goodneſs and Vertue. Moderation, Liberality, Juſtice, Valour, and all the Vertues, were ſo eminent in him, and got him ſo much applauſe among the Perſians, that they extoll'd him as a Child ſent from Heaven, rather to inſtruct, than be inſtructed by them. But I fear, Sir, that I have already tranſgreſſed my limits, and by conſequence abuſed your Patience, eſpecially thoſe Perſians which hear me, becauſe, perhaps, they know theſe things better than I my ſelf. My Maſter lived in this Quality until his ſixteenth year of Age; And then Fortune began to offer him opportunities of diſcovering the greatneſs and generoſity of his Soul, both in his words and Acts; And to put in practice that greatneſs of ſpirit which his youth did promiſe; you may remember, Sir, how Harpagus was baniſhed by the King of Medes for not exactly obeying his Commands in putting to death this young Cyrus: This Exile had formerly been of great power in Medea, being in ſuch favour with the King, as he made him Governour in one of his greateſt Provinces: This man did endeavour to reconcile himſelf unto Aſtiages, but all in vain: he was in this diſcontent forced to travel from Court to Court to find out protection and relief from thoſe Princes which were Enemies unto the King of Medes; and being ſome certain days diſguiſed in Perſipolis, found out an opportunity to diſcover himſelf. His habit was Perſian; he mingled himſelf among the multitude which waited upon the Prince to hunt; and having the Language of the Countrey paſſable enough, he was not known to be a Stranger. Cyrus was lively and active at the Sports, and none are leſs tired, or more bold and forward at theſe Sports than he, either in following the Chaſe, or aſſaulting the wild Beaſt at a Bay: He drew a Bow, threw a Dart, and uſed a Sword admirable well: he was alway Victor in the publick Games, and bore away the Prize. But to return to Harpagus: He did follow

Cyrus very cloſe at this great hunting whereof I ſpoke; and waited upon him ſo near, when the Prince followed a wild Bore ſo eagerly and faſt through the thick of the Foreſt, leſt he ſhould loſe ſight of the Bore, as none of all the Perſians was able to follow, only Harpagus: Cyrus overtook this wild Beaſt, bent his Bow, and ſhot an Arrow through his Heart: After this Victory, whereof Harpagus only was a Witneſs, he ſat down, and reſted himſelf until ſome of his own Servants came in, upon a bank cloſe by a little Brook, which ran acroſs the Foreſt in that place: In all theſe Chaſes it is the cuſtome of the Countrey for Hunters to carry a Bow, a Quiver, a Sword, and two Javelins: This gallant young Hunter wore them all, and his Buckler alſo, for them alſo they uſe in hunting as well as wars; As he was thus ſitting, Harpagus drew near him: Cyrus, who had not yet ſeen him, took him for a Perſian, began to ſhew him the Prize, and cried out, I have killed him, I have killed him: but Harpagus kneeling upon the ground, told him, that he knew how he might obtain a more glorious Victory than this. The Prince thinking the man had diſcovered ſome greater Bore than this which he had killed, roſe up, and asked him heartily whither he ſhould go to get this Victory? Into the head of an Army of Thirty thouſand men (anſwered Harpagus) which I come to offer unto you; ſo that if you pleaſe to accept of it, you may make your ſelf Lord of a Kingdom: Cyrus aſtoniſhed at his words, lookt upon him more earneſtly than before; and ſuppoſing he had ſeen him formerly, Who are you (ſaid he) that make this gallant offer? I cannot yet think my ſelf worthy of it, ſince my valour was never tried againſt any but Bears, Bores, Lions and Tigers? I am, Sir (ſaid he) one that is ſent by the Gods to tender you a brave opportunity of getting immortal glory. If all be true you ſay (ſaid Cyrus) ſhew me the way I muſt take, and let it be as difficult as it can be, I will follow it with all alacrity. I have already told you, Sir (ſaid Harpagus) you muſt repair unto the head of an Army of Thirty thouſand men, which wait for your commands, and to conquer when you bid them. It becomes not him to Command, (replied Cyrus) who hath not yet learnt how to obey; it is far fitter I ſhould be their Companion, than their General. But I pray you (Noble Stranger, whom I think I have ſeen before, tho not remember you) tell me where this Army is, and who they are alſo, who is the Enemy, and what the Kingdom you would have me Conquer. Sir, (anſwered Harpagus) I am not at all unreaſonable in my deſires, when I wiſh your Aſſiſtance againſt a King who hath baſely broken the Laws of Humanity againſt a Prince, who is both the Love and Wonder of all which know him; a King, I ſay, who hath acted againſt Nature, Reaſon, and Juſtice; who by an ill-governed Ambitious Jealouſy, would againſt all Humanity or Conſcience take away the Life of ſuch a Prince, in whoſe behalf I now ſalute you: It is in the behalf of a hopeful, young, innocent Prince, and againſt ſuch an unnatural unworthy King, I deſire to animate you. It nearly concerns your own Honour to condeſcend unto my Deſires. Your deſire (anſwered Cyrus) is too full of Juſtice to be denied: And not to keep me any longer from this Army which you deſire I ſhould repair unto; inform me who is this barbarous King, and who is the injured Prince; for I do much wonder, ſince I have been ſo carefully informed of all the prime Paſſages of the World, I ſhould not gueſs at them both. Sir, (then anſwered Harpagus) you are the Prince which owes Revenge. Yes, (ſaid Cyrus) and by whom Noble Stranger can I be injured? I, who have hardly yet begun to live; I, who ever ſince I firſt br~~eathed~~, have been rock'd in a Cradle of ſlumbering Peace, who never had Enemies in all my life, and who never yet was Enemy unto any, but ſuch wild Beaſts as theſe which infeſt the Foreſts? Sir, replied Harpagus, who perceived ſeveral Hunters to come from ſeveral Quarters of the Wood) if you pleaſe to go a little further into the Wood, and lend me your Audience, you ſhall underſtand that you have Enemies, and more terrible ones than you imagine; ſuch, as if you do not make open

War upon them, will make a ſecret one upon you, and that in ſuch a manner as may perhaps become moſt fatal to you. Cyrus, according to his deſire, ſtept ſome twenty or thirty paces into the Wood, and beckned with his hand unto thoſe which followed, that they ſhould not approach: Then looking moſt attentively upon Harpagus, Is it poſſible (ſaid he to him) that what you tell me can be true? And that you ſhould know my Life better than I do my ſelf? And ſince you have told me who the Prince is, pray tell, who is the Enemy? Sir, (anſwered Harpagus) the King of Medes is he, who endeavoured to kill you, and who will yet kill you, if you kill not him firſt. How, (ſaid Cyrus, more amazed than before) is Aſtiages my Enemy? And is there a neceſſity I muſt be his? No, no, (ſaid he) it muſt not be; but if he have any Enemies, I pray tell me them, that in his behalf I may Fight, and overcome them if I can: But to undertake a War againſt him, is a thing I neither can, nor will, nor ought to do. Aſtiages is Father of that Queen, whoſe Son I have the honour to be; and I muſt look upon him as one who gave Life unto her, who gave me mine; neither can I forget how he treated me with many Teſtimonies of his Affection to me. It was he who had a tender care of my Life at my Birth, and cauſed thoſe reports of my Death to no other end, but to make me live: It was he, who brought me out of the poor Shepherd's homely Houſe, unto a Prince's Throne; it is he who hath deſerved my Love, my humble Requeſts, and good Opinion. Cyrus having ended his reply, Harpagus deſired leave to ſpeak, and related unto him the whole Paſſages, of which the Prince had hitherto been ignorant, for the Queen his Mother ſpoke not a Word of it unto him ever ſince his return. Harpagus began then to aggravate the Cruelty of Aſtiages, and to aſſert the truth of his Information by this infallible Proof, That he himſelf was the Man who received that bloody command to Kill him, from the Mouth of Aſtiages; yet he durſt not tell unto Cyrus, how he left him with Mithridates to do it for him; but he rather related, as if he was the means whereby he was preſerved: At laſt, he told him how he had received Intelligence from the Province of Paretacene, that if he would pleaſe to Command all thoſe Forces which they would bring into the Field, and perſonally appear amongſt them, all Medea might eaſily be conquered. Cyrus hearkened very attentively unto this Diſcourſe, and paus'd a good while before he anſwered; at laſt, he ſaid to Harpagus with a Countenance more dejected than before; I know not, Harpagus, whether I ſhould be angry with you, or whether I ſhould thank you; but I am ſure you have made me very ſad, in telling me, that I ſhould be the innocent Subject of that Prince's Injuſtice, in whoſe Honour I have ſuch an Intereſt. But, Sir, (anſwered Harpagus) your own Honour ought to be conſidered in the firſt place: Therefore it is (replied Cyrus) that Revenge is not permitted me: Cruel Friend, ſaid he to him, what Propoſitions do you come to make me? You offer me an Army, which I have a deſire (but dare not) to accept of; You tell me of an Enemy whom I muſt not Fight with; and you propound ſo many juſt, and ſo many unjuſt things all together, that it is impoſſible but my thoughts muſt waver at them: Yet know, Harpagus, tho I have ardent deſires of Glory, to become Famous, and to Conquer Crowns, at leaſt derſerve them, yet I cannot now accept of your offer; and tho I am arrived at that Age, which ought to give ſome tokens of Valour, yet it is requiſite as well that I give ſome Teſtimonies of my Temperance: Hah Harpagus! What would you have me do? Why did you not tell me of ſome lawful Enemy? Sir, (anſwered Harpagus very coldly) I had thought that the King of Medes Injuries had been convincing Reaſons for you to diſpenſe with thoſe Obligations of Conſanguinity, which otherwiſe would have required Reſpect from you; but ſince I am (it ſeems) deceived, it becomes me, Sir, to be ſilent, and to be no more ſenſible of thoſe Affronts which are put upon you, than your ſelf are; and ſince you are pleaſed to teſtify your Temperance ſo far, as to forget your own Injuries, I ſhall perhaps (whilſt I paſs the reſt of my days in Exile for ſaving you) be ſorry that Cyrus, Son to the wiſe Cambiſes, and virtuous Mandana, ſhould ſink under the Wrongs of the King of Medes, who without all queſtion will attempt upon his Illuſtrious Life, either by Poniard or Poyſon; upon Cyrus, I ſay, from whom ſuch high Acts are expected, and who may now if he had but a mind, take a full Revenge, prevent the Storm, preſerve the Perſian Ancient Laws and Liberties, become Lord of a large Kingdom, and perhaps of all Aſia; him whom the Gods by ſo many Prodigies do invite unto Sovereign Dominion, and Act as I propound unto him; and who tell him, that if he undertake this War, if he ranſack all Medea, Conquer all the Land, and mount into the Throne of Aſtiages; he then does no more but what is juſt, and the pleaſure of the Gods for him to do. If it were their pleaſure to have it ſo, (anſwered Cyrus ſharply) they can tell how to bring it to paſs without my intermedling: However, I do not conceive it juſt, and I am reſolved never to wear a Crown upon unjuſt terms. Kingdoms are not got without Combat (anſwered Harpagus) and Glory is a cruel Miſtris, which will never be enjoyed by any but ſuch as Court her in a Field full of Dangers. I ſhall expoſe my ſelf unto Dangers enough (replied Cyrus) in not deſtroying him, whoſe deſign is to deſtroy me: But let me intreat your Patience Harpagus, until we can do it more Nobly, and if I be not much deceived, I ſhall acquit my ſelf with more Honour in this innocent War within theſe Woods, than in that. Mean time, to make it manifeſt, that I am indulgent towards Aſtiages, ſo I will be juſt to you; know, that if you ſhall inform me of any other, who ſhall be culpable of the like Injuries, he ſhall not eſcape my revenge: For your part, Harpagus, ſince you would not conſent unto my Death, nor put the cruel Commands of Aſtiages into Act, I will preſent you unto the King my Father, and the Queen my Mother; this Court ſhall be your Sanctuary, provided, that you do not hereafter propound any thing which may divert my Duty to Aſtiages; I ſhall think it was the heat of your Zeal to ſerve me, prompted you unto theſe unjuſt Propoſitions; and I ſhall conſider, that as it is my Duty to reſpect my Enemy, ſo I ſhall think my ſelf obliged to gratifie him who preſerved me from his Injuries. But Harpagus, ſaid he, with a more pleaſant Aſpect, it is not now a convenient time to talk more with you, and I am very ſorry to break off any Diſcourſe of Wars, Combats, Victories, and Triumphs.

After theſe words, this Miraculous Child turned towards the Company; and Harpagus being raviſhed with the Wiſdom of ſo young a Child, accepted of his offer, only deſired him, that he would be pleaſed to acquaint the Queen his Mother, and know her pleaſure before he appeared in Court; which Cyrus did alſo promiſe him: thus Harpagus parted from him, and mingled with the Multitude; and Cyrus alſo went away with intentions to follow the Sports no longer. I then had the Honour to be near him, and was appointed by the King and Queen to have the particular Care of him: And Feraulas whom you ſee here, being but two years elder than Cyrus, waited upon him as a Play-fellow, being very fit for ſuch a purpoſe, and of a cloſe reſerved Inclination. Feraulas was the firſt, who obſerved how the mind of Cyrus was troubled, and coming unto me, who at that time did not mind him; Sir, (ſaid he to me) Methinks the Prince is very reſerved, and Melancholly upon a ſudden; from whence ſhould this change ariſe? I know not (ſaid I) nor did I perceive he has had any miſchance all this day: perhaps (ſaid he to me) the Man whom I ſaw talking a long time with him in private, hath told him ſomething which hath angred him. As we were thus diſcourſing, Cyrus came near us, and ſaid, Chriſantes, I would ſpeak with you; all the Company then kept their diſtances, and the Prince began to tell me in a low Voice, all which Harpagus told unto him, with his anſwer unto it: he told it me with ſuch Gravity, Wiſdom, Generoſity, and Spirit, as really I was amazed, and lookt upon him as a Miracle: When he did expreſs that Joy which he apprehended, when Harpagus offerd him an Army of Thirty thouſand Men; Oh Heavens, with what unwillingneſs did he refuſe it! and when he would ſhew his Sorrows, that it was not permitted him to accept the offer, he expreſſed it to the life: I cannot believe any Man of greateſt Wiſdom and higheſt Parts that ever this Age produced, could with more Prudence, Wiſdom, and Nobleneſs, determine upon a matter ſo nice and curious, as he did upon a ſudden. He repented him tho of his promiſe to Protect Harpagus, and of his preſenting him unto the Queen his Mother; for thought he, if ſhe ſhould know of her Father Aſtiages's Cruelty, it would but become her Torment, and it would be an infinite Grief unto him, to be a cauſe of hers. In concluſion, he ſaid unto me, Pray Chriſantes tell me, whether I have done well or no, and give me your Counſel what I ſhould do in the buſineſs; for (ſaid he) altho I dare truſt unto my own Courage, yet I dare not conclude too much in my own Prudence and Diſcretion, ſince I have not yet attained unto ſuch years of Experience, as I dare truſt my ſelf. When he had ended, I gave him his deſerved Commendations, and told him, I thought all he ſaid was very well; but as for acquainting the Queen with what Harpagus told him, I did not conceive why he ſhould not. Take it upon your ſelf then, Chriſantes (anſwered he) as for my part, I confeſs it goes againſt the hair of my Diſpoſition to tell ſo bad a Story; I promiſed him that I would: When we came to Perſipolis, Cyrus went unto the King's Lodgings, and gave me opportunity to go unto the Queen: I acquainted her with the Adventure, and it moved her unto much Joy and much Sorrow, for ſhe deſired to keep the Prince ignorant of Aſtiages her Father's Cruelty; alſo ſhe did much rejoyce that her Son was ſo rarely qualified, and had returned ſo wiſe an Anſwer. Upon the whole matter, ſhe charged Cyrus to ſpeak nothing of it unto the King his Father, ſince it was irreparably paſt, and would but moſt unprofitably vex him. As for Harpagus, gus, ſhe thought it but juſt to Protect him, and that i was neceſſary to detain him ſtill in Perſia, in order t the Reconciling him unto Aſtiages; for ſaid this Virtuous Princeſs, altho the King my Father was too to blame, yet I am his Daughter, which is Argumen enough for me to preſerve him to the utmoſt of my Power; therefore Harpagus muſt not upon any term depart a Malecontent, ſince he has Thirty thouſand Men at his Devotion, which may kindle ſuch a War in Medea, as may prove its ruin. It were better Policy to let this my own Country be his Sanctuary, than another Prince's, who by his Power and Intelligence may become prejudicial unto me and my Father alſo. Alas, alas, (ſaid he) what croſs Fate is this? Harpagus, as he is Rebel to my Father, ſhould be my Foe; but as he preſerved my Son, muſt be my Friend, and deſerves Protection. The King of Medes, as he is my Father, I owe him all Obedience and Love; but as he is my Son's Enemy, and would deſtroy him, (if I may ſay it) I do hate him. What think you, Chriſantes? How can I reconcile theſe things? In concluſion, after ſhe had well weighed all Circumſtances, ſhe reſolved to move the King her Husband for Harpagus's Protection, as one who had been an ancient Servant unto her Father, the King of Medes; and whom he baniſhed for ſome Cauſe, which afterwards ſhe would deviſe; and to ſtay him in Perſia as long as they could, leſt he ſhould cauſe a War in Medea. But withal to contrive it ſo, as that he ſhould dwell in the Country, and not appear in Court, leſt the entertaining of him ſhould become offenſive unto Aſtiages. She gave me an eſpecial Charge to prevent his coming near young Cyrus, leſt he ſhould corrupt his Thoughts. All things are tranſacted according to theſe Reſolutions. The Queen is extreamly fond of her Son, and commends him for his Diſcretion in his carriage of the Buſineſs: Harpagus is civilly treated, and preſented unto the King her Husband; afterwards ſent unto one of the King's faireſt Houſes, with orders taken for his Subſiſtency, and kept continually in hopes. All this while, Aſtiages is not rightly compoſed in his mind; but ſtill fears leſt the menaces of the Gods ſhould be ſeconded with ſome diſaſterous Effects. He had Spies conſtantly at Perſipolis, who gave him Intelligence of Harpagus's Arrival and Reception; and how he had Conference with the Prince in the Foreſt; for afterwards, ſeveral Perſians knew Harpagus, and divulged it. He alſo had Advertiſement how the Province of Paretacenes, whereof Harpagus had been Governour, ſtood affected, and that he had opportunity to make head, if he had a Diſpoſition to it. He had alſo ſeveral Informations of ſecreet Aſſemblies and Conſultations, the Cauſes whereof he was ignorant. All this coming at one time to him from divers places, added to his own timerous Diſpoſition, did cauſe him to reaſſume his former Fears and Inquietudes. He aſſembled the whole pack of the Magi; they conſult afreſh with the Gods and Stars; they pray, and offer Sacrifices; upon the reſult of all, they tell Aſtiages, that they will never fail in their Fidelity, nor conceal what they diſcover in the Stars and Victims, which ſeemed to portend nothing but Deſtruction and Change, and that preſently; for doubtleſs ere long the Effects would follow the malignant Signs; there needed no more to wound the Soul of that Prince, who was always naturally apt enough to believe them; and who by other concurring Circumſtances did too apparently ſee the probability of what the Magi told him. Ciaxares his Son was yet King only of Cappadocia, and had one only Daughter. This Jealous Prince apprehended that if young Cyrus had any deſign in forging, he might much more eaſily put it in Execution, than if Ciaxares had a Son, knowing well enough that the People do commonly more affect a King than a Queen. Moreover, Harpagus being fled into Perſia, who had ſuch a ſtrong Faction, and good Intelligence within his Dominions, it was therefore to be doubted things would not ſucceed well upon that ſcore. Thus Aſtiages fearing every thing, and ſuppoſing his own Shadow to be a Plot; and apprehending not only things ſemblable, but alſo abſolute impoſſibilities, he became the moſt wretched Man that ever was. The Queen of Perſia had alſo Intelligence of all her Father's Diſtempers; for as he had his Spies in Perſipolis, ſo had ſhe hers in Ecbatane, who every hour advertis'd her; and who upon this News renewed her Sorrows. It was her pleaſure to Honour me ſo far as to diſcover her Fears and tell me how ſhe doubted the King of Medes her Father, being prompted by his old Paſſions, would take ſome violent deſign in hand to deſtroy her Son Cyrus; her Experience of things paſt, was a ground for her Jealouſy for things to come: I diverted her Paſſion as much as poſſible; but ſhe being a Woman of a high and apprehenſive Soul, it was not eaſy abſolutely to remove her Reſentment, ſince there was ſo much reaſon in it; ſince Aſtiages might act ſuch a thing in ſome cloſe private manner as we could not foreſee. However ſhe commanded me to have an extraordinary care of Cyrus her Son, and to prevent his hunting as much as I could, but not to let him know the reaſon; for it might be imagined, that if Aſtiages had any Plot upon his Life, he might there in wild Foreſts find a fit opportunity for it. I promiſed my Obedience, and found it no great difficulty to obſerve her order: for ſince the laſt time of hunting, Cyrus became ſo deeply Melancholly, ſo as that which before was wont to be a pleaſant Recreation, did now but augment his humour; yet notwithſtanding he was of ſuch a natural and ſweet Complacency, that when I attempted to obſerve the Queens Commands very punctually, I was not denied my Requeſt unto him; for as he deſired one day to hunt, more for Cuſtom and Company, than any Delectation he found in the Sport: I told him, that I had ſome Advice to give him, which I humbly beſought him might be well accepted; he aſſured me, that he would ever follow my Counſel without Contradiction. Then I told him, that as hunting in his younger years might be allowed him as his Buſineſs, ſo in his riper years of Diſcretion, it ſhould be uſed ſeldom, and as a Recreation only; therefore it would appear an act of Wiſdom to forbear it, or at leaſt uſe it not ſo often as he was wont. Your Advice, good Chriſantes, (ſaid he to me) is very good: And it is not long ſince I did entreat Feraulas to aſſiſt me in contriving ſome ingenious ways, wherein I might more nobly imploy my time. Sir, ſaid I to him, Feraulas deſerves the honour of your Love, and his Advice is to be asked. But I conceive it no great difficulty to find out many ways wherein your hours might be better ſpent than in hunting. Chriſantes (ſaid he to me) it is not ſo eaſy as you imagine. Whileſt we were thus in Diſcourſe, the Queen ſent to enquire for Cyrus, ſo that the Hunting and our Diſcourſe both, were at this time prevented. Some few days after, the King took a Journey about ſome great buſineſs, which would be a Month before his return; he left the Queen and Prince both at Perſipolis, with orders to ſtay there until his return. After he was gone, Cyrus would Hunt no more, but was compoſed of all Gravity and Sadneſs: I preſſed Feraulas to tell me the cauſe of his Melancholly, but I could not get a Syllable out of him, what the Prince had told him. I urged him again, and that ſo importunately, as at laſt, he told me how Cyrus complained he could not endure this idle kind of Life, and often lamented it unto him; after this, the Prince grew to be of ſo dull a Complection, as he was not knowable; the lively Features which formerly moved Adoration in all the Ladies of the Court, are all dampt and vaniſht; his thoughts run no more of Hunting, his Study is muſing and penſiveneſs; he forgot his Exerciſes of Darting, Shooting, and the like; Solitude is the only Life he leads. The Queen was much troubled at this Alteration, and many times told him of it; but his Anſwers were, That ſome ſlight, ſimple Indiſpoſition had produced theſe effects in him, and humbly deſired her not to trouble her ſelf about it any more. Harpagus all this while, he chears up himſelf in hopes, that when Cyrus is older, he may then chance to exchange ſome of his Affection for ſome Ambition, which might then afford him ſome opportunities of acting that, which he was now but plotting. Thus being the ſtate of things, I one day obſerved the Prince mo penſive and ſad, than ever; and ſeeing he refuſed a manner of Recreations or Society, I ſaid unto him Sir, you have ever heretofore done me the Honour t believe me, whenſoever I took the boldneſs to adverti you of any thing which might conduce unto yo good; I perceieve that of late, you have habited yo ſelf unto ſuch a quite contrary courſe of Life, than th which you were accuſtomed, as I cannot chuſe bu ask the reaſon: Have you not often told me, Chriſant (ſaid he) that the Joys of Children ought not to be th Buſineſs of Men? I have told you ſo indeed, Sir, (an ſwered I) but yet there is a great deal of difference be tween playing the Child, and doing nothing at al 'Tis true Chriſantes, (anſwered the Prince) if I ſhoul do no more hereafter than I do at preſent, I were no worthy to live; yet the unhappineſs of my Conditio doth in this interval, give me leiſure to contrive wa of changing my idle courſe of Life. Why, Sir, (ſai I to him) do you ſay your unhappy Condition? Ar you not the Son of a great King, and a great Queen Doth not Fortune ſo much ſmile upon you, as th you are beloved of your Subjects, and feared of yo Enemies? You, I ſay, who ſhall one day be poſſeſſe of a great Kingdom, where ſuch a laſting Peace is ſ ſurely ſetled as nothing can diſturb it; you whom th Gods have adorned with ſo many admirable Qualitie of ſo generous a Mind, ſo ſublime a Soul, all who Inclinations are noble, whoſe Perſon is admirabl handſome, whoſe Strength ſo incomparable, and who proportion of Body, moved by ſo courageous a Sou may eaſily prompt you to the moſt heroick Action Suppoſe I were all theſe you tell me (anſwered Cyr very quickly) and that they were Spurs to quicken me unto high Actions, and that the Gods have given me ſuch Qualities to employ them in common, poor, idl Things, am I not then the moſt unhappy Man aliv to make no better uſe of them? If I ſhould continu this courſe of Life long, Poſterity would not know that Cyrus ever lived: No, no, Chriſantes, I am not ſ happy as you think me, eſpecially ſince the time that Harpagus talk'd with me in the Foreſt: Let me tell you, I have endured ſuch anguiſh of Soul ever ſince, as you would pity me if you knew it; and I would acquaint you with it, if you will promiſe to be faithful and obey me. Sir, (ſaid I to him) I ſhall never fail in my Fidelity, and I will promiſe ever to obey you, ſo far as your Commands are juſt. I deſire no more, (ſaid he); then looking upon me with ſuch an Aſpect, as would win the heart of a Savage-man: My dear Chriſantes, (ſaid he) if you knew the torments of Mind I have endured, I am ſure they would move Compaſſion: Harpagus you know motioned a War unto me, and I refuſed it. Doth it repent you, Sir? (ſaid I, interrupting him) No, (ſaid he) but it troubles me that any Man ſhould propound any difficult buſineſs unto me, and I not in a Condition to accept it; not to diſſemble with you, if I had followed the Suggeſtions of my own Mind, I ſhould not have been eight days after that croſs Accident, but would have found out ſome War in ſome Country or other, that I might thereby make it apparent unto Harpagus, and all the World, how the only reaſon why I refuſed his Motion, was, becauſe I thought it unjuſt, and not becauſe I thought it difficult and dangerous: Who knows (ſaid he) whether Harpagus will think it Cowardiſe or Temperance in me? I am now of Age, wherein my Valour may be ſuſpected; and I ſhall never reſt ſatisfied until by ſome honourable and dangerous Adventure I have juſtified my ſelf, and redeem'd my honour: This is it, Chryſantes, I am infinitely weary of my idle Life, nor can I underſtand why you ſhould commend me as you have done, unleſs it were to rouſe up my dull Soul unto ſprightly Action. It hath been my Leſſon never to be weary in any Action I ſhall undertake, and that Delicacy is a crime; I have been taught that Valour is eſſentially requiſite in a Prince; and how he ought to Fight, to know the uſe of his Bow, his Spear, his Buckler, his Sword; but to what purpoſe are all theſe; if he never uſe them? What good is there in ability of Body to endure hardſhip, if ſhould be ever treading in the ſmooth Paths of th Courts Tranquility? What uſe can I make of m Valour, as long as I am lull'd in a lazy Peace? Wh ſhall I be the better for combating with wild Beaſt which know nothing but as nature teacheth them? I ſhort, Chriſantes, (not to conceal my Soul from yo I conceive the ſapient Documents and Inſtructio which have been infuſed into me, do all Authoriſe th deſign which I reſolve upon as ſoon as ever I can get opportunity for it. And what is your deſign, ſaid I t him? I would (anſwered he) leave the lazy Cour and Travel into Aſſyria, and from thence into Phrygi or any place, where I ſhall hear there is any War; have a deſire to inſtruct and improve my ſelf to th beſt Advantage; I would learn to know my ſelf, an all the World. Your Deſign is great, (ſaid I) an proceeds from a moſt Noble Soul; but, Sir, ſuch De ſigns as theſe ought not to be ſo lightly and inconſide rately taken up. I do not well know (anſwered Cyru how I ſhall take it, ſince Fortune doth oppoſe me; bu this I know, that I will employ the utmoſt of m Power to undertake it: Good Chriſantes, let me en treat you not to diſſwade me, for all you can poſſibl ſay, will be in vain, I am throughly reſolved upon it I am not ignorant of that Duty which I owe unto th King my Father, and unto the Queen my Mother; am infinitely tender of them both; but yet my deſir of Honour and Love of Glory is above both. Whe ther you allow, or diſallow of this Reſolution, believ me, dear Chriſantes, I will find out a way to put it i Execution, or Death ſhall be the only Obſtacle whic can hinder me. Cyrus pronounced theſe words wit ſo much active Animoſity, and with ſuch heroick Vio lence, as I paus'd and wondered, and could not an ſwer; his Eyes more than ordinary Sparkling; his Complexion more Vermilion; every Part ſo Agile, and his Diſcourſe ſo Poſitive, that there was no Contra dictions to be thought upon. I muſt confeſs, I did much honour his budding Virtue in him, and I coul not contend, with what I ſo much liked and admired. In concluſion, I deſired eight days time for conſideration, not liking to undertake a matter of this conſequence too raſhly; but I had much ado to obtain it, for he was reſolved to be gone whileſt his Father Cambiſes the King was in his Progreſs: Then, Sir, I did think my ſelf ſtrangely entangled in the buſineſs: I did perceive by the Queens intelligence from Ecbatane, that the Fears and Jealouſies of Aſtiages did rather much encreaſe, than any thing diminiſh; and I ſaw that this Violent, Scrupulous, and Superſtitious Prince, would either deſtroy Cyrus, or declare a War upon Perſia; and that it was impoſſible to prevent the one of theſe two: I preſently addreſſed my ſelf unto the Queen, and told her, that I diſcovered every day more, and freſh Diſcontents in the Prince her Son, and moved her to perſuade the King her Husband, that the Prince her Son might undertake ſome Travels, and in a diſguiſe ſee the World, be acquainted with the Manners of other Countries, and remove from under that malignant Conſtellation, which in this place, at this time was ſo predominate. But ſhe anſwered me, That ſhe thought Cambiſes being perſuaded that the Manners of the Perſians, were more Virtuous than thoſe of other People, he would therefore never conſent unto it, unleſs he had ſome ſtrong Arguments to induce him thereunto: yet as for her part, in conſideration of the King her Father's humours, ſhe did not much diſapprove of the motion; I perceived ſhe had ſome Inclinations that her Son ſhould be removed, but that her Maternal tenderneſs, joyned with the deſires of concealing her Father's Cruelty from Cambiſes knowledg, did impede it; and that this was the only reaſon which hindred her from abſolute conſenting to his departure: both ſhe and I did conceive much likelihood of producing good Effects, provided he were ſo handſomely diſguiſed, and not diſcovered by the Spies which Aſtiages had lurking in every corner of Perſipolis. Moreover, ſhe conſidered that the King of Medes her Father was Old, and of a mutable Diſpoſition; therefore fore it might ſo happen, that during her Son's Travels he might either die, or alter his mind, when he knew that he, who was the cauſe of his Fears, was far enough remote from being in the Head of any Army to trouble him; and ſince he travelled without any Accommodations or Train proportionable to his Quality. And tho the Queen did well enough reſent and underſtand all this, and confeſſed it, yet the preſence of her Son was ſo dear unto her, as ſhe could not fix upon this harſh Reſolution, however ſo full of Reaſon. I, pondering all theſe Circumſtances, and knowing that Honour was the only motive which prompted Cyrus to this Deſign, alſo conceiving it the only prudential courſe for the preſervation and maintaining of Peace between theſe two great Kingdoms, then I reſolved without diſcloſing any of theſe reaſons unto the Prince, to conſent unto his deſire, and I my ſelf to be a partaker of his Fortunes, and a witneſs of his Virtues, from which I expected high Atchievements. Certainly it was not without great reaſon, that I concealed from him the cauſes of all our Fears which we apprehended of his Life, if he had ſtayed any longer in Perſia; for doubtleſs, if he had known the truth, he would quickly have alter'd his Reſolutions, and would not have quit the Name of Cyrus for that of Artamenes, which now I adviſed him to take upon him. I cannot expreſs the Joy this Prince was in, when I went unto his Chamber, and told him, that he had overcome me, and that I would conſent unto his deſires, upon condition, that in all the Voyage, he would be pleaſed to promiſe me to condeſcend unto mine, and be rul'd by me; indeed, I never in all my Life ſaw ſo many ſigns of full Satisfaction, as appear'd in his looks. Ha, my Chriſantes, (cried he out, and embracing me) ſince you have contented in this, fear not, but I will obey you in any thing. Let us go, let us go upon any Conditions, for as long as you ſhall demand nothing but what is juſt and honourable, be confident, I will never diſobey. In concluſion, Sir, (not too much to abuſe your Patience) it was reſolved that Cyrus, and I, and Feraulas, (from whom he had not hid the deſign) and two other Servants, ſhould be all the number. As for our Subſiſtence, we took with us all the Prince's Jewels, which were not a few nor common ones, tho the Perſian Nation does openly profeſs to contemn all ſuch magnificent Superfluities; but the Queen following the Cuſtom of her own Country, brought with her a vaſt number, and gave the moſt and beſt of them unto Cyrus her Son, who ſeldom wore them, unleſs at publick Feaſts, and grand Ceremonies, intending to poiſe himſelf between the magnificent Mede, and the moderate Perſian. We put up all theſe Jewels, and pretended to Hunt with a ſmall number; we did prolong the Chaſe until Night; then diſperſing our ſelves in the Foreſt, and meeting at an appointed Rendezvous, we took our way and began our Voyage; the horrid Sequel whereof affrights me when I think upon it: But before our departure, the Prince writ unto his Father, asking Pardon for departing out of the Kingdom without his leave: He wrote another Letter alſo unto the Queen his Mother upon the ſame Subject; and without acquainting me, he left a Note to be conveyed unto Harpagus; in which he told him, That tho he had refuſed his offer, yet he ſhould ſee ere long, by what Rule he ſquared his Action. As for my part, I thought it not good for me to write unto the Queen, leſt the King ſhould come to ſee what I writ, and gather ſomething out of it, which the Queen would have concealed. Now, Sir, Cyrus muſt ceaſe to be Cyrus; and under the Name of Artamenes, you ſhall underſtand ſome of his glorious Acts. After we had lain three days in the wildred Foreſt, where we chang'd our Habits, and travelled three Nights, we arrived at Suſianes; that way ſeeming more ſafe than the other to paſs into Aſſyria, of which you know Babylon is the Metropolis, a Town, then of the greateſt Splendor of any that ever was. But, Sir, it befits me not to ſpeak of it before you, ſince you all, except Thraſibulus, contributed to the Deſtruction of it, and therefore are not ignorant:

I will only tell you, that tho Artamenes had no Intentions to take part with the Aſſyrian againſt the Phrygian, becauſe the Aſſyrians were the old Enemies of Aſtiages; yet we went thither to ſee the Court, which then was the greateſt and moſt pompous in all Aſia. When we approached near it, the Object did much delight Artamenes. As we paſſed along the Banks of the River Euphrates, we admired the Situation of this proud Town, which ſtood between two of the moſt famous Rivers in the World, Tygris and Euphrates. Here paſſed by us, two Men talking together, how that the Queen was poſſeſſed with great Joy, and great Sorrow, both together: Artamenes did overhear them; and you muſt know, Sir, Cambiſes had always a great deſire that his Son ſhould be taught the Languages of all the prime Nations of the World: It was his cuſtomary Speech, that it were very ſtrange a Prince ſhould not underſtand the Language of that Nation from whom he would entertain an Embaſſador; ſo that both Artamenes and I underſtood that Language: Artamenes then underſtanding what theſe two Men ſaid, addreſſed himſelf very civilly unto them, and asked them in their own Language: What did the Queen ſo much Joy, and ſo much Sorrow at? The one anſwered, That her Joy was, becauſe about ſome eight days ſince, the tedious War between the King of Aſſyria, and the King of Phrygia, was happily ended; a happy Peace was concluded upon advantageous Terms, and joyfully proclaimed about ſome two days ſince. But the Joy of this great Queen, who ſolely governed the Kingdom ſince the Death of the King her Husband, altho ſhe had cauſed the Prince her Son to be Crowned King; this Joy, I ſay, was turned into great Sorrow; the reaſon of it is, becauſe ſhe having but this only Son, whom ſhe intended to Marry unto the Daughter of a Prince, called Gadates, with whom this Peace was concluded, and whom this Prince could not affect, was gone from the Court, and none knows what is become of him. After the Man had thus ſatisfied the Prince's demands, and the Prince returned thanks, the Man took his way, and we ours. But when I look'd upon Artamenes, and found him all Sadneſs; What, Sir, (ſaid I to him) have you any ſuch intereſt in the buſineſs of the Queen Nitocris, as that you ſhould be a Partner in her Grief? Chriſantes, (ſaid he to me) altho I know this Princeſs to be the Glory of her Sex, and the Fame of her Name, and Virtue moves me to a high eſteem of her, yet it is not her Sorrow troubles me moſt, but I am vexed at the giddy fantaſticalneſs of my Fortune: I come hither to ſeek for a War, and find all huſh'd up in Peace; I thought to find a turbulent Country, turmoild in Confuſions and Diviſions, and behold all compos'd into Tranquility; I hearkened for the ſhrill Sound of Trumpets, and I heard nothing but Acclamations of Joy; I went to the Court to ſee how the moſt Potent Prince of Aſia lived in this moſt ſtately Town, and it ſeems he's fled, and nothing but Cries and Tears, where I expected ſuch Magnificence. But Feraulas, (ſaid he, turning towards him) this ſhall diſquiet me no more; and if other buſineſs troubled me no more than this, my heart would be more at eaſe. Feraulas, as well as I, did cheer him up, and told him, that the Diſgrace which he apprehended concerning Harpagus, was nothing, nor ſo great as it ſeems he thought it; yet, notwithſtanding we went into Babylon, and obſerved it with much Circumſpection; the Prince viewed the Fortifications, and I was amazed to hear with what Judgment he ſpoke of thoſe things, in which he had never been verſed or inſtructed; the Martial humour of this Prince, caus'd us to ſtay longer upon ſuch things than any other; he did moſt ſeriouſly view the prodigious Walls of the Town, the Motes and Ditches full of Water, which inviron'd it; the hundred Gates of Braſs, which ſhut and opened into it;the River Euphrates,which added much Strength unto it; he look'd upon theſe more preciſely, than upon the Magnificence of the King's Palace, or the rare Gardens, which may be ſaid to be in the Air, becauſe they are over all the Houſes, and all the Walls: nor did he much mind the Temple of Jupiter Belus, which you know is one of the greateſt Rarities in the World. In all his Walks and all his Journeys, all his Thoughts, and all his Diſcouſe was all of War: If I were to take this Town (would he ſay) I would Aſſault it on that ſide; and when he ſaw a great Plain, which had any riſing Ground about it, he would tell me, that he ſhould be Maſter of the Field, if he gave Battle unto the Enemy from that piece of Ground. Thus did we view Babylon, and becauſe many things were very remarkable, we ſtay'd a Month in it; during which time, we often ſaw the Queen, who doubtleſs was one of the greateſt Princeſſes in the World: It was ſhe which built that magnificent Bridge, that huge piece of work, whereby ſhe turned the courſe of the River Euphrates, which hath ſince cauſed much Sorrow unto Artamenes: Notwithſtanding her Grief for the abſence of her Son, yet ſhe did not deſiſt from the work, but we ſee her every Morning and Evening, go, her ſelf to haſten it on, which has rendred her famous unto Poſterity. In this Court we ſaw Mazares, Prince of Saces, who ſince, was much engaged in my Maſter's Adventures, and hath cauſed him a thouſand ſad Diſaſters, ſuch as was like to be at the price of his Life. Artamenes one day thinking upon Nitocris, and her great Work, turned to me and ſaid, This Princeſs makes me wonder at the induſtrious care which ſhe takes about this Work; certainly her aims in it are all for Fame and Glory; But poor I have not yet done any thing to advance my honour. Diſquiet not your ſelf, Sir (ſaid I to him) ſince you are yet but young, and cannot complaim of any loſt time; you have much before you, and will have occaſions enough to make you talkt on: At laſt we ſatisfied his impatience, and left Babylon, becauſe we had intelligence that there was ſome ſigns of a War began to appear between the King of Lidia and the King of Phrygia: But as I was not ſo forward as he to run into danger, ſo I endeavoured to ſtay him until ſuch time as the Wars were publickly declared, yet to travel both the Countries without engaging on either ſide: At my deſire he conſented, when he call'd to mind his promiſe of being rulud by me all the Voyage: and he reſolved to perform his word, though with much repugnancy: So we travelled thoſe Countreys which were governed by thoſe great Princes, and Artamenes, though as impatient as any to have his Arms on, yet was perſuaded by me: It muſt be acknowledged that the Greek Nation hath many advantages above others, and if it were united as it is divided, and if thoſe which dwell in the ancient Countrey would concur with thoſe who inhabit Aſia, then perhaps they would teach obedience unto all them which they term Barbarians. Well, Sir, after we had ſeen many places, which would be over-tedious to relate, we came to the Town of Milete, which we found to be very faſtious, ſome lamenting their Prince which others had depoſed, and thoſe others plotting how to prevent his ever-reſtauration, leſt they ſhould be treated as Traytors: We ſaw the Towns of Mius and Priends both of them within Caire. We went afterwards to Claſſomenes, to Phocius, and Epheſus, where the beautiful Temple of Diana told Artamenes, that our own Nation might be aſhamed they did not build ſuch another, but that they ſhould ſo offer their Sacrifices upon the tops of Mountains: Conceiving, that the beſt works of all the Sons of men were yet far too unworthy to be the Houſe of God. Certainly this Temple is a piece ſo magnificent, that it well deſerves the name of the World's wonder. We underſtood that the late King of Lidia, named Alliatte, Father of Cræſus, who now reigns, had great devotion unto this place, and how he ſent hither Offerings ſo rich, as the Temple of Delphos had not the like, although it was fam'd all over the World, and more ancient than that of Epheſus. We underſtood here alſo, That the Inhabitants of that Famous Town were not well pleas'd with Cræſus, as they were formerly with his Father, having ſome jealouſies that he intended war upon them. Artamenes ſtayed here ſome days longer than intended, purpoſely to dive into the buſineſs: During which time we could not chuſe but wonder at the multitudes of ſtrangers that reſorted hither to conſult with the Oracle. I moved Artamenes to enquire concerning the ſucceſs of his Voyage and Fortunes, yet he would not, but told me that he had more reverence unto the Gods, than to pry into their Secrets; nor was it fit to ſatisfy fond curioſity ſo far as to fore-know his future Fortune: yet that which chiefly reſtrain'd him (as I conceive) was his fear not to find that in the anſwer of the Gods, which he ſo much deſired, to wit, Glory, and the occaſions to acquire it, War: but the event of things did ſhew how his fears were falſly grounded, and that the Deſtinies would have told him nothing but of his Victories and Triumphs. Whilſt we were at Epheſus, we converſed with many Grecians which came to that place, ſome out of Devotion, and ſome Curioſity: amongſt the reſt, Periander, King of Corinth, came hither in diſguiſe, and lodged in the ſame place with us: Many terms of Friendſhip paſt betwixt him and me (if it become to ſay ſo of a Sovereign.) This wiſe Prince, whoſe wiſdom was in higheſt eſteem throughout all Greece, had ſo great a fancy unto Artamenes, as he forced me to promiſe him, as ſoon as our Affairs would permit, to travel unto Corinth. After we had paſt over all Chaire, and part of Lidia, we viſited both high and low Phrygia: in the firſt of theſe we ſaw that great Town of Apameus, and in the other the Mountain Ida, the Port of Tenedos, the River of Xanthis, and the deplorable Ruines of Troy; Artamenes ſtayed here with much delight, and viewing the places where the valiant Hector and famous Achilles fought, he could hardly ſtir off it: at laſt we paſt on, and behold the Tomb of this Demigod. As we came into Jonia, we procured a man of the Iſle of Samos, who being a great Scholar, well travelled, and very knowing in all Antiquity, became our guide, and ſhewed unto us all that was rare: Artamenes asked him a thouſand Queſtions concerning Troy and its Leaguer. There remains yet ſome Ruines of the two Marble Caſtles, which neither the Flames nor old Time had yet demoliſhed. The Prince was much pleaſed with the ſight, and went over all the Ruines and Rocks, and over the Famous Rivers of Scamander and Simois. This Countrey, which heretofore did flow with Noble blood, ſeemed now to be a Land conſecrated unto the Gods of Peace: This Learned Grecian which we had with us, told us, that Periander, whom we had ſeen in Epheſus, was not the only wiſe man of Greece, but that the Nation was now as full of wiſe and excellent men, as in the days of Agamemnon, Ulyſſes and Neſtor. This commendation moved Artamenes to have a great deſire of going thither. So that we ſeeing the Wars in Phrygia proceeded no further, I perſuaded him to paſs into Greece, to which he conſented, and we went.

To begin with the moſt famour firſt, We came to Athens, which we much admired, as well for that Famous Port of Pireus, as the excellent order of Laws here eſtabliſhed by a man of great wiſdom, whoſe name was Solon, and who did voluntarily baniſh himſelf ten years for his own Countrey, to the end his Laws might thereby not be changed, he having obliged the Citizens by Oath to obſerve them until his return. Artamenes came here acquainted with Piſiſtrates, who, as ſome ſaid, became Tyrannical; Whilſt we were at Athens, there was a flying Report that Solon was in the Iſle of Cyprus. So that I confeſs I did forward Artamenes his deſire of going thither, as well to ſee that fair Iſland ſeated in the Ægean Sea, alſo that Famous Temple of Venus, as to be acquainted with that prudent Grecian; but we were not ſo fortunate as to find him there, yet it was Artamenes his good fortune to contract friendſhip with a Prince called Philoxippes, a man of high ſpirit and great vertue: But I will not trouble you with every particular paſſage of our Voyage, and omit many Iſlands which we ſaw in the Ægean Sea; I will only tell you, that after our coming to Athens, whither my Maſter promiſed Philiſtrates to return, we went to Lacedemon, which Government did not pleaſe him, who thought all the Earth too little to fill up the chinks of his Ambition. This Great Soul thought two Kings in one Kingdom incompatible. At laſt we came to Delphos, Argos, Micenes and Corinth, where we were magnificently treated by the wiſe Periander: for this gallant man ever thought the Laws of Hoſpitality inviolable, and that Strangers could not be welcomed with too much Civility: It was his pleaſure that the Princeſs Cleobuline his Daughter, whoſe beauty and wit was fam'd throughout all Greece, ſhould honour Artamenes with her converſe: he was as exact in the Greek Tongue as any Native. Periander to entertain him, cauſed Arion (that famous Muſician, as well for his excellency in that Art, as for the Dolphin which preſerved him) to play before him. I will trouble you no more, Sir, with many remarkable Paſſages, and how my Maſter did infinitely better himſelf by the obſervation of the ſeveral Manners and Cuſtoms of thoſe People and Places where he came: But in the concluſion of all, I muſt tell you, That at the Port of Corinth, where men from all parts arrive, there we came to know, that the War between Lidia and Ionia was now broke out and publiſhed, and that the ſtorm which had long hovered, was now fallen upon them. Upon this Artamenes becomes all Impatiency till he were in Arms, and preſently reſolved for Epheſus, there to engage with them againſt Cræſus their Enemy. In taking leave of Periander, he told him how deſirous he was to recompence the Grecians for the Civilities which he had received from them. So Periander furniſhing us with a well tackled Ship; we put to Sail with a favourable wind. Artamenes thought now he had met with an opportunity to put that prodigious valour which Nature had infus'd into him, into practice: his deſire of glory did elevate his Soul ſo high, as that he was wrapt into a Heaven of unimaginable joy: But Fortune which had made him wait ſo long for an opportunity, did now offer him one which he looked not for, and which was like to have proved very fatal unto him; for ſuddenly a Mariner cried out, he diſcovered four Sail of Ships coming towards them, and if we looked not well about us, they would immediately fetch us up: The Pilot he lookt, and was more diſmayed than at firſt: for he diſcovered that it was certainly the valiant Pirate who made up to aſſault us. Pardon me, Generous Thraſybu- lus, (ſaid Chriſantes, and breaking off his Story) if in following my Narration exactly, if I give you a Name which was ſo much renowned in all the Seas where we paſſed. No, no, (ſaid Thraſibulus to him) I think never the worſe, that you ſhould give me a name which my ill fortune made me aſſume, and which, perhaps, better Fates may render more conſiderable upon the Ægian, Helleſpont, and Euxian Seas, and which may wipe off all that infamy which waits upon the quality of a Pirate: Continue on your Story, and omit not the leaſt circumſtance which relates unto the Story of Artamenes. Chriſantes, ſeeing Thraſibulus ſilent, and all the Princes prepared for attention, he went on. The Pilot then being confident it was the valiant Pirate which came with reſolutions to ſet upon us, without any further order endeavoured to ſhun all encounter, and fly from ſuch an Enemy as always uſed to conquer; eſpecially ſince their number ſo exceeded us: which Artamenes no ſooner ſaw, but he took hold of him with one hand, and of the Stern with the other; No, no, ſaid he, thou ſhalt not be Maſter of this Ship if thou beginneſt to run away; Mark me, if thou doſt not immediately carry me ſtraight unto the Enemy, I will throw thee into the Sea, or run thee through with my Sword: The Pilot as well as I, was ſo amaz'd at his violence, as he threw himſelf at his feet, and ſaid, that he did not think he would undertake ſuch an Enemy as there was no hopes or poſſibility of overcoming: Do as I bid thee, ſaid Artamenes, and leave the reſt to the Gods, and my Courage. When I heard the Prince ſay ſo, and having learned from the Mariners how the famous Pirate was mighty ſtout; Sir, (ſaid I to him) what do you mean to do? I will either conquer, or die, ſaid he, and will not loſe this firſt opportunity which Fortune offers me to make uſe of my Valour: But, Sir, (replied I) how can you conquer where there is neither poſſibility or hopes of it? Have I not told you (ſaid the Prince) if I cannot conquer, I can die; and I had much rather do ſo, than fly, and not fight when I have occaſion offered: Sir (replied I) to retire from an Enemy too numerous and ſtrong, is not a diſgraceful flight, but a prudent and honourable Retreat, and you ought not to mix Raſhneſs and Valour together: Diſcretion is the better part of Valour; I know not how to make theſe faint diſtinctions (ſaid the Prince very roughly to me) I am afraid to be deceived by them in a buſineſs which concerns my Honour; the ſurer way is to fight, and that I'll take: Therefore (ſaid he, ſpeaking to the Soldiers and Mariners) I heartily deſire you all to prepare your ſelves for fight, and imitate me: During this Argument, the four Ships which gave us chaſe, and were much better Sailers than we, were come ſo near us, that I ſaw there was no way but to prepare for defence: and it was not to be imagined that the Prince would now retreat, or ſubmit without combat: Then I began to aſſiſt the Prince in giving orders: And after we had commanded them all not to row when we were almoſt within Oar-reach of the Ship, and the Pilot to make toward their Admiral, Feraulas and I rankt our ſelves next him: I muſt needs give this Teſtimony of his virtue, Never was ſeen more conſtancy and alacrity in ſo great a danger, as appeared in the Soul of this young Prince; He had got ready by him a Bow, a Quiver, abundance of Arrows upon his ſhoulder, beſides ſome in his hands; alſo many Darts and Javelins, but he thought ſo little of a Buckler, and of any danger, that he had wanted it, if I had not brought him one juſt when we began to accoſt the Enemy. All this while the Renowned Corſaires ſees our inequality, and thought to take us without a blow; but Artamenes is of another mind, and inſpires mettle into the Soldiers and Mariners, and commands the Pilot to make towards the Enemy, who doth ſo punctually obey, that we were preſently within reach of each other: ſo that in lieu of vailing Bonnet, as Corſaires did believe we would, we ſaluted him with a Cloud of Arrows, which killed many of his men, whom we ſaw tumble down upon the Deck; This bold attempt made the Pirate conclude, that either ſome man of a moſt high courage was in the Ship, or elſe ſome deſperate Enemy, who would die fighting without ſubmiſſion.

miſſion. He being thus incenſed with our bold affront, begins to order himſelf like a Soldier who knew how to fight: He commanded all his Ships to encloſe us round, that ſo he might the more aſtoniſh us, and take us without boarding: yet do what they could, it was two hours at the leaſt before he could compaſs us; and if the Prince would have been contented with fighting thus upon ſuch unequal terms, and have retreated without an abſolute victory, he might eaſily have avoided that danger wherein afterwards we were ſurrounded; for at laſt theſe four Ships (in ſpight of all our Pilots art) did compaſs us about, and fell upon us with ſuch fury, as we fought in darkneſs, by reaſon of the ſhowers of Arrows which covered our Ship, and fell upon our heads. Artamenes ſeeing it thus, commanded to make at the Admiral, and aſſault him: we all obey, we grapple, we board him, and begin a fight, the like was never ſeen: Artamenes leapt into the Ship of Corſaires, at the ſame time when the Pirate leapt into his: ſo that in an inſtant of time theſe two Generals were amidſt their Enemies. The fight is now moſt ſtrange; and that happened upon this accident, as the like, I believe, will never do again: for we were all very attentive unto Artamenes, and when he leapt into the Pirate's Ship, all of us leapt after him, except ſome few that were repulſed or killed: on the other ſide, the Soldiers of Corſaires did the like, and followed their Captain with the like fury that we followed ours. By this confuſion Artamenes became Maſter of Corſaires his Ship, and Corſaires Maſter of Artamenes: At their firſt entrance, they both rejoyced,and thought they had been Victors; but when they perceived their Error, and that they had only changed Ships: Artamenes by menaces made the Mariners of Corſaires Ship obey him; Corſaires did the like with Artamenes's Mariners; they then began to fight afreſh, and ſtrive to re-enter into their own Ships: The fight is furious, and this odd chance did a-while prolong it, and our deſtruction; for the three other Ships of Corſaires did not perceive this changing chance, as well becauſe they were ſo far off, as becauſe of the thick clouds of Arrows: therefore they move not a finger againſt the Ship of their Admiral in which we were, but they aſſault our Ship in which Corſaires was; ſo that he could neither defend himſelf, nor offend us: My Maſter knowing him to be the Chief of the Enemies, did undertake him ſingle, with ſo much vigour and reſolution, as none ever ſaw the like: And all the Mariners who were Spectators of the Combat, did aſſure us, that Artamenes more than twenty times entred the Veſſel: and the Valiant Pirate did the like before any advantage on either ſide did appear; All after their example puſht the Pike, ſhot Arrows, and did ſlaſh with Swords: As for Artamenes, he uſed all theſe Weapons: for when he was far off, he ſhot Arrows; when nearer, he us'd the Pike; and when joined, his Sword was not idle. The truth is, he was ſo admirable at them all, as I could not believe it to be him. Preſently after, the three Ships diſcover their error, and fight no more againſt their Maſter, but fall all pelmel upon us. Now when Artamenes ſaw no hopes of any thing but periſhing; and ſpying Feraulus and I near him, (Feraulas, I ſay, of whoſe valour I will not ſpeak in his preſence) he turned towards us all in a fury, and ſaid, "I ſee, My "Friends, we cannot overcome, but if you will ſecond "me, the Pirats ſhall pay very dear for their Victory: After this, what did he not do? or what can I ſay more than is truth? Though he ſaw the Ship beſet round with Enemies, and though he found their Commander Corſaires of great courage; and though he ſaw moſt of his own men which remained alive, almoſt all wounded, and himſelf alſo received a wound with an Arrow upon the left ſhoulder, yet for all this he was not at all diſmayed; he was ſometimes at the Prow, and ſometimes at the Poop of the Ship: Here he puſht a Pirate into the Sea, there he kill'd another with his Sword at one blow; and ſo beſtirr'd himſelf, that one might well know he was uncapable of ſubmiſſion: All this while, Feraulas and I had the misfortunes to be ſo wounded, as we were carried out of the combat; Feraulas having two wounds with a Javelin through both his Thighs; and I, two cuts with a Sword upon my Right Arm: Yet for all this, though Artamenes ſaw he was quite loſt, and heard me cry unto him, that it was no diſhonour to render himſelf a Priſoner, and that the Pirate would ſave him; and though he ſaw the Deck covered with blood, and dead men, yet this Imp of Mars, this inflexible heart of ſteel would not ſurrender, but fought on with more violence than before. In concluſion, a Valiant Greek, who was very eminent for combat, did grapple with him; they both tumble into the Sea: Then did all the Soldiers which were alive, ſubmit; and the Pirate now having no Enemies to reſiſt him, did ſee ſome 30 paces off his Ship the invincible Artamenes; who ſwimming with one hand, and holding his Sword with the other, did yet maintain fight againſt that Valiant Grecian, which tumbled into the Sea with him, who ſeeing Artamenes Lance always againſt him with much courage, began a terrible Duel: This Greek being elder, much ſtronger, and leſs wounded, did better reſiſt the violence of the Waves, which ſometimes did ſeparate them, and ſometimes brought them together, ſometimes ſeemed to choak them both, and end their quarrel in triumphing over both; the like Combat was never ſeen upon Land: I leave you, Sir, to imagine what effects this wrought upon my Soul, who by reaſon of my wound in the Arm, had loſt ſo much blood, as I could not move, or help; Imagine, I ſay, what I thought when I ſaw this excellent Prince in ſuch a condition: I know not well what my deſign was, but I remember how I would have thrown my ſelf into the Sea, but was not able: at laſt the Pirate being charmed with the Valour of Artamenes, and ſeeing him in this danger, commanded five or ſix of his men to take a little Boat and ſave him: Theſe men did preſently obey his command; and making towards Artamenes, commanded the ſtout Greek to forbear Combat; whereupon, he got into their Boat, and changed his deſires of killing, into endeavours of ſaving Artamenes. They did their beſt to catch hold of him, which they could not have done, if he had not been much wearied with ſwimming, and had received ceived another wound in his right Arm againſt the Point of a Rock which was inviſible within the water: he ſtrives to ſwim faſter, and accoſt this Boat, and a violent Wave wreſted his Sword out of his hand: as he was about to dive for it, thoſe which were in the Boat, catched hold, and drew him in, brought him aboard the Ship, and preſented him unto the renowned Pirate, who received him with a generoſity beyond example; and ſaid, “ Have I fought with ſo poor a Courage, that “ you think me unworthy to be both your Conqueror “ and Deliverer? You have fought (anſwered Artamenes) with ſo much Courage, that my fears of never equalling you, make me deſpair; and I care not “ for receiving my life from that man whom I would “ have killed, and could not. The inequality of your “ number (anſwered the moſt Illuſtrious Pirate very “ ſweetly) does juſtify your Valour ſufficiently, and “ gives excuſe enough unto your defeat: if I ſhould “ triumph thus again, I ſhould never triumph more: “ and I find my Victory ſo dearly bought, and honourable to you, that if there were a Praiſe to be given “ unto the Conqueror, I would give it unto you, and “ not aſſume it unto my ſelf. When he had ſpoken thus, he gave command, that there ſhould be as great a care of Artamenes as of himſelf: And after he was informed whoſe this Ship was, and underſtood them to be mere Strangers, whom Curioſity only brought into Greece, then he treated us with much more ſweetneſs than before. I ſhall not now tell you, Sir, of all the Civilities which this Noble Corſaires uſed towards Artamenes, and us all, becauſe the honoured Thraſibulus knows it well enough. I ſhall only tell you thus much; that if Artamenes had been his Brother, he could not have expreſſed more indulgence. My Maſter's Wounds were not dangerous, Corſaires was the worſe, but both quickly healed; yet Feraulas and I could not ſo ſoon recover. Now, although Artamenes could not comfort up himſelf with any honour he had gotten, ſince he was not abſolutely Conqueror in this firſt Combat which ever he had made; yet Virtue, being ever full of attractive Charms, cauſed a great League of Love inſenſibly to grow between him and the Renowned Pirate: This Amity was the cauſe why this Illuſtrious Pirate was not ſo forward in offering my Maſter his Liberty, and why my Maſter was ſo backward in asking it. So that there being occaſion of Corſaires going towards the Euxine Bridge, we went along with him: not conſidering whether or no it would conduce to the good or bad fortune of Artamenes. In our paſſage thither, we put in at Lesbos, where the Noble Pirate had ſome buſineſs: My Maſter and I went to ſee a cry'd-up Beauty there, whoſe Name was Saphon, whom all Greece admired; indeed, we found her worthy of that fame, both for her Beauty, and the Verſes which ſhe compos'd. But, Sir, to come unto the buſineſs of my Story: I muſt tell you in few words, That in our paſſage to the Euxine Bridge, after we had ſailed three days and three nights, Corſaires, who uſed to aſſault others, was now aſſaulted himſelf by ſix Ships. This Combat, which was both long and fierce, Artamenes would needs be in; and performed Acts ſo gallant and high, that the modeſty of the famous Corſaires made him ſay after the Battel, that he owed the Victory unto Artamenes. In concluſion, he thought himſelf ſo obliged unto my Maſter, that of three Ships which he had taken, he would needs give him two: yet Artamenes would take but one; in which he deſign'd himſelf for the Helleſpont and the Ægine Sea, and ſo for Epheſus, intending to ſend Periander this Ship in lieu of his own, which was much torn and leaky, ſince the laſt Combat.

Thus he parted from this generous Pirate, not knowing him, nor being known unto him; for as they were both reſolved not to diſcover themſelves, ſo they would not ask one another that queſtion which they themſelves would not anſwer unto. And thus their friendſhip, though very great, did cauſe them both to moderate their deſires, and not be too inquiſitive into what both of them deſired to conceal: Alſo ſuch was the Diſcretion of my Maſter, that he fought in this laſt encounter, and never knew againſt whom, nor ſo much as asked the queſtion, becauſe he found that the generous Pirate made a myſtery it. Artamenes then, with Feraulas, my ſelf, and two Servants more which Corſaires gave my Maſter, returned from whence we came, and at firſt found a favourable wind; yet we had ſcarce ſailed ſix hours, but a terrible tempeſt began to riſe, and that ſo extraordinary and violent, as the Pilot himſelf began to tremble: the Air was dusky, the Sea boiſterous, and rowled (Montes volvuntur aquarum) mountains of waves upon us, and upon one another; it roared horribly, and toſt the Ship ſo high, and then again ſo low, as the Mariners had much ado to keep it upright: the flaſhes of Lightning, the rumbling of Thunder, and the night's obſcurity, all theſe, made us ſee when we could ſee nothing elſe, That they who are of a lofty compounded Soul, cannot fear death, let it appear in what horror it can; for my Maſter was no more moved at it, than if he had been floating in the calmeſt River in the World, he gave out Orders without any confuſion: Though the Danger was ſo great, and Death looked ſo inevitably grim; yet fear did not ſo much as make him alter his Countenance or Diſcourſe. We continued three days and three nights in this manner, and were quite driven out of our Aims; for intending at the Euxine Bridge, we found our ſelves upon the fourth day at Sun riſe, caſt upon the Port of Sinope, which you know is in Cappadocia, towards the Frontiers of Galatia.

I relate this, Sir, that you may more wonder at the oddneſs of phantaſtical Fate, who preſerves Artamenes from the Fury of an incenſed Sea, to caſt him in the midſt of his Enemies Land; for Ciaxares you know was the Son of Aſtiages; and indeed it was he, who had more reaſon to fear the Menaces of the Gods than Aſtiages his Father; who was ſo old, as he had as many Feet in his Grave as in his Throne; yet when we underſtood that the Court was not at Sinope, but at another Town called Pteria, I was in leſs fears; and tho I did not ſee how it was poſſible Artamenes ſhould be known, yet I endeavoured as much as might be, not to put in there, but it could not be avoided. We ſaw from the place where we were, that ſtately Temple dedicated unto Mars, which as you know, is a little out of the Town. The next morning, whileſt our Ship was repairing which had been much torn by the Tempeſt, we went to viſit the Temple. And as things that are extraordinary, are commonly the diſcourſe of them who Travel for Curioſity, and have nothing elſe to do but to ſee Wonders, the Prince began to ask the reaſon, why in ſo many places as he had travelled, he ſhould find fewer Temples dedicated to Mars, than any other Gods or Goddeſſes; and as if he were jealous of the Honour of that God, he called to memory all the Temples which had been dedicated unto Venus; and found, that there was many more devoted unto that Goddeſs of Love, than to that God of War: And why, Sir, (ſaid I to him ſmiling) are you an Enemy unto that Divinity, which is ſo much adored throughtout all the World, and every one does offer Sacrifices unto her? I am no Enemy, anſwered he, but I am very jealous of the others Honour, and think it fitter that Mars ſhould have more Altars than ſhe: Perhaps (ſaid I) you will not be always in that mind. I know not (anſwered he) but in the mind I am in now, War ſhall ever be preferred before Love. You have reaſon, Sir, (ſaid I) for the one is much more Heroick than the other; but as zealous as you are now for Mars, you may perhaps one day become a Convert, and pay as much Devotion unto Venus. I cannot think ſo (ſaid he) I am much deceived if ever that come about; as ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, we entred into the Temple, which we found magnificently adorned. There was then very few People in it, ſo that we had convenience of obſerving every thing: we found here in the Temple a Stranger of a very handſome Garb, and well proportioned, much about the Age of Artamenes, or about two years at the moſt more than he. This Gallant obſerving the Cuſtom of the Country, where they uſe to be ſoon acquainted, came amongſt us, and diſcourſed with Artamenes; they earneſtly view one another, and with ſome Aſtoniſhment: This Stranger found we ſpoke the Language of the Country, which much reſembles that of Medes, as well as that of Aſſyria, by reaſon of its nearneſs to both; he ſpoke in the ſame we did, and ſeemed to be one of an ingenious Spirit. Preſently we ſee much Company come into the Temple, and obſerved to paſs before us Preparations for ſome coſtly Sacrifice; they were a hundred white Bulls crowned with Garlands of Flowers, driven by two Men, the ordinary number for Hecatomes: we ſaw many Veſſels of Gold paſs by to receive the blood of theſe Victims: we alſo ſaw men carry the ſacred Chafing-diſhes, on which to burn their Incenſe; alſo their rich Knives wherewith to cut their Sacrifices; and all the Sacrificers in their Ceremonial Habits walked two and two together: Preſently all was ready to be ſacrificed, only there wanted the Perſons who muſt offer them. As we were looking upon all theſe things with much delight, upon a ſudden we heard many ſay aloud, Room for the King; room for the King: at theſe words the People preſſed unto both ſides, and made a paſſage for the King. I confeſs to you, Sir, this Accident did much ſurpriſe me; and I was very angry to ſee Artamenes ſo near Ciaxares, who came this Morning from Pteria unto Sinope, to offer theſe Sacrifices. Artamenes too curious and forward to ſee theſe Paſſages, would, whether I would or no, range himſelf in the firſt Rank of the People, juſt in the Prince's paſs. The Train of Courtiers which uſe always to walk before the King, were come up to the Altar: Artamenes, who much longed to ſee the King of Cappadocia, ſees him enter, and leaning upon the Arm of Aribees, who was then a great Favourite; after him entred the Princeſs Mandana his Daughter, who without all manner of diſpute was abſolutely the faireſt that ever eye beheld. I no ſooner ſaw her appear, but I ſaw Artamenes alſo preſſing near her, and leaving the Stranger which we met with, for a fairer Object This Princeſs might well kindle ſuch curioſity in the Soul of Artamenes, as ſhe did. Be pleaſed, Sir, to remember, as I told you in the beginning of my Relation, that this Princeſs was born about three years after Artamenes, tamenes, ſo that the firſt time he ſaw her, ſhe entred upon her Sixteenth year; ſhe was this day moſt richly dreſt; and tho there did not appear any affectedneſs in her Habit, yet it was infinitely becoming; her Tiffany Vail of Silver did not at all hide the Splendor of a thouſand rich Jewels ſet in Gold to deck her Hair, which was the faireſt Flaxen that ever was ſeen; her Ornaments did not Eclipſe the vivacity of her ſprightly Looks, which is the eſſential part of a perfect Beauty; She was of an excellent Stature, and walked with ſo much modeſt Majeſty, as ſhe did attract the Eyes of all Beholders; her Neck no Snow ſo white; her Eyes were blewiſh fair, but ſo ſweet, ſo lovely, ſo ſparkling, and ſo full of inviting Charms, as it was abſolutely impoſſible to look upon them and not admire; her Lips no Roſe ſo red; her Teeth no Ivory ſo perfect white, nor no Rule ſo even; her Complexion ſo pure, ſo clear, ſo ſmooth, and ſo exact Vermilion, that all the Luſtre of a Flowry-ſpring was ugly in compariſon of her glorious Idea; her Hands as white and clear as ever any eye beheld; for I beheld this laſt piece of Beauty, as ſhe lifted up her Vail at her entrance into the Temple, and as afterward with wonder I beheld all the reſt. In ſhort, Sir, all theſe Beauties and attractive Charms which laſt I related, are good Arguments to render Artamenes more excuſable. He was ſo Planet-ſtruck with all the Actions and Motions of this Princeſs, that whether ſhe walked or ſat, whether ſhe Spoke or were Silent, whether ſhe Smil'd or Frown'd, ſhe was all Charms, all Attracts, all Admirable; with this Divine Apparition was Artamenes ſurpriſed, and amorouſly blaſted: So that not regarding Ciaxares, he beholds Mandana coming in ſuch a manner, as I told you; but fairer by a thouſand degrees than any Tongue can tell: He was ſo raviſht, that removing from his Station, he got up cloſe to the very foot of the Altar where ſhe kneeled: Feraulas and I ſeeing him do ſo, preſſed up alſo; and we ſaw him ſo placed, that he might both ſee and be ſeen by her; for I never in the whole courſe of my Life ſaw ſuch a Paſſage; ſince the Princeſs of Cappadocia came into the Temple, Artamenes minded nothing but her; he knew not whether it was a Sacrifice, or only an Aſſembly, or ſome publick Game for a prize; he ſaw nothing but Mandana; he lookt upon her continually, and the more he lookt, the more he lik'd, and often changed Colour; he told us afterwards, how he was ſo wrapt with the Divine Viſion, as he had not power to look off her, and he aſſured us, he did what he could to divert his Eyes and Thoughts, but it was not in his Power. Mean while the Sacrifice begins, and the Chief Prieſt being proſtrate at the foot of the Altar, pronounced these words; the King, the Princeſs, and all obſerving a hush ſilence.

FOR the Happineſs of this bleſſed Peace which we enjoy, Accept (O Mighty God of War) theſe pure and innocent Victims, which here we come to offer, in lieu of that which young Cyrus, the Terror of all Aſia would have offered, if the goodneſs of Heaven had not eſtabliſhed the Thrones of all the Kingdoms of the Earth in Peace by his Death. Receive from the King, from the Princeſs his Daughter, from all Cappadocia, and from all Medea, theſe their moſt devout Thanks for the great benefit of his Death. His Death, I ſay, which hath given a happy Peace in all Aſia, and whoſe Life would have put the whole Earth into Confuſion and Miſery.

I leave you to judg, Sir, in what a caſe I was in, and how my Maſter was ſtartled, tho he minded nothing elſe but Mandana; for he was much aſtoniſhed when he heard himſelf named: I lookt him in the Face, and he lookt upon me, but his mind was upon ſomething elſe; I removed from my Station to come to him. Sir, ſaid I very low, we ſhould not do ill to be gone from hence, but we ſhall do better (ſaid he, bluſhing) to ſtay here. When I ſaw the Prince in that Reſolution, I durſt not preſs him further, leſt ſome notice ſhould be taken of us. Then I ſtayed by him, who notwithſtanding all this, did ſtill look upon Mandana with ſo much earneſtneſs, that he neither minded the Death of the Sacrifices, nor the Perfumes: he perceived no ſuch thing until all the Ceremonies were over, and the King, and Princeſs his Daughter, were going out of the Temple. Then he followed them out, and I think he would have followed them into the Caſtle, whither they went to Dinner, and which was ſome Sixty paces out of Sinope, if I had not ſtopt him. Sir, (ſaid I, ſhewing him the way) that is your way to the Town; then Artamenes, without any anſwer to what I ſaid, but ſtill looking after the Princeſs Chariot; as long as they were within ſight, he never turned his head that way; at laſt we came to the Houſe where we lodged. All this while our Ship was trimming, and putting into ſome condition to make Sail; but when we came to it, there was a great Alteration; for Artamenes at his going to the Temple, was all for haſte; but at his return, he ſaid they made too much haſte to do it well. All Dinner while, he ſpoke little, eat leſs; for my part, altho I ſaw him look very attentively upon the Princeſs of Cappadocia, yet I did not think he could ſo ſuddenly, in ſo ſhort a time be charmed. Preſently after Dinner, Feraulas, whom we had loſt in the crowd, comes back; and he having more particularly enquired into the cauſe of the Sacrifice, he drew Artamenes and me aſide. Sir, (ſaid he to him) you muſt prepare for your departure hence, and that preſently. And why ſuch haſte, anſwered the Prince ſmiling? Becauſe (replied Feraulas) you are in a Country, where the People give thanks to the Gods for your Death, and think it ſuch a happineſs, as they have offered Sacrifice for it. I know that already, anſwered the Prince, without any emotion; but ſince they think me dead, they will not ſeek me alive. But Feraulas, (ſaid I) do you know any more than what you had from the Mouth of the Prieſt, when he ſpoke in the Temple? I have learned (anſwered he) from one of the Sacrificers, that Aſtiages being aſſured by ſeveral Intelligences, that young Cyrus is periſhed by Shipwrack, and believes him to be dead; therefore he hath commanded that ſame day which is ſuppoſed he periſhed, ed upon, to be a day of Thanks unto the Gods in the Temples of Medea and Cappadocia, for deliveri them from the cauſe of that apparent Danger whi the Stars did threaten unto them. Therefore (ſaid h to me) it concerns you to have a care of the Prince ſafety, and to conſider what would be his Fate, if h ſhould be known unto the King, or the Princes of th Country, who do ſo much rejoyce for his Death, a that they render publick Thanks unto the Gods for it During this Diſcourſe of Feraulas, Artamenes was very penſive; and perceiving I was going to ſpeak unto him he prevented me, and ſaid, with a moſt ſad and di contented Countenance, Fear not Chriſantes, that ſhall be diſcovered; if any thing do it, it will be o too haſty Preparations of departure; this may make ſuſpected, therefore let us ſtay, and reſt quietly; let not depart tumultuouſly. In ſaying ſo, he turned fro us, and would not ſtay our Anſwer. Then he took walk by the Sea-ſide, being followed by two Slav which the valiant Corſaires gave unto him, and Ferau and I followed preſently after: But alas, this Walk li tle pleaſed him, for we found him in a profound me lancholly dump. In ſhort, Sir, he was in Love; an loved ſo deſperately, as never Man was in more dee Paſſion: and as this Paſſion had taken ſuch ſtrong po ſeſſion of his Soul; ſo the Expreſſions which he ha uſed againſt Love in his firſt going to the Temple cauſed him to conceal it from us, he being aſhame to diſcover his weakneſs. He was continually expo ſtulating with himſelf what it was which thus trouble him, not well knowing whether it was Love or no What kind of Torment(ſaid he to himſelf)is this whic I endure? From whence proceeds this reſtleſneſs o mind? If the ſight of the faireſt Angel upon Earth b the cauſe, then I am the moſt miſerable Man alive Yet methinks ſuch beautiful Objects ſhould not inſ any Paſſions but Delight and Joy. How comes it t paſs then, that the faireſt Proſpect which ever Eye b held, ſhould cauſe my Sorrow? I know not (ſaid whether I ſhould think it Love, or whether worſe humour: But what is it I would have? or what is it I can have? Alas, alas, I neither know what I would, or what I can have; and hence comes all my misfortune and my ſorrows: Yet I am moſt certain of this; that if I follow my own inclination, I muſt love the Fair Mandana, as great an Enemy as ſhe is unto me; But what do I ſay, I muſt love? Ha! no, no, I do explain my thoughts but ill; and my Tongue betrays my Heart if it do not ſay, I do love Mandana, and that I will for ever love her, and that I think my ſelf the moſt miſerable man unleſs ſhe love again. But alas, alas, Miſerable unfortunate Artamenes! Came I here to ſee her offer Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods for my death? Did I come to learn how Cyrus can never pleaſe her, but in the Tomb wherein ſhe thinks him buried? After theſe Contemplations his Paſſion was a little qualified: But preſently hope, which makes Love live, and undertake all impoſſibilities, and without which there is no ſubſiſtence, did perſuade him, that Artamenes and Cyrus were two: and that he, as he was Artamenes, was not at all intereſted in thoſe things which the Medes reſent againſt Cyrus, Son to the King of Perſia: and that altho Cyrus was hated, yet Artamenes may happily be beloved, if he uſed the means, and endeavoured by his ſervices to render himſelf worthy of it. As he was thus entertaining himſelf with this flattering Argument; the ardent deſire of Fame and Glory, which heretofore had held a ſtrong poſſeſſion in the heart of my Maſter, began to come in competition, and diſpute for victory, with the Princeſs of Cappadocia.

When his thoughts reflected upon this glorious Rival of Mandana, he then began to rouſe up and reſolve never to think upon the Princeſs any more. Why ſhould I (ſaid he) forſake a Miſtreſs which will never fail to recompence me, and all which follow her; and whoſe ſervitude is ſo glorious, as ſhe rewards them which are faithful unto her, with no leſs than Kingdoms, Crowns, and immortal Glory. What is become now of my eager deſires, to know and be known of all the World? Poor I, who ſculks under the falſe name of Artamenes, and am buried alive to ſatisfy my Enemies? Have I left Perſia for nothing elſe, but to become a fooliſh Lover of a Cappadocian Princeſs? and have I left Cyrus to become a Slave unto one who thanks the Gods for my misfortunes? and who, perhaps, her ſelf, with her own hands, would throw me into my grave? No, no, (ſaid he) I muſt not be ſo fooliſh as to fetter my ſelf: Recollect thy ſelf Artamenes (ſaid he) and remember how oft thou haſt been told in Perſia, that love is a dangerous paſſion: Stop entrance therefore into thy heart at firſt, never let it take poſſeſſion, and domineer. But alas, (added he preſently) what do I ſay? what can I do? I ſpeak of reſiſtance, and am already fettered: I ſpeak of Liberty, and I find my ſelf in ſtrong Chains: I think of Reigning, and am a Slave: I ſpeak of Glory and Ambition, and Heaven knows, I have no higher than to be Mandana's Servant: and I will never ſeek any greater honour, than I can find at the feet of my Princeſs. I plainly ſee, that I am more hers than my own; and that all my Reaſon is far too weak to oppoſe Love: My own eyes betray me; my heart has left me, and my will is all hers; I would not love my life, but in hopes to imploy it in her ſervice: And I find that my Reaſon, as rebellious as it is againſt my heart, begins to argue in behalf of my Princeſs; it tells me ſecretly that Love is the noble cauſe of all Heroick Actions; that it took up Lodgings in the hearts of all the Heroes: and that the famous Perſian, the firſt King of my Race, for all his valour, was overcome by it, when he firſt ſaw his Andromeda: It tells me, that the Gods themſelves were ſenſible of it; and that it is never idle, but in the hearts of ſluggiſh Spirits; yet moſt agile in the Souls of them who are truly generous. In concluſion of all, it tells me, That ſince Mandana is the Faireſt, and moſt abſolute Beauty in the World, I am excuſable if I love her: And that though, perhaps, I ſhall not be much commended for it, yet it aſſures me, I ſhall not be much blamed; Follow on then Artamenes, purſue thy humour which thus tranſports thee; and make no more reſiſtance againſt a Fair Enemy, whom thou canſt not vanquiſh; or if thou didſt, would repent it. After the agitations and toſſings of this violent and noble ſpirit, the Prince began to mend his pace; Feraulas and I followed, but found him ſo altered, that we began to wonder; ſuch a ſorrow ſadded his eyes, and all his geſtures were ſo turbulent and diſordered, that I began to undertake him, and ſaid; Sir, I cannot underſtand from whence all this melancholly can proceed which thus diſcompoſes your face: for though theſe Sacrifices for your death, I know, cannot be pleaſing to you; yet, methinks, ſuch a Soul as yours ſhould contemn, and not permit them to trouble you: you, I ſay, who have been taken for dead more than once, and in a more gaſtly manner. You have reaſon Chriſantes (ſaid he to me) to think that this publick thanks is not the cauſe of my grief; for, I aſſure you, that as ſoon as Cyrus does revive again, this falſe joy of his Enemies ſhall be turned into ſorrow. But Chriſantes, there is another cauſe, which I would tell you if I had but confidence enough; for I do conf your wiſdom makes me fearful to reveal it. Sir (I to him) one of your age had need be wiſe to judge the wiſdom of another: This wiſdom whereof yo ſpeak, knows no cauſes of any fear you ſhould have but ſhall think himſelf honoured when you ſhall impa any ſecrets unto him. I know not, ſaid Artamenes, wh ther or no I ſhould tell you that——At theſe words A tamenes ſtopt, and could not for his heart go any further, but not being able to expreſs himſelf, he bluſht, and ſigh'd, and ſmil'd; at laſt, looking me in the face, he ſaid, Do you not gueſs, my dear Chriſantes, at what I dare not tell you, and for which I fear you will chide me, when you know it? When I heard him ſay thus, the zeal he uſed in the Temple, and his eying the Princeſs, made me conclude he was in love: And remembring what I ſaid unto him, at his firſt entrance into the Temple; I ſaid unto him, Is it not, that Venus has a mind to be revenged on you for taking Mars his part ſo much againſt her? I ſaid this unto him in a laughing and jeſting manner, ſuppoſing that this humour might chance be but a piece of Gallantry, and a light Phanſie which might eaſily be blown over: But alas, Artamenes, who asked me the queſtion more in earneſt, anſwered me in ſuch a tone, as I ſaw it muſt be no common remedy that could cure his Diſeaſe. But after he had fully opened himſelf, and told me all, I contributed all I could to divert his thoughts, and diſſuade him; I urged the little reaſon he had to love ſo violently, and the impoſſibility of ever being beloved again: for, Sir, (ſaid I to him) if you appear as Cyrus, the Princeſs will be ſo far from loving, that ſhe will hate you, and Aſtiages will be ſure to load you with fetters at the leaſt: on the other ſide, if you court her as bare Artamenes, what hopes can you ever have from Mandana? Can a poor ſimple Knight pretend unto the Daughter of a great King? A Princeſs, who is lookt upon as the ſole Succeſſor unto the Crowns of Media, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Perſia alſo? for ſince they think you dead, Aſtiages and Ciaxares will doubtleſs prepare themſelves to uſurp it, if Cambiſes die firſt; And though they both know that the Kingdom of Perſia is elective, yet ſince it hath continued ſucceſſive in the Illuſtrious Line of Perſides, ever ſince his time, they will now pretend it ought to be ſo ſtill: Recollect your ſelf therefore, Sir; be a man, and aſſume your Reaſon: Caſt not your ſelf away frivolouſly: Hath the Gods deſign'd you for ſuch high things, and muſt you dream away your time in Love?

What would you have me do (ſaid the Prince)? I have not rendred my ſelf captive with ſight; I have conſulted and argued with my ſelf as much as you can, and produced as many reaſons: therefore Chriſantes, I cannot promiſe to cure my ſelf upon a ſudden, there muſt be time for it: therefore urge me no more to depart from hence, but give me time to conſider. Sir, replied I, Love is a diſeaſe whoſe venome is contagious, and of a nature ſo malignant and ſubtle, that one cannot too ſoon fly from the place infected. Thoſe who are already infected, do carry the Diſeaſe with them (replied the Prince) although they do change Air; therefore preſs me no more to depart, I conjure you unleſs you intend to make the Diſeaſe worſe. But (ſaid I) if you ſhould chance to be diſcovered, your Ruine were moſt certain. It would be more certain (anſwered he) if I ſhould depart; therefore pray let us ſubmit to Fortune, and talk no more of it: The Prince ſpoke to me in ſuch a manner as it was apparent he deſired I ſhould have ſome indulgence towards him, ſo that I was glad the Ship was not trimm'd up. The next morning Artamenes went again to the Temple of Mars, pretending to inform himſelf of ſome particulars concerning the Countrey: but indeed his Deſign was to find out ſome Subject, to ſpeak concerning the Princeſs: He fell into diſcourſe with one of the Sacrificers, whom he found to be a man of good ingenuity; he asked this Prieſt a thouſand Queſtions, before he could handſomely bring in Mandana: at laſt he asked him, whether Ciaxares had any more Children beſides this Princeſs his Daughter? No, ſaid the Prieſt; and it is very ſtrange, for the People were wont to affect a King rather than a Queen, but now they have left off that humour; for ſince this Princeſs came at age of diſcretion, her beauty, and her vertue have ſo dazled the eyes of all, that they will not change the Queen for any King. Artamenes was raviſht to hear the Prieſt ſay ſo, and ſaid unto him, If the beauty of her Soul were like to that of her Body, doubtleſs then ſhe deſerved that good opinion; Yes, yes, (anſwered the Prieſt) a thouſand times more excellent and more vertuous than either you or I can imagine: for ſhe is wondrous fair without vanity or affectation; ſhe ſits in a Throne without pride, and conſiders the miſfortunes of poor men with compaſſion, and her bounty doth often relieve them. Thoſe who have the honour to be more about her than I have, do ſay, that ſhe is of a moſt winning converſation. As for my ſelf, I cannot ſpeak of her but with thoughts of that Piety which ſhe expreſſeth towards the Gods: I can aſſure you, Sir, there is none more religious and vertuous than ſhe, nor of greater wiſdom and knowledge in all things that a humane ſoul is capable of. In a word (added the Prieſt) ſhe is the honour of her Sex, and a ſhame unto ours.

I leave you to judge, Sir, whether the Amorous Artamenes was not in an extaſie of joy, that he was not deceived in her; and whether or no this did augment his Paſſion: He lookt upon me all the time of this Diſcourſe, and was glad he had found ſo good an excuſe for his weakneſs: He lengthned the pleaſant Diſcourſe as much as he could, and asked the Prieſt if ſhe came often unto the Temple? When ſhe was at Sinope (anſwered he) ſhe came hither almoſt every day. And where ere ſhe is, ſhe will come one day in a year with the King, to render thanks unto the Gods for the death of a young Prince, who, if he had lived, had uſurp'd all Aſia; Then ſhe hates his memory (ſaid Artamenes bluſhing, and interrupting him) and is very glad of that man's death, who would have hindred her from being Queen of ſo many Kingdoms. I never diſcovered any thoughts of hatred in her (ſaid the Prieſt) and I believe her too good to carry malice to the Grave, or to hate the man ſhe never knew, eſpecially ſuch a one as he whom report ſpeaks to have been rarely accompliſhed; ſhe knows it her religious duty to take both the good and the bad which the hand of Heaven doth give, with an equal Thanks; and ſince ſhe knows that Conquerors and Uſurpers cannot act their Deſigns but by the permiſſion of the Gods, who makes them only inſtrumental to chaſtiſe thoſe whom it is their pleaſure to dethrone; therefore, I ſuppoſe, her joy proceeds from her knowledge that the Gods are appeaſed by the death of that young Prince whoſe life did portend deſtruction to us; but then this joy is ſo moderate, and ſweetly tempered without the leaſt ingredient of hate or anger, that her ſoul keeps hell within her limits, and without diſordered paſſion. To thank the Gods for the death of a man, conſidering him ſimply as a man, were impious and ſacrilegious rather than any devotion: and neither the King nor the Princeſs, nor any of the Magi, are ſo ill inſtructed in Divinity: But to render thanks for the death of Tyrants and Uſurpers, who would pull down Thrones, and depopulate Kingdoms, is an act both of juſtice and piety, which doth not contradict the Rules of Religion, Humanity or Juſtice. Artamenes did hearken unto this Diſcourſe with ſuch different Reſentments, as indeed I pitied him; ſometimes he was all Joy, and ſometimes all Sorrow; now in Hope, then preſently in Deſpair; but however, he thought it a great happineſs to hear that Mandana was owner of as much Virtue and Wiſdom, as he ſaw ſhe was of Beauty. Mean time, this Prieſt liked Artamenes very well, and ſaid thus unto him: Friendly Stranger, if you deſire to ſee our ſtately Ceremonies, come hither three days hence, for thoſe which we ſhall then celebrate, will be much more magnificent and ſumptuous than theſe which you have now ſeen. Artamenes thanked him, and deſired to know the end and reaſon of them: To whom the Prieſt anſwered, That there was a Prince and Neighbour unto Cappadocia, called the King of Pont and Bythinia; This Prince being in Love with Mandana, had ſent his Embaſſadors unto Ciaxares, to demand her in Marriage. Artamenes being much moved at this, interrupted, and asked him, Whether this Ceremony was for the Marriage of the Princeſs? No, no, anſwered the Prieſt, for we do obſerve the Cuſtom of the Aſſyrians, who were our Ancient Lords, that when a Princeſs muſt ſucceed unto the Kingdom, ſhe cannot by this Cuſtom marry a Stranger; and therefore Ciaxares had refuſed the King of Pont; who being not content with this Anſwer, nor able to help his Paſſion to the Princeſs, hath confederated with the King of Phrygia, and declared War againſt the King of Cappadocia; ſo that their Army being ready to March, the King and Princeſs come at the time I told you, to ſupplicate the Gods, eſpecially him to whom this Temple is dedicated, That he would be pleaſed to proſper their Proceedings, and aſſiſt them in ſo juſt a War, which maintains the Fundamental Law of their Land. Artamenes was ſo ſurpriſed with different Apprehenſions, as he had no mind to ask any more Queſtions, but after he had in few words given many thanks, he civilly took his leave; and as he was fully reſolved, not to hide any of his Thoughts from either Feraulas or me, becauſe he could receive no Aſſiſtance but from us; ſo, as ſoon as he had opportunity, he ſaid thus unto us, Was ever ſuch conceited Fortune as mine? Are the Gods reſolved I ſhould be tormented with two violent Paſſions at one time? I am no ſooner in Love, but I am Jealous alſo; I no ſooner ſaw her Beauty and her Wiſdom, but I underſtand how it has captivated the heart of a Prince, and that an excellent Prince, whom only one bare Cuſtom of the Cappadocians has cauſed to be rejected, and nothing elſe; who knows, whether the Princeſs does not in her heart diſallow of this Cuſtom? And whether I do not love one whoſe Soul is already beſtowed? Alas, alas, this Cuſtomary Law, which makes ſomething worſe for the King of Pont, makes me deſpair. For as he is a Stranger, ſo am I; therefore for that reaſon, as alſo many others, I can never have any hopes of Pretence unto her. Sir, ſaid I to him, if all the difficulties which you imagine, and which are a thouſand times greater than you do apprehend, would alter your Reſolutions, I ſhould with all my heart conſent unto it; but ſince I cannot, yet do not (I beſeech) you contend with Monſters, and almoſt Impoſſibilities. No, no, Chriſantes, (anſwered he) never hope to make me give over my deſign; eſpecially now, ſince I can ſatisfy my deſires of Glory, and my Paſſions for Mandana both together: And ſince I find a War in Cappadocia, why ſhould I go ſeek it at Epheſus? But, Sir, ſaid I to him, if you ſhould chance be diſcovered, in what danger are you then? It is not the conſideration of any danger (replied he) that can alter me; but I ought, on the contrary, to ſeek after dangerous Enterpriſes; and to give you full Satisfaction, know, that I am abſolutely reſolved to carry my ſelf ſo Gallantly in this War, under the Notion of Artamenes, as that Cyrus may without danger come out of his Tomb afterwards. Sir, ſaid I to him, all this while the King your Father, and the Queen your Mother, do think you dead, and doubtleſs are infinitely troubled at it; it is a piece of Inhumanity to ſuffer them to continue in it. Why ſhould not you think (as I do, ſaid the Prince) that this report of my Death, is nothing but the device of my Mothers, to divert Aſtiages from ſeeking me? And that ſhe hath acquainted the King my Father with his Cruelty; ſo that this falſe News is diſperſed by his conſent, and hath ſent it to Aſtiages as true; ſo that, Chriſantes, your reaſons are too weak to convince me, or make me alter my Reſolutions. Indeed, I did find ſome probability in what the Prince had ſaid, not imagining, how any other way, this report of Shipwrack ſhould ariſe. But yet notwithſtanding, I fell afreſh to perſuade him from his Paſſion, to fly from that Court which was ſo full of danger to him, and to give intelligence of his being alive, unto the King his Father, and Queen his Mother: But as to the firſt of theſe, I might as well have bid him do a thing abſolutely impoſſible: As to the ſecond; as no danger could diſmay his Soul, ſo he told me, that my Reaſons were not good, but that I gave them becauſe I had no better. And as to the laſt, Know, ſaid he, Chriſantes, that Cyrus ſhall never be known unto the King of Perſia, until Artamenes has rendred himſelf famous throughout all Aſia; yes, Chriſantes, Aſtiages ſhall eſteem of Artamenes, Ciaxares ſhall favour him, the King of Pont ſhall fear him, and Mandana ſhall love him; otherwiſe he ſhall ſleep in the Tomb with Cyrus; and he had rather dye in earneſt, than not fully ſatisfie his deſires of Glory, and alſo his Affection which he owes unto the Princeſs of Cappadocia. Sir, ſaid I to him, for my part, I cannot yield unto Paſſion, or conſent unto the Opinion of a Man, whoſe Reaſon is prepoſſeſſed and partial, unleſs I ſhould render my own ſuſpected. Thus we parted, and he went unto Feraulas, who being younger than I, was not ſo croſs unto him in his deſign, and therefore better pleaſing. I began to contemplate and weigh what courſe to take was beſt, in a buſineſs of ſuch intricacy and danger. As for Artamenes, it were a needleſs Queſtion to ask how he entertain'd himſelf with Feraulas, for you may be ſure Mandana was all their Diſcourſe. Artamenes asked him, if ſhe were not the moſt perfect Beauty in the World? And as he anſwered, that all Perſia had not one comparable to her; That's not enough, (replied the Prince) but tell me, that all Greece, where the faireſt Women in the World are, has not one (who by a thouſand degrees comes near her) and ſay, that the famous Image of Venus, which we ſaw at Cyprus, who charmed all that came near, was ill-favoured in compariſon of the Princeſs of Cappadocia; ſo much does ſhe tranſcend all the Beauties of the World! Perhaps, Sir, I have inſiſted longer than was fit upon the Paſſions of Artamenes, and their effects, but I was conſtrained to ſuffer that Evil which I could not prevent, and to endure that which I could not help.

Mean while the day of Sacrifice, of which we ſpake before, approached; Artamenes muſt be there, and more haſty than any of the Sacrificers; for he was there before any Doors were opened; but for all his earneſtneſs, we found the young Stranger, which we met withal, in the Temple before us, who waited for the opening of the Gates. My Maſter, tho he knew no reaſon for it, yet had ſome ſecret odd thoughts of him, finding him there, and more forward than himſelf; and tho out of his Civility, he could not chuſe but ſpeak unto him, yet he did it in ſuch a manner, as partly diſcovered his Anger, and made me wonder, for there was never a ſweeter and more complacential Spirit in the World than this; yet I found by his Words, as well as by his Tone, that this young Stranger did not pleaſe him. Certainly (ſaid he to him, in meeting with him) you are either very full of Devotion, or very full of Curioſity, that you come thus early to ſee a Ceremony, wherein on my Conſcience you have no great Intereſt, and which cannot afford you any Novelty, ſince you have already ſeen them. I may ſay the ſame to you, (anſwered the young Stranger) ſince I find you as forward as my ſelf; but I will confeſs to you, that I ſaw ſuch delectable Sights in the Temple, the laſt time I met you here, that I could not chuſe but come again. I would gladly know (replied Artamenes very ſharply) which was the moſt delectable Sight you found in the Ceremony; whether the Ornaments of the Temple? The abundance of Victims? The coſtlineſs of the Sacred Veſtments? Or the Function of Prieſts, The Confluence of People? The Majeſty of the Prince? The Magnificence of the Court? Or the Beauty of the Princeſs? It might be all theſe, (anſwered the ſociable Stranger) but if I be not deceived, you your ſelf can gueſs, which among them was the faireſt Object. Since I believe we are of ſeveral Countries, (replied my Maſter) we may perhaps differ in our Opinions, and therein alſo be ſeveral; and that which is fair to me, may chance not be ſo to you: The Perſians delight moſt in their Temples; the Scythians in their Houſes; the Græcians immortalize themſelves by their Statues; the Aſſyrians and Medes, in their magnificent Palaces; ſo every one has his Phanſy for his Reaſon, and thinks nothing fair but what complies with his own Humour, and carries with it the Cuſtom of his Nation. Yet, replied the Stranger, there be ſome univerſal general Beatitudes, which pleaſe and hit the fancy of all Nations; the Sun delights the whole World; Diamonds ſparkle in all Eyes; and alſo many Perfections there are which are beautiful to all Men upon Earth. This Diſcourſe, tho it was very general, yet it did not pleaſe Artamenes; and I am perſuaded, that if one of the Sacrificers had not come to open the Doors of the Temple, this Diſcourſe had not ended ſo civilly as it begun; for indeed, Artamenes harboured a great diſlike of him, altho he had but few his equal in point of handſome Behaviour. The Door of the Temple was no ſooner open, but preſently they parted, and Artamenes ſhunned Converſe or Meeting with him, as much as he could, but mingled amongſt the Company which came into the Temple.

Indeed this Sacrifice was much more Magnificent than the laſt; for as the People are always more forward to pray unto the Gods for Deliverance from future Miſfortunes, than to thank them for any benefits paſt; ſo now there were many more multitudes of Men than before, more Ceremonies uſed, the Victims better adorned, and every thing more delightful to the Eye; the Princeſs alſo was more beautiful in the Eyes of Amorous Artamenes, than the firſt time he ſaw her. And as Love is always ingenious in conceit, ſo my Maſter thought Mandana pray'd unto the Gods with more Fervency and Zeal than ſhe did before: This joy'd him much, and made for his advantage, that ſhe ſhould be more earneſt with the Gods for his good Succeſs in War, than ſhe was in thanking them for his Death. But immediately his Joy turn'd it ſelf into a contrary Paſſion; for, who knows, ſaid he, whether or no ſhe prays for my Rival? And whether the inward Devotion of her Heart do not contradict the outward Expreſſion of her Lips? Perhaps ſhe prays more for the King of Pont, than for the King of Cappadocia; and that the happy Succeſs of her Affection to that Prince, is the happy Succeſs of the War that ſhe prays for? But what am I thinking, Mad-man that I am, ſaid he to himſelf? I am offending againſt a Princeſs, whoſe Virtue is without blemiſh, and whoſe Soul is ſo ſweetly calm, that it cannot be poſſeſt with any Paſſion. I ſee it by her Eyes, and judg it by her Motions, and haply I may find her Heart not ſo ſtony and inſenſible of Love. In ſhort, Sir, not to abuſe your Patience; The ſecond View did confirm what the firſt begun; and one Paſſage chanced which did much augment his Paſſion, which was this. The Sacrifice being ended, the Princeſs did not go out of the Temple ſo ſoon as the reſt, but ſtayed at her private Prayers after the King. The People knowing her Cuſtom, retired, and left her at her Devotion. Artamenes did not ſo, for he went not out as long as ſhe ſtayed. The young Stranger was no forwarder to go out than he, but ſtood always before Mandana. The Sacrificer, with whom my Maſter had diſcourſed three days ſince, found him out among the preſs; and being willing to do him any favour as a Stranger, who travelled out of Curioſity, and as a Man whoſe Deportment and Converſe verſe had much pleaſed him; he came to him, and told him in a low voice, That if he would have a little patience, he might hear the Princeſs ſpeak as ſhe went out of the Temple; for (ſaid he) I have a Petition unto her. Artamenes being much raviſhed with this happy accident, thanked him very civilly for his kind offer, and prepared himſelf for this happineſs, which he did not ſo ſoon expect. The young Stranger over-hearing this, preſſed after very boldly. The Princeſs being ready to depart, as ſhe was at the Gate of the Temple, the Sacrificer went unto her, my Maſter followed him, and the young Stranger following both; The Prieſt did moſt humbly beſeech her, that ſhe would be pleaſed to mediate unto the King her Father, that during theſe enſuing Wars, he would have a care for the preſervation of the Temples: For Madam (ſaid he) the Gods are the Gods of all Nations; Cappadocia hath Altars as well as the King of Pont; and as Victory inclines unto one ſide, Enemies muſt not be taught how to commit Sacriledge, nor by example of others draw upon themſelves the anger of incenſed Gods. The Princeſs conceiving his deſire juſt, did thank the Prieſt, and aſſured him, ſhe would have a particular care that no diſorder in the Temples ſhould be uſed, as heretofore had been in the War between the Scythians in Medea and Aſſyria; And that ſhe would move her Father to it in the beſt manner ſhe could. But Grave Thiamis (ſaid ſhe to him, for that was his Name) be you ſure to pray unto the Gods for Peace, which is the beſt way to preſerve your Temples; for my part I ſhall not be at reſt as long as the War laſts; and I confeſs, that I prefer a Peace before a Victory: Therefore pray unceſſantly unto the Gods, that they would be pleaſed to change the heart of the King of Pont, and that they would direct the heart of the King my Father to prefer the ſafety of his Subjects in general, before his particular glory. After theſe words the Princeſs went away, and left Artamenes in a wonder at her beauty and wiſdom: For though ſhe had ſpoken little, yet he found much purity of expreſſion, much ſpirit, much complacence and goodneſs in the ſenſe of her words. In ſhort, Sir, the ſtate of Artamenes was incurable: and though I had been able to have eaſed him, yet he would not hear me; But when we were returned to the Town, and I had conſidered the matter more ſeriouſly, I found no ſuch great danger in it, as at the firſt I did apprehend: for who knows (thought I) whether it be not the pleaſure of the Gods by this innocent way, in ſpight of all the prudence of Aſtiages, and all his fears, to bring Artamenes unto the Perſian Crown, and to make him Lord of all Aſia? Can it be imagined, that the Divine Powers, who never act againſt reaſon, have foreſhewed all theſe prodigious portents unto the Magi concerning Cyrus, in vain? Did they not expoſe him to the danger of being devoured by Lions and Tigers? yet did they not miraculouſly ſave him? Have they not moſt divinely accompliſhed him? Have they not infuſed great thoughts aud inclinations into him? And have they not conducted him through ſeveral Nations without a ſtop? Did they not preſerve him from the danger of that cruel Combat with the Pirat? Did they not bring him by Tempeſt amidſt his Enemies, and landed him at Sinope? Did they not bring him in the nick of time to be a Spectator, when a ſacrifice of thanks was offering for his death? Have not the Gods caſt him into love of her who offered it? Have they done all theſe wonderful things (I ſay) to deſtroy him? no, no, It is impoſſible: Had not the Gods deſtin'd him unto ſome greater Fortune, they would have ſuffered him to periſh by Tygers and wild Beaſts in the Houſe of Mithridates, or have let him periſh at Sea, or kill'd him in ſome civil Combat; or elſe this Port, on which we were blown, might have been a Rock.

Moreover, I conceive it impoſſible that Artamenes ſhould ever be taken for Cyrus, becauſe the Cappadocians do ſeldom or never come into Perſia. I remember that the laſt time Ciaxares ſent thither, his Embaſſador was a Medeam; and, I know, when he returned, he came not to this Court, but went unto Ecbatan; ſo that of all the places in the World which I can think of, this Court ſeems to be leaſt dangerous for him. I cannot imagine which way Aſtiages can come to know that Artamenes is Cyrus; or if he ſhould, it may well be thought he would not treat that Prince ill, who is in Arms for the intereſt of Ciaxares his Son; neither can it be thought that Ciaxares will ſo much diſhonour himſelf, as to be ſo full of fears as his Father. Whereas, if he were in any other Court, or if he ſhould be diſcovered in that other Court, then Aſtiages would ſuppoſe him to be cajolling and inciting his Enemies againſt him, and would contrive all poſſible ways to deſtroy him. As long as Aſtiages lives, Cyrus cannot be more ſafe in the Cappadocian Army; ſince the beginning of his Travels he is more changed than can be credited; ſo that it will be very difficult for thoſe who ſaw him at Ecbatan, to know him again: or for thoſe who ſaw him ſince in Perſia, for then he was very young, and very little. 'Tis true, Feraulas and I, who lived in ſome conſiderable rank at Perſipolis, may chance come to be known; But we can eaſily put it off, by ſaying that we changed Maſters after the Shipwrack of Cyrus: Beſides all this; may not Fortune be truſted with any thing? Moreover, who knows but that Love is the only neceſſary Paſſion whereby to attain unto glory? Ambition in ſo young a heart as his, cannot retain its violent and harſh deſires ſo long, as to add victory unto victory: yet ſince the Genius of this Age is ſo much devoted unto pleaſures, there is not a more delectable humour in the World to make the moſt rugged and difficult things ſeem feaſible and eaſie, than Love: Moreover, ſince Artamenes is ſo amiable and extraordinary handſome, who knows but the Princeſs may love him as well as he loves her? And it may be certainly concluded, that ſince he is hated unknown, he would never be loved if he were known to be Cyrus.

Theſe Reaſons, Sir, moved me to give ſome ſatisfaction unto my Dear Maſter: yet becauſe I would not truſt only unto my own reaſon in a buſineſs of this importance, I cauſed a Sacrifice the next day to be offered unto the Gods, that they would be pleaſed to inſpire me with knowledge how to tranſact in ſo nice a buſineſs.

neſs. After the Offering, I found my ſelf ſo ſtrongly confirmed in my Reſolutions to comply with Artamenes in his amorous Deſign, as I thought it would be to oppoſe the order of Heavens, if I ſhould croſs him in his Affection any more. Thus Humane Prudence, which is but a blind director in future things, moved me to conſent unto a Deſign which hath caſt my dear Maſter into that danger wherein now you find him: I did not yield unto him upon a ſudden, but by degrees, and ſeem'd to reſiſt him a little at the firſt: But as ſoon as I gave my conſent that he ſhould endeavour to make himſelf eminent in the War in which he had engaged himſelf, our buſineſs was only to appear in an Equipage befitting men of ſome quality: We had yet Jewels ſufficient to carry it out, and many more than we ſtood in need of; ſo that the buſineſs being fully reſolved upon, he writ a civil Letter unto Periander, and commanded the Ship to make for Corinth, and to preſent that Ship and Letter unto that Famous Greek in lieu of his own which was gravelled upon the Sands in the laſt Sea-combat. Whilſt the King and Princeſs ſtaid at Sinope, Artamenes ſaw them very often; and though he had ſeveral opportunities of being made known unto them, yet he refuſed them all, being reſolved to do it in a more glorious way than ſo: Mean while, all preparations for the War goes on, and news is brought every day, that the King of Pont, and the King of Phrygia, were forward on their march towards Galatia. Ciaxares, to prevent them, draws ſpeedily to the general Rendezvous, endeavouring as much as he could to enter into Bithynia, and carry the War nearer his Enemies Countrey: And ſince the Princeſs his Daughter was the cauſe of the War, therefore fearing leſt the Enemy might attempt upon her perſon in his abſence, he would have her follow unto a Town called Anigres, which was not far from that place where he reſolved to enter the Enemies Countrey: Mean while, Artamenes furniſhed himſelf with ſuch neceſſaries as are fit, to wit, Arms, Horſes, and Tents. He often met with the young Stranger which he had ſeen in the Temple of Mars: And the ſame man which ſold Arms unto Artamenes, ſold alſo unto Philidaſpes, for that was the Name which that Stranger owned; ſo that meeting together in this place, they both of them knew that one and the ſame deſire of glory and honour did enflame their Souls to engage in this War; and were both of them but a little ſatisfied with one another. But not to inſiſt, Sir, upon any thing which is not abſolutely pertinent unto the Story; we come to the Rendezvous. The King viewed his Troops, and we marched towards the Enemy: Artamenes with ſorrow ſaw the Princeſs go to Anigres with two thouſand men for her Convoy and Guard: But ſince it was his deſtiny to endure all that Love could call rigorous, he reſolved to comfort up himſelf in her abſence with hopes of Victory and Return. My Maſter ranked himſelf in the Squadron of Voluntiers, as well to encamp and fight near the King's perſon, as becauſe in thoſe Troops which had no particular Captain, nor obeyed any Orders but the General's, he might more eaſily conceal himſelf; and alſo becauſe they who deſired to make themſelves eminent by any notable exploit, might there find the beſt opportunities. The Army of Ciaxares conſiſted of forty thouſand men, that of the Enemy of fifty thouſand. I will not trouble you with relating how many of them were Archers, how many were Darters, nor how many Horſe, or how many Foot, ſince it is not pertinent to my Diſcourſe; and ſince I have ſo many Combats and Battels to relate, it is not requiſite to inſiſt upon that: For my intention is not to compoſe the Hiſtory of Cappadocia, it is the Hiſtory of Artamenes only which I rehearſe: Let me therefore only tell you, that when theſe two Armies firſt faced one another, I never in my life ſaw Artamenes ſo pleaſed: He was armed that day after a very remarkable manner. His Arms were Ruſſet wrought with flames of gold; His Plume waving and reaching to the very crupper of his Horſe, was of a lively Flame colour: His Horſe, according to the faſhion of the Countrey, was trapt with ſtuds of ſteel, part Ruſſet, part gilt: Artamenes carried two Lances in his left hand, with a Buckler upon the ſame Arm; another Lance in his right hand, and a broad ſhort Sword by his ſide, to uſe in the throng of his Enemies: I never ſaw him ſo gallant and pleaſant in my life; And tho the Perſians were never much commended for good horſemanſhip, yet he managed his with ſuch a quick facility, and ſat him in ſo brave a poſture, and with ſo fine a grace, as he did attract the eyes of all men upon him. The Armies being both ready to fall on, and Charge ſounded on both ſides; Artamenes, who was placed in the firſt rank, no ſooner ſaw a Squadron vapour, but he was gone in an inſtant, like a Thunderbolt, above an hundred paces before the reſt, and fell upon the Enemy with ſuch a fury as he diſordered them, broke their Ranks, and ſtruck terror and death into their Army. After the fatal Clouds of Arrows which darkned the Air, and fell upon both Armies, were diſpelled, and that they came to hand-blows, Artamenes then performed ſuch Acts as ſurpaſſed all imagination: His three Lances held three of the Enemies braveſt men; and when he drew his Sword, wo betide him that ſtood in his way, and death to him that durſt encounter: He looked every-where for the King of Pont, and deſired to have a bout with him, but could not find him; for hap would have it ſo, that whilſt he was on one ſide of the Army, the King of Pont was on the other: and though his valour broke all their ranks, ſquandred their Squadrons, and nothing could reſiſt him; yet he was not ſatisfied, and thought nothing eminent enough, unleſs he either held or took the King of Pont Priſoner: His Courage was much exaſperated when he ſaw Philadaſpes amidſt the thick of the confuſed fight, and obſerved him as valiant a man as the World had: his valour won him the eſteem, emulation, and admiration of Artamenes, when he ſaw none fight like him; ſo that obſerving each other with a brave emulous eye, they ſtrive to ſurmount one another; and from this time became Corrivals in Ambition and Valour. Artamenes was more happy one way than Philidaſpes, and Fortune gave him better opportunities of ſhewing himſelf: For the King of Pont, who thought he could not end the War better than by taking the King of Cappadocia Priſoner, ſince for his Ranſom he might obtain his Daughter; he therefore kept a reſerve of Ten thouſand Men, the beſt of all his Troops, who had Orders not to Fight until a certain Sign was given, which ſhould be when they were inform'd where Ciaxares did keep his Quarter; then they to fall upon him, and take him Priſoner: Theſe Orders were punctually obeyed. The King of Pont, and the King of Phrygia ſeeing that the Victory did poiſe in an equal Balance, and having diſcovered the place where Ciaxares was in Perſon, they give the Signal; the Ten thouſand Men fell furiouſly upon us, and put our Army into great Confuſion: Artamenes had the good hap to be near the King when he was compaſſed about, and ruffly aſſaulted by his Enemies. Indeed, if he had not been there at that time, believe it, Ciaxares had not been now in a Condition to keep him his Priſoner, for all the World did ſee he had there elſe periſhed. Artamenes ſeeing this freſh Storm fall upon the King, took the boldneſs to come to him, and ſaid, Sir, tho I am but an unfortunate Stranger to you, yet if your own Subjects will but do like me, you ſhould overcome (I warrant you) then, not ſtaying for any Anſwer from the King: Come, come, follow me my brave Men (ſaid he to them which were about him, trembling for fear) if you will but take heart and follow me, I'll warrant you we will preſerve the King, and get Honour enough beſides. Theſe words, and the Confidence which they ſaw in the Eyes of Artamenes, did ſo rouſe up their dull Spirits, that they began to courage up; then he led them on, and charged the Enemy with an unimaginable fury. Now, ſince the Enemy had Commands to ſpare Ciaxares's Life, and to take him Priſoner only, therefore they durſt not Fight ſo tumultuouſly, leſt then they ſhould perhaps kill him unawares; yet Artamenes ſlew ſuch a Number of them, tho they defended themſelves as well as they could, that it was a wonder he was not tired with killing. But whileſt he was in this gallant Fury, he heard many cry confuſedly, The King is taken; and immediately after, The King is kill'd: At the ſecond of theſe ſad words he turn'd about, and ſaw a Body of Horſe who guarded the King, whom they had taken, whether alive or dead, he made ſtraight towards them: Then animating thoſe Cappadocians which followed him, and ſpying Feraulas and me, call'd us by our Names; Come away, ſaid he to us, let us go and relieve the King; and let us not be leſs Valiant in delivering him, than our Enemies have been in taking him: Then we charged that Body of Chivalry, in the midſt of which we perceived ſome Confuſion, and as it were a Fight. The Gallant Artamenes brake the Ranks of the Enemy, and gave a Death to all he met; being come to the middle of the Squadron, he ſaw Ciaxares with ſome Fifteen or Twenty, who having got Arms in their hands, would not render themſelves unto thoſe who compaſſed them about. And when the Enemy ſaw that Artamenes was like to relieve Ciaxares, there was one deſperate Fellow among them, who thought it was more advantagious for the King of Pont, that Ciaxares were kill'd, rather than eſcape; therefore he lifted up his Arm which held a great Sword, to ſtrike the King upon his Head, which was then bare, for he had loſt his Helmet in the Combat, the Buckles being broken; this Blow had inevitably kill'd him, if Artamenes had not ſtept in with his Sword, and run this raſh Man through the Heart, and made him fall at his Feet, juſt as the Blow was falling upon the King's Head; the King ſeeing this, called him his Preſerver and Deliverer. And my Maſter thinking the like Chance might hap again, took his own Helmet from his Head, and put it upon the King's. Then without ſpeaking a word, or loſing a minute of time, he went immediately out again to Fight, reſolving his Buckler ſhould defend the Blows from his Head; this Act, which was obſerved both by Friends and Enemies, wrought different effects. The King was amazed at it, and would needs give him his Head-piece again. But his Enemies when they ſaw better than before the admirable Beauty of Artamenes, and that Martial Diſpoſition which did ſo eaſily become him in Combat, they thought ſome Divinity had deſcended to preſerve Ciaxares from his Enemies, and againſt whom it was no boot to reſiſt; therefore their Fears encreaſe, and many thought their Heels to be the beſt Arms. Artamenes followed them, and drave them upon the left Wing of their own Army, which put them into diſorder, ſo that he had abſolutely defeated them if Night had not been ſo near, which hindred his purſuit, and cauſed both Parties to retire unto their Colours. Philidaſpes, tho he was not preſent at all theſe Paſſages; yet did he much contribute unto the happy Succeſs of this great Action? For it was he who kept our right Wing from giving ground, and who fought with the left Wing of the Enemy, whileſt we had our Hands full in delivering the King; ſo that if he had not been, we ſhould have had the main Bodies of both the Kings upon us, and then could never have been able to do as we did. And ſo it may truly be ſaid, it was only Artamenes and Philidaſpes, which preſerved Cappadocia at this time; yet ſince the Art of Artamenes had the fortune to have the King for a witneſs, who thought it Artamenes only which ſaved his Crown and Life, therefore he had the greater Honour and better Fortune. Mean while, Night invites all unto their Tents, the Victory not being abſolutely declared: Artamenes bethought himſelf of two ſlight hurts in his left Arm, which however, it did not haſten him to Bed. The King alſo received a little hurt in the Hand; but we underſtood by one of our Soldiers, who had been taken Priſoner and eſcaped, that the King of Pont had a more conſiderable Wound with an Arrow; and which was a cauſe neither ſide had any mind to fight again. Ciaxares was no ſooner come into his Tent, but he ſent to ſeek out his Deliverer, and to bring him thither; yet ſince none knew the Name of Artamenes, it was next day in the Mornin, before Ciaxares could ſatisfy his extream deſire to ſalute and thank him for ſaving his Life; at laſt, my Maſter being found out, and being ſo commanded from the King, he comes unto him; but he addreſſed himſelf with ſuch Modeſty and Reverence, as if he had done him no Service at all. After his firſt appearance before the King, every one accoſted him, and deſired Acquaintance. Philidaſpes alſo gave him a reſpective Complement for his good Fortune the day before; all admired his handſome Preſence, and were inquiſitive to know the place where he was born. The King no ſooner ſaw him, but he went to meet him, and embrace him; after theſe firſt Welcomes, the King did commend him ſo much, as the Modeſty of Artamenes could not endure it. Sir, ſaid he to him, I have done yet ſo little in your Service, that if I did not hope to do you more another time, I ſhould be very much aſhamed of this; but if I may have the Honour to continue a Soldier under your Colours, the Zeal which I have unto your Service, and the Examples of theſe Gallant Men which are in the Army, will create new Deſires of Glory in me, and enable me to accompliſh it; and till I have done ſomething worthy of them, I dare not without Bluſhing receive ſuch Commendations from ſuch a Prince as Ciaxares. Your Modeſty, anſwered the King, does as much aſtoniſh me as your Valour, it being more extraordinary to find that grave Virtue in one ſo young, than to fight, which is a tumultuous Act, and more ſuitable with your years. Sir, (replied Artamenes) your Majeſty muſt pardon me, if I think you Phraſe it not aright, and call that Modeſty in me, which is a bare reſentment of my conſciouſneſs; for ſince I have ſeen all theſe gallant Men which hear me, perform ſuch brave Acts, and amongſt the reſt (ſaid he, in ſhewing him Philidaſpes) this Noble Stranger, it would be extream Boldneſs and Vanity in me, to think I can deſerve any Commendations for what I have done; rather I will receive them from your Majeſty, as a Spur to quicken me up hereafter unto Gallantry, than as a Recompence for what is paſt. I ſee (anſwered Ciaxares) it is a hard matter to overcome you in any thing, and this makes me afraid to ask you of what Country you are, leſt you ſhould have no willingneſs to impart it. Sir, (replied Artamenes, following the Reſolution which we fixed upon when we came from Sinope, and which I forgot to tell you) I was born in that Country, where the People are from their Cradles both Wiſe and Valiant; and the reaſon why I deſire to conceal it, until I have made my ſelf worthy of it, is, leſt my Actions ſhould become a ſhame unto it. If that be your reaſon, (replied Ciaxares ſmiling) you may very well ſatisfy my Curioſity; for whether you be Greek or Perſian, which in my opinion, are the two Nations which come neareſt the Deſcription you gave of yours, or whether you be the Son of ſome great and wiſe King, it would be an Honour unto him for to have you for his Country-man. Artamenes with a low reverent Congee, ſaid unto him, Since you both Commend and Command me, Sir, I will tell you, that my Birth is very Noble; and moreover, that I am of that Country which is as conſiderable as any one upon Earth: But to tell you, Sir, the Names of my Parents, and the particular Place where I was born, is a thing I neither can, nor ought to do, having for ſome reaſons which would very little concern your Majeſty, if you knew them, promiſed, and fully reſolved not to make my ſelf known until my return; therefore I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, command me not to diſcover it: And be pleaſed to know, that when your Majeſty hath any Service to Command me, he, who calls himſelf Artamenes, ſhall obey you. It were moſt unjuſt (anſwered Ciaxares) to exact that from you, which you are not willing to impart, and I am too much indebted to you to compel you unto any thing. See, Sir, all the diſguiſe which Artamenes takes upon him; this Great and Noble Soul being exact in all Virtue, could not ſpeak the leaſt Lye. After this, Ciaxares did treat him with all imaginable Civility, and deſired him to Command a thouſand Horſe, whoſe former Commander had been killed in the late Battel. Artamenes at the firſt excuſed himſelf, and refuſed it; but afterwards, leſt he ſhould diſpleaſe Ciaxares, he accepted of it; he thanked the King for the Honour, and aſſured him that he would imploy it the beſt he could in his Service. And becauſe there was another place vacant by the Death of the former Commander alſo, Ciaxares conferred that Regiment upon Philidaſpes, whom he had known longer than my Maſter: for Aribees, who, as I formerly ſaid, was then a Favourite, had preſented him before the coming from Sinope. The King had no ſooner conferred this laſt Honour upon Philidaſpes, but Artamenes did congratulate with him, who returned him a civil Complement, but yet harboured within his heart many Sparks of Jealouſy at all the Honours which Ciaxares had done unto Artamenes. Mean while, Artamenes is looked upon as the King's Deliverer, and it were a crime in any one not to bid him welcome. So that as well for that reſpect, as becauſe he had a natural pleaſant way of attracting the Hearts of all which ſee him, therefore he is viſited, extolled and welcomed by all the Court, and all the Army; the Regiment eſpecially which he Commanded, were beyond all expreſſion pleas'd with him, and came to tender him their firſt offers of Obedience with abundance of Joy: Philidaſpes and he did alſo viſit one another; and you muſt know, that Philidaſpes reported his Countrey to be Bactria. Now ſince the Battel was bloody on both ſides, and all things in great diſorder, therefore neither ſide thought yet of any fighting again; wherefore the King being deſirous to advertiſe his Daughter of all paſſages, and being pleaſed to honour my Maſter ſo far as to acquaint him with his deſire, commanded him to go unto Anigres, and carry his Letter unto Mandana, and alſo to acquaint her how he was alive, and preſerved by his Valour; the King ſaid unto him ſmiling, that a Man which bore his Arm in a Scarf, might very well leave the Army for four days without diſhonour or ſuſpicion of being taken for a diſſertor of it, and at the deſire of his friend not refuſe ſuch a Commiſſion. I leave you to judge, Sir, how this joyed Artamenes, and how it wrought upon his thoughts; he changed colour at the firſt motion of it, and not daring to accept of it without firſt refuſal; Sir, (ſaid he) The hurts which makes me carry my Arm in a Scarf, are ſo ſmall, that they will not hinder me from fighting againſt your Enemies, if occaſion ſhould be offered; and becauſe I am afraid ſome ſuch opportunity may preſently preſent it ſelf, I dare not accept of this Commiſſion wherewith you would honour me; No, No (ſaid Ciaxares, and giving him the Letter unto the Princeſs) do not think that we will fight without you; for you have ſufficiently convinced me, that it is abſolutely neceſſary to have your help before we can conquer our Enemies: But yet it is fit that a Princeſs who muſt wear the Crown of Cappadocia, as ſoon as ſhe comes at that age which is appointed by the Laws, ſhould know what ſervices you have done her, and that ſhe ſhould receive the intelligence from your own mouth, to the end you may receive from hers that acknowledgment and thanks which is your due. As Artamenes was ready to anſwer, Philidaſpes, who for ſome reaſons which you ſhall hereafter know, was not pleaſed that my Maſter ſhould have this Commiſſion, addreſſed himſelf unto the King with a very comely grace, and ſaid, ſmiling, unto him, If it be your Majeſties pleaſure the Princeſs ſhould be informed of all the brave acts of this gallant Stranger, I conceive ſince he is ſo modeſt, it is not convenient to ſend him, becauſe that Modeſty will rob him of that honour which is his due; therefore if your Majeſty would be pleaſed to give me leave, I ſhall preſent his Panegyrick unto the Princeſs; I, I ſay, who was an eye-witneſs of his Valour, and a great admirer of it. Artamenes, hearing and ſeeing Philidaſpes ſo forward, was afraid the King ſhould conſent unto his deſire; therefore without giving the King time to anſwer, he ſaid, Sir, ſince the acts of this Gallant Stranger who ſpeaks, are ſo illuſtrious, and much more than mine, it would be but juſt in me to preſent them unto the Princeſs my ſelf: Therefore without any further oppoſition unto your Majeſties Commands, I will accept o the honour, ſince there is more reaſon I ſhould ſp his Elogy, than he mine. Sir, Replied bluſhing Philidaſpes, his going will leſſen the honour of Artamenes; but (replied my Maſter) it ſhall not leſſen the honour of Philidaſpes. The King being much pleaſed with this pleaſant Controverſy (of which you ſhall hereafter know the cauſe) would be Umpire in the matter, and gave this judgment betwixt them. I will (ſaid he to Artamenes) thus far hearken unto the advice of Philidaſpes, as to uſe it as an Antidote againſt your too much modeſty : I will therefore have Arbaces, the Lieutenant of my Guard, go along with you , to help out your modeſty, and ſpeak aloud thoſe things which perhaps you will not ; ſo the King took the Letter from him, and when he had altered it, gave it unto him again: Artamenes took it with as much joy, as Philidaſpes ſaw it with anger. As I remember it was thus indited :

Ciaxares King of Cappadocia and Galatia, unto the Princeſs Mandana his Daughter.

He who ſhall give you this Letter, having ſaved my life, I thought none more fit to acquaint you with the danger wherein I was, than he who delivered me from it: And I could not deviſe a more prevalent way to cauſe his ſtay amongſt us, than thoſe prayers and deſires which I know you will make unto him ; and becauſe I am acquainted with his modeſty, therefore I have ſent Arbaces with him, that he may tell you what perhaps the modeſty of the other will not permit him ; for I ſee he hath a better faculty in extolling the valour of another, than his own. In ſhort, he hath ſaved my life, and had vanquiſhed all my Enemies, if night had not hindred his purſuit. Pray unto the Gods that all my Captains may be like unto him ; and tho you cannot make him my Subject, endeavour at the leaſt to make him my Friend:

Ciaxares.

Judge you, Sir, what Joy this was unto Artamenes: Feraulas waited upon him in this little journey, and was a witneſs of all paſſages, and my Maſter's Entertainment. Alas! ſaid he to himſelf in reading the latter end of the Letter, how unneceſſary is this Prayer? how impoſſible a thing it is to be a Lover of Mandana, and not a friend unto Ciaxares? Yes, yes, think no more of it, I am, and will be a friend unto the King of Cappadocia, and to the King of Medes alſo, and ſo great a friend too, that I will be an enemy unto Cyrus; Let him keep in his Tomb ſtill, unhappy Cyrus, who is the object of all the fears and hates of theſe Princes; as long as Artamenes is thus happy, keep ſtill in the obſcurity of thy Sepulchre, and never come out: Oh! Artamenes, happy Artamenes, (added he) thou art going to ſee thy Princeſs, and to ſpeak unto her; to be commended by her, to be known unto her, and happily may prove ſo fortunate as not to be hated: But alas, alas! that is not enough, for to be perfectly happy, is to be beloved. Thus Sir, were the ſpirits of Artamenes inſpired with all the delicate and tender paſſions which Love could contrive: Sometimes his ſoul was all joy, ſometimes again quite quaſht with fear; for who knows (ſaid he) but that for all the King's Letter to her, I ſhall incur her diſlike? There are ſecret ſuggeſtions of ſoul which moves us to love or hate, for which no reaſon can be given, and againſt which there is no reſiſtance; ſo that perhaps tho I be not the moſt odious of Men, and tho I have done ſome conſiderable ſervice to the King and her, yet, if I ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to find ſuch an antipathy in her ſoul, then all my actions, my ſervices, and obſervances, tho I owned all the vertues in the World, and tho I had all the Crowns of the Earth upon my head, yet I ſhould never win her affection: I may perhaps by theſe obtain her liking and eſteem, but that will not ſatisfie me; Love is ſuch a capricious Paſſion as it will never be content with any thing but Love again: And I ſhould conclude my ſelf the moſt unhappy of Men, if I ſhould find in my Princeſs only a bare eſteem without affection: The violent Raptures of his ſpirit, made him buſie himſelf about a hundred petty things which heretofore he never thought upon. As ſoon as he came to Anigres, he would himſelf chuſe what Clothes to wear; and asked Feraulas a hundred times, which he ſhould take? and which did beſt become him? To be ſhort, when he was dreſt, and wearing a very magnificent rich Scarf of Golden Tiſſue, to bear his Arm in, he was conducted by Arbaces unto the place where the Princeſs was. Artamenes, Sir, did afterwards confeſs unto us, that he had more timorous motions of ſpirit at that time, than when he fought that valiant Pirate, or when he fought in the laſt Battel: This great heart which never trembled in moſt horrid dangers, was now poſſeſt with ſuch fear, that had not his joy a little tempered it, he had quite ſhamed himſelf, and incurred the Princeſs diſ-favour; but at laſt being come into her Preſence-Chamber, magnificently furniſhed (Arbaces having acquainted her before, whilſt he was dreſſing himſelf, in what manner ſhe ſhould receive him) where ſhe was waited upon by a great number of Ladies which waited upon her in this voyage, and alſo many others of the Town and Province: She was that day dreſt but negligently, yet ſo fair and charming did ſhe appear in his eyes, that (as he told me afterwards) he ſaw none of the other beauties and rich attired Ladies about her; ſo much was his eyes and mind poſſeſs'd with this powerful object. The Princeſs no ſooner ſaw my Maſter, but ſhe roſe up, and having been already told of all the ſervices which he had done her Father, ſhe prepared her ſelf to receive him with joy and thanks: Artamenes made two Congies, and approaching with all reverence due to one of her quality, he kiſſed the King's Letter, and preſented it unto her: When ſhe had read it, He was beginning his Complement; but the Princeſs in a moſt obliging manner prevented him, and ſaid, What Divinity (Noble Stranger) brought you amongſt us to preſerve all Cappadocia thus, in preſerving the King, and which enabled you to do him better ſervice than all his Subjects could? Madam (anſwered Artamenes) you have reaſon to think ſome Divinity brought me hither, and that ſome Benevolent Divinity too, ſince it hath brought me to the honour of being known unto you, and enabled me to render ſome ſmall piece of ſervice unto the King, which might have been performed by any other hand as well as mine: Modeſty (ſaid the Princeſs, turning to the Ladies about her) is ſo eſſentially belonging unto our Sex, as I know not whether I ſhould ſuffer this Gallant Stranger to uſurp it or no; he cannot be content to enjoy his own eminent Valour, unto which we cannot pretend, but he muſt take upon him our Modeſty alſo, when we commend his Gallantry, as Women may very allowably do when their Beauty is commended: For my part, (added She) and looking upon Artamenes, I find ſome injuſtice in your procedure, and ought not to ſuffer it, tho I cannot chuſe but infinitely commend you for it. Such, Madam, as you (replied Artamenes) ought to receive praiſes from all the World, and not to give them to any but very ſlightly, leſt you ſhould repent: Therefore I beſeech you, Madam, do not run that hazard; ſtay, Madam, until I have the honour to be better known unto you: I know already by Arbaces, anſwered ſhe, that you are thought to be of that Nation (tho you will not confeſs it) who amongſt all thoſe great qualities you attribute unto them, are ſuſpected of Craft and Subtilty; yet that which you have done, doth well deſerve to be excepted out of the general Rule; nor can I ſuſpect that your Prudence out of your exceſs of reaſon, ſhould degenerate into craft: but on the contrary, I am fully perſwaded you are the very ſame you ſeem to be. I am much obliged unto you, Madam (anſwered Artamenes) that your Goodneſs is pleaſed to make ſuch a favourable exception; I can aſſure you, that in doing ſo, you are not deceived; and the cunning Artifice of which the Greek Nation is ſuſpected, cannot be laid unto my charge; but, Madam, whether I be Greek, as it ſeems you think I am, or of any other more ingenious Nation, I have ever reaſon to ſay, That ſince you have a good opinion of me, I have cauſe to fear leſt time ſhould make you alter your opinion: Time (replied ſhe) can never make any ſuch alteration; but what you have already done, deſerves commendation, and for it I muſt ever retain a good opinion of you, as of him that hath ſaved the life of my Father. I wiſh, Madam, anſwered he, you may never loſe it, and that the moſt glorious Princeſs of the World may ever do me that honour as not to think me quite unworthy of her eſteem. After this, the Princeſs did enquire of all circumſtances concerning the Fight, and Artamenes did exactly relate it, excepting thoſe paſſages which concerned himſelf, and them he ſlightly paſſed over in few words; which made Mandana (who had all the ſtory of his Acts from Arbaces) much to wonder: But Artamenes did not fail to ſpeak very advantagiouſly in the behalf of Philidaſpes and his valour; whom the Princeſs remembred to have ſeen at Sinope a little before her departure. In ſhort, his deportment was ſo happy in this firſt acquaintance, as he was highly cried up by all the Ladies: And though he had not the entire freedom of his Soul, ſince he was ſo heart-bound, and tied by the eyes unto the beauty of Mandana; yet did he not now ſeem half ſo much bewitched as formerly he had been: His lovely Preſence, diſcreet Civility, ſweet Modeſty, and his handſome Garb, joined to the Eloquence of his Words, and Wiſdom of his Mind, did blind all the diſorders of his Soul, and made them not perceived; ſo that he departed from this entertainment with a general applauſe. Arbaces lodged him in a Chamber of the Caſtle which looked towards the Garden, and expreſſed all the care which was due unto one who had preſerved the King his Maſter: Artamenes was no ſooner in his ſtately Chamber, but deſired to walk in that Garden which was a Proſpect unto his Chamber; ſo little reſt did his amorous inquietudes permit unto him; not but that he was infinitely joyed at the Princeſs, and the Civilities wherewith ſhe treated him; but as an effect of Love, which is of ſuch a nature as it alwaies cauſeth pleaſing troubles, and never moves unto any joy or ſorrow but tumultuouſly, and in odd agitations or diſorders. Artamenes then, as happy as he was, yet was reſtleſs, and would fain have entertained more Diſcourſe with the Princeſs, ſo more ſtrongly have captivated himſelf in freſh chains and charms, which he found in her eyes and diſcourſe. However, his Reaſon doth no more oppoſe his Love, but rather aſſiſt it, in contriving ways conducible unto his Satisfaction. Sometimes he feared he had not ſpoke all he had to ſay, or that he was not well enough prepared to ſpeak what he did. However, the ſweet Idea of Mandana was it which filled every cranny of his amorous ſoul: At every turn he thought he ſaw her, and fancied every feature; telling himſelf a hundred times She was abſolutely the faireſt and wiſeſt in the whole World. After he had thus fancied her, and thinking that ſhe had ſomething of Gallantry in her ſpirit, which (without prejudice to her natural modeſty) did incomparably ſet her off; after, I ſay, he had pleaſingly contemplated all theſe things over and over again; O ye Gods (ſaid he) if ſince ſhe is ſo lovely, it ſhould ſo fatally fall out, as that ſhe cannot love me, what will then become of miſerable Artamenes? but (preſently recollecting himſelf) ſince ſhe ſeems to be ſenſible of benefits and glory, let us go on as we have begun, and act ſo gloriouſly, that although her Genius ſhould be againſt me, yet her eſteem of them may win her affection, at leaſt eſteem of me, whether ſhe will or no: For though I confeſs one may eſteem a thing a little which they do not abſolutely love; yet I conceive one cannot eſteem any thing very much which they do not love a little. Let us hope then, and render our ſelves worthy of pity, if not of Love. As he was thus diſcanting upon the ſtate of his Love, Feraulas told him, that he ſaw the Princeſs at the end of a Walk; who according to her uſual Cuſtom, came to take the Air in the Garden about the Sun-ſetting: Artamenes obſerving ſhe came towards him, had doubtleſs out of reverence gone into another walk, if ſhe had not beckned unto him to come nearer: But Sir, to avoid being tedious, I muſt in ſhort tell you, that in this walk and new diſcourſe, Artamenes diſcovered ſuch freſh Beauty, and ſo much admirable Wiſdom in the ſoul of Mandana, that as before he only loved her, ſo now he adores her. The Princeſs alſo better diſcovering the ſpirit of my Maſter, conceived a very great eſteem of him, and treated him more reſpectively than at firſt. To fulfil the King's commands, ſhe endeavoured to perſwade his Continuance amongſt them: But alas! how unneceſſary was that Prayer! and what joy did he reſent, to hear her ask that which he himſelf had ſo great a deſire unto, and which was ſo ſuitable unto his Paſſion? After he had brought the Princeſs unto her Chamber, who was waited upon by many Ladies of Honour, ſhe gave order he ſhould be waited upon unto his, with all poſſible magnificence, and was punctually obeyed. All this while he mentioned not a ſyllable at the Table concerning the Battel; but when all the waiters were retired, and he being alone with Feraulas, all his diſcourſe was of Mandana; he asked his opinion concerning her; Whether all theſe felicities which had been conferred upon him, did not pleaſe him? But before they ever thought of it, and contrary to their intention, the night was more than half ſpent in diſcourſe with Feraulas, who doubtleſs did not croſs his fancy, ſince he found Mandana fair above all natural excellencies: At laſt, they went to Bed, but not to ſleep; for when it came into his thoughts that he was to return unto the Camp in the morning, and that Manners commanded him to take his leave before he went, then there was no room for ſleeping; but he roſe in the morning before he had ſhut his eyes, and as ſoon as the Princeſs was to be ſeen, he addreſſed himſelf unto her, and deſired he might return to the place whither his duty called him, and where the King and ſtate of things required him: But ſhe would not permit him; for ſhe told him, that ſhe deſired he ſhould be a witneſs of a Sacrifice of thanks which ſhe would that day offer unto the gods, for preſerving by his hand, the King her Father: and that he might aſſure himſelf ſhe was pleaſed with his company, ſhe expreſſed her ſelf thus: I pray you, Artamenes, ſtay, but I dare not command you: But you may, Madam, anſwered he, and more than that; for I and all the Earth ought to pay obedience unto ſuch a Princeſs. Artamenes ſtayed then the other day in Anigres, and went unto the Temple with the Princeſs, whom he had the honour to accompany: All the People cried him up with ten thouſand Applauds, as their Benefactor; for it was divulged in a moment, both by Arbaces, and the Princeſs Domeſticks, that it was he which preſerved the King. The next morning being come ſooner than he wiſht it, he muſt take leave, and be gone; which without doubt he did with as much grief as love, although he durſt not expreſs either, more than by ſilence and profound reverence. She gave him a Letter to the King her Father, the effect whereof I can tell, for Ciaxares ſhewed it unto every one, in hopes to oblige my Maſter the more by it; and there was none in all the Army which had not either ſeen it, or heard the Contents, which were theſe.

The Princeſs Mandana, to the King of Cappadocia and Galatia, her Father.

SIR,

IT was not without ſome reaſon Your Majeſty did miſtruſt the Modeſty of Artamenes, ſince it was only by the Lieutenant of Your Guard, that I came to know what he had done for Your Preſervation, and by conſequence for the preſervation of all Cappadocia, all Galatia, Medea; and of Mandana, whoſe death had been included in Yours: He told me of the great danger to which Your Majeſty was expoſed, but he intimated not a ſyllable of his own valour which relieved you; ſo that I might for ever have been ignorant of it, had I not heard more from others than him. I have ſo perſwaded him of your Virtue, and tyed him to Your ſervice, as more endeavours had been uſeleſs. But, Sir, I beſeech You, let not my Prayers be fruitleſs, when they ſhall deſire You, not to expoſe Your precious Life unto any more hazards. Your Majeſty may do well to conſider, how the happineſs of all your Kingdoms depend upon it; and perhaps Artamenes may not be always ſo fortunate as to relieve You. Commit the care of conquering Your Enemies unto this Gallant Stranger, and employ him no more in preſerving the Life of that Prince, in which is inſeparably concerned the Life of Mandana.

Artamenes, delivering this Letter to the King, was welcomely received; Philidaſpes, who heard it read, was the only man who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed at it: The envy which appeared in his looks, diſcovered the anger and trouble of his mind. Few days after, my Maſter's Wounds were well recovered, and he was not idle in the exerciſe of that Regiment under his Command. As the two Armies were entrenched near one another, ſo he was continually ſending out Parties, which always returned with the Advantage, for he quite beat up one quarter of the King of Phrigias's Brigade: Philidaſpes was alſo very fortunate in the like Encounter. Now tho this War was begun by the King of Pont, becauſe he was refuſed the Princeſs of Cappadocia; yet becauſe this ground for it was not plauſible enough in the eyes of the People, ſince nothing ought to be more free than Marriages, nor nothing could be more juſt than the Authority of Fathers over Children; nor nothing more unalterable than the fundamental Laws of a State, which did here forbid the Banes; therefore the pretence and colour of this War was given out to be, a right he had unto two Towns, which bordered on either ſide of a great Plain, between Galatia and Bythinia; both theſe Princes conceiving, that both theſe Towns belonged unto them, though both of them were in poſſeſſion of that Town which bordered upon their own Provinces: So theſe two Towns were declared the cauſe of the War: the one called Ceraſia, in poſſeſſion of the King of Pont; the other Aniſa, in poſſeſſion of the King of Cappadocia. But ſince the King of Pont was much wounded, and his Chyrurgions told him, he would not quickly recover, therefore he protracted the Fight as much as he could: yet for all that, he could not chuſe but be often ſkirmiſhing. The Victory ſeem'd always to poiſe equally, unleſs when Artamenes and Philidaſpes

lidaſpes

Hidaſpes appeared: Mean while the King of Phrygia had received private intelligence, how the King of Lydia would declare war againſt him, and enter into his Dominions: he imparted it unto the King of Pont, who was much troubled at it; knowing that if the King of Phrygia fell off, he was not able to reſiſt Ciaxares, who had under his command, not only Cappadocia and Galatia, but alſo all Media and Perſia. Whilſt the Princes were in Counſel what to do in ſuch a croſs Conjuncture, the King of Phrygia adviſed, That before this News was divulged or known unto Ciaxares, it were expedient to ſend unto him, and make an offer, to determine the Controverſie by Combat of two hundred men againſt two hundred men, that ſo the War may be ſooner ended, and much blood ſpared: for, ſaid the King of Phrygia to him, if the War with Lydia do not hold me long, Pretences enough may be found out to break the Peace with the King of Cappadocia. The King of Pont ſeeing no likelihood for him to come off with honour, if Phrygia ſhould decline him, therefore he approved of this advice notwithſtanding all his bravery, and his paſſion for the Princes, or his ambitious deſires of Glory. He ſent therefore Propoſitions unto Ciaxares accordingly; who held a Council of War concerning it: Opinions were different, ſome for it, ſome againſt it; Aribees, who found the continuance of the War was for his own advantage, did openly oppoſe it; but yet Ciaxares conſidered, that Aſtiages his Father, King of Medes, was ſo old he could not live long, and therefore had no mind to be engaged in a long War, ſince when his Father died, he was then to leave Cappadocia, and go into Medea; and conſidering the ſtate of things, how the Ponteans were more numerous than the Cappadocians, and that ſucceſs of war is dubious, therefore he accepted the offer: The Controverſie was to be determined within eight days. The Articles of Conditions were theſe following.

1. That both Princes ſhould draw off their Armies into thoſe two Towns which were under their reſpective ſubjections, and which were the Cauſes of the War.

2. That the Combat ſhould be fought in that great Plain between the two Towns, and where now the Armies were entrenched, and thoſe two Towns to be the utmoſt limits of them.

3. That either Prince ſhould, as he pleaſed, chuſe thoſe that ſhould fight for their intereſt, without conſideration of Rank or Quality; but that Valour only was ſufficient to be admitted into Combat.

4. That the Combatants of both ſides, coming out of theſe two Towns at one time, ſhould meet in the middle of the Plain where they were to fight.

5. That they ſhould fight on foot, and have no other Arms, than each man two Javelins and a Sword, but not to bring any Bows or Arrows.

6. That the two Enemy-Kings ſhould ſtay the event of this Combat, each of them in the head of their own Army, near the Town where they are to encamp, without any information but by the return of the Conqueror; it not being permitted unto the Conquered to return, or have any Quarter of their Life from their Enemies;, nor either Party to ſend any intelligence of diſadvantage.

7. That the Succeſs of the Combat being known; the two Kings, guarded only with two thouſand men apiece, ſhall meet in the place of fight, as well to ſalute one another, as to verify the report of the Victorious.

8. That Hoſtages ſhould be given on both ſides.

9. That theſe Hoſtages which ſhall remain in the two Camps, ſhall viſit, and ſearch the two hundred men which muſt fight, to the end they ſhall bring no other Arms than is permitted by Conditions.

10. That after the Combat, the Party vanquiſhed ſhall abandon the Town, and draw off his Army into his own Countrey: that the Conqueror ſhall take Poſſeſſion of that Town for which the War commenced.

11. That the Bodies of thoſe two hundred men of the Parties vanquiſhed, ſhall receive no ignominy, and that their Funerals ſhall be ſolemnized with honour, together gether with thoſe which are dead of the Party conquering, upon the place of Combat.

12. That after this, Peace ſhall be firmly eſtabliſhed between the two Princes, and Commerce allowed between their Subjects; the King of Phrygia to be compriſed within this Peace as an Ally of the King of Pontes.

All theſe Articles being agreed upon, and ſigned by both Parties, they were publiſhed in both Camps, and both Armies began to move towards the Towns unto which by Articles they were to repair. The Princeſs hearing of it, deſired to ſee her Father, and came unto Aniſa, the day before thoſe who ſhould be choſen Combatants were elected. I leave you to judge, Sir, how all they who had a deſire to purchaſe Fame and Honour, were ſollicitous to be accepted of in this ſervice: and I leave you to judge alſo whether Artamenes and Philidaſpes would not be with the formoſt. The laſt of theſe two did preſume upon the favour of Aribees; and my Maſter, though he was extremely thirſty of Honour, yet could not aſſure himſelf of that favour; for though he had done the King great ſervice, and his Valour was ſufficiently known; yet becauſe he was a Stranger, his fears were above his hopes, and that objection would be a great obſtacle: yet he thought, that if he were not accepted to be one of them, then all his hopes of Mandana would be quaſht: For, ſaid he, what can I do to obtain her eſteem in a calm Court, where I ſhall find no occaſion of ſerving her? but if I could be an aſſiſtant to get this victory, I ſhould then have ſome ground to build my hopes upon: But alas! I fear that I am not fortunate enough for that happineſs, and I fear Philidaſpes will be preferred before me, though he be a ſtranger as well as I: For, Sir, it is not to be imagined how theſe two young Gallants did in all their actions extremely envy, at leaſt emulate one another. The Princeſs was no ſooner come, but Artamenes went immediately to her without my knowledge; and as ſoon as he found an opportunity, Madam, ſaid he, I come to beg a favour, though I confeſs, I am unworthy of it: You are worthy of all (anſwered the Princeſs ſweetly) and be aſſured, if the thing you deſire be neither unjuſt nor impoſſible, you ſhall certainly obtain it: and ſince I know you are too noble and wiſe to deſire any ſuch, you cannot doubt but your deſire is granted: I know, Madam (ſaid he, doing humble reverence) that the thing I deſire is in your power, ſince it is in the King's, who I am ſure can deny you nothing; but, I confeſs I dare not aſſure my ſelf there is as much juſtice in my Petition, as there is poſſibility; and though I do but what I ought in endeavouring to obtain it, yet I know not whether you ſhall do as you ought in granting it. Nevertheleſs, Madam, I will ask it, and that with as much zeal as my ſoul is capable of: and if it be ſo that the good fortune which I had in doing the King a little ſervice, has any thing obliged you, I beſeech you let me obtain this deſire, as the greateſt and moſt glorious recompence that ever I can obtain. Prevail, I beſeech you, moſt adored Princeſs, with the King your Father, that he will do me that great honour, to admit me to be one of the two hundred Combatants which muſt fight. That which you ask (replied the Princeſs with much wonder at his generoſity) is not impoſſible, but moſt advantagious unto the King my Father: but I muſt confeſs, I do not think it juſt, ſince, when you have ſaved his life as you have done, you ſhould receive ſo bad a recompence, as to expoſe your own in a fight, which according to the Articles muſt needs be bloody, and full of danger. You are too good, Madam (anſwered Artamenes) to fear my deſtruction: But trouble not your ſelf, Madam; for the care you have of me will preſerve me in the midſt of dangers; and it cannot be thought the Gods will deſtroy what you would ſave: Therefore, Madam, (continued he ſmiling) ſince I ſhall fight without danger, do me the honour to aſſiſt me in my ſuit: For, Madam (added he, aſſuming a more ſerious look) if I do not obtain it, I muſt needs fly from the place I live in, ſince I cannot live in it without diſhonour, and where they do not think me worthy to do that which two hundred others can do.

If there were but one to fight, perhaps then I ſhould not dare to think my ſelf, being a ſtranger, worthy to defend your intereſt; but ſince the number is two hundred which muſt have the honour, I think, Madam, I may without any great preſumption beg this noble Office: I would very willingly (anſwered the Princeſs moſt candidly) petition you another might be choſen in your room; but ſince you do ſo earneſtly deſire it, I will promiſe you to ask the King my Father. As Artamenes was ready to anſwer, and gratefully caſt himſelf at her feet, Ciaxares comes into the Chamber: the Princeſs no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe went towards him, ſaying, Sir, This Noble ſtranger is ſo inſatiable of honour and glory, as not being content with the ſervice he hath done you already, would yet have you receive another victory from his hand, and deſires you to admit him into the number of the Combatants. Ciaxares, raviſhed with this Propoſition, embraced him, and thanked him for his zeal to his ſervice; but it was a long while before he would conſent; and ſince the Princeſs did not ſpeak all this while, Artamenes turned towards her, and ſaid, Madam, do you remember your promiſe? No, anſwered ſhe, I do confeſs I cannot keep my word; and that fighting is ſo contrary to my diſpoſition, that nothing can be obtained from me, but prayers that all Wars and Fightings may ceaſe: Ah, Madam (replied he) your goodneſs obliges me, and undoes me both. Then did he ſo earneſtly importune Ciaxares, that after many denials, he conſented: not but that he was very glad a man ſo valiant as Artamenes, would fight, but his denial proceeded from him as an effect of his love to him, and becauſe he feared to loſe him in this Encounter. To tell you what was the joy of Artamenes, how many thanks he gave the King, what graceful Addreſſes he made unto the Princeſs, and what excuſes he had, that he had ſo ſlenderly ſerved her, would be to loſe precious time, ſince I have ſo many notable things to tell you; however, I muſt needs tell you how Philidaſpes, who put on to be one of this fatal number, did miſs of his deſire; for though Aribees could have told him that Ciaxares would not admit him, yet he excuſed it handſomely, and told him that Artamenes having ſpoken firſt, and Ciaxares having already conſented unto one ſtranger, would not by any intreaties admit of any more, leſt the Cappadocians ſhould murmur, who would think it a wrong done unto themſelves. This Accident cauſed much ſorrow in Philidaſpes, ſo that had he not otherwiſe been more conſiderably intereſted in the King, he would have quitted the Court and Camp upon it; that which moſt ſtuck in his ſtomack, was, that Artamenes ſhould be preferred before him, being a ſtranger as well as he. And though Ciaxares told him afterwards, that if he had ſpoken firſt, he ſhould not have been denied; yet this did not ſatisfy him. On the contrary, the joys of Artamenes were doubled by the ſorrows of Philidaſpes; and this great Soul, as generous as he was, could not chuſe but rejoice at his grief; ſuch was the violent emulation between theſe two high Spirits. Am I not very happy, ſaid he to me, when he met me, that I muſt either overcome in the Quarrel of my Princeſs, or I muſt die for her? If I eſcape the danger, I ſhall be the Meſſenger of Victory and Triumph; or if I die, I am certain ſhe will lament me. Ah Chriſantes, what honour is this? Ha, Sir, anſwered I, what have you done? That which I ought, my dear Friend, anſwered he, and that which you would have done if you had been in my caſe: But, Sir (ſaid I to him) have you forgot that Artamenes is more than ſuch a common Knight as he ſeems to be, but that he is Son to the King of Perſia? No, no, my Governour (anſwered he) and becauſe I know my birth is not common, therefore I muſt ſtrive to do things above common Capacities. But, Sir (ſaid I) why have you not obtained as much for Feraulas and me, as you have for your ſelf? Is it becauſe you ſuſpect our Courages? Ah Chriſantes (ſaid he, imbracing me) I will rather ſuſpect my own; but it was not poſſible to be done; and if I had put in for ſo many, I might, perhaps, have been denied my ſelf. But notwithſtanding all his reaſons, and though I was not poſſeſſed with ſuch violent Paſſions as he was, yet I was very ſorry he ſhould be engaged in ſuch a deſperate Deſign; but there was no remedy: he had got himſelf liſted before I got knowledge of his intention. The choice of Combatants being made, the day of Combat comes on; Hoſtages were given on both ſides; they ſearch and view the Combatants and Arms, according to the Conditions of the Articles: Notice is ſent unto the King of Pont of their readineſs, who ſent the ſame meſſage back of his men. This ſelected Troop paſs'd before the King, who at break of day offered a Sacrifice unto the Gods for their Proſperity. Artamenes was in hopes the Princeſs would have been with the King her Father when they parted; yet ſhe not having a heart for it, ſtayed ſtill in the Temple praying for them, ſo that he was deprived of that hope for conſolation. As for my ſelf, Sir, I could not chuſe but drop ſome farewell tears at parting, ſince it was not now permitted to go with him as at other times; but now we were not ſuffered to aſſiſt him, or be a witneſs of his Valour: He perceived our ſorrows, and ſaw us all drooping: He looked upon us with as gallant and pleaſant an aſpect as ours was ſad: Cheer up, ſaid he to us, I will conquer, I'll warrant you; and ſo laughed at us; I ſee you are but bad Fortune-tellers; as he ſpoke theſe words, they came to the Gate of the Town where the King ſtayed. Sir (ſaid my gallant Maſter to him, march in the head of the Troop) I am going to make my ſelf worthy of thoſe honours which your Majeſty hath done me, and to imitate the Example of theſe brave men which go with me. And I am going (anſwered the King) to prepare a Lawrel for you and them, not doubting of good ſucceſs, ſince Artamenes, and ſuch men are to fight. Thy Glory is great, cried the hopeleſs Philidaſpes, and thou ſhouldſt not be alone, if I had as much of thy good Fortune as I have of thy Valour: We ſhould be very ſtrong if we had you with us, anſwered Artamenes, but we will endeavour to vanquiſh without you. After theſe, two hundred Heroes which were devoted unto the Grandure and Tranquility of Cappadocia, were gone out of the Town, and the Gates were ſhut, we had no full information of that fierce Encounter; wherefore I ſhall rehearſe as much as we knew, and reſerve the reſt unto the end of my Story. When theſe two Troops came upon the Plain, they halted a little, and ſent out a Party of four to diſcover whether their numbers were equal, and Arms according to Articles. All being found right, and an equal ground choſen, they advance without any noiſe or vapour, but in a ſilent terrour: When they joined, they uſed their Javelins, which did great execution, but much more upon the Cappadocians than the other ſide; at laſt falling to their Swords, and ſhielding themſelves with their Bucklers, they begin to mix. Artamenes (as we had the knowledge of it afterwards) ſtept a little before his Fellows, and at one blow with his Sword did offer the firſt Victim of this Sanguine Sacrifice: His Valour was not ſo happily ſeconded; for to ſpeak in general, the Ponteans had got much advantage of the Cappadocians; not but that they did behave themſelves as gallantly as men could do, but that the other ſide proved more fortunate, and their wounds leſs mortal. Artamenes looking about, and perceiving, that maugre his fury, the number of the Cappadocians did diminiſh, he fell into a ſtrange rage, and acted ſuch things as indeed can neither be imagined nor credited; and it might juſtly be ſaid, that the event of Combat did abſolutely depend upon him: he was not ſatisfied with offending his Enemy, and defending himſelf, but he alſo defended every one of his Companions, and received the blows which were aimed at his next fellow. In ſhort, he did ſuch Heroick Acts, and wrought ſo many wonders, as he was an abſolute miracle of valour. Inſomuch, as one of his Enemies, whoſe name was Artanus, began to think, that for all the advantage which his ſide had gotten, it would be hard to get the Victory; and therefore he began to think how he ſhould ſave his own life, and ſculk away; for (ſaid he himſelf, as afterwards we had knowledge) if my ſide prove ſtronger, I can mix amongſt them in the end of the fight without diſcovery; and if they periſh, then I ſhall ſave one by the ſhift, although I quit my Countrey, and live unknown in ſome other Quarter of the World. Being thus baſely reſolved, and during the confuſion of Combat, he ſtole backwards by degrees until he was quite behind all his own ſide; then he ran away ſome twenty paces off, and, as if he had been kill'd, fell down; then crept further and further off, inſenſibly by little and little, until he came unto a little Hill where he might be an inviſible Spectator of the Combat: All the reſt being buſied in fight, minded him not; Mean while, the ſtate of the Fight came to that paſs, as Artamenes ſaw but fifteen of his ſide againſt forty Enemies: I leave you to judge, Sir, if the Pontean ſide did not hope to be Conquerors, and the Cappadocians fear defeat: yet ſince it was no boot to ask Quarter, but either to fight or die, which would make the moſt deſperate become moſt valiant; Artamenes did ſo encourage them both by words and example, as he infuſed freſh life into his Fellows: As for himſelf, every one thought him abſolutely invulnerable, and ſaid that a diſmal fatality was tied to his Sword, which at every blow was dipt in the blood of his Enemies. He had a blow for all: He followed thoſe which fled or ſhrunk from him: He kill'd them which ſtood cloſe to him. In ſhort, he laid ſo about him, that from the forty which was againſt fifteen, he brought it to be ten to ten. This reaſonable equity got him a new heart: Come on (ſaid he to his Fellows) let us finiſh the Victory which is almoſt already gotten; and indeed, conſidering how the caſe was altered, he might well ſay ſo; yet he knew not that three of his nine Companions were ſo wounded, that they fell preſently after; ſo that there remained but ſeven againſt ten: he himſelf was all the while ſo fortunate, as he received but one ſlight hurt on his ſide, by reaſon of his ill Curaſs; yet it had only razed the skin, ſo that it did not trouble him at all. This heart of a Lion, ſtill fought with the ſame fury and ſtrength that he did at firſt: He killed two of his ten Enemies preſently, the third held him play a long while, yet fell at laſt: As he turned himſelf about, thinking to rejoice with his Companions, panion, he found but one left, and three Enemies upon him; he ran in all haſte to relieve him, but he came too late, for his Fellow fell juſt as he came in. Now, Sir, the Illuſtrious Artamenes ſtood in need of all his courage, when after three hours Combat, and that more ſharp than ever any Battel, he found himſelf ſingle againſt three Enemies. Yet loſing neither heart nor judgment, he fought with them after a quick moving and nimble manner, leſt he ſhould have his Enemies on all ſides of him at once: and ſhewed ſuch ſprightly agility, that his three Enemies found they had enough of him, and felt his Sword at every Paſs: When they preſſed upon him, he in the turning of an eye was on the other ſide; and though all their blows did not miſs, for blood ran down in many places; yet for all that, his ſtrength failed not. But he being reſolved either to conquer or die, and his Enemies being amazed to ſee one man reſiſt them ſo long, they made at him all together at once. Artamenes ſhielding himſelf with his Buckler, charged violently through them all, and did ſeparate one of them from the other two; He fell like a fury upon this third man, and made him fall at his feet, by running him through the Body. This chance made the other two to droop, but gave new courage unto Artamenes: So that now altering that manner of fighting which before he was compelled to take, when he had three againſt him; he begins to charge them with ſuch precipitation, as that one of them ſtumbling upon a Buckler which was under his feet, Artamenes not loſing this opportunity, fell upon the other, and kill'd him preſently: Now, cried out Artamenes (and flouriſhing his Sword as he was turning toward his laſt Antagoniſt;) Now muſt true Valour decide the Controverſie, without mixture of Fortunes, and where none can ſhare in the glory of the Conqueror: In ſaying ſo, he fell like a Lion upon this laſt Adverſary, who received him with more Gallantry than uſeth to be in common Spirits. Now has Artamenes but one to fight withal, but believe me a doughty one, whom Fortune, it ſeems, had reſerved to make Artamenes pay dear for his Victory. Theſe two Valiant Heroes; one of which was to carry away the glory of the Day, took time to breathe and look about them: They ſaw themſelves all blood, and amidſt a Field covered with dead men, ſo that Victory did not look with any charming countenance: and though both of them had hopes to be victorious, yet this diſmal ſight terrified them. Preſently the Combat begins afreſh, and with ſuch fury as the like was never ſeen. He who fought with Artamenes, was a man of good quality, as well as Artanus, who all this while lay lurking; and becauſe he had ſeen my Maſter ſo thunder up his Fellows, durſt not riſe up to aſſiſt his Partner. Here, Sir, may be admired the ways which the Gods uſe, when they are reſolved to ſave one; and it muſt be acknowledged their ſecrets are inſcrutable: For the caſe ſtanding thus, could any man believe that Artanus, who was all this while hid, and freſh, and ſaw my Maſter wounded in many places, ſhould not dare for all this to riſe and help his fellow to conquer one man whoſe blood guſht out in ſo many places? but he thought it ſafer to ſtay there, and keep in a whole skin: Thus you ſee Artanus was not very valiant; but as I have heard ſince, undertook this Engagement with very ill will. This man, ſeeing Artamenes when he was ſingle againſt three, could not be conquered, but brought it one to one; and who remembred that this laſt man who fought with my Maſter, was his Corrival; and ſeeing how the caſe ſtood now, never thinking of his Country, but of his Revenge, his Jealouſie, and his Love; he reſolves to get the Victory, and never fight for it; for (ſaid he to himſelf, as afterwards he confeſſed) this Combat cannot end, but one of theſe two at the leaſt muſt die, ſince they fight with ſuch reſolution; and he which dies, will before his death give many wounds unto his Enemy: If he which is an Enemy to my Country fall, I ſhall find my Rival in a condition eaſie to be vanquiſhed; and if my Rival die, I ſhall as eaſily overcome the Enemy of my Country, ſince he has loſt ſo much blood as he can hardly ſtand, and who has ſhed ſo much of his Enemy's as he has left himſelf none; ſo that which ſide ſoever Fortune turns on, I will fight with the laſt man, and he ſhall die too, and I will live, and triumph without danger. Theſe were the thoughts of Artanus, who prayed equally for the death of both his two Enemies : And truly it ſo fell out, as his unjuſt Prayers wanted but a little of being heard ; Artamenes and Pharnaces (for we knew afterwards that to be his Name) breathing a while as we ſaid before, began a Combat, and ſuch a one, as all ambitious deſires of glory could not make more fierce: And Artamenes fearing leſt his loſs of ſo much blood ſhould betray his Courage ; therefore he charged his Enemy with all his force : ſo that Pharnaces, who ſaw there was but two ways to chuſe, either death or victory; had yet this conſolation left him, that he thought Artanus his Rival and Enemy was dead, ſince he ſaw him not fighting : and this hope, not to be any more croſt in his Love, begot a freſh deſire of vanquiſhing; and moved him to fight ſo fiercely, that I heard my Maſter ſay., before he knew any thing of it, that he did imagine it to be Love which ſuſtained his Courage, and enflamed him with that Heroick heat. They fought yet a long time: Pharnaces wounded Artamenes in four places: Artamenes him in ſix : Their ſtrength began to fail, and their Bodies to reel, ſo that to finiſh the Combat ſooner, they ſtep nearer one another : Thruſting is all their play, not uſing their Bucklers, which they were hardly able to lift; They paſſed at one another both together, but hit differently; for Artamenes ran Pharnaces through the heart; and Pharnaces ran Artamenes through his thigh, and left his Sword in it. So that my Maſter, yet holding his Sword in his hand, and couragiouſly drawing his Enemy's out of his thigh, holding both Swords in his hands, he cried out, I have got the Victory; and preſently after, being very weak, he fell. But here's the wonder, Sir, for if Artamenes had not fallen as he did, he had died, becauſe Artanus would have preſently diſpatched him: who (as we knew by his confeſſion, and as you ſhall know in the ſequel of the Story) as ſoon as he perceived his Rival dead, did riſe up, aud prepared himſelf to fall upon my Maſter, whom he perceived to reel; but as ſoon as he ſaw him fall, he moved no further towards him, he cared not for going to ſee him take his laſt gaſp, but went as faſt as he could to tell the King of Pont he was the Conqueror. This man (if he be worthy of that name) was fuller of joy than the true Conqueror was; for he was full of glorious fancy; he had ſeen his Rival die, and hoped that this Victory would certainly obtain him his Miſtriſs, who was Siſter unto the King of Pont: He could not imagine any thing could be a dor unto his Felicity, unleſs his remorſe of Conſcience, and his unparallel'd Cowardize. I know very well, Sir, that I have not half particularis'd this great Encounter; ſince it came unto light only by Artanus, when he was vanquiſhed, and kept a Priſoner of War amongſt us; and by my Maſter, whoſe Modeſty would not ſuffer him to relate any thing wherein his own Valour would be mentioned: Mean time, Artamenes is very weak, and continued ſo a long while: His ſounding cauſ'd his blood to ſtop, ſo that when he recovered out of thoſe fits, he got a little ſtrength, and crawl'd up upon his knees with his Sword in his hand, as if he would look about, to ſee whether any would diſpute with him about the Victory: yet he ſaw nothing but broken Javelins, half Swords, bloody Bucklers and Men, who though dead, yet did retain grim faces of fury: On the one ſide he ſaw a Cappadocian, on the other a Pontean; on all ſides, horror and blood in abundance. He tried often if he could walk, but found it impoſſible, by reaſon of his laſt wound, which had ſo weakned him, as he was not able to ſuſtain himſelf: Mean time, he knew it was the duty of the Conqueror to carry news of the Victory, ſince their Combat had no other Witneſſes; and ſince the fate of Arms had thus ordered him, he was not able, for it had left him only ſo much life, as he was ſenſible of unimaginable pain: Alas, ſaid he, What good will my Victory do me; ſince, when I am dead, they will not know I am victorious? Ciaxares will repent of the Honour which he did me: and Mandana, illuſtrious Mandana will, perhaps, think I died in the beginning of the Combat, before I had done her any conſiderable ſervice: and that I have ſo poorly behav'd my ſelf, as Philidaſpes would have carried it better: Yet, oh ye Gods, ye Juſt Gods, ye know what I have done for my Princeſs, and how dear the Victory does coſt me: After this he looked round, but ſaw none; ſo that not knowing what to do, and verily believing he ſhould die before any could know of his Conqueſt; he began gently to draw unto him as many Javelins, Swords, Helmets and Bucklers as he could reach, and piled all theſe Arms one upon another, as if he would build a Trophy; then he took a great ſilver Buckler, which once call'd the valiant Pharnaces Maſter, and dipping his finger in his own blood, which by reaſon of his motion began to run again, he writ upon it theſe vermilion Letters,

To Jupiter, the Guardian of Trophies.

And plac'd it upon the top of this Glorious Pile of Arms, which he had erected near him. After which, weak and weary as he was with this Triumphant Labour, he did lie down a little, his left Arm leaning upon his own Buckler, and holding his Sword in his right, as if he would defend the monument of victory which he had compiled: But notwithſtanding this uneaſie condition, all his thoughts (as he told me ſince) were beſtowed upon his Princeſs; and the hopes he ſtill had that ſhe might come to know of his Conqueſt, made death appear very pleaſant and welcome unto him; yet if he could but have that happineſs to ſee her only once more, it was all that ever his heart could deſire. Mean time, Artanus who was gone to publiſh his falſe Triumphs, had fill'd all the hearts of his party with Joy, eſpecially the King of Pont, who though he did not much love Artanus, yet was very glad to receive this welcome news from him. The Hoſtages, which according to the Articles, remained with the King of Pont, were as much dejected; and certified the ſaid tidings unto their Maſter, to the end that Hoſtages on th ſides might be returned, and both Princes meet in e place of Combat, with Two Thouſand Men apiece, according to agreement; Ciaxares and the Princeſs Mandana were in a ſad perplexity; for ſeeing none of their party return, there was great likelihood things went not well on their ſide; but at laſt, being put out of doubt by return of the Hoſtages, that which at firſt was only a perplexity, becomes now an abſolute ſorrow: yet notwithſtanding, becauſe he would keep within the limits of Conditions, he goes unto the place of Combat, with that number of Men as was agreed upon. The King of Pont did the like; but as for the Princeſs, ſhe mourned extreamly, and ſtaid in the Town. When the ſad News was firſt brought unto the King, the firſt word ſhe ſpoke was with tears in her eyes: Alas, Sir (ſaid ſhe) poor Artamenes will never ſerve you more; the good ſervice which he did us in ſaving your Life, was but ill requited: As for Fernulas and my ſelf, Sir, I leave you to imagine how great our ſorrows and our deſpairs were; and though we knew the News too too true, yet we would accompany the King on to the field, and pay our laſt ſervice unto the body of our deareſt Maſter: So we went with Ciaxares, who came upon the ground juſt at the ſame time with the King of Pont: But both parties were extreamly amazed, when in coming near the place, they ſaw Artamenes, who having recovered a little ſtrength, at the ſight of the King for whom he had fought, was got upon his knee, with his Sword in his hand, near the Trophee which he had erected, and ſeeming to put himſelf into a poſture of defence, if any ſhould oppoſe him: But amongſt all them which were aſtoniſhed, Artanus, who was waited upon as Triumpher, was the moſt; eſpecially when he heard Artamenes in a loud voice, ſay to Ciaxares, Sir, the Victory is yours, the gods by my hand have given it unto you. When the King of Pont heard this, he ſaid, that it was himſelf to whom the Victory belonged, ſince here was preſent one of his Combatants, who was not ſo much as once wounded, ready to juſtify it. Then ſaid Artamenes, Without doubt, he who told you that Lye, did run away from fight and death, and Triumphed before he had fought: For if he had been Conqueror, why did he not make an end of me, and hinder me from piling up this Trophie? I left thee for dead (anſwered the impudent Artanus) for thou hadſt done fighting long before I came away. Thou baſe Impoſtor (ſaid Artamenes to him) if I had not had more terrible enemies to fight with than thou, the Victory which I have obtained, ſhould not have coſt me ſo dear; this valiant Man whom thou ſeeſt dead at my feet (ſaid he in ſhewing him Pharnaces) was the laſt Man of thy ſide which was in the field, and who only was in any hopes to overcome me; but as for thee, it ſeems, thou haſt not got ſo much as a ſcratch finger in that field thus covered with dead Men; and dareſt thou brag of Victory? The Condition which thou art in (anſwered the malepert Artanus,) is nothing like that of a Conqueror. At theſe words, Artamenes being tranſported with anger, gathered up all his ſtrength, and ſtrove to riſe; then looking about for Artanus, with a face full of lovely fury, Come (ſaid he to him, and holding his Sword in his hand) come on, thou which vaunt'ſt of victory without a wound; weak as I am, and cut in pieces, thus ſteept in my own and Enemies blood, I will yet maintain thou art a baſe lying Impoſtor; and that it is impoſſible thou durſt ever fight. At theſe words he put himſelf into a fighting condition; when the King of Phrygia, who came with the King of Pont, being much taken with the magnanimity of Artamenes, cried out that there was no Juſtice a man who ſeem'd ſo valiant, ſhould in ſuch a weak condition, undertake a new fight: My Maſter interrupting him, Sir, ſaid he, perhaps I have not ſtrength enough to live an hour, yet I have enough to fight with ſuch a feeble fellow as he. Artamus was ſo confounded at all this, that in ſpight of his impudence, it was eaſie to perceive there was no truth in his words: However Ciaxares lighted from his Horſe, and both Kings were on foot: Ciaxares embraced Artamenes, and commanded to ſuſtain him, ſo that Feraulas and I ſtept in to hold him up againſt his will. Then ſaid Ciaxares, Altho Artamenes were in a condition to fight, yet I know no reaſon why I ſhould ſuffer him, there being no juſtice a Conqueror ſhould hazard the Victory a ſecond time: inſomuch as this Conteſt had like to have been put unto the worſt extremity; and doubtleſs, if the King of Pont had not worn his Arm in a Scarf, by reaſon of a wound received in the laſt fight, this diſorder had not ended ſo well. The King of Phrygia, as one leaſt intereſted, did ſomething qualify the anger of theſe two Princes, and told them, that the buſineſs did require ſome time to examine the truth more exactly, but in any caſe not to do things over-raſhly and inconſiderately: The two Kings, conſenting unto this Propoſition, retired: And Artamenes did earneſtly deſire that his Trophy might ſtand, and that Ciaxares would be pleaſed to leave a guard with it, which was conſented unto. During theſe Conteſts, there was a neceſſity of carrying away Artamenes. I ſent unto the Town to get a Litter; the Princeſs hearing of it, ſent hers; for which my Maſter (as you may imagine, Sir) thought himſelf not a little obliged. After the Princeſs had given orders for the Funeral of the Combatants upon the place of fight, with all ſolemn Pomp, as well one ſide as the other, Feraulas and I did carry Artamenes into a Houſe in the Town, where he had lodged ſome days before; yet Ciaxares would not ſuffer it, but cauſed him to be carried into the Caſtle: All the King's Phyſicians and Chirurgions were brought into the Chamber. After they had viewed his wounds, put in their firſt tents, and dreſſed them, they told the King, that they hoped none of them were abſolutely mortal, although two were very dangerous; ſo that by their care, and his own ſtrength of nature, a happy cure was hoped for. The Princeſs alſo that firſt night, ſent many times to know in what ſtate he was; and he underſtanding of it, tho the Meſſenger ſpoke very low, the Phyſitians having forbidden all noiſe, he called to the Meſſenger, and would himſelf receive the Princeſs Complement; after he had received it, feebly turning himſelf on one ſide, and opening the Curtain of the Bed, which was cloth of gol ſeizes on him, as every one deſpaired of his life: I can not tell how to expreſs the ſorrows and cares which C axares and the Princeſs had of him, unleſs I ſhall tell you that Ciaxares was as dear over him, as if Mandana ha been ſick, and Mandana alſo as if Ciaxares had been ſ

I could not chuſe but wonder at the humorous conce of Fate, which made this Prince and Princeſs, who th their cares were not in vain; for after the twentieth da him. Aribees, as great a Favourite as he was, came o to tender his Complement: Philidaſpes, in ſpight of h ambitious jealouſies which the Valour of Artamenes pro cured him, fail'd not to pay civilities; and the King who ſaw him every day, brought the Princeſs to co gratulate his recovery. This wrought a wonderful e fect in Artamenes; ſo that in few days after, his Wound healed extraordinarily; ſuch power, it ſeems, has th Soul over the temper of the Body. I will not troubl you, Sir, in telling you what were the entertainmen at theſe two viſits; it being eaſie to imagine, that the de ſerts and valour of Artamenes was the whole ſubject o their converſe. But, Sir, to return unto matters of W where we left: Be pleaſed to know, that whilſt Artam nes was thus in cure, Embaſſadors paſſed continually b tween the two Kings, to find out ſome expedient ho to determine this difference, and bring it to Arbitr

ment. The King of Pont protracted it as long as he could: hoping, that during this vacancy the King of Phrygia might perhaps be free from the deſigns of his Enemies; and according to that, he could conclude either Peace or War: but the matter continued ſo dubious, that it ſeemed the Gods did purpoſely ordain it ſo, to give Artamenes time of recovering his ſtrength, to vindicate his Honour, and acquire more glory. He left his Chamber ſome two months after his firſt wounding, and went to preſent his thanks unto the King and Princeſs: afterwards he returned civil complements unto all the Court and Camp, eſpecially unto Philidaſpes. By this time, Sir, the two enemy Kings, having agreed upon Judges to hear and determine upon the Reaſons and Arguments of both Parties impartially, They erected a very magnificent Tent upon the Plain where the Combat was, and cloſe by the Trophy which Artamenes had compiled. Four of the Cappadocian and Galatian Grandees, and as many of Pont and Bythinia, were conſtituted Judges of this famous Controverſie, after they had all taken ſuch Oaths as were neceſſary to remove all ſuſpitions of prejudice and partiality; alſo three ſtately Thrones equally erected, and under them a long Seat covered with Purple, for the Judges of the Field; and all this handſomely prepared; the King of Pont, and the King of Phrygia conducted Artanus to juſtify his pretended Victory: But though he had more ſpirit than valour, he went unto this Combat much againſt his will, though it was not to be a bloody one. Artamenes was alſo conducted by Ciaxares: Four thouſand men of both ſides ranged themſelves, half upon the right hand, and half upon the left. Theſe Kings taking their Places according to their Rank, and Judges ſitting at their feet, Artamenes and Artanus ſtood at the Bar: ſilence was proclaimed. But, Sir, I will not trouble my ſelf to repeat verbatim the Speeches of theſe two Orators; I ſhall only tell you the iſſue of them; he which ſpoke firſt, was Artanus, who though he was eloquent, and delivered it with a good grace, yet it made no impreſſion upon the hearers: But on the contrary, the Speech of Artamenes having the Rhetorick of truth in it, and pronounced by a man of ſuch an excellent Preſence, gaine the hearts of all his Auditors: His Courage did ſo ſet o his Eloquence, and wrought ſo upon the King of Pon that he could not chuſe but admire the Spirit as well a Valour of Artamenes. At theſe words the King of Hircani begun to ſpeak and ſay, Wiſe Chriſantes, I beſeech yo do not deprive us of the happineſs to know the ſenſe o what was ſpoke in this glorious Court, in which the Cauſe depending was ſo uncommon, and where the Judges were Subjects unto them whom they were to judge, ſo by conſequence muſt needs beget a curioſity in them who are ignorant of it. Since it is your pleaſure, Sir, replied Chriſantes, I ſhall relate as much as my memory is capable of. The firſt which ſpoke, as I told you already, was Artanus, who after he had made low reverence unto the Kings and Judges, began his Speech to this effect:

The Oration of Artanus.

SInce it doth not reflect upon my Honour in particular, I will not ſtand to relate unto my Judges all that I did in the Combat wherein I was: It will ſuffice if I only ſhew, that it is my Party which hath conquered, and who ought to enjoy the fruits of their Victory. I think there can no queſtion be made, but if it be granted I was there, and fought, that then I did overcome: therefore it imports the juſtice of my Cauſe, to make it appear by ſtrong and pregnant conjectures, ſince all the Witneſſes of my Actions are dead, that though I was without Wounds at the end of the Combat, yet it was the particular goodneſs of the Gods unto me, and not my cowardiſe which preſerved me. Imagine, O ye my Judges, what probability or likelihood there is, that I could fly or hide my ſelf in ſuch an open Plain, or that where the Combat was, where the danger was not leſs in flying, than in fighting, ſince if it had been diſcovered by any of my Enemies, I had infallibly been purſued; and if by my Friends, then I had expoſed my ſelf unto their Revenge, and all the Puniſhments which were due unto one who had baſely deſerted and betrayed his King and his Countrey: ſo ſhould I have incenſed againſt me, either my Friends, or my Enemies, or both; and ſo by conſequence ſhould have incurred greater danger than if I had remained fighting. Moreover, Sirs, you know that none were compelled to undertake this Combat; ſo that had I not found in my ſelf heart good enough for it, I ſhould never have engaged in the buſineſs; All Pont, nor all Bythinia, were not to fight; all the gallant men of either Nation were not employed in the Encounter; ſo that if I had feared fighting, I could have declined my Engagement without any more diſhonour, than a hundred thouſand others, who did not engage themſelves. I could have teſtified deſires to have been one, as others did, yet not have accepted of it more than they; and ſince fear is always witty, I could have invented excuſes enough to have put it off, if I ſhould have been accepted. Theſe Circumſtances I conceive are ſufficient to convince any reaſonable and unbyaſſed man, that I did fight; and if it be granted that I fought, it muſt conſequently follow that I got the Victory, ſince it belongs unto that man who remains laſt in a condition to take away the life of his Enemy: Now, every one knows how Artamenes was more unfortunate than I was: The Kings which hear me, did ſee how he was ſteept in blood, all wounded, and ſo weak, that his Sword was more ſupported by his courage than ſtrength, and therefore they would not permit him to fight it out in that condition. I confeſs, the great inequality between us, was extraordinary; and it might very well cauſe wonder, that of four hundred men which fought, there ſhould remain but two living, the one whereof to be wounded in ſo many places, and the other ſo freſh and whole as if he had never fought; but the Gods work Miracles when they pleaſe: yet can it be that wounds ſhould be taken for marks of Victory? If ſo, why hath our Tutors ſo carefully taught us to defend our ſelves from blows? Why do we wear any Bucklers? but let us go to wars without defenſive Arms: Wounds, Sirs, are rather ſigns of weakneſs in the party who receives them, than of his great Courage; if men may brag of Victory becauſe they are wounded, the weakeſt, the ill-favouredſt, and moſt unfortunate, have the advantage over the ſtrong, handſome, and moſt happy men. In Duels, a little ſcratch is counted a great diſadvantage: 'Tis true, his wounds are certain marks that he was in danger, but it is as certain that his Valour was not able to avoid them: Methinks I hear ſome ſay, that his Wounds do argue for him; but if I underſtand their Language right, they plead his Defeat and my Triumph: As for this Trophy which he raiſed in my abſence, I conceive it was no difficult matter for him to do, ſince he was alone; And it was a cunning device of him, which ſhame of being overcome, and deſire of honour, made him invent: But after all this, Sirs, ſuppoſe that I did not fight, but that I fled in the beginning of the Combat, yet where is the great advantage which he pretends unto? It is true, that then I deſerved puniſhment; but it is not true that he deſerves to have the Victory, ſince he had the advantage of one man more on his ſide than his Enemy had; and ſince the ſtate of the Combat was brought unto that wherein you found him, it had been eaſie for that one man which was wanting, to have kill'd him, and got the Victory. Can he ſay himſelf that he ſaw me fly? if he can, I may chance doubt of the Victory, and hereafter truſt more unto his eyes than my own Valour; but ſince my Enemy can ſay nothing againſt me, only that he did not ſee me fight, and that I had received no wounds; I ſhall deſire that his weak reaſons may not be accepted of, but rather mine which hath truth and weight in them: For it muſt be a conſequent, that if I fought, I conquered; and it is apparent that I fought, ſince I was accepted for a Combatant, and that of my voluntary diſpoſition and deſire. And that though I did not fight, yet cannot he be declared Conqueror, becauſe then he fought upon inequalities, and therefore his Conqueſt is not lawful; Therefore, Sirs, defer no longer, but pronounce judgment; for I do not oppoſe againſt the glory of Artamenes*: Let it be granted he did gallantly, and that his wounds are marks of courage, and not weakneſs: I will only inſiſt upon this, that there was not an Enemy to oppoſe me, nor any who can ſpeak a word in contradiction of what I ſay, unleſs that he did not ſee me fight; he (I ſay) who perhaps was ſo wounded at the beginning of the fight, that he could not ſee any thing, therefore I deſerve judgment to be pronounced on my ſide; for if he did not ſee me, his eyes were full of blood, and therefore could not: But as for me, who by the goodneſs of the Gods, and my own valour did keep my ſight, my blood, and my ſtrength; I ſaw him fight, and* ſaw him wounded, and fall dead, cloſe by this imaginary Trophy. So, Sirs, having no more to ſay, I deſire that the honour of my Countrey and my Triumph may be no longer deferred.

As ſoon as Artanus had ended his Speech, there was heard a ſtrange odd grumbling and muttering Noiſe, without any Acclamations amongſt the Aſſembly; by which it might eaſily be gueſſed that the People diſliked his Diſcourſe. Artamenes told me ſince, that never any thing in his life did ſo much trouble him, as to endure this Ignominy; yet he reſolved to anſwer without any diſturbing Paſſion; and the weakneſs of this feeble Fellow made him turn his Anger into Pity, and caus'd him to omit every thing that concerned his private Injury, only ſo far as concerned the Advantage of his Cauſe, and Juſtification of his Valour. After the murmur of the People ceas'd, and Artamenes had in a graceful demeanour done Reverence to the Kings and Judges, the People preſſing in ſilence to hear him, he began his Anſwer thus.

The Oration of Artamenes.

Victory is ſo high a Good, and Cowardiſe ſo baſe an Evil, that I wonder not to find a Man, who would gladly enjoy the firſt without winning it, and ſhun the ſecond, tho he do deſerve it. Deſire of Glory and Honour is born with us, and fear of Infamy is found in the baſeſt of Men, moſt deſerving it. Neither do I at all wonder that Artanus would triumph without Fighting. But indeed I wonder, that conſidering he is a Man of more Wit than Valour, he hath not ſhaped his Lye more reſemblant unto Truth; and that he hath made no particular Relation of his Acts, which had been very requiſite, before he can convince us of his coming off ſo without Wounds; at leaſt, he ſhould have told us who was the God which ſo preſerved him. I am moſt certain, the Valour of one Man could not preſerve him ſo miraculouſly, but it muſt needs be ſome other Divinity which kept him inviſible from my Eyes, whenas after I only was left againſt three, I ſaw none about me but they; they (I ſay) who by their own Fate, rather than my force, did fall before me. I am moſt certain, that Artanus was none of thoſe three; yet I know that the Valiant Pharnaces was the laſt of them which remained, and fought with me ſtoutly, diſputing the Victory; and who if he had been ſeconded by ſuch a freſh unwounded Man as Artanus, would eaſily have carried away the Victory from me, who was then ſo weak, ſince he had almoſt done it without him: I know well enough, that Wounds are no infallible Marks of Victory; but I know alſo, that to boaſt of not being wounded, is no proof of his Fighting. Methinks he ſhould have at the leaſt ſhewed ſome of his Enemies Blood upon him, tho none of his own; but it ſeems Artanus went out as if to a Combat of ſimple Gallantry, where bloody Victory is forbidden. I confeſs, I cannot ſay any thing in particular againſt him; I neither know when he fled, nor how he hid himſelf, or how he vaniſhed: I only know, that I did not ſee him Fight, and this is ſufficient to convince that he did not overcome, ſince he left me alive. There are Crimes of another nature, whereof thoſe who are accuſed cannot be convinced without ſight, as that ſuch a one was ſeen kill a Man in the Corner of ſuch a Wood, and pull him by the Arms, and run his Sword through him; ſome ſuch Circumſtance muſt be ſeen, or elſe thoſe who do accuſe, do rather Juſtify then Condemn. But here in this caſe it is quite contrary; for in ſaying negatively, that I did not ſee Artanus Fight, is all that I can ſay againſt him. But I do affirmatively accuſe him of a Crime of which he cannot juſtifie himſelf, only in ſaying, that he ſaw me, that he fought with me, and that he overcame me, which in my Opinion will not be eaſie for him to do or prove. Then furthermore, tho he dares not truſt too much to the Exploits which he hath performed; yet he dares ſay, that becauſe he fled, and I fought upon Inequalities, therefore I muſt not have the Victory. But, Sirs, where found he any Law to authorize this Diſcourſe? At the beginning of a Combat, doubtleſs the number of Combatants ought to be equal, and their Arms alſo; but when once the Combat is begun, every one may lawfully take thoſe Advantages which Fortune preſents, or which his Enemy ſuffers him; What tho a Soldier go out of

Combat either by Death, or otherwiſe? Or if he fly, he is as well vanquiſhed, as if he had been Killed, or taken Priſoner. And he, who doth oppoſe the Victory of his Enemy no way but by flying; or ſaves his Life only by not expoſing it, is moſt unworthy to have any ſhare of Honour or Glory in the Victory. But if he do, then I confeſs, that Artanus having managed his Life ſo thriftily, has ſome reaſon to ſay he deſerves the Triumph better than I do, who indeed have not been ſo ſparing of my Blood as he. But this Victory did depend upon the Death of all Enemies; if ſo, then he cannot ſay the Victory was his, ſince all theſe Kings and Judges who hear me, did find me alive with Arms in my Hand, ready to defend my Right againſt him or any who oppoſed. Now, Sirs, to make it appear that I neither fear his Force nor his Fortune, altho he ſeems invulnerable, in a Combat where ſo many gallant Men loſt their Lives; I moſt humbly deſire you to permit me Combat with him in Liſts, and in the preſence of thoſe Kings who hear me; for if you will be pleaſed to grant me this Petition, which he never ſo much as mentioned, and which in juſtice you cannot deny me, I will promiſe you he ſhall Vaniſh no more out of my Sight, but I will render you a better account of him. I know well, that in ſome reſpects it is an Injury unto the Juſtice of my Cauſe, and to the Title of that moſt Illuſtrious King, whoſe Intereſt I maintain, to put it unto a ſecond Hazard. But ſince upon the whole matter, there is only his Negative, and my Affirmative, without other Teſtimonies, which does appear before you Judges, who can never be convinced of the Truth, either by the Words of Artanus, or mine, but only by our Actions; therefore I conceive there is no other way to clear the matter in queſtion; and to tell you truth, I care not for preſerving that by my Eloquence, which (without Vanity be it ſpoken) I have got by my Valour: The Glory of this Victory is too great to coſt the Valiant Artanus not one little drop of Blood. He muſt, Sirs, he muſt either confeſs the truth before all you who hear us, or elſe muſt have the Life of Artamenes; and ſince two hundred Men were not able to give him one ſcratch, he needs not fear one ſingle Man, and one who is ſo much weakned by his Wounds as he is, yet one whom I aſſure you he ſhall not Vanquiſh without Ho- nour; therefore certainly, if he did Fight before, he will not fear to Fight now. I ask no more advantage for my Cauſe, O ye Judges; and you cannot pronounce any other Judgment but with a trembling Accent; and do what you can any other way, one ſide will complain; whereas, if I ſhall make you underſtand the truth from Artanus's own Mouth, then you may boldly give Sentence without any fear of Injuſtice, or that either ſide will complain of you: Deny me not therefore, I conjure you, ſince I deſire nothing but what is moſt juſt and reaſonable. Moreover, that Artanus may oppoſe this my Deſire, by hopes of avoiding Combat, tho if Juſtice be granted unto me, he cannot avoid it; therefore I adviſe him to hope for Pardon, by confeſſing his Fault, and ingenuouſly tell us, that he thought it better to ſteal a Victory, than to run a hazard for it. But if he will diſpute the Buſineſs, and ſtand upon terms of Juſtification, then this gallant Man muſt reſolve upon this courſe which I deſire, and which I beſeech you to ordain. I freely give him his choice of Arms, and promiſe this further, that tho he fall into my Power, I will not kill him, provided he will confeſs the Truth, and be more ingenuous under my Feet, than he is before this Majeſtical Tribunal. It is in your Power to pronounce this juſt Sentence, which I expect from you, it being the only way to make that Truth appear, which I affirm.

Artamenes had no ſooner ended his Speech, but all the People made a great Shout, much different from that which they made at the end of Artanus's Oration, for then there was nothing heard but a hollow Murmuring; but this was lively Acclamations and Applauds, which ſeemed to tell the Kings, and the Judges, that Artamenes muſt have the Victory. His very Enemies could not chuſe but commend him; ſo charming is Virtue, and ſo powerful is Truth. Artanus would have anſwered in oppoſition of Combat, but none would hear him. None of the Kings did like of this Propoſition which Artamenes made, for Ciaxares was unwilling to hazard again the Life of ſo excellent a Man. And the King of Pont not well ſatiſfied, fied, that his Cauſe ſhould depend upon the hands of Artanus, whom he had no great good Opinion of. Mean while, the Judges riſe, and conſult in private: during which interval, Philidaſpes, who was preſent at all the paſſages, and was driven into abſolute deſpair by ſeeing new Honours every day heaped upon Artamenes, addreſſed himſelf unto Ciaxares, and moved him to take into his conſideration the ſmall time ſince Artamenes left keeping his Bed, and his Chamber; therefore he humbly deſired him to let him have the Honour of fighting with Artanus, in caſe the Judges permitted a ſecond Combat, which favour would eternally oblige him. Philidaſpes ſpoke not ſo low, but Artamenes jealouſly obſerved him; and ſuſpected ſuch a thing, and fearing leſt he ſhould obtain his deſire, he addreſſed himſelf, and ſaid, Sir, do not hearken unto Philidaſpes, ſince what he deſires is equally injurious, both unto his Honour and mine. How know you that, replied the young Stranger? I know (replied Artamenes) that ſuch a Man as Philidaſpes ought not to Fight with a Coward, unleſs he was forced to it, as I am; and it is a wrong done unto my ſelf, to think that I have need of all my Strength to vanquiſh ſuch an Enemy as he is. Altho Artanus were Artamenes, replied Philidaſpes roughly, I would deſire as much. And tho Artanus were Philidaſpes, (replied my Maſter) I would not yield my place unto another. Ciaxares ſeeing them ſo high in Conteſt, and fearing it might proceed further, did embrace them both; and commending their Courage and Zeal, cauſed them to embrace each other. He told Philidaſpes, that he was not to be Judg in his own Cauſe, therefore could not ſatisfie him: And he told Artamenes, that he had no reaſon to have an ill Opinion of Philidaſpes for his offer: He commanded them both to expect the Sentence of the Judges patiently. The Judges were in long Conſultation, before they could reſolve what Sentence to pronounce; for tho every one did verily think that Artanus had plaid the Villain; yet notwithſtanding, he ſo peremptorily denying it, and there being no Witneſs, neſs to prove it, they were much intangled in their Judgments. Thoſe of Ciaxares's ſide could not give Sentence againſt their Prince; for all they which knew Artamenes, could not doubt but he had vanquiſhed. And thoſe of the King of Pont's ſide, altho they did believe the ſame, yet durſt not give Sentence againſt their Prince, becauſe their belief was grounded only upon Conjectures. So that after a full Conſideration of the whole matter, they reſolved upon Combat, and gave Sentence, That he who could cauſe his Enemy to confeſs he was vanquiſhed, ſhould be eſteemed Victorious; and if it ſhould ſo hap, that his Enemy ſhould dye without Confeſſion, the matter ſhould be interpreted advantagiouſly for him who killed him; that the Duel ſhould be in cloſe Liſts, as Artamenes deſired it, and in the Preſence of both Enemy-Kings. No ſooner was this Sentence pronounced, but Artamenes was all Joy, and thanked the Judges after ſuch a manner as did preſage Victory; but ſo did not Artamus, who went along grumbling againſt the Judges, and the King his Maſter; ſo that (as we came to know afterwards) this Prince being of a gallant Diſpoſition, did treat him but ſcurvily, and told him ſharply, that if he had really overcome before, he might overcome again; but if he had played the part of a baſe Coward, as he began to ſuſpect him, then he ſhould be very glad to ſee him puniſhed by the Hand of Artamenes; adding further, That he ſhould not grieve ſo much for the loſs of Ceraſia, as he ſhould rejoyce at his ruin; and that the one would be a Cordial againſt the other. After all, this Prince cauſed him to be diligently watched, leſt this Coward ſhould play him a ſecond Prank, and avoid Combat by Flight, as doubtleſs he had done, if he could have found a handſome opportunity. As for Ciaxares, he was ſorry for nothing, but that he was to hazard the Life of ſuch an Illuſtrious Man, and engage him in freſh Danger, ſince the verieſt Coward might by a misfortunate hit, chance to wound the braveſt Man in the World.

Mean while, the time of Combat being limited to be within four days, every one retreats unto the Towns in which the Kings had Encamped their ſeveral Armies. Ciaxares was no ſooner in the Town of Aniſa, but he went unto the Princeſs's Chamber, waited upon by Aribees, Artamenes, Philidaſpes, and many others. He no ſooner acquainted her with what was reſolved upon; but ſhe preſently ſaid, What, Sir, is it juſt that he ſhould be put to overcome an Enemy twice? Is not one drop of Artamenes Blood more worth than the Conqueſt of Ceraſia? For my part, (added ſhe, and held her Hand before her Face to hide her Bluſhing) I confeſs my weakneſs, and cannot hear you talk of Combats and Fights, whithout fear and trembling, eſpecially when they reflect upon the Life of him who has preſerved yours, Sir. Madam, (interrupted Artamenes) you infinitely Honour me, in taking any care of my Life, which could never be better expoſed than in the King's Service; but, Madam, never fear me in this Combat, rather be ſorry that I have ſo weak and baſe an Enemy to fight withal. The fault is not in Philidaſpes, Madam, (ſaid Aribees unto the Princeſs) that Artamenes is expoſed unto this Danger, ſince he hath endeavoured all he could to exempt him, and Fight in his room. It is very true, Madam, (ſeconded Philidaſpes) that I aſſumed the boldneſs to Petition to the King for it, but he did not think me worthy of that Honour. That's not the reaſon, (anſwered Ciaxares) I did not deny you becauſe I thought you were unworthy, but becauſe I thought it unjuſt. Then added my Maſter, This is another reaſon, Sir, becauſe Artamenes would not have ſuffered him, for he never uſes to yield his place unto another. The King, who was afraid leſt the two Gallant Strangers ſhould fall out upon it, broke off Diſcourſe, and left the Princeſs, carrying with him all them which followed him unto Mandana. For all theſe paſſages, Love was predominate in Artamenes, ſo that he never was with the Princeſs, but he obſerved her with a moſt circumſpect Eye. When he was in his Chamber with only Feraulas and me, he asked us, what we thought of that Bluſh which appeared in the Face of Mandana, when ſhe talked of him, and of her diſlike, that he ſhould Fight any more. Was it (ſaid he to us) only an effect of her natural, ſweet, and calm Diſpoſition which is Antipathious unto War? Or was it, think you, the Service which I have done her Father, that has ſomething ingaged her Soul in ſome Diſpoſition not to hate me? But, alas, ſaid he preſently, (not giving leave to anſwer) was it not that ſhe was aſhamed, and repented of thoſe obliging Words which ſhe ſpoke in my behalf? Is it not an infallible ſign that her Tongue did contradict her Heart? I cannot abſolutely tell what to think of that lovely Bluſh which lookt ſo like Divinity, and charm'd my Soul anew? Flatter me not, dear Feraulas, (ſaid he) but tell me truly, what do you think of it? And how ſhould I interpret it? Sir, (ſaid he to him) I cannot conceive any thing by it, but what makes for your advantage; for admit it to be but an effect of Pity, yet it will be a good ground for you to build your hopes upon, and you may more eaſily work upon her Soul, when ſhe ſhall be acquainted with thoſe Paſſions which you endure for her ſake. Ah Feraulas (cried he out) when will that be? How long before I muſt make it known unto her? Cyrus dares not peep out of his Tomb to tell her; and Artamenes, who appears to be no more than a bare ſimple Knight, dare he entertain ſo raſh a thought without extravagant Folly? To tell you truth, Sir, Artamenes's mind ran more upon the Princeſs than upon Artanus; not but that he thought upon the Combat with as much care and memory as was fitting; but that when he thought upon any thing whatſoever, ſtill there was a mixture of Mandana in it. And Love which works ſuch Wonders, beſtowed this Privilege upon him, that he was able to diſcourſe of War, of Buſineſs, of News, of Complements, and every thing, without ever omitting the dear thoughts of his Princeſs.

Mean while the day of Combat comes on, and he muſt go to take his leave of her with ſuch jolly Looks, as gave aſſurance of Triumph. Madam, (ſaid he) I come to beg ſome Arms of you, wherewith to fight Artanus. I had rather (anſwered ſhe moſt ſweetly, but more ſad than uſual) find out a way to make you invincible. You may do it eaſily, Madam, (ſaid he) if you do me but the Honour to accept favourably of thoſe Services which I ſhall do for the King and you; and doing me only the favour, of wiſhing me Victory. For if I be ſo happy, tho Artanus were the Valour of the World, (as Heaven knows he is not) I ſhould moſt undoubtedly vanquiſh him. If there want nothing but acknowledgement of your Services, (replied the Princeſs) and my Prayers, to make you triumph, go Artamenes, go, and fear not being vanquiſhed. After this, the Princeſs, as if ſhe were weary of this kind of Diſcourſe, bad him farewel in a moſt ſweet and obliging manner; and Artamenes went towards the King, who was ready to go unto this Combat. Ciaxares was followed only with Two thouſand Men as before. The Kings of Pont and Phrygia met alſo, with the like number in the ſame Plain and Place, where the Judges pronounced Sentence, that was cloſe by the Trophy of Artamenes. There they rayl'd out a piece of Ground, which was longer than wide, and of ſufficient bigneſs for a Combat. Artanus, who thought his Sword too much, would fight with no other offenſive Arms; always imagining that the fewer Arms his Enemy had, the leſs ſhould he be expoſed unto them; either of them one Sword, and one Buckler, was all their Arms. At the two ends of the Liſts, there was two Scaffolds erected for the Enemy-Kings; and at either ſide, another for the Judges. The Four thouſand Soldiers were ranked, ſome behind the Scaffolds, ſome on the ſides of the Liſts, all remaining under their own Colours, not mixing, but ſo placed that all might ſee. At both ends of the Liſts there was two entrances for the two Combatants, into which Artamenes and Artanus entered at one time, and preſaged the event of the Combat at the firſt, by their different Aſpects. Artanus would Fight on Horſe-back, having more confidence in his Strength and Nimbleneſs, than in the Courage and Valour of him which rid him; but he knew not, that the more vigorous and fierce his Horſe was, the leſs was he ſerviceable unto that Rider who was afraid to ride him, or could not guide him: Artanus then appeared in moſt magnificent Arms, and upon a Milk-white-horſe, ſo fine, ſo well-made, and ſo ſprightly, that at firſt he invited all to look upon him; he had a lively, and a proud Look, and pawing with his Foot, ſhaking his Main, foaming at his Mouth, and violently Neighing, he began his Carrear; he ſeemed impatient to carry his Maſter unto his Enemy. But, Sir, altho the Horſe of Artanus did win the Admiration of all Men, yet the ill-favoured Poſture of him, who rid him, deſired the Pity of all Spectators; the leaſt motion of the Horſe, ſhook him almoſt out of the Saddle; and one might plainly perceive, all his endeavours were to keep him from his Enemy, as if he were afraid to be too ſoon aſſaulted. As for Artamenes, he appeared otherwiſe; for tho he rid upon a very handſome Black-horſe, yet this day he took but very common Arms, as being aſhamed to Fight with ſo baſe an Enemy; he carried his Body boldly, and his Countenance confidently; he ſat his Horſe gracefully, and was ſo dexterous a Maſter of him, that it was eaſy to perceive he knew how to Command him. All ſuch Ceremonies as are commonly uſed upon the like occaſions being ended, and the Signal by Trumpets no ſooner given, but putting on his Horſe to Gallop, he made towards Artanus with mighty fury; he did ſo little fear his feeble Enemy, that he almoſt neglected the uſe of his Buckler. As for Artanus, he knew not at all what he did; for giving his Horſe too much Bridle, then pulling him in too ſuddenly, one great bound bounſt him all on one ſide; then his Horſe ſhaking his Head fiercely, and half rearing upright, he ſuddenly runs away with his Rider to the other end of the Liſts, before Artamenes could ſalute him with one Blow; but Artamenes turning his Horſe, he followed him, and fell upon him before he was well got into the Saddle again; then he paid the Debt he owed him, and gave him ſuch a Blow with his Sword upon the right Shoulder, that Blood ran down his gallant Suit of Arms; Artamenes gave him another. Artanus all this while kept himſelf upon the poſture of Defence, but durſt not ſtrike ſo terrible an Enemy, leſt he ſhould further provoke him, always hoping that Artamenes's Horſe would tire before his, or that ſome Accident or other would chance to take pity and relieve him. Mean while Artamenes was much angred, for he could kill him when he pleas'd, but that Victory would not pleaſe him; for he deſired to ſatisfy the World out of Artanus's Mouth, concerning the truth of the whole matter, he fought and ſpared him alſo; notwithſtanding this advantage which Artamenes gave him, yet this Wretch durſt never turn one Blow back; he was hurt in four ſeveral places, not once daring to lift up his Sword againſt my Maſter; his Horſe being aſhamed to bear ſo baſe a Burthen, would have thrown him; at laſt, my Maſter extreamly diſdaining ſuch a Coward, gave him a luſty Blow with the back of his Sword, which made him tumble upon the Neck of his Horſe, who thereupon took that opportunity to throw him half dead upon the Ground; his Helmet falling off his Head, his Sword out of his Hand, and he held faſt unto nothing but his Buckler, of which he always made more uſe than any other Arms. Artamenes lighted preſently from his Horſe, and running at him with his Sword lifted up, Confeſs, thou baſe Enemy (ſaid he to him) all the truth of my firſt Victory. I'll confeſs all, anſwered this wretched Coward, (covering himſelf with his Buckler) ſo you will ſpare my Life. There is ſo little Honour in taking it from thee (anſwered my Maſter, holding his Foot upon his Neck) that I will grant it; but be ſure thou telleſt no more Lies before the Judges; if thou doſt not tell all the whole Truth, there's nothing ſhall ſave thee from the fury of immediate Revenge. The Judges deſcending from the Scaffold, went into the Liſts towards Artamenes, who ſeeing them coming, Come, ſaid he to them, come and hear the truth from the Mouth of an Enemy. Speak it then, ſaid he to him, If thou wilt live, and defer no longer the Vindication of my Honour. Then the wretched Artanus being moved with remorſe, but much more with fear of Death, told in few words the whole truth of the Story, ſaying only by way of excuſe, That when he perceived the manner of the Fight, and that the Victory was in great diſpute, that in all probability all on their ſide would be loſt, therefore he thought to have that by Cunning, which he could not by Valour. In concluſion, he confeſſed that Artamenes was left but Fifteen againſt Forty, that he brought it to be Ten to Ten; afterwards Seven to Ten; after that himſelf againſt Three; preſently himſelf againſt Two; and at laſt, himſelf againſt Pharnaces only. In ſhort, he confeſſed all he knew, and feared Death much more than Infamy. And truly, ſince he was ſo pitifully bafled, he need not to fear the loſs of any more Honour, having loſt ſo much already, that it was impoſſible for him to loſe more. The Judges hearing the Confeſſion of Artanus, did entreat my Maſter to content himſelf with this acknowledgment, and to let him riſe and live. I will let him riſe and live, anſwered Artamenes, upon condition he will live in Honour, and play ſuch baſe Tricks no more. The Judges then were in no more Controverſy, but all agreed that my Maſter was Victorious; declaring Ceraſia to belong unto the King of Cappadocia, and ordained that the Trophy which Artamenes had piled up, ſhould be hereafter built in earneſt unto the Honour of Artamenes. The King of Pont did receive this News like a Prince both of Courage and Wiſdom; and he witneſſed more reſentment of Sorrow for the vile Action of Artanus, than for the loſs of Ceraſia. As for Ciaxares, he received Artamenes with extraordinary Joy, which doubtleſs was no welcome News unto Aribees and Philidaſpes, who were both preſent. As for Artanus, ſince he was of great Quality, ſome of his Kindred took him off, and had care of him, notwithſtanding the King's anger. But the King told them, that tho they did Cure him of his Wounds, yet he would never look upon him again. When the Judges of both ſides had acquainted their Maſters the Kings with their Judgments, the two Enemy-Kings, and the King of Phrygia did meet, and ſaluted one another the ſecond time.

The King of Pont told Ciaxares, That he would return unto his Army, and the next day withdraw it off from before Caraſia, to the end he might take Poſſeſſion of it: He told the King of Cappadocia, in concluſion, that he had more reaſon to eſteem himſelf happy in having the Friendſhip of ſuch a Man as Artamenes, than in recovering the Town; and for his part, he would with all his heart give half his Kingdom, to have but one Soldier ſo Valiant as he. Artamenes was cloſe by Ciaxares, when this Complement paſſed, who returned an Anſwer full of modeſt Civility; tho all which coming from a Lover of Mandana, was nothing pleaſant to him. After this, the Kings departed; Ciaxares to Aniſa, all the People came out of the Town to meet him; the whole Army was drawn up into Battalia; the Princeſs her ſelf being advertiſed of all Paſſages by a Man, whom the King had ſpeedily diſpatched with Intelligence, met the King juſt at the gate of the Caſtle, where Ciaxares preſented Artamenes unto her, whom ſhe received with abundance of Joy; But as ſhe did expreſs her Joy, that he was come off ſo ſafe from ſo dangerous an Encounter. Call it not ſo, Madam, I beſeech you, (ſaid he to her, and Bluſhing) do not wrong me ſo much, as to believe I could think my ſelf expoſed unto any danger in this Combat. The Honour which you were pleas'd to do me, in promiſing your Prayers for Victory, had ſuch an Operation, as I became Victorious without any Danger. I know not (anſwered the Princeſs) whether you vanquiſhed without Danger; but I am certain you did not vanquiſh without Honour. Many other Complements paſſed which would be too long to relate. And Ciaxares to recompence in ſome manner the Services of Artamenes, beſtowed upon him, not only the Government of Caraſia which he had conquered, and of which he thought to take Poſſeſſion the day after; but the Government of Aniſa alſo, with all the Country about it, it being Vacant by the Death of a former Governor. It is but juſt, ſaid the King, that Artamenes ſhould enjoy that which he hath got, and that which I had loſt, but for him. Aribces durſt not directly oppoſe this great Benefit which the King had conferred upon Artamenes, becauſe his Services did well deſerve as much; for he had performed abſolute Miracles in the Battel; he had ſaved the King's Life; he had brought the Enemy unto many diſadvantages; he did prodigiouſly vanquiſh in Combat of two hundred, and had concluded a General Peace by one particular Victory. But altho Aribees did not abſolutely oppoſe this great recompence; yet he thought Artamenes did eclpſe him and Philidaſpes: He told the King in a low Voice, that he apprehended much danger by truſting thoſe two Places in the hands of a Stranger; and that it were better to recompence Artamenes by ſome other Places in the midſt of the Country, than by thoſe Frontier Towns: Yet, ſay or do what he could, the King would not alter his Reſolution. It was his pleaſure alſo, to obſerve the Sentence of the Judges, and to erect an everlaſting Monument unto the Glory of Artamenes, in the place where he himſelf had compiled the Trophies; and commanded the Architectures to place all thoſe Trophies upon a magnificent Pillar of Marble, which ſhould riſe a great height, with a glorious Inſcription upon it; this was in a little time after finiſhed, notwithſtanding the continuance of the War. For, Sir, you muſt know, that the King of Pont did very punctually keep Promiſe, and retire from Ceraſia: But you muſt know alſo, that the Inhabitants of this Town did ſo extreamly love this Prince, under whoſe Government they had lived ſo long; and had been ſo ill uſed by the laſt Kings of Cappadocia, under whom they once lived, that the King of Pont, do what he could, was not able to perſuade them to open their Gates unto his Enemy; yet he thought that when he was gone from them, they would then change their Reſolution, ſo that he would not ſend any thing of it unto Ciaxares, leſt it ſhould incenſe him againſt them, but retreated himſelf as he was obliged, leaving only one Captain with Five hundred Men, with Orders to remain there, and deliver up the Place unto thoſe whom the King of Cappadocia ſhould ſend to receive it. On the other ſide, Ciaxares being pleaſed to favour Artamenes in all things, told him very graciouſly, that he would have him go take Poſſeſſion of his own Conqueſt in the Head of Six thouſand Men. But when Artamenes came there, he much wondered to find the Gates ſhut, and all the Walls man'd with Soldiers to defend it and themſelves if any would Aſſault it; he thought it ſtrange that he ſhould be forced to Storm it, yet he would know what the People would ſay, before he would fall on; he therefore commanded his Troops to keep out of Arrow-ſhot, and ſent to Summon the Town, commanding the Inhabitants to open the Gates, according to the Conditions with the King of Pont; but they being fully reſolved not to change Maſters, took up Arms, and Diſarmed thoſe Five hundred Soldiers which the King of Pont had left; then they prepared a Declaration, and threw it over the Wall unto the Herald which ſpoke unto them, telling him, That Ciaxares might there ſee in writing their Reaſons why they defended the Town againſt him, and perhaps might approve of them; alſo bidding him be gone preſently, or elſe they would make him, for they were reſolved to defend themſelves, tho the King of Pont had forſaken them. Artamenes having read the Manifeſto, ſtood aſtoniſhed, not only at the hanſome compoſure of it, but becauſe he ſaw that never were Subjects ſo faithful unto their Prince as theſe. I do not well remember the whole Contents of it, but I have not forgot that it ended in theſe words.

If we were perſwaded that we were your lawful Subjects, we would do the ſame unto the King of Pont, which now we do unto you; but as on the contrary we take our ſelves to be his, we will dye a thouſand Deaths, rather than receive any other other Maſter. We know that he hath abandoned us; but we know withal, that he did not abandon us without Sorrow; ſo that we are reſolved to keep it for him, whether he will or now; and as the caſe ſtands, be rather Rebels unto him, than change Maſters. If we can reſiſt you, we ſhall rejoyce and be happy; if we periſh in reſiſting you, Death will free us from all Servitude; whatſoever befals us, we will not change our King and and Government. If you be generous, and well adviſed (as we hope you will be) you will rather recompence than puniſh us for our fidelity: and you may be glad that we have given ſo good an example of fidelity unto your Subjects, which may teach them to be as faithful unto your ſelf when there is occaſion for it.

Artamenes finding the people to be of Heroick diſpoſitions, would not ſtorm the Town without further order; he ſent me unto Ciaxares, to carry this Manifeſto, and receive his Commands, ſtaying himſelf in the head of his Regiments, and facing Ceraſia. The King doubtleſs was much moved at this event; and Aribees, who had a cunning wit, did believe that the people had ſome other ground for their action, than their pure affections unto their Prince; and imagined that their Prince did prompt them to it: So that ſince the continuance did redound unto his private advantage, he did exaſperate the King as much as poſſible he could: Nevertheleſs (as we came to the knowledg of it afterwards) the only cauſe which moved the Ceraſians unto this generous reſolution, was only their affection unto their King, and diſlike of the Cappadocians. Ciaxares ſent to the King of Pont to complain of the Inhabitants, to tax him with breach of Covenant; and without any more loſs of time, he cauſed his Army to advance againſt the Town, and to enter it any manner of way whatſoever. The King ordained Artamenes his Lieutenant General; this ſtruck ſorrow and anger to the very heart of Philidaſpes, when he conſidered that now he was ſubordinate unto the only Man of all the World, which was an obſtacle unto his Glory, and conſequently unto his main deſign. The Princeſs was much troubled at the accident: Philidaſpes more than ſhe; Ciaxares is reſtleſs: The King of Pont is both glad and ſad: The King of Phrygia is angry: Aribees is well pleaſed; and Artamenes is neither moved with one Paſſion or other, but keeps a medium between both, ſince he ſaw his love was not concerned in it, and that was the only thing which could move him either to joy or ſorrow. The King of Pont anſwered thoſe whom Ciaxares ſent unto him, That he was very ſorry, and much offended that the Ceraſians did not obey him; and that for his part, he had done all he could: for all he could do, was to command them to ſet open their Gates. But (ſaid he to the Embaſſadors) I do not think my ſelf obliged to go and beſiege them, or to fight againſt thoſe who out of their extream affection to me, do caſt off obedience It is ſufficient that I will not aid them: Beſides, they are now none of my ſubjects, they are the ſubjects of Ciaxares, and it belongs to him to order them: Yet I do, indeed, think my ſelf bound to intreat them, but not rigorouſly to compel them. This Prince, thus diſmiſſing the Embaſſadors of Ciaxares, ſent one of his own Heralds with them, whom the King of Cappadocia cauſed to be conducted unto the Walls of Ceraſia, for to ſummon them to ſurrender the Town: But they would not obey, and bid him tell his Maſter, that though he had cruelly forſaken them, yet they preferred death before ſubjection unto the King of Galatia. Ciaxares ſeeing their conſtant reſolution, did commend them for it in his heart, yet he plotted how to aſſault them; to that end he held a Councel of War, the reſult of which was, To carry this Town by force. In order to which, he ſate down before it: Quarters are choſen; Lines are drawn; Trenches are caſt up; Ladders and other Engines are prepared. Mean while, Philidaſpes, whom we did not believe to be of ſuch an ambitious ſpirit, was full of reſtleſs envy: It did appear ſo viſible in his eyes, that all the world took notice of it. He thought, that if he did not come off very eminently at this ſiege, he ſhould come infinitely ſhort of Artamenes, who had carried it ſo highly; and ſo by conſequence his great deſign would be ruined: He alſo thought what gallant things ſoever he did in this expedition where Artamenes was appointed Governour, they would all redound unto his advantage. Neither was the King of Pont without his ſhare of vexation in mind; for his Mandana ſtuck in it; and this affection of the people towards him, moved much tenderneſs in him towards them again. So that queſtionleſs, had not the Lydian War, which the King of Phrygia feared, diverted him, he would have been willing to begin that War which he had but newly ended. But, Sir, it was not long before he had what he wiſhed for; becauſe the King of Phrygia newly received ſome intelligence, that the King of Lydia was not in condition for War, a great part of his own ſubjects being lately revolted. This news begot new reſentment in the mind of the King of Pont: But whilſt he was deliberating what was beſt to be done; Ciaxares cauſed Ceraſia to be ſtormed: Artamenes did things above admiration, and Philidaſpes did no leſs. I will not, Sir, ſtand to deſcribe exactly all the particularities of this Siege; having many things of greater importance to relate: Let me tell you only in few words, that the Inhabitants of Ceraſia did deſperately defend themſelves, and found enough for the valour of Artamenes and Philidaſpes to work upon; and I have ſince heard my Maſter ſay, that he never found ſuch ſtout reſiſtance as from them; nor did he ever fight more againſt the hair of his diſpoſition: for conſidering the couragious mind of the Men, and their incomparable fidelity, it could not chuſe but grieve him that his valour ſhould be imployed againſt ſuch Men. They maintained the Town againſt four Aſſaults, with Gallantry above example: They ſaw all their Gates broken down, and a great part of their Walls demoliſht with Martial Engines, before they would render themſelves: And being intrenched towards the higheſt part of the Town, they ſtill found us work enough. Philidaſpes helped not a little in this Siege; and both Artamenes and he did ſo highly eſteem of one another, that it may well be ſaid, valour did never beget ſo much admiration, and ſo little love. But in concluſion, after theſe unfortunate inhabitants had a long time very ſtoutly reſiſted, they were compelled to yield: Yet before they were the laſt time aſſaulted, Artamenes did beſeech the King that he might ſend a Summons unto them once more, with aſſurance of a general pardon, if they would render themſelves, and reſiſt no more, which Ciaxares conſented unto. At that very inſtant, there arrived an Embaſſador from the King of Pont, to intreat the King he would be pleaſed to pardon the inhabitants of this Town, when he had vanquiſhed them, and not to die his victory too deep in blood: He preſently returned this anſwer, That he would pardon any but Rebels. But this laſt ſummons which was ſent into the Town, returned in vain, and the deſperate men made anſwer, That let things go as they would, they had rather dye gloriouſly, than abandon their King, as he had them; nor would they ever have any other Maſter, and by conſequence could deſire nothing but death, ſince there was no other way to get their Liberty. Ciaxares finding their obſtinacy, did not only give orders to Aſſault them, and ſo take them; but do what Artamenes could, he gave orders alſo to put them all to the Sword: The loſs of Six thouſand Men at this Siege was it which moſt incenſed him. As for Philidaſpes, never Man fought better than at this laſt Aſſault: For ſeeing it was ordered that this miſerable Town ſhould be deſtroyed, he helped forward with it as he could; for it was ſome ſatisfaction unto his ambitious jealouſie, to ſee that Town ruined whereof Artamenes was to be Governour: But my Maſter ſaved it as much as poſſible, and at the end of the Combat, did force the King to grant life unto a few which remained, who were conſtrained to receive it againſt their wills. This ſad Victory was very happily gotten, both for Artamenes and Philidaſpes, neither of them having received but one ſlight hurt. Mean while, both love and anger diſturbed the King of Pont's mind: Now he only wants a handſome pretence to begin a War; He ſends to Ciaxares, and much complains of his cruelty towards the Ceraſians. Ciaxares anſwer, That thoſe whom he had puniſhed, were his Subjects and ſuch Subjects as rebelled againſt him more than once; of whom he was not bound to render an account unto any. The King of Pont was pretty well ſatisfied with this tart anſwer, becauſe it furniſhed him with a ſlight occaſion of quarrel: He ſends back to Ciaxares, and tells him, that he would hold Alliance no longer with a Prince, who uſed his own ſubjects ſo ſcurvily, and therefore would from henceforward declare himſelf an enemy. Ciaxares, for all this, knew that he had an infallible expedient to make peace when he pleaſed, ſuch an one as would make him throw his Arms down preſently, and therefore he never complained againſt his procedure: You know, Sir, that this expedient which the King of Cappadocia did mean, was the Marriage of the Princeſs Mandana unto him. But yet notwithſtanding Ciaxares received this meſſage very ſowrly, and anſwered him with as much tartneſs as the Embaſſy was full of Injuſtice. Now ſee how things are more embroyled than before: Ciaxares, whoſe Army was much weakned, retreated towards Aniſa, after he had burnt the Town of Ceraſia, as well to prevent the King of Pont from ever repairing it, as becauſe he would not be put to the neceſſity of leaving a Gariſon in it, as alſo to make it a terrible example of his revenge. Artamenes, leſt the King of Pont ſhould think that this retreat proceeded from any fear, he did intreat Ciaxares that he might ſtay about Ceraſia with Ten Thouſand Foot, and Four Thouſand Horſe, to obſerve the motions of the Enemy; and to let him ſee, that there was no fear of him. Mean while, the King might Recruit his Army out of thoſe Gariſons and Places which were near him, he might quickly make new Levies; and with thoſe Troops which he carried away with him, he might appeaſe that Tumult which was lately riſen, which was not of any deep conſideration: The King approving of Artamenes's Propoſition, conſented unto it, and appointed thoſe Troops which were to remain under conduct of my Maſter. Obſerve here, Sir, the ſtrange and fantaſtical effects which violent Paſſions do produce in that ſoul which is poſſeſſed with them : Philidaſpes, who was abſolutely deſperate to be put upon ſuch a neceſſity, that he muſt obey Artamenes as his Lieutenant-General, and who for many reaſons was to follow the King unto Aniſa, whither he was now upon return : yet notwithſtanding all thoſe occaſions which required him to be about Ciaxares, and notwithſtanding thoſe ſecret grudges to be under command of Artamenes, he did for all that ſollicit Ciaxares to be one of thoſe which ſhould be with Artamenes ; and was ſo very earneſt, that he obtained his deſire ; The Reaſon of his deſire was, becauſe it was an intollerable vexation of ſoul unto him, to ſee Artamenes every day purchaſe new glories and honours, and he no partaker with him ; and becauſe he was abſolutely reſolved to be his inveterate Rival in point of Ambition. The King of Pont underſtanding that his Enemies Army was divided, advanced immediately with all his Forces towards Artamenes. His Army conſiſted of Five and twenty thouſand Men : with them he reſolved to ſwallow up Artamenes, or at leaſt make him retreat to his Maſter at Aniſa : But this inequality of number could not make Artamenes budge a bit. I took the boldneſs to tell him, that there was too much hazard in the Adventure ; but he anſwered me, That there was more hazard if he declined Combat ; ſince by that he ſhould loſe himſelf in the eſteem of his Princeſs. No, no, Chriſantes, ſaid he, the deſigns of my ſoul are all extraordinary, and above common reach : To gain a Battel upon equal terms, is the common glory and fortune of every day, which any paltry Valour may chance to ſtumble upon : But to get a Battel, when in all likelihood it is quite loſt, this is that which Artamenes muſt do if he will hope to preſerve himſelf in Mandana's favour ; and Artamenes muſt ſuffer as Artamenes, or elſe oblige her ſo that ſhe will not hate Cyrus. In concluſion, Sir, He call'd a Council of War ; but though Philidaſpes was of Artamenes his opinion, and would fight it, becauſe he would not ſeem leſs bold than Artamenes ; yet all the reſt of the Captains declined it : But however at this time Prudence muſt give place unto Valour. Notwithſtanding Artamenes was as wary as he could, He poſſeſſed himſelf of all the advantages which the place would afford, and beſtir'd himſelf with as much vigilance and prudence as the greateſt Captain in the World could do. The King of Phrygia and the King of Pont did often fall into the Quarters of Artamenes, but were always beaten off with loſs; and in what Quarter ſoever they lighted, they always found my Maſter in the head, they always were repulſed, and found him invincible. Theſe two Kings did ſet a high value upon him (as we afterwards came to know) for they feared Ciaxares more by reaſon of him, than by reaſon of all his power beſides, whether conſidering him as the Son of the King of Medes, or as King of Cappadocia and Galatia: But, Sir, to make a ſhort Relation; It may truly be ſaid, that Artamenes gave and got three little Battels in a ſhort time: In the firſt he undertook a ſingle Combat with the King of Pont, and gave him a little hurt, and had the better of that bout. In the ſecond the matter was more dubious, Philidaſpes did miraculouſly, and attempted to take the King of Phrygia Priſoner: But in the third there hapned a chance unto Artamenes, which ſaved his life afterwards, as I ſhall tell you in the ſequel of my Diſcourſe, and, indeed, it doth deſerve your knowledg. Then Sir, I ſhall tell you, that it was always the cuſtom of Artamenes, in all Fights that ever he was in, to ſeek out as much as poſſible the principal Commanders of the Enemy: He laboured with all diligence to find out and fight with the King of Pont, as he was the King-Enemy and King-Lover of Mandana. As he was ſearching all about, he ſaw upon his right hand one Knight who defended himſelf againſt fifteen or twenty Cappadocian Soldiers; He went to them, and he knew him to be the King of Pont, who by that number had inevitably been utterly ruined; He went ſtraight to them, and making himſelf known by his voice; Hold, my Companions (ſaid he to them) Kings muſt not be overcome thus, they muſt fight more nobly, and not be oppreſſed by multitudes: Upon his words, the Cavaliers held their hands, and he addreſſing himſelf unto the King of Pont; Valiant Prince (ſaid he, and ſtopt a little) It ſhall be none of my fault but yours, if you do not revenge the blood which I ſpilt, and finiſh that which was the other day begun: Generous Enemy (Replied the King of Pont, going back, and holding up his Sword) It would not be juſt in me to fight againſt my Deliverer; neither will I put you to take that from me which you come to give me; nor will I ever put my ſelf unto ſo much diſhonour, as to kill him who ſaved my Life. But when he ſaw that Artamenes was not pleaſed with his Anſwer, and perhaps would force him to fight, he left him, and mingled ſuddenly amongſt the multitude, whither Artamenes followed, but could not meet with him that day. This paſſage moved both wonder and ſorrow in my Maſter: For conſidering the brave acts which he had ſeen the King of Pont perform, he knew it could be nothing elſe but generoſity of ſoul which moved him to do thus. Alas (ſaid he to me, when he returned at night unto his Tent) what a dangerous Rival have I met with? and how unhappy ſhould I be if Mandana knew him as well as I do? But, O ye gods (ſaid he) that this Prince did but know who he was that would have fought with him, and what the reaſon was which moved me to ſave his Life: He knows not that I ſaved it only to take it away; for he did not look upon me as a Generous Enemy, nor ſuſpect me to be his Rival. But Chriſantes (ſaid he to me) how is it poſſible that ſhe ſhould know him, and hate him? Have not I more cauſe to fear, who am but bare Artamenes, and who am more hated as the Son of the King of Perſia, than as a meer ſtranger? Afterwards, as a ſpark of jealouſie, he commanded me to enquire with all care and wit concerning the original of Pont's love; which I did, and which I eaſily found out, there being none in all Cappadocia which was ignorant of it: I found, that the late King of Pont having a war with the King of Cappadocia, and in concluſion being drawn to terms of Peace, they were to give Hoſtages on both ſides; and that the King of Pont ſent one of his Children with this, who then was not the eldeſt. That within ſix Months after he had been in the Court of Ciaxares, his love took firſt beginning, but durſt not openly profeſs it, becauſe it was not he who was to ſucceed his Father in the Kingdom. That in concluſion, his Father and elder Brother being dead, and he ſucceeding to the Crown, he ſent Ambaſſadors to court the Princeſs by way of marriage, but ſhe was refuſed him upon ſeveral reaſons already mentioned. Artamenes underſtanding this, was ſtrangely diſquieted; for all the vertue, modeſty and ſeverity of Mandana, had much ado to perſwade him, but that this Prince, who was ſo generous, ſo handſome, ſo lovely, ſo amorous, and ſo compleat a man, muſt needs in ſix months time obtain one corner in her heart and affection; yet when he remembred how the Princeſs did cordially rejoice at any Victory obtain'd from this Prince, his fears of it begun to vaniſh and diſpel his inquietudes: but his Soul was not yet at reſt; for (ſaid he) ſince this Prince, who is very handſome, of a good deportment, extraordinary valiant, and full of wit (as they tell me) cannot gain her heart; How can I ever hope to pretend unto it? I, who am a Prince indeed, but dare not tell it; who paſs only for an unfortunate ſtranger, without Eſtate or Countrey. So it was, Sir, that after this third Combat, wherein Artamenes had the better, and Philidaſpes became very eminent, he thought good to refreſh his Troops a little while, eſpecially ſince the King of Pont did the like: During which interval, thoſe Forces for which order was given to be drawn out of ſeveral Gariſons, were come up, his new Levies alſo compleated, and then his Army amounted unto above fifty thouſand men effective; the King of Pont recruited alſo: So that theſe two Enemy-Kings were both ſtrong and able to diſpute the Victory upon equal terms: Artamenes was received both by the King and Princeſs with wonderful applauſe: Philidaſpes alſo was well welcomed, tho much below Artamenes, which drave him into a moſt melancholly mood. During the time they continued at Aniſa, they often waited upon the Princeſs, and commonly both together, which did nothing at all pleaſe Artamenes: How cruel is Philidaſpes (would he expreſs himſelf unto me) to ſteal from me the one half of Mandana's adorable looks, and all the ſweetneſs of her Diſcourſe? For he is ſo continually in her preſence, that though every one did not think him capable of ſuch a high ambition, yet they thought he was in love; Why doth he not hang upon Ciaxares, and ſeek his Fortune that way? Can he not let me alone with the Princeſs? Let him not think that I will ever be his Rival in that Ambition, to become great in the King's favour: If thou thinkeſt I do, alas, thou doſt abuſe thy ſelf: No, no, Philidaſpes, enjoy, and enjoy freely all the wealth of Cappadocia. Be more in the King's favour than ever any, I allow it, but leave Mandana only to me; take ſome other courſe to come unto that which thy Ambition aims at, and trouble not me thus in my freedom of Diſcourſe with her; which to me is a very heaven of joy. I know very well (ſaid he to us) that I dare not yet tell her of my paſſion; for her vertue commands my ſilence; her modeſty and ſeverity forbids me: I have not yet done things great enough to expoſe my ſelf unto ſo great a danger: yet notwithſtanding, I cannot chuſe but deſire moſt earneſtly to entertain diſcourſe with her without any Witneſſes. For my Friends, if ever that happy time once come unto me, none ſhall ever ſhare with me in her favour and lovely looks: I only will enjoy her eyes and thoughts; I ſhould prize this as an infinite happineſs, tho I ſpoke not a word to her of my Paſſion. How do I know but that this Divine Princeſs, who is ſo full of wit and apprehenſion, will, when I am alone with her, perhaps gueſs at that which I would have her know? and common courteſie cauſeth her to divide her mind between Philidaſpes and me: But what is this I ſay? (ſaid he, reprehending himſelf) No, no, it is not yet time to diſcover thy Love, Artamenes; but keep it cloſe, and let none know it: Artamenes is not yet arrived at that Point where he ſhould be: nor hath he ſhare enough in the heart of Mandana to arm himſelf withal againſt her Anger; He muſt firſt oblige her more

by his great Services; and gain more eſteem by his Heroick Acts: force her Inclinations by perpetual complacency: divert her diſpleaſure always if poſſible, and merit her love by as many amorous reſpects as ever Soul was capable of: And then perhaps it will be time to ſpeak unto her upon terms of Love. But alas (added he) if Philidaſpes do continually enjoy her company, how can I have opportunities to do it? In concluſion, he was ſo full of fears, leſt Philidaſpes ſhould be inſpired with Love, as well as Ambition, that thoſe different thoughts troubled him infinitely. Mean while, all the freſh Recruits were come up; and the King, before he advanced againſt his Enemy, who was in the Field ready to preſent him battel, would take a general view of his whole Army: And in order to that, cauſed it to paſs under the Walls of Aniſa, upon which the Princeſs ſtood to behold that Martial Ceremony. Artamenes was that day in very common Arms, although he had very rich ones trimmed up, which none yet ever did ſee; but he ſaid they were not made to be ſeen, and therefore he would not wear them until he had ſeen his Enemies in them: telling Feraulas and me merrily, that Arms were never handſome until they were ſanguin'd with the blood of his Enemies. But although he did not that day rely upon his gallant and handſome deportment, yet notwithſtanding he did excel all the reſt of the Army, even Philidaſpes himſelf, though Philidaſpes was very handſomely proportioned, and that day very proudly trimm'd up in Arms. The Princeſs being then upon the Walls, waited upon by all the Ladies of the Court, and of Aniſa, ſhe viewed the Troops, who after they were paſſed by the King and her, were by the orders of Artamenes drawn up into Battalia, who ſtood in the head of them, and carried himſelf with ſo gallant a grace, that he did with delight attract the eyes of all upon him: It might be ſaid, that all this great body was linked unto him by an inviſible Chain, ſince by the leaſt motion of his hand, or accent of his voice, it moved as he commanded; ſometimes to the Right hand, ſometimes to the Left; ſometimes to the Rear, ſometimes doubling their Ranks, and ſometimes their Files; in ſhort, there was not a very Sergeant in all the Army which underſtood his Office better than Artamenes did. As they were buſied at this brave Exerciſe, the Princeſs diſcovered a far off upon the Plain, one of the King of Pont's Heralds, who was eaſily known by his diſtinguiſhed Habit. When he was come near the firſt Ranks, he was conducted unto the King, of whom he deſired permiſſion to ſpeak unto Artamenes concerning ſomething from the King of Pont; Ciaxares calling him, the Herald addreſſing his Speech unto him, Sir (ſaid he) the King of Pont my Maſter, who eſteems you, and thinks himſelf obliged unto you, and who would not have the Victory, if it be his fortune to get it, imputed unto any baſeneſs of his men, hath ſent me to advertiſe you, that there are forty Knights in his Camp (whom he does not know, for if he did, they ſhould be all puniſhed) who have took a ſolemn Oath, and conſpired againſt your life, to be at the firſt Battel, and not to ſeparate nor ſeek for any but Artamenes, nor fight with any but him, but either to kill him, or periſh themſelves. This is the Conſpiracy, Sir, which the King my Maſter hath enquired out, and which was found in a Paper ſcattered in the Camp, but he cannot diſcover who are the Parties, or who it was that writ it: Therefore, Sir, the King of Pont, and the King of Phrygia, who ſent me to you, to advertiſe you of it, not daring to deſire you, that both for their honour, and your ſafety, you would forbear to fight that day, knowing well that your great Spirit cannot forbear: but they adviſe you at leaſt to wear ſome ſimple unknown Arms that day, to the end theſe baſe men may not eaſily diſtinguiſh you, nor effect their unworthy Deſign. The Herald having delivered his Meſſage, and made low reverence, alſo Artamenes another unto the King, he deſired laeve to anſwer the Herald, which he did moſt civilly, although it did much vex him he ſhould receive ſuch Obligations from his Rival. I am much obliged unto the King, your Maſter, (ſaid he unto the Herald) for the care which he takes in preſerving my life: But to teſtify unto you that I am not altogether unworthy of that honour which he hath done me. I muſt deſire leave of the King, (ſaid he in turning towards Ciaxares) that I ſtay you a little before I give you my Anſwer. Then he whiſpered Feraulas, who was cloſe by him, in the ear, and commanded him ſomething which none underſtood: but it was preſently known; for Feraulas making haſt, and my Maſter's Tent being not far off, we ſaw him return preſently, and followed by a Soldier which carried as a Trophy that magnificent Sute of Arms, which Artamenes had cauſed to be made for himſelf. This ſight ſurpriſed Spectators, and begot a curioſity in the Princeſs: for Feraulas obſerved that ſhe eyed the Arms, and was much aſtoniſhed at them; Certainly, Sir, Artamenes could not make choice of any thing more magnificent, nor more obſervable. They were engraved with gold, and were enamelled with ſuch lively colours as the bow of Heaven had none more glittering: All the Nails were headed with Rubies, intermixed with Emeralds: In the middle of his Buckler was a great Sun, repreſented by Diamonds which dazled all thoſe who beheld it: Upon his Head-piece was an Eagle of Maſſy gold, moſt rich, with her Wings diſplayed, who bending down her Head and holding the Helmet's top in her Beak and Talons, did ſeem to gaze upon the Diamond-Sun whch ſhin'd in the midſt of his Buckler: as who ſhould ſay, that this Sun, which according to Artamenes his device did emblem the Princeſs, did deſerve more regard than that Sun which ſhined in the Heavens. From the Train of this proud Bird did iſſue a Plume of Feathers, admirably well mixt with twenty ſeveral colours: The Hilt of his Sword, the Scabbard, the Belt, the Gauntlet, the Sute of Arms, and all the appurtenances, were ſuitable unto this magnificence, which for the richneſs of the ſubſtance, the excellency of the work, and the admirable variety of colours, nothing could more invite the eye to gaze, than it: As ſoon as they appeared, every one began to ask and deſire to know what Artamenes would do with them. The King lookt upon my Maſter, and ſtept nearer to hear what he would ſay; when Artamenes after a low Congy, and asking leave to anſwer the Herald, Tell thy Maſter (ſaid he to him) that ſince my Arms are good enough to reſiſt his which are ſo dreadful, I ſhall think them therefore good enough, not to fear thoſe gallant Cavaliers who have ſuch a high opinion of their Valour, as that there muſt needs be forty to fight with one: I prethee publiſh throughout all the King of Pont's Camp, that theſe Arms which here thou ſeeſt, ſhall be thoſe which I will wear upon the day of Battel. And aſſure thy Maſter from me (if the King will pleaſe to permit me) that to acknowledge his generoſity in ſome manner, there ſhall none ever aſſault in my preſence, but one to one: nor ſhall his Valour ſink under an oppreſſing multitude, if I be there: The Herald, though aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of Artamenes his Soul, would have anſwered ſomething, but he hindred him: No, no, my Friend (ſaid he) do not oppoſe thy ſelf againſt my Deſign; and be confident, that if the King thy Maſter did but throughly know me, he would not diſallow of what I do. Ciaxares hearing what he ſaid, would have oppoſed him; inſtancing, that it was not wiſdom or juſtice ſo ſlghtly to hazard a life which was ſo conſiderable. My Honour, Sir (replied he) ought to be more precious unto you; therefore I moſt humbly beſeech Your Majeſty, force me not unto any diſobedience: But this (replied Ciaxares) is to no purpoſe; yet he diſmiſſed the Herald without any other Anſwer. When he was gone, and his Arms carried back unto the Tent, Artamenes was not moved at it one jot, though the Advice did ſo nearly concern his life. But Ciaxares had other reſentments of it, and was much perplext, almoſt reſolving not to advance towards the Enemy, fearing to hazard that life which was ſo dear unto him. The Princeſs, who ſaw the Herald come unto the King, and who knew Feraulas, which carried thoſe magnificent Arms, had a great deſire to know the meaning of it; ſo that ſhe ſent one of her Servants to enquire, who met us as we were conducting the Herald out of the Camp, after we had according to the Orders of Artamenes,carried him through the body of the whole Army, my Maſter being deſirous that the Herald ſhould inform the King of Pont in what a gallant condition it was;then we gave him at the parting,according to my Maſter's appointment, a Diamond of a very conſiderable value. This Servant of the Princeſs enquired of us all which he deſired to know, and we told him in few words, relating the generoſity of Artamenes. He was ſo generally loved, that this man ſeem'd to be much troubled at the great danger which my Maſter did expoſe himſelf unto, though he was much joyed to ſee that he turned all the Deſigns of his Enemies unto his honour. He acquainted Mandana with the buſineſs of the King of Pont's Herald, and with Artamenes's Anſwer: We knew afterwards by a Lady whom the Princeſs loved very well, and unto whom Feraulas did afterwards bear a very good will, that the Princeſs did preſently change colour at the news: that it did trouble her extremely, and that ſhe commended Artamenes highly. Philidaſpes, who was alſo cloſe by the King as well as my Maſter,did alſo extol him; but it was alſo out of different reſentments, Anger and Jealouſie: Notwithſtanding I found out this anger and this ambitious jealouſie, which is inſeparable from all thoſe who aſpire unto high reputation. Artamenes had ſome light ſuſpicions that Philidaſpes was in love with the Princeſs; And I think Philidaſpes had no leſs jealouſie of Artamenes: However, both of them tranſact as if they both knew it; and they were poſſeſſed with the ſelf-ſame Paſſions. The Princeſs for her part thought that they were both of them in love with Honour and Glory only, and dreamt not of any ſhare ſhe had either in their hatred or love. Ciaxares queſtionleſs did love them both, becauſe they did both of them highly deſerve it: but with this difference; that his inclination did forcibly compel him to prefer Artamenes before Philidaſpes, altho he had as many obliging engagements to the one as the other. It is very true, that Philidaſpes was much held up by Aribees, who being deſirous to oppoſe this new Favourite Artamenes, did think no way ſo expedient as to make this other young Stranger his Stalking-Horſe, who as well as my Maſter had the advantage of novelty, which is a great charm throughout the World: So that theſe two being in oppoſition to one another, he betwixt them both might better preſerve his own power and credit. Mean time, my Maſter, who let no occaſions of his reſtleſs love eſcape his thoughts, reſented them very deeply when he underſtood how the Princeſs commended the King of Pont's generoſity. How unhappy am I (ſaid he to us at night when he was retired) and how ought I to ſuſpect my Fortune, ſince ſhe uſeth all her art to torment me? O thou too generous Enemy (ſaid he) canſt thou not conſpire againſt my life, without adviſing me to preſerve it in ſuch a cruel manner? Why doſt thou not contrive ſome other way to get the reputation of the World, without making me the Subject of thy deſerving it? But (ſaid he) I am too blame that I do not make my true caſe known unto the King of Pont: It is to abuſe his generoſity, to hide from him that I am his Rival, againſt whom perhaps he would conſpire, if once he knew as much: But alas, dare I diſcover my love unto my Rival, who dare not tell as much unto my Princeſs? and can I endure that the King of Pont ſhould thus load me with obligations, and force me againſt my will to return generoſity for generoſity, and alſo to preſerve that life which I would take from him, which I ſhall infallibly do whenever any honourable occaſion offers it ſelf, unleſs he exchange his Paſſions? Alas, unhappy Prince (ſaid he) that I ſhould lament thee! thee who queſtionleſs doſt eſteem of Artamenes; thou doſt wiſh him engaged in thy ſervice; that he had been born thy Subject, and that he would become thy Creature. But O ye Gods: although he were thy Creature, thy Subject, and thy Brother, yet he would be always thy Rival, and therefore thou ſhouldeſt not wiſh his life ſo much as it ſeems thou doſt: But in the mean time thou preſerv'ſt it, do what I can, if what the Herald doth inform me be true; and certainly I ſhall owe thee my life if I eſcape; ſince if I had not been prepared for it, it would have been impoſſible for me not to fall upon thoſe diſadvantages. Ah Mandana (ſaid he pitifully) incomparable Mandana! do not beſtow all your eſteem upon my Rival: Stay until the end of the Battel, then compare his Actions and mine together, and then diſpence it with equity: yet notwithſtanding, there is a vaſt difference between him and me; for Mandana knows the King of Pont is in love with her, but ſhe is abſolutely ignorant of my Paſſions. May be, Sir, (ſaid I to him) that the knowledge ſhe hath of his Paſſion, is more prejudicial than advantageous unto him: No, no, Chriſantes (ſaid he to me) as ſevere as my Princeſs is, and what rigorous vertue ſoever be in her, it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould deprive love of that privilege, but that all glorious Actions beget a new eſteem in thoſe who know them: yes, Chriſantes, Love is a cauſe of Love; And it is without all doubt, that when ſhe is perſuaded all the Glorious and Heroick Acts which are done, are done for her; if ſhe do not then return love, yet ſhe will at leaſt eſteem, and ſometimes pity; ſo that, Chriſantes, at this very time it may be Mandana doth eſteem and pity my Rival, and perhaps I may have ſome ſhare in her eſteem; but I ſhall have none of that pity; and I am well aſſured, that in all her recompences which ſhe hath conferred upon me, there was not any ingredient of her heart or affection in them; may be ſhe infuſed into them ſuch a mercenary reſpect as belongs to one who hacks out his Fortune by his Valour, and who looks more after recompence than glory; But as for the King of Pont, he cannot be thought to be one of theſe: All his Actions are ſuits for love: the War which he makes with her Father, ſpeaks the violence of his Affection; His generoſity perſuades her he is worthy of hers, and all things argue for him, and againſt me. I ſhould never make an end, Sir, if I ſhould repeat all his words: Nevertheleſs, as he was the next morning to march towards the Enemy, and after he had given order for all things neceſſary for his Voyage, often charging that his Suit of Arms ſhould be ſure not to be forgotten, he waited upon the King unto the Princeſs, to take his leave. Ciaxares did there highly extol him; but after he had done his Commendations, he began to chide him as much for his opinionative reſolution to carry thoſe remarkable Arms: Therefore (ſaid the King unto him moſt affectionately) I am reſolved to preſerve your life, as you preſerved mine; you ſhall ſtay with me upon the day of battel. Sir, (anſwered Artamenes, throwing himſelf at his feet) I am infinitely engaged unto your Majeſty for your goodneſs towards me, but I moſt humbly beſeech you to pardon me, if I do not in this obey you: But I am reſolved to reſerve my ſelf as much as poſſible, ſince it is neither wiſdom nor juſtice to expoſe my ſelf unto the fury of forty at a time, who perhaps may wound me more dangerouſly in conſideration of that ſervice I ſhould do your Majeſty, than they could in conſideration of my ſelf; Then fight in plainer Arms, replied the King: for though you have ſent word otherwiſe, yet you ſent without my conſent, and it is I that muſt be Maſter in my own Affairs, and in my own Army. It is moſt true, Sir, Replied Artamenes; But Generoſity ought to be Maſter of both our Actions, and by conſequence I muſt not do that which redounds unto my own diſhonour. When the King ſaw that Artamenes would not be perſuaded; I will leave you to my Daughter, ſaid he, and turned to the Princeſs, Perſuade him if you can, and I will thank you: At theſe words the King embraced the Princeſs, and went out. She waiting upon him to the door: Artamenes was then obliged to ſtay after him, and as the Princeſs returned from waiting upon her Father, whom ſhe did not part from without tears, Artamenes, unto whom ſhe had given her fair hand, would needs take his leave of her; but ſhe ſtaying him in an inviting manner, Artamenes (ſaid ſhe to him) do you ſo much fear my Prayers, that you will needs be gone ſo haſtily? You are dreadful in all your Actions, Madam, (anſwered my Maſter) and it is my duty to depart from my own generoſity, rather than from you: I have no Deſign (Replied ſhe) to perſuade you out of your Generoſity: but my deſire is, if I could poſſible, to oblige you not to expoſe, without neceſſity, unto danger, a life ſo glorious as yours, and which hath been ſo ſerviceable unto my Father. You know (ſaid ſhe) that reaſon ſhould be the limits of all your Actions. Valour hath its bounds, beyond which, 'tis Raſhneſs rather than right Valour. Madam (ſaid he, interrupting her) it better becomes a man of my age, rather to go beyond thoſe ſtrict limits which your exact wiſdom preſcribes, than to ſtay ſhort of them. The exceſs is always better than the defect. Your Argument is good (replied the Princeſs) but I would have Artamenes be neither too timorous, nor too bold. Madam (ſaid he, interrupting her again) it is not impoſſible but I may regulate my ſelf according to this preciſe mediocrity which you deſire me. But in the choice of theſe two extreams, I moſt humbly beſeech you, give me leave to incline more unto that way in which I may meet with Honour, than the other where Honour never comes: Oftentimes (ſaid the Princeſs, interrupting him) we muſt ſurmount and overcome our ſelves; Yes, Madam, (anſwered Artamenes) We muſt, ſo the Victory do not make us unworthy to conquer others. Mandana then ſaid, I do not deſire of you that you will not fight, but only that you would not wear thoſe remarkable Arms at the firſt Battel. Madam (replied my Maſter) you may command from Artamenes that which is moſt hard for him to part from, without any thought of diſobedience; but for this, he cannot conſent unto your deſire; a Diſguiſe (ſaid he, and bluſht) is allowable in Love, but not in War. In ſhort, Madam (continued he, and ſmil'd) it is far from my Diſpoſition to hide my ſelf from my Enemies, or to render my ſelf leſs remarkable. If I were ſo abſolutely qualified as to merit a Favour from the moſt excellent Princeſs upon Earth, I ſhould then take the boldneſs to beg of Illuſtrious Mandana that glorious and magnificent Scarf which now ſhe wears: and if I had the glory to obtain it, it would be an infallible Preſervative againſt all dangers, and an abſolute certainty of Victory: It would render me invincible, in rendring me more remarkable. Artamenes (Replied the Princeſs, and bluſht her turn) hath all the excellent qualities to deſerve the care of the greateſt Princeſs of the World for his preſervation: And if I were perſuaded that this Scarf, whereof you ſpeak, could preſerve you invulnerable, you ſhall without all doubt eaſily obtain it: But I am ſo far from thinking it will preſerve you, that if I ſhould give it unto you, I ſhould fear my ſelf acceſſary unto your ruine, and that it would invite the Arrows of your Enemies unto your heart, for which end I have not kept it. You are moſt ingenious, Madam (anſwered Artamenes) and can oblige me in denial of it: But, Madam (continued he with a moſt ſerious countenance) I have nothing to ask you; for indeed to deſire that, were to deſire my Enemies ſhould not ſee me, as perhaps ſome of them ſhall not, if my Fortune do not fail me, nor my courage betray me: I am glad (replied the Princeſs) that you have put me in a condition to refuſe you nothing. But Artamenes (continued ſhe) what will you do? I will vanquiſh your Enemies, Madam (anſwered he) and do that which ſhall make you know I have vanquiſhed them; which I could never do, if I ſhould hide my ſelf, as you deſire me.

As they were in this Diſcourſe, in comes Philidaſpes, who came to take his leave of the Princeſs; all three change Colour at once; Philidaſpes for Anger to find my Maſter there; Artamenes for Spite, to be ſo interrupted by him; and the Princeſs for Shame, whereof ſhe could not tell the cauſe. Becauſe it was a good while, ſince the King went out of Mandana's Chamber, therefore he thought fit to leave Philidaſpes with her, whilſt he went to ſeek the King, but it was abſolutely impoſſible for him to ſtir; and thereſore he ſtayed there as long as Philidaſpes. As ſoon then as Philidaſpes entred, the Diſcourſe did alter, as tho there had never been any Expreſſions of Love between Artamenes and Mandana, and as tho ſhe never knew that my Maſter was in Love with her; for that pure and noble Fire, which afterwards did enflame his Heart, his Soul, and all his Faculties, was yet but a little weak Spark; yet Feraulas and I did think (for we were both preſent at this Diſcourſe) that this Arrival of Philidaſpes did a little croſs and anger the Princeſs. He no ſooner came near her, but ſhe ſweetly ſpoke with abundance of civility to him; but how much ſweetneſs ſoever the incomparable Mandana retain'd in her Soul, yet ſhe always appear'd majeſtical, modeſt, and high in her Looks; ſo that my Maſter has often told me, when he was with her, he durſt not ſo much as think upon his Paſſion, much leſs expreſs it; inſomuch, as ſhe made him fear, as well as love her. Philidaſpes and Artamenes, ſtay'd a good while with her, but durſt not openly expreſs the leaſt Shadow of that ſecret Averſion; which they had one of another; and as they were both Strangers to her, ſhe treated them both alike with equal Civilities. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe Artamenes had the Command over Philidaſpes in this Martial Occaſion, and perhaps the Inclination of the Princeſs prompted her, therefore ſhe did more Honour unto Artamenes than to Philidaſpes. As they were ready to depart, Go, generous Strangers, (ſaid ſhe to them) go and be happy, and manage your Lives ſo, in the day of Battel, that I may receive all the particulars of the Victory from your two Mouths; but above all things, have a care of the King. It is to me, Madam, (replied Philidaſpes) whom that Honour belongs; for as for Artamenes, he will have enough to do with his forty Cavaliers; without looking unto any elſe. We ſhall ſee, Madam, at the end of the Battel, (anſwered Artamenes) who it is which beſt acquits himſelf of his Duty; for if I be not miſtaken, it is beſt judging upon the event. I queſtion not, replied the Princeſs, but you will both of you do ſuch things, as will well become Men of great Souls, and high Honour; and I will go to preſent my Prayers unto the Gods, that they will be pleas'd to make you Conquer and Triumph. Upon theſe words ſhe left them both, and went immediately unto the Temple.

Preſently after, the Lieutenant of the Guard came to tell Artamenes and Philidaſpes, that the King Commanded them to haſten unto their Commands; and certainly, it was well this Order came ſo happily; for if their Converſe had continued but a little longer, in the Abſence of the Princeſs, I believe they would have made a Quarrel of it; ſo averſe were their Diſpoſitions when they were together. The reaſon why they were ſo haſtily commanded away, was becauſe the Soldiery was a little in diſorder, and talked very high in a time when it was fit for them to think of Action. They both then went after the King; and the whole Army, which was already upon their March, advanced towards the Enemy, who was not above two days march from thence. I know, Sir, you wonder to hear me tell of ſo many Battels as Artamenes fought, and got in this War. But, Sir, to leſſen your wonder, you muſt know, that there are not many Gariſons or Places of Strength, neither in Bithinia, Galatia, or Cappadocia; ſo that the Victory doth always fall unto him, who can make himſelf Maſter of the Field, which cannot be but by fighting and gaining of Battels. The firſt day of this March, Artamenes was all in a dump; and becauſe I knew it could not be the apprehenſion of this Danger whereof he was forewarned, which could cauſe this reſervedneſs; but I knew that his phantaſtical Paſſions of Love would oftentimes forge Mountains out of Molehills, and make every trivial Accident to be a matter of great Importance, therefore I reſolved to ask him what it was which ſo much troubled his mind; whether it was becauſe the Princeſs denied him the Scarf which he asked; or the denial of any thing elſe, which was leſs advantagious to him? Can the reaſon of it, Chriſantes, (ſaid he) be, becauſe ſhe hath a care of my Life? And thinks this Scarf which is ſo rich and magnificent, will make me more remarked by the Eye of my Enemies? Or, is it not rather, becauſe ſhe thinks me unworthy of it, and becauſe ſhe will not give me any cauſe of complaint; therefore her dexterous Wit hath contrived this obliging pretence to colour her denial? In ſhort, whether do you think it was for Artamenes, or againſt Artamenes, that ſhe refuſed it? And whether muſt I commend, or complain of her for it? Should I be ſad, or be glad at it? Would I could rightly know the thoughts of my Princeſs, that I might regulate mine own accordingly? But, alas, (ſaid he) whatſoever her thoughts are, they are all reaſon, and I have no cauſe to complain; if ſhe refuſed it becauſe ſhe feared ſome fatality in it prejudicial to my Life, it were an unconceiveable favour; and if ſhe refuſed it, becauſe ſhe thought my Quality unworthy of ſuch an Honour, then ſhe hath done only a wrong to Cyrus, but not to Artamenes. But, O ye Gods, (added he) if after the Services which Artamenes hath done her, ſhe refuſed the Scarf unto him, becauſe he was but Artamenes, how can he ever hope ſhe will ever permit him to tell her that he loves her? Or how can he ever hope to be beloved? No, no, ſaid he, let us not conceive ſo cruel a Thought; let us reſent the Princeſs's Refuſal in a more advantageous Senſe, and let us think that what ſhe ſaid, and ſaid ſo ſweetly, was for us, when ſhe did it againſt us; let us not interpret her meaning, and dive too deep into the Secrets of her Divine Soul; let us rather ſuffer our ſelves to be pleaſingly deceived, than endeavour to find out ſo irkſome a truth. After this, Artamenes did ponder upon the Princeſs, her behvaiour unto Philidaſpes, even to the leaſt circumſtance; and tho he perceived that himſelf was much more regarded than he, yet he could have been contented if he had not come in at all; and almoſt wiſht that his Princeſs had no cauſe of Quarrel with him; therefore he chid himſelf for all thoſe fantaſtical Thoughts which his Paſſion caus'd to conceive of her; Her, who as violent as ſhe ſeem'd to be, did yet permit him to follow the Rules of Reaſon. But to be ſhort, Sir, we marked that day: The morrow after, we came within ſight of the Enemies Vanguard; and within the compaſs of two days time we were in readineſs to give Battel unto the Enemy, which both ſides much deſired with equal longings. The King did all he could to hinder Artamenes from wearing thoſe remarkable Arms, but could not prevent him: I never ſaw my Maſter's Countenance ſo pleaſant as that Morning. As for my part, I trembled to think of the danger unto which he expoſed himſelf, for all his Valour which I knew to be in him: Feraulas and I, reſolved to follow him cloſe, as near as the Diſorder and Confuſion of the Fight would permit us, and either preſerve his Life, or loſe our own. Ciaxares did all he could to keep him near him; and when he perceived that there was no perſwaſions would prevail, he committed the Command of the Right Wing of the Army unto Him; and unto Aribees the Left Wing, under whoſe Command he always ordered Philidaſpes. In ſhort, Sir, without any further patticularizing the order of the Battel; it will ſuffice, I tell you, that Artamenes did prodigious Acts; inſomuch as I, who was an eye-witneſs of them, could not conceive them within any compaſs of poſſibility to be done. He performed his Promiſe to the King of Pont's Herald, and wore thoſe magnificent Arms which I told you of; ſo that it was eaſy enough for thoſe Forty Conſpirators to know him, and fall upon him when they found their opportunity. Their Reſolutions were (as ſince we learnt) not to Aſſault him when he was alone by himſelf, but when he was buſily engaged againſt ſome others of their Party; but ſince Artamenes was prepared for them, they could not Act their Deſign. When both Parties were within the Shot of Arrows, which had obſcured the Air with Clouds of them, Feraulas and I, who had no eyes but upon Artamenes, did ſee that he was more oppreſſed with them, than any which were about him; that his Buckler, tho it was covered with a plate of Gold, was very much battered; and that there was ſome likelihood a great number had compacted together, who aimed all at him. But Artamenes without the leaſt aſtoniſhment, or any fear of Danger wherein he was, lifting his Buckler up with his Left Arm, to preſerve himſelf from the Arrows which lite like Hail upon him; and turning unto thoſe about him, Come my Companions, (ſaid he to them) let us go and vanquiſh thoſe which Fight ſo well at a diſtance, and who perhaps will not be ſo Valiant with Swords, as they are with Bows. In ſaying ſo, he led them on;

they follow and fell on with ſo much Courage and Precipitation, that the Enemies Left Wing was diſordered, and thought to call for Quarter; but preſently after they took heart, and the Combat was ſtifly diſputed. Mean while, the forty Conſpirators which were to fa upon Artamenes, did not forget the promiſe which they made unto him who employed them; and it was eaſy to diſtinguiſh him from other Enemies, who had no particular deſign upon his Life. For theſe did always ſhun our Men when they aſſaulted them, and would not engage with any who fell upon them, unleſs my Maſter; ſo, that it is impoſſible he ſhould ever have any reſt, which thoſe who fight in the bloodieſt Battels ſometimes have; for which way ſoever he ſtirred, he was ready to be compaſſed about; if he charged one, then he was preſently beſet with four or five; if he killed one, he brought two more upon him for it; the more he defended himſelf, the harder he was beſet; the more he made them fall, the faſter they came in, and did treble their number, to execute their Plot: Feraulas and I contributed all our force to Fight theſe cruel Enemies, who fell ſo fiercely upon him; yet, if his own Valour had no better befriended him than ours, all our Aſſiſtance had been in vain. But he, Sir, laid about him with wonderful fury, and did things ſo much above imagination, that becauſe they are ſo incredible, I dare hardly relate them. The chief o the Conſpirators was ſo ſubtle, and ſo baſely wicked, the he commanded his Cavaliers to endeavour all they could to kill his Horſe, that ſo he being that way overturned, ſome of their Companions might more eaſil kill him. This Plot took effect twice; The firſt ti I had the good fortune to be near him, and gave hi mine whether he would or no; and I verily believe h would not have accepted of him, if I had not at th ſame time accidentally light upon another, one of h ſide who was next me being killed. But for the ſeco time, I ſaw the Horſe which I gave him, fall dead, a my Maſter recover himſelf from under him, fighti with thoſe that fell upon him, before I could get in his Aſſiſtance; for the Conſpirators had ſo compaſſed me about, that they hindred me. A thouſand to one but he had been kill'd at this bout; yet it was the Will of Heaven to preſerve him, and make him ſo fortunate to kill one of thoſe Conſpirators, whoſe Horſe was an excellent good one; ſo that Artamenes without the loſs of a minute of time, and in ſpight of all their Reſiſtance which oppoſed him, he got upon him, cutting off the Hand of one who had hold of the Bridle, and putting to rout all that durſt reſiſt him. In concluſion, Sir, Artamenes to my knowledg killed and wounded above Thirty, and took many Priſoners beſides, both Conſpirators and others. Mean while, the Enemies Right Wing ſtood out better than their Left; and for all the Valour of Aribees and Philidaſpes, the Victory did coſt them dearer than it did Artamenes; altho they had no particular Enemies to fight againſt, yet in the end they obtain'd it. Ciaxares, for his part, was in the Main body of the Battel, fell upon the Enemy, and quite diſordered them, ſo that the Victory went clearly on his ſide; all was in a mighty Confuſion, the Conquerors purſued the conquered very eagerly; ſome rendred themſelves, and threw away their Arms; others preferred Death before Captivity. In ſhort, the Victory is got, and all by the Valour of Artamenes, who without all queſtion was the principal Cauſe; for I had forgot to tell you, that at the beginning of the Battel, Aribees and Philidaſpes were forced to give Ground a little, by reaſon of the violent Charge of the Enemy, whereof Artamenes being advertiſed, and ſuppoſing himſelf able to deal with the Enemy which he had in hand, without them, ſent Two thouſand Men to the Relief of Aribees and Philidaſpes; which Auxilliary preſerved them from being vanquiſhed, and by conſequence was the very getting of the Victory. In all this great Confuſion, Artamenes, who had received but two ſlight hurts, charged and purſued the Enemy in all places where he ſaw them Rally, or make any Head. As for thoſe who were not in a Condition to make Reſiſtance, never was a Conqueror ſo full of Clemency as he. As he was thus engaged in this purſuit, he diſcovered the King of Pont, whom Philidaſpes did heavily preſs upon with Twelve or Fifteen Men, and had inevitably killed him, if my Maſter, who was followed by Feraulas and me, with two others, had not come in to his reſcue. As ſoon as he came near, ſpeaking as loud as he could, and diſperſing thoſe who aſſiſted Philidaſpes; Generous Prince, (ſaid he to the King of Pont) ſince you are not ſo fortunate as I am, tho you are more Valiant; you would not perhaps ſo happily eſcape from thoſe who ſet upon you, as I have from them who ſet upon me: If I do not keep promiſe with you, it is becauſe you will obſtinately Fight againſt thoſe Men, who are not abſolutely under my Command, the King whom I ſerve being Perſonally in the Army; but either render your ſelf a Priſoner, or elſe Fight with me ſingle, I give you the choice of theſe two. Unto theſe words, which did infinitely raviſh the King of Pont, (and ſurpriſe Philidaſpes) the King of Pont began to reply, juſt when a hundred of his Horſe rallied together, and ſought about for him, and began to Charge them who had compaſſed him about. But the King ſeeing that he could not Fight with Philidaſpes, who would have taken away his Life, unleſs alſo he fought with Artamenes, who preſerved it; went away with as much haſte as he could. This little-lookt for Accident did ſo ſurpriſe Philidaſpes, as you cannot imagine; yet preſently after, when he had recovered his amazement, never thinking to follow the King of Pont, he turned angerly towards Artamenes, and ſharply ſaid unto him, What, will you have none to Triumph but your ſelf? And are you not content with your own Victories, but you muſt alſo rob other Men of theirs? Artamenes looking upon him with a fiery Aſpect, It is ſuch a one, (anſwered he) who makes uſe of the Valour of others to vanquiſh a diſtreſſed Prince abandon'd of his Men, who ought to be reproached with ſtealing a Victory; and not Artamenes, who never imploys any Arm but his own to obtain it; and who leaving all the Plunder of a Field unto the Soldiers, doth ſeldom make them partakers of his Dangers. Thoſe whom Fortune favours, (replied Philidaſpes)

Philidaſpes) need not to call any others to their help. Thoſe who dare truſt unto their own Courage, (anſwered Artamenes) never beg the help of Fortune. I am certain ſhe hath been your Friend, and helped you at this bout, replied Philidaſpes. And certainly ſhe hath forſaken you, (replied Artamenes) that you ſhould thus need the Aſſiſtance of Twelve or Fifteen to deal with one ſingle Prince. It is an eaſy matter for you to vanquiſh, (anſwered Philidaſpes) who never have any to Fight with, but baſe, faint-hearted, and ſimple Antagoniſts. It is an eaſy matter for you to vanquiſh an abandon'd King with a great number; but you would perhaps find it a harder matter (added he, and raiſed his Voice) to vanquiſh Artamenes ſingle, whenſoever you ſhall give him an occaſion to Fight with you; for he deſires it, and it ſhall be to morrow Morning if you pleaſe. Let us not ſtay ſo long, (replied Philidaſpes) then he ſtood upon his Guard, ready to receive Artamenes, who came moſt fiercely upon him, and gave a furious Blow, which doubtleſs had deeply wounded him, if his hand had not turned, and the Sword glided upon his Arms. To be ſhort, they both of them felt the weight of each others Blows, and the ſtrength of their Arms, do what we could, who endeavoured to part them; but here, Sir, I beſeech you, admire what Virtue and true Valour can do; we were but only Four which follow'd Artamenes, and they were Twelve or Fifteen which followed Philidaſpes, who when they ſaw the diſpute that was between them, tho they took his part againſt the King of Pont, yet they would not do ſo againſt my Maſter, but turned on his ſide. At this very time, Ciaxares, followed by a great number of Men, did draw near us, and cauſed theſe two furious Combatants to give over, and ſuſpend their Choller. What Demon-enemy unto my Glory (ſaid Ciaxares) would ruin theſe who have made me Victorious? And why would ye do that your ſelves, which Fifty thouſand Men could not do? After theſe words, he asked what was the ground of their Quarrel; and when he underſtood it, he chid Philidaſpes very much for drawing his Sword againſt one who had the Command over him; and he did a little blame my Maſter, for ſo ſaving the King of Pont. Sir, (ſaid Artamenes to him) I will engage my ſelf, to repair this Fault by ſome way that is more honourable; and I will promiſe you to bring you this Illuſtrious Priſoner before the War be ended, or elſe Periſh in the Attempt: Did I not promiſe in Your Majeſties preſence, that I would not ſuffer him to be vanquiſh'd by any numerous Multitude? And I did but keep my word with him. If the King had not come,----- (replied the deſperate Philidaſpes) you might perhaps have been puniſhed, (Then added my Maſter, interrupting him) for your Boldneſs and Raſhneſs. The King impoſed Silence upon them both, and by Virtue of his Sovereign Authority, agreed them upon the place, and cauſed them to Embrace one another before him.

In concluſion, a Retreat being ſounded, they Encamped upon the Field of Battel, and every one returned into his Tent, and Artamenes thought upon his; Feraulas, who had been wounded, did the ſame: As fo me, who had eſcaped more happily than they, I found my ſelf in a Condition to do them both Service. The King came to viſit Artamenes at Night; who not being able to contain his Joy, that my Maſter had eſcaped ſ dangerous an Adventure, he expreſſed all the ſigns tha poſſibly could be, of a moſt dear and tender Affectio towards him. He ſent immediately unto the Princeſ his fair Daughter, to acquaint her with the Victor and Preſervation of Artamenes; and my Maſter (as yo may very well believe) did receive this Honour fro the King with much Joy and Reverence. All th while, tho Artamenes and Philidaſpes were good Frien from the Face outward, yet they were not ſo at t Heart; and it may eaſily be conjectured, that this l Adventure did ſharpen their Spirits; it begot phan ſtical Reſentments in both their Souls. For, Sir, diſguiſe the matter no longer; Philidaſpes, whom Maſter thought to be only an ambitious Man, did lo

the Princeſs as well as he; and this is the reaſon why he was ſo hot againſt the King of Pont; looking more upon him as a Lover of Mandana, than as an Enemy unto Ciaxares. Neverthleſs he drew ſome reſt unto himſelf out of this Accident; for conſidering how generouſly Artamenes had preſerved the King of Pont's Life, he could not ſo much as ſuſpect my Maſter to be his Rival; thinking it a thing impoſſible in ſuch a caſe to be a Rival, and ſo generous both. As for Artamenes, his thoughts ran quite contrary concerning Philidaſpes; for his Suſpicion of his Love to the Princeſs, was by this days accident more augmented than ever. How, is it poſſible, (ſaid he to us at Night, after Ciaxares was gone out of the Tent) that Philidaſpes, who cannot harbour any particular hatred of the King of Pont, unleſs, becauſe he is his Rival, ſhould offer to kill him, as he was about to do? That Prince, I ſay, who ſeems to be of a brave and generous Soul, and is inſpired with a gallant deſire of Glory? Ah: No, no, Chriſantes, (ſaid he to me) Philidaſpes loves Mandana, if I be not the moſt deceived Man in the World. Thus, Sir, you ſee, that one and the ſame Action produces different effects; for Philidaſpes did think that Artamenes did not love Mandana, becauſe he ſaved the Life of the King of Pont; and on the contrary, Artamenes thought that Philidaſpes did love her, becauſe he did endeavour to kill him in a manner ſo diſhonourably. Yet notwithſtanding this, all theſe diverſities of Opinions were ſo dubious, ſo uncertain, and grounded only upon weak Conjectures, that they could not aſſure themſelves of any truth; but they entertained an inveterate Averſion one againſt the other. However, ſome two or three days after the Battel, Ciaxares held a Councel of War, to conſult whether or no they ſhould purſue their Enemies, who were retreated, and who waited for a puiſſant Recruit: And to amaze them the more, it was reſolv'd to divide the Army, and ſend one part of it to beſiege a ſtrong Fort in Bythinia, which was ſeated upon a great Lake; by this means to divert and impede thoſe Forces which the Enemy expected: Mean while, the moſt conſiderable ſiderable part of the Army, to ſtay and wait upon that part of the Enemy which had Rallied, and to act according as they ſhall ſee cauſe. Things being thus reſolved upon, Ciaxares, who did find himſelf not well, returned to Amiſa, and left Artamenes Lieutenant-General of the Army which was to keep the Field: Aribees followed him, and ſent Philidaſpes with the reſt of the Troops to beſiege that Town whereof I ſpoke before. The capricious Humour of theſe two Rivals, would not ſuffer either of them to be contented with their Employment. Philidaſpes ſaw that Artamenes being in a condition, wherein he might Fight with the King of Pont, had therefore the Advantage of him. And Artamenes thought that the gaining of ſuch a conſiderable Town, was more advantage than gaining a Battel; for ſaid he, after the taking the Town, he is got into a Place of great Importance; whereas, after the winning of a Battel, the Conqueror gets nothing but a bare empty Field, without any other benefit of the vanquiſhed. But at laſt, they muſt be content; Philidaſpes departs with Sixteen thouſand Men, and Artamenes ſtays with Thirty thouſand; the King reſerved no more with him, than what was neceſſary for his Guard. My Maſter had received ſuch ſlight hurts, that he kept his Bed but one day. Theſe two Rivals taking their leaves of one another in the preſence of the King, did in appearance wiſh all good Fortune one to another, but inwardly with a counterfeit hate.

The next morning, the King removed, and left the command of the Army unto Artamenes, in ſpite of all the ſollicitations of Aribees to the contrary. There were two Priſoners which were taken in the Fight, one of them was much wounded, and deſired to ſpeak with Artamenes concerning ſome buſineſs of Importance: My Maſter being told of it, went preſently unto their Tent; ſuppoſing it might perhaps be ſomething which might be ſerviceable to the King: when he was entred, the wounded man ſpoke firſt; Sir, ſaid he unto him, Since you have beſtowed upon me ſuch demonſtrative marks of Valour, by thoſe wounds which I have received from your hand, I will give you a full ſubject for your Juſtice, or for your Clemency: Thoſe are two Virtues, replied my Maſter, in the choice of which there is no danger of being deceived; yet my nature being ever more inclinable unto Indulgence than Rigour, you may almoſt be certain which of them I ſhall chuſe and follow: Sir, (ſaid he which was not wounded) that which my Brother would ſay, and which becauſe he is very weak, I will ſay for him, will ſhew you ſufficiently which you will follow, and juſtify all the rigour which you can deviſe againſt us; for indeed, Sir (continued he, and caſt himſelf at his feet) we are vile, wicked men, whom our knowledge of your Virtue hath made virtuous, and in love with your Glory, and who by conſequence do hate our Lives, until we have by ſome poor ſervice made a little ſatisfaction for that evil we would have done you. Artamenes hearing theſe men ſay ſo, knew not what to think; at laſt, he which was wounded, began to ſpeak, and with much pain, tell him thus: Sir, not to hold you any longer in ſuſpence; and to teſtify we are really penitent for our Crime, ſince we diſcover it our ſelves; know, Sir, that my Brother and I were two of thoſe forty Cavaliers, who conſpired againſt your Life, and who did ſet upon you with ſo much baſeneſs in the laſt Battel. Alas! my Friends (ſaid Artamenes, interrupting him which ſpoke, and looking upon them both without any anger) What moved you to do ſo? and what moves you to do thus? Why would you then deſtroy me? and why would you now ſave me? how dare you expoſe your ſelves unto the will of a juſtly incenſed Conqueror? Sir, (replied that Conſpirator) we would have deſtroyed you, becauſe we were unfortunate men, with whom hopes of Recompence was more prevalent, than true love of Honour. But now, Sir, your illuſtrious Example has better taught us, and we do prefer one act of Virtue before all the Grandure of the Earth; and therefore it is, that we had rather hazard our Lives in diſcovering our fault, than conceal from you, how the chief Author of that Conſpiracy is now unknown in your power; and if he ſhould chance to be exchanged or delivered amongſt other Priſoners, perhaps he would act worſe than before, and attempt againſt the moſt Noble Life living upon Earth: How, ſaid Artamenes, the chief Author of the Conſpiracy in my Hands! Who may this man be, whom certainly I never offended ſo much as to hate me; and who hates me ſo much as he prefers the death of his Enemy before his own Honour? It is Artanus, Sir (replied they both together:) Is it Artanus (replied my Maſter?) Yes, Sir, ſaid one of them; it was indeed Artanus, who contrived that Note which was found in the King of Pont's Camp, and engaged us amongſt the forty Conſpirators, who were to fight againſt none but Artamenes, and kill none but him: And that man who ſpake unto us from him, and ſhould have given that Note back unto him, did loſe it amongſt the Tents; ſo that it being carried unto the King, he cauſed this information to be given of it. But ſince neither Artanus, nor any of the Conſpirators were named in the Writing, nor known unto any, nor could he diſcover the Author, or any of his Complices, therefore he ſent to advertiſe you of it, but was not able to remedy it by the puniſhment of them, becauſe he knew not who they were. Believe it, Sir, it was Artanus who ſuborned us; it is he who is in deſpair, and aſhamed of what he would have done, and that he ſhould be overcome by you in a manner ſo ſhameful unto himſelf, and ſo prejudicial unto the Love which he bears unto the Princeſs of Pont, in affection to whom he is deeply engaged. To get himſelf into this Princeſs favour, he came diſguiſed into the Army: where not doubting, but by that Party which he had prepared, he ſhould kill you, he intended to ſhew himſelf, after the Battel, with your Arms; and if I durſt ſpeak it, with your Head in his Hands, to the end the King of Pont might take him into favour, becauſe he had got the Victory over the moſt valiant of his Enemies. But, Sir, the Juſtice of the Gods, and your Valour, has prevented him: and now, Sir, you may diſpoſe of our Fortunes, and our Lives, as you pleaſe. If your Wounds be not dangerous (anſwered Artamenes, looking upon him which was in bed) bed) you may have time to repair your fault by ſome generous Act: for I cannot puniſh thoſe who repent, nor revenge my ſelf upon thoſe who are not in a condition to defend themſeves. Ah, Sir, ſaid theſe two men (the one holding up his hands, and the other kneeling) againſt what Man, or rather againſt what God have we been ſuborned? Againſt a Man who fears the Gods (replied my Maſter) taking the one of them up with one hand, and holding out the other unto his Brother; and one who does prefer death before the leaſt injuſtice, or the leaſt baſeneſs; And therefore (continued he) I will forget that Crime which the unhappineſs of your condition cauſed you to commit; and becauſe I will recompence you for your Repentance,and for the good ſervice you have done, in telling me the Author of your Crime is in my power, I will give you your lives, and promiſe you liberty, which otherwiſe ſhould not have been without ranſom. Oh, Sir, ſaid they, command any thing, and be obeyed; for what doth not thoſe men owe, who have life given them when they deſerved death? I command then (replied Artamenes) that before you be ſet at liberty, you ſolemnly ſwear, that for no conſideration whatſoever you will ever employ your Valour againſt any, as you did againſt me: and that you will not diſhonour your Lives, nor your noble Profeſſion, by any ignoble Actions; Fight againſt me like valiant Soldiers, as an Enemy unto your King, and do what you can to overcome me; for I promiſe not to refuſe the meaſuring of my Sword with either of you; or fall on me both together, if you have ſo good an eſteem of me, that you dare not do it ſingle; but do not ſell the blood and the life of any one; nor endeavour to gain by Infamy. O Sir, ſaid they, interrupting him, we will rather run our Swords through our own hearts, than ever draw them againſt you, nor ever imploy them in any unworthy Action: After this, Artamenes did make very much of them; and having learnt who it was which kept Artanus Priſoner, who conceal'd himſelf as much as he could, he commanded him to be brought into the Tent where theſe two Cavaliers were:

as ſoon as he was come thither, and ſaw him there, then he thought he was diſcovered, and therefore not ſtaying till Artamenes ſpoke to him, or mentioned his Crime, I know (ſaid he) that thoſe Traytors whom I ſee, who though they had not power to reſiſt my Promiſes, have yet the perfidy to accuſe me, therefore I will not go about to deny that whereof they may eaſily convince me. But, Sir (ſaid he to him in a moſt ſuppliant manner, and in whom fear of death did plainly appear) what would you have a man do, who in loſing his Honour, hath loſt his Reaſon, but to cover one Crime with another, and find his own life in your death? I know this is but an ill Argument; but ſince I have no other, I muſt addreſs my ſelf unto Clemency, and ask pardon, ſince I cannot ask Juſtice, but I muſt ask Puniſhment with it. This, this is a ſtrange kind of fearing ignominy, (anſwered Artamenes) that you ſhould diſhonour your ſelf for fear of being diſhonoured: No, no, Artanus, your Paſſion hath made you extravagant: and this courſe which you take, is not the way unto Honour. I think that I know a little better than you, how to find out the paths which leads unto it; therefore let me be your Guide, and tell you without any anger or reproach, That the way to forget your former faults, is not to commit new ones. If you have any intention to blot out of the memory of men any act which perhaps is ignominious, you muſt repair it by a hundred acts of Virtue and Honour; not fall from worſe to worſe: therefore Artanus, I intend to ſend you unto the King your Maſter; At thoſe words Artanus changed colour, and it plainly appeared that he had rather ſtay in the hands of him whoſe life he had attempted againſt, than return unto the King of Pont: ſo that Artamenes obſerving it, Fear not Artanus (ſaid he) but that if I ſend you, I will ſend ſecurity of your life with you: If I had a mind to ruine you, I ſhould not need to ſend you any whither to be puniſht. If I may gueſs at what will be hereafter, by what hath already been, I find but ſmall hopes of your goodneſs; and if I may judge you by your preſent looks, it is eaſie to ſee in your eyes, and in your way of proceeding, that your heart harbours much anger and fear; but yet for all that, Artanus is no more terrible unto me living, than if he were dead: Therefore I will forget what's paſt; I will commit the future unto the Gods, and behave my ſelf for the preſent like a man of Courage; Do you ſo too, Artanus, if you be wiſe. In concluſion, Sir, after much diſcourſe together, Artamenes ſent Artanus unto the King of Pont, and would never have diſcovered the Crime of the man, if it had not been always dangerous for Kings to keep ſuch wicked wretches about them, without the knowledge of it: but he intreated him to be contented with the knowledge of Artanus, without puniſhing him; ordering the Herald, whom he commanded to conduct him, that he ſhould not leave the King of Pont until he had engaged his promiſe not to puniſh him: Artanus, who in ſpight of all his malice, could not chuſe but ſee the moderation of Artamenes, yet could not chuſe but complain of his hard fortune, which made him find ſo much rigour in the clemency of his Enemy; ſince in giving him life and liberty, he gave him ſhame and confuſion alſo, in ſending him unto the King of Pont, and ſpoiling his reputation in the eſteem of his Princeſs, whom he loved. As for theſe two Cavalier Priſoners, after Artamenes had given them their liberty, they beſeech him not to ſend them unto the King of Pont, their Maſter, but let them hide their Infamy in ſome far-off Country. Artamenes, who judged that perhaps theſe men might fear the revenge of Artanus, who was a man of ſome quality in his own Country, did conſent unto their deſires, as ſoon as he which was wounded was recovered; gratifying them with great rewards at departure. When this Act was made known unto the Princeſs, ſhe did extremely commend him for it, as well as the King of Pont, when Artanus came home; ſo that my Maſter had the commendations both of his Rival and his Miſtreſs at one time. It is true, the Prince was ignorant that he whom he ſo much extolled, was the greateſt Obſtacle in the World unto his Deſigns; and the Princeſs was alſo ignorant of his being her Adorer. We underſtood, Sir, by the Herald's return, how the King of Pont had much ado to reſolve whether or no he ſhould ſuffer Artanus to live; But the Herald obſerving my Maſter's command, not to leave him until he had obtained the King's promiſe to let him live; the King did at laſt promiſe not to puniſh him, upon condition he ſhould never come into his preſence, but for ever go out of his Dominions. During all theſe paſſages, Artamenes never diſpatched any Meſſenger to Ciaxares, but he preſented his Complements unto the Princeſs: And the Princeſs never ſaw any come from the Camp unto Aniſa, but was very inquiſitive how he did, and was much pleaſed to hear all the wonders of his life related.

To ſum up all in few words; It may juſtly be ſaid of Artamenes, that whatſoever he did, was excellently done. And I remember at that time there was an old Cappadocian Captain who was quartered in Galatia, and had committed ſome diſorder in his Lodging, whereof the Inhabitants came to complain; Artamenes knowing him a very ſerviceable Soldier, and had lived long in Arms, deſired to give him ſuch a check as ſhould correct him, but not incenſe him; thinking it fit to have ſome reſpect unto an old Officer, who had been ſo much longer in Arms than himſelf; Therefore he ſent him this Meſſage in a piece of Paper, That he conjured him not to force a young Soldier to take ſo much boldneſs upon him as to chide and chaſtiſe an old Captain. I relate this paſſage, Sir, to the end you may know the judgment and moderation of my Maſter, and that you ſhould not wonder to underſtand, that though he was a ſtranger, yet he ſo demeaned himſelf, as he was as much feared, loved and obeyed, as if he were a Cappadocian born, and one of the moſt illuſtrious Families amongſt them.

Mean while, the King of Pont having received great Auxiliaries from Phrygia, and ſo recruited his Army, that he was in a condition to undertake both Artamenes and Philidaſpes at one time if he had pleaſed: But yet he thought it more expedient to offer fight with Artamenes before he divided his Forces, becauſe then he would be more numerous than my Maſter, intending to relieve that Town which Philidaſpes beſieged, (and which was well provided with all things neceſſary to endure it) after he had gotten the better of the day, as he hoped to do. But ſince he was ſo much in love with the Valour of Artamenes, and owed him his life, He would in ſome way or other requite it. The King of Phrygia and he did ſtudy how to find out ſome extraordinary courſe to be diſengaged from thoſe Obligations wherein he had fettered them, and not to be ſo perpetually overcome as well by his Virtue as his Valour: They fixed upon a ſtrange and new Reſolution. 'Tis very true the King of Pont, who was really generous, was concerned in it: For although he knew that Artamenes did not ſo much as ſuſpect his generoſity in that buſineſs of the forty Conſpirators; yet ſince Artanus was Baniſhed, ſome ill-meaning minds, or perhaps Artanus himſelf, would forge a falſe report, That the Author of that Conſpiracy is not yet known; and will tacitly give it out, as if the King of Pont, although he did advertiſe Artamenes of it, yet was the Author of it; and that his generoſity in ſending unto Artamanes, was a meer ſubtilty: This Prince therefore did deſire to juſtify himſelf from any ſuch ſcandalous reports; and in order to that, the two Kings cauſed this command to be publiſhed throughout all the Army, exacting ſtrict obedience, That none whoſoever ſhould uſe any Bows, Arrows, Slings, Darts, Javelins, or any far-off Engines, againſt Artamenes, whoſe Arms were ſo remarkable, that none could miſtake him: and to uſe no other weapon but Sword only againſt him, and not to fight againſt him but only one to one, as much as the confuſion of the Battel would permit, leſt ſo gallant a Man as he ſhould dye by the hand of a Coward, who might kill him at a diſtance with an Arrow, or leaſt he ſhould be ruined by a multitude, as Artanus attempted: They conceived this Act would redound unto the glory of their Nation; they thereby teſtifying unto the World, that they cared not for Victory upon baſe diſadvantages. The day after the publication of this Order, Artamenes (who truſted unto none but himſelf in all matters of importance, and who was ſo able, ſo vigilant, and capable of every thing, (if I may ſay it) as he took upon himſelf the charge of the whole Army, and tranſacted ſucceſſively) cauſed a party to go out with him, and face the Enemy. The King of Pont being advertiſed of it by his Spies, ſent the like number to beat off thoſe who approached ſo near them: But Artamenes wondred that he was not covered with Clouds of Arrows as he uſed to be, and far from being compaſſed about by multitudes; for he never had but one at one time upon him; he himſelf aſſaulted many, but he was never aſſaulted by more than one at once: This accident did a while aſtoniſh him, for things were not wont to go ſo; yet in the heat of Action he reflected but ſlightly upon it, nor thought of any thing but getting the Victory. In concluſion, a great part of the Enemy was cut off, many took Priſoners, and the reſt ſaved themſelves by flight in the diſorder of the Battel. Artamenes being returned to the Camp, the Priſoners which were taken, hoping to be uſed better for it, did publiſh the generoſity of their King, and the prohibition which he ordained concerning my Maſter. The Soldiers hearing ſo unuſual a procedure, and Artamenes coming to the knowledg of it, he cauſed all the Priſoners to be preſently ſet at liberty, deſiring them to tell the King their Maſter, that he ſhould preſently ſee he was not altogether unworthy of that honour which he had done him. I was by him when this happened; and he was no ſooner got by himſelf, but looking upon me with admiration, Chriſantes (ſaid he to me) what odd fortune is this, to have a Rival who overloads me with ſo many favours, and ſo much generoſity, that I am almoſt forced to hate him? Such an one as by his good intentions unto me, drives me into a ſtrange deſpair! Doubtleſs he thinks to purchaſe the Princeſs eſteem by this way, and ſeeks more after publick acclamations than victory; Oh, if it be ſo, ſaid he, how much more terrible is he to me when he preſerves my life, than when he aſſaults me to take it away? No, no, too generous Rival (ſaid this amorous Prince) I will not ſuffer thee to ſurmount me in virtue; and I am reſolved to diſpute with thee more ſtifly for the eſteem of Mandana, than ever I contended with thee for victory in the head of an Army: Yes, Chriſantes (ſaid he, and lookt upon me) my Princeſs ſhall never ſay that the King of Pont hath done any brave act, but ſhe ſhall ſay that Artamenes hath done another as Heroick; at leaſt, I will make ſuch a Combat in the ſecret of Mandanaes heart, as he ſhall not with juſtice overcome me, unleſs the inclination of my Princeſs be byaſſed by leaning more unto his ſide, and ſurmount me that way more than by his own merit: After this, Sir, I would have ſaid ſomething, but he would not hear me. The next morning he held a Council of War, and according to the order thereof, it was thought beſt he ſhould impede the enemy from attempting to raiſe the Siege which Philidaſpes attended upon, in caſe there were any intentions of the Enemy diſcovered to take that courſe; yet he could not reſolve to contribute ſo much unto the glory of Philidaſpes, nor leave the King of Pont ſo long in the advantage of his high generoſity; Therefore he ſo wrought with all the Captains of his Army by that winning eloquence which nature and education had given him in the Greek Language, as they were all reſolved to force the Enemy unto Battel, as himſelf intended: Judge, Sir, whether it were a hard matter to make two Enemies meet which ſought one another; therefore it was not long before Artamenes had his deſired ſatisfaction: But here you may wonder, Sir, at what the deſire of glory can do in a ſoul that is truly generous. Artamenes, who upon the King of Pont's notice concerning the conſpiracy againſt his life, had choſen the moſt glorious Arms that the World could make, to the end he might better be known to them who ſought for him in the laſt Battel, and who now thought that all who knew him by thoſe Arms would not fight againſt him neither with Bow, Arrow, Javelin or Dart, nor fall upon him ſingle; he therefore left off thoſe gallant Arms, to the end he might not be known: Thus did he endeavour to ſhew unto the World that none ſhould conquer him in point of generoſity: Sir, ſaid I unto him (in the morning when he was putting on his Arms) will you hide all your gallant Acts in ſuch obſcure Arms as theſe? It is fit I ſhould, Chriſantes (ſaid he unto me) at this time, if I will ſhew my ſelf worthy of that Honour that is done me: But Sir, (ſaid I) is it not to be feared that it will take away the hearts of your Soldiers, when they cannot diſtinguiſh you from that great number who are Armed as you are? If they follow me (anſwered he) they cannot chuſe but know me; and I intend to behave my ſelf ſo, as it may be they ſhall eaſily find me: At laſt, Sir, they fought, and Artamenes did ſuch things as are not imaginable. Until now he fought but like a valiant Man; but at this time it might very well be ſaid, he fought like an incenſed God: one would have thought he knew himſelf incapable of Wounds, ſeeing how he adventured himſelf. He drove their Squadrons on heaps, he broke their Ranks, and charged through and through their beſt compoſed Bodies; nothing could reſiſt him. In concluſion, he carried the matter ſo prodigiouſly, as he made both his friends and his enemies know him, notwithſtanding his ſimple Arms, which were all ſanguin'd with the blood which he had loſt; and which running upon his Curace, made him moſt terrible to look upon: His Buckler was all mangled with Arrows which fell upon it. The King of Pont meeting him in this condition, and eaſily knowing him; It is not my fault, Generous Artamenes, (cried he aloud unto him) ſince I have done what was fit to preſerve your Life: Nor is it my fault (anſwered Artamenes) that your Valour does not receive an advantage in my defeat, ſince I do all I can to make you Glorious; and do not ſpare a Life, which perhaps is more ways than one an obſtacle unto your victory and happineſs. But valiant Prince, ſaid he, we have contended long enough upon points of Generoſity; Let us now try if we can fight as well as acknowledg a benefit; for I am much deceived, if we can otherwiſe overcome one another without diſhonour. Upon theſe words the King of Pont would have replied ſomething, but Artamenes making ſigns that he had rather fight than talk, did advance towards him; and then theſe two Gallant Men began a Combate, which perhaps had been very fatal to them both, if night and darkneſs had not againſt both their wills parted them, and by conſequence had not left both their general and particular victories in doubt: yet notwithſtanding the advantage did fall upon Artamenes ſide; for he loſt few Men, killed many, and took many Priſoners: But ſince the Combate was not ended when night came on, and ſince both of them remained upon the field in their Arms, it was difficult to ſay abſolutely which ſide was loſer, or which a gainer; yet it was partly a cauſe of taking the Town which Philidaſpes beſieged; becauſe that after this, the King of Pont's Army was not ſtrong enough to be divided, nor venture to ſuccour that Town, and come between both our Armies. The next morning Artamenes having intelligence, that two thouſand men were upon the way on the Mountains which bordered upon that Plain betwixt Aniſa and Ceraſia, conducting Money unto the King of Pont's Army for payment of his Soldiers; he went to give a ſtop unto this Convoy: ſo that meeting with them, he forced them into a Valley environed with inacceſſible Rocks, to ſhelter themſelves; who ſeeing themſelves brought into that ſtrait condition, conſulted what they ſhould do; ſince if they fought, they were loſt; and if they ſtaid there, it would be a loſs unto their Maſter: ſo that to ſave themſelves, and be rid of that ill condition, they beat a Parley, and ſent twelve of their Company unto Artamenes, with their Bucklers full of Gold and Silver, entreating him to accept of that for their ranſome, and let them depart. Artamenes, who was always more Heroick in all his Actions, than they could imagine, told them, that he would freely give them their lives and liberty, and alſo ſuffer them to paſs with their Gold and Silver, ſo they would leave their Bucklers which held it, behind them, as marks of his Victory: But theſe ſtout and couragious Soldiers, throwing down all that was in their Bucklers upon the Earth, and putting them upon their left Arms, taking their Swords in their right, You ſhall ſee (ſaid they, turning away towards their Companions) that our Nation never uſe to leave their Bucklers but with their lives; and may be (what inequality ſoever there is between us) you ſhall never get them without danger of your own. Artamenes ſeeing the Soldiers carry it out ſo very bravely, was ſo charmed with a generous envy, as he could not reſiſt them: And when he conſidered that he had got this advantage without honour, becauſe he got it without danger; and that as the ſtate of things were, an addition of Two thouſand Men could not much alter the caſe: And ſeeing theſe Twelve Soldiers go away in ſuch a gallant reſolution, Valiant Men (cried he to them) come again, and take both your Money, your Lives and your Liberties, which you ſo well deſerve: you have overcome me, my Companions, ſaid he to them, and if you had been in the laſt Battel, the King your Maſter had defeated us. Theſe Soldiers were as much ſurpris'd with his Generoſity, as he was with theirs, and knew not whether they ſhould give any credit to his words: But at laſt they believed, and having acquainted their Captains with it, all ſhouted for joy and wonder, and made all the Rocks round about ring with the Name of Artamenes and his Glory. Thus were theſe Gallant Men releaſed out of the Valley which encloſed them; who when they came unto their Camp, did publiſh the Generoſity of my Maſter's Name, for which the King of Pont ſent a Trumpeter to thank him moſt heartily for his civility. But Sir, I never conſider, how I abuſe your Patience, nor how long thoſe Paſſions which I reſent for Artamenes, have kept me; therefore let me reflect if you pleaſe upon the moſt important things of my Maſter's ſtory. Winter drawing on when this laſt Battel was fought, and the Town which Philidaſpes beſieged, being preſently after taken, where Philidaſpes behaved himſelf like a Man of great Gallantry and Prudence, and Ciaxares having had ſuch happy ſucceſs within the compaſs of eight Months, he called off Artamenes and Philidaſpes, who after they had ſetled all their Troops in their Winter-Quarters, and ſeen their Enemy do the like, did come unto the King, who now returned unto Sinope. I need not tell you, Sir, how Artamenes and Philidaſpes were entertained by the King and the Princeſs: for you may be aſſured that it was with as much civility and joy as their great Services could deſerve. As they were diſpoſed when they took their leaves of the Princeſs, ſo they were the very ſame at their return; the firſt time that they ſaw Mandana at her Chamber,(there they met) It ſeemed by Feraulas who was there, and well recovered of his wounds, that the Princeſs was diſpleaſed and angry; yet ſhe ſhewed nothing but ſuch charms as were able to captivate the hearts of moſt rebellious Lovers; She diverted her Diſcourſe after ſuch an ingenious manner by her ſweet complacence, which had nothing of affectation in it, that ſhe gave them no occaſion to renew thoſe differences which paſſed between them in the laſt Battel, of which the Princeſs was not ignorant. When you took your leaves of me (ſaid ſhe to them) I remember that I entreated you to look unto your ſelves ſo well, as I might from your own mouths receive the particulars of the Victory; but now I will ſpare you that labour; for I have ſuch an indiſpoſition unto War, that I do not love much to diſcourſe of thoſe glorious advantages which my Father hath obtained by your Valour: Never fear that I am ignorant of them, or that I will ever forget them. Fame doth court and love Artamenes ſo much, and doth not hate Philidaſpes, that the leaſt of your actions muſt needs be publiſhed: My ſoul is more ingenuous than to loſe the memory of benefits. But truly I do much affect peace; the calm and quiet Virtues do much better agree with my inclination, than theſe lofty proud ones. That Prince then (replied Artamenes) would be very unhappy, who hath a particular aim to pleaſe you, and could find out no other way to pay you ſervice but by Sword, and Fire, and Blood. Queſtionleſs (added ſhe) that a Prince who had nothing but Valour, and good Fortune in Fighting, hath not in my opinion all the qualities neceſſary to deſerve the eſteem of a reaſonable Princeſs. For if he have thoſe only, and no more, I ſhould believe that a common ordinary eſteem might well enough content him; but he ought not to pretend unto ſo high a degree as Love. What qualities then, I beſeech you Madam, (replied Philidaſpes) are requiſite to purchaſe the favour of an Illuſtrious and Great Princeſs? It is requiſite (anſwered ſhe, if I be not deceived) that his Valour be not too cruel; that he love Victory better than blood; that his fury laſt no longer than fight: That he be ever civil; That he affect glory without pride; That he look for it in ſuch ways where he may find it; That ſweetneſs and clemency be his predominant qualities; That he be very liberal; but liberal with diſcreet choice: That he be always grateful; That he do not envy the glory of another; That he be juſt unto his very enemies; That he be an abſolute Maſter of his paſſions; That his converſation be not lofty or proud; That he be always faithful to his Friends, and terrible to his Enemies: And to ſpeak all in one word, That he have all the Virtues, and none of the Vices. You have reaſon Madam (replied Artamenes) to ſay that he ought to be exact in all, who deſerves the affection of an illuſtrious Princeſs: But, Madam, doubtleſs ſhe muſt be ſuch a one as reſembles you, who without injuſtice can deſire that perfection which is not to be found amongſt Men; and if ſhe never confer her affection upon any but thoſe who are worthy of it, then that treaſure would never be enjoyed by any, though without queſtion it be deſired by all the Princes upon earth. I know not (ſaid ſhe) whether the affection of ſuch a Princeſs as reſembles me, be a thing ſo precious as to be called a Treaſure; but I know very well, that if ſhe reſemble me, her affection ſhould not be eaſily obtained, ſince by a premeditated deſign I am reſolved never to beſtow any part of my Love lightly, but to fight againſt my own inclinations if they ſhould offer to overcome me. I know not, Madam, (ſaid Philidaſpes, interrupting her) whether this hardneſs of heart be not as much to be condemned in your Sex, as you conceive pride is in ours; I do not think it, (ſaid ſhe); if I did, I ſhould perhaps change my mind: But whatſoever it be, to ſhew that I am not unjuſt, I pray know, that I am as liberal of my eſteem, as I am wary of my love, ſince truly I ſhall never refuſe it unto my greateſt Enemy when they ſhall deſerve it; Imagine then (ſaid ſhe to Artamenes) if I do not only much eſteem you, but admire you for all thoſe gallant acts which you have performed: And imagine Philidaſpes (ſaid ſhe in turning towards him) if you have not much reaſon to pretend unto a great part of my Commendations for what you have done: Thus did this diſcreet and wiſe Princeſs entertain theſe two Gallants whom ſhe perceived to be very ambitious and extreamly jealous of their Honours; and therefore ſhe durſt not aggravate the great actions of my Maſter, leſt Philidaſpes, who ſeem'd to be the more violent and haſty, ſhould be offended. Then they parted, being very well pleaſed with Mandana's civilities, but much troubled to have it from her own mouth, that her affection was ſo hard to be obtained.

It appeared that Philidaſpes, who was as Amorous as Artamenes, and did entertain the ſame Reſentments, was a little more netled than he, eſpecially ſince throughout the Princeſs diſcourſe, he found many more obliging terms towards his Rival, than himſelf. All this while Ciaxares thinks upon nothing but Feaſts, and publick Jollities. Aſtiages hearing of his Victories, ſends to Congratulate with him, and ſent alſo a great Complement unto my Maſter, relating to his Valour. The Court was never ſo full, nor ſo glorious as now: All the Officers of the Army made Sinope their Rendezvous, and almoſt all the Ladies of Quality throughout both Kingdoms repaired thither. The Preſence of the Princeſs was free and open; there was not a day, but the King went unto her Chamber, and by conſequence every one had permiſſion to enter: For ſince the King was very well acquainted with Mandana's Virtue, he did permit Men of Quality to enter into her Preſence, tho he himſelf was not there; ſince the Lady of Honour nour her Governeſs, and all her other Women were continually there, and never left her. So that it might be ſaid, Artamenes did ſeem to be very happy, tho indeed he was not; for he had the good Fortune, during the time of his Paſſion, to get infinite Honour, to ſerve Ciaxares moſt highly; to oblige the Princeſs moſt ſenſibly in ſaving the Life of her Father, and overcoming all his Enemies, ſo that he might be almoſt aſſured of her eſteem. But on the other ſide, when he conſidered the auſtere Virtue of the Princeſs, of which he made profeſſion; he could never hope ſhe would ever ſuffer either Artamenes, or Cyrus, to preſume ſo boldly as to ſpeak of Love: Moreover, the King of Pont and his Paſſion ſtir'd up his Jealouſy; and the Preſence of Philidaſpes was troubleſome to him, tho he knew no reaſon for it; yet Artamenes and he loſt not an inch of any opportunity to ſee the Princeſs; they followed her unto the Temple; they waited upon her into the Park and Walks, and viſited her at all permitted Hours; they neglected nothing, that two Men equally poſſeſſed with Paſſion could do. But that which moſt amuſed my Maſter concerning Philidaſpes, was, that beſides his diligence about the Princeſs, one might ſee him always buſy about Ciaxares and Aribees, and ſeem'd to be ſo urgent in all his Actions, that my Maſter did ſuſpect his Ambition as well as his Love, tho he every moment thought him capable of both. In all matters of Gallantry they were always oppoſite one to another. In all their Opinions they differed: 'Tis true, Artamenes had this advantage, that he oppoſed Philidaſpes without any ſhew of humorouſneſs in his mind, which his Rival could not brag of. For tho really he was a very compleat Man, yet he was of a more violent, conceited, and active Temper; he was always too full of Contradiction in his Diſcourſe, and therefore not ſo plauſible. Truth is, it appeared one Night when they were with the Princeſs, that he was not abſolute Maſter of Himſelf or Thoughts, but ſuffered them ſometimes to rove further than he would have them: There was then but few about her, and theſe two ſecret Lovers were there almoſt alone with her. After diſcourſe upon many ſeveral Subjects, the Princeſs had a great deſire, if it were poſſible, to unite them, to the end they might become more ſerviceable unto her Father; and beginning to diſcourſe upon what might be the ordinary cauſe of friendſhip; I have wondred a hundred times (ſaid ſhe to Artamenes and Philidaſpes) that I could neve diſcover any great matter of Friendſhip betwixt you two; for tho I know you do eſteem of one another very much, yet methinks you love not one another ſo much as you ſhould do: I mean, (ſaid ſhe) that confident friendſhip, and tenderneſs of Affection, which dare truſt and tell all things unto him that is loved, and partake of one anothers Sorrows and Joys. For you are both of you Strangers, and both Men of Spirit, Courage and Generoſity; you ſerve the ſame Prince, and you ſhould Love one another; for I believe your Souls are too Gallant to be capable of Envy: If ſo, then how comes it to paſs that you do not love, as much as eſteem one another? And why cannot I find that Union of Soul betwixt you, which makes Friends reveal their Hearts and Secrets one to another? Perhaps, Madam, (anſwered Philidaſpes) it is becauſe we eſteem too much, to love one another alſo. And perhaps alſo it may be, Madam, (replied Artamenes) that our Secrets are of too great a Conſequence to be revealed unto any. I would therefore gladly know, (replied the Princeſs, and that very preciſely) what it is which doth diſunite you; for I do confeſs, I cannot find it out: For my part, (continued ſhe) I know but of two Paſſions which can hinder gallant Men from loving one another, thoſe are Ambition and Love: As for the firſt of theſe, I do believe my Father is able to ſatisfie you both. As for the ſecond, I can neither ſuſpect that two Men ſo generous as you are, can be ſo weak, nor indeed do I ſee any appearance of it: And it may be, that there is not one of my Women (ſaid ſhe ſmiling, and looking upon them all) that hath not ſecretly chid her Beauty, becauſe ſhe has not fettered you ſince you came to Court, where it is obſerved, that the Inclination

tion is not at all that way. Tell me then, (ſaid ſhe to them) I Conjure you, and do not hide the truth of the matter from me: I leave you to judg, Sir, in what a Labyrinth Artamenes and Philidaſpes were now entangled; and what an odd chance this was, that the Princeſs ſhould deſire that thing which they could not tell her, and that which would have amazed her, if they ſhould have aſſumed the boldneſs to have told what they knew, tho neither of them in particular knew all they deſired to know. For it is certain, that as yet ſhe did not ſuſpect any thing, either of the Paſſion of Artamenes or Philidaſpes; or that Artamenes and Philidaſpes did hate one another, rather by reaſon of certain ſecret Jealouſies which they had of their Deſigns, than out of any certain knowledg of the truth. Yet the Princeſs, whoſe aim it was to Act the moſt advantagiouſly ſhe could, for the Service of the King her Father, and to reconcile the minds of theſe two Men, who were of ſuch Eminency, did very much preſs them, to tell her what was the Obſtacle which obſtructed their Friendſhip. Madam, (anſwered Artamenes) It will be a hard matter for me to tell you, ſince ordinarily I do not uſe to have any difference with thoſe I eſteem: As for me, (replied Philidaſpes,) I will go a little further than that, and ſay, I am never uſed to have any thing but difference with thoſe I do not Love, whether I eſteem or deſpiſe them: my heart (ſaid he) cannot reſt in ſuch a juſt Medium, between Love and Hatred; and though I could, yet I ſhould byaſs more to one ſide than the other: you make me much joyed (anſwered the Princeſs very haſtily, leſt Artamenes ſhould make ſuch a reply as ſhould ſharpen the ſpirit of Philidaſpes) for I never could ſuſpect that he could hate ſuch a Man as Artamenes, who never offended you; whom all the Court knows; whom the King my Father does extreamly love, and whom I eſteem very much: ſo Philidaſpes (continued ſhe, not giving him leave to ſpeak) ſince doubtleſs you cannot hate Artamanes, I conclude that of neceſſity you muſt love him a little; and if ſo, I hope that I ſhall not have no hard task to make you love him much: for, ſaid ſhe, in turning towards Artamenes, Doubtleſs you will never reſiſt me, nor ever diſagree with Philidaſpes, who is owner of a hundred excellent Qualities, and whom the King my Father eſteems infinitely; he who certainly Loves you a little, and who deſerves the approbation of thoſe who are more knowing than I am: And, added ſhe, if there be any prevalency in my Prayers, you ſhall, for the Love of me, carry it ſo for the future, that the whole Court ſhall take notice of the good correſpondence which is betwixt you, and no more wonder at the coldneſs which appears in all your actions, and in all your words, the cauſe whereof every one is moſt ignorant. Perhaps, Madam, anſwered Philidaſpes, we know it not our ſelves: But, ſaid the Princeſs, whether you know it, or know it not; I hope you will do as I deſire you. The Gods, Madam (ſaid Artamenes) for ought I ſee, are not ſo rigorous as you, ſince they allow us liberty to Love or Hate thoſe whom we judge worthy of either: Be pleaſed to be ſatisfied, Madam, with that Lawful Authority which your rare Qualities have given you over the hearts of all them who have the honour to come near you; and do not Tyrannically (if that which I owe you will permit me to phraſe it ſo) impoſe upon Philidaſpes, to Love Artamenes compulſively; nor upon Artamenes to Love Philidaſpes, whether he will or no: If they will at any time Love, let them have the freedom of their own choice entire, and take not from them the Merit of their Affection: And if they will eternally hate one another, (replied Philidaſpes) let them have the liberty to do it, without any juſt offence to you. That cannot poſſibly be (replied ſhe,) for I eſteem both of you too much to ſuffer it. Why, Madam, ſaid Artamenes to her (and changing colour) Cannot I hate Philidaſpes, unleſs I do anger the Princeſs Mandana? No, ſaid ſhe, nor Philidaſpes hate Artamenes, without offending me extreamly, ſince I have ſo deſired of him the contrary. We are both of us then, very happy, and very unhappy, replied Philidaſpes: and you ſhall be both of you very reaſonable, if you will Love one another, for the Love of me. This is not poſſible, replied Philidaſpes. Indeed, Madam, anſwered Artamenes, I think it would be much more eaſie for us to hate one another for the Love of you, than to love one another for the Love of you; for, ſaid he, both of us aiming at Glory as we do, and ſeeking out all occaſions to greaten our ſelves by obtaining the eſteem and friendſhip of the King, if you ſhould byas more unto Philidaſpes than unto Artamenes, I think that Artamenes, though he durſt not complain of you, yet he would hate Philidaſpes a little: And I my ſelf think (replied this violent Prince) that tho it ſhould happen ſo to me, Philidaſpes would content himſelf with eſteeming Artamenes, without Loving him. The Princeſs was then very ſorry ſhe had undertook a buſineſs, which ſhe found much more hard to compoſe, than ſhe believed; therefore ſhe thought it better to end this diſcourſe, than continue it any longer. Then ſhe begun to ſpeak unto them with abundance of excellent ſweetneſs; At leaſt, ſaid ſhe, will you promiſe me to live together as if you did Love one another; and that you will not contradict one another in any thing? Philidaſpes (anſwered Artamenes) ſeems to be ſo zealous in the King's ſervice and yours, Madam, and I alſo the like, that it may be imagined, there will be always much concurrence in all our deſigns: I know (replied Philidaſpes) that at the leaſt we ſhall meet one another very often: And I think that ever ſince the firſt day Artamenes arrived in Cappadocia, I have every day ſeen him. It is true that I met you at the Temple of Mars (anſwered Artamenes) the ſame day I came to Sinope: What day was that (asked the Princeſs?) It was the ſame (anſwered Philidaſpes) whereon you offered a Sacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods, for the Death of that Prince who would have ſubverted all Aſia, and uſurped your Crown from you; I remember it very well (ſaid the Princeſs, deſiring to break off the former diſcourſe) and I never in all my life had ſo little devotion to render thanks unto the Gods for a Benefit, as I had that day; not but that according to the Predictions of all the Magi, the Ruin of young Cyrus was a happy fate for all Aſia; but becauſe that naturally I ever had ſuch a repugnancy in me againſt rejoycing at the death of any one, as that I had need to have a great intereſt in the Publick Felicity, if I conſent unto it. Why Madam (anſwered my Maſter, bluſhing a little) are you ſo good as not to hate Cyrus? How (ſaid Philidaſpes, interrupting him, who always would be of a contrary opinion) can ſhe hate a Prince whom ſhe never ſaw, and who is her Couſin; and who, as I am aſſured, was one of much merit? Therefore it was neither reaſonable nor poſſible to hate him. But (anſwered my Maſter) it ſeems you told me, that he would have ſubverted all Aſia, and uſurped the Crown from the Princeſs: But I ſaid it (replied Philidaſpes ſharply) becauſe the Magi ſaid ſo, without ſeeing any appearances of it. Cyrus (anſwered my Maſter very coldly) would be much obliged to you, if he were living: But not very much to you, replied Philidaſpes, who would have him hated when he is dead. Since the King my Father (ſaid the Princeſs to them) has both you about him, who are ſuch gallant Defenders, in his Service, I believe it had not been eaſie for Cyrus to deſtroy us. This opinion, Madam, anſwered my Maſter, is a great Glory to us. I ſhould have acknowledged as much, replied Philidaſpes, if ſhe had named none but me. I ſhall leave you to judge, Sir, what effects this diſcourſe did beget in my Maſter's ſpirit; but as he was about to reply, the King came in, and broke off further diſcourſe. After he had ſtaid a while with Mandana, he went out to walk by the Sea-ſide, and every one followed him. As ill luck would have it, Aribees held the King in a long private diſcourſe, ſo that Artamenes and Philidaſpes turned to each other, and took a walk by themſelves; and ſince they came out from the Princeſs with exaſperated ſpirits, ſo they were a little while ſilent, both of them queſtionleſs recalling unto memory all that paſſed: Did ever any one ſee ſuch croſs Fortune as mine (ſaid Artamenes to himſelf) Mandana would force me to Love Philidaſpes, who Loves not me; who is oppoſite to all my deſigns; who contradicts all my diſcourſe; whom I always find about the Princeſs; who looks upon me with envy, and perhaps is my Rival. This laſt reflection imprinting it ſelf very deep in his ſoul, did move anger to appear very high in his looks; and I, who was not far off, obſerved it; I think his enemy alſo, had very near the ſame thoughts: at length I perceived Philidaſpes and he change colour both together at an inſtant; and by their muſing ſtudy which both ſtood in, I perceived them to be very angry and cholerick: After they had ſtood a while without ſpeaking a word, and ſtanding at diſtance one from the other; Artamenes on a ſudden rouſing himſelf out of his muſing, ſaw that the King and the Company was a good diſtance off, and remembring what Philidaſpes had ſaid in the Princeſs's preſence; You have reaſon, ſaid he, to ſay that we meet very often, ſince without any deſign we are met here ſingle together in the midſt of ſo much people: I care not much (replied Philidaſpes briskly) for meeting here in a walk; but I muſt confeſs to you, I do not love to meet you near the King, or the Princeſs, or in a Battel when I am upon the point of taking Kings Priſoners. For my part, replied Artamenes, I have no ſuch averſion from meeting you; and I ſhould be glad to find you in the head of an Enemies Army, where we might diſpute the Victory, and ſhew you how to take Kings Priſoners in ſuch a way as would be glorious. There needs not, anſwered Philidaſpes, an Army of Fifty thouſand Men to give you that ſatisfaction which you deſire; and if you deſire it, I ſhall eaſily ſatisfie your longing. It ſhall ſtick only upon you, replied Artamenes; and leſt the pretenſions which you have at the Court ſhould hinder you from giving me this ſatisfaction, or oblige you to repent of what you have ſaid, Let us to morrow morning before Sun riſe, ſee whether the Princeſs have reaſon to deſire that Philidaſpes ſhould love Artamenes, and Artamenes love Philidaſpes. I like it well, anſwered he; and take heed leſt the Honours which you have from the King, and the reſpects you bear unto the Princeſs, do make you alter your reſolutions: Therefore, replied Artamenes, Let us meet behind the Temple of Mars, where I will ſtay for you with a Sword by day-break: Mean while I think it good to follow the King, leſt any ſuſpicion ſhould be of our deſign. After this they appeared before the King, and carried the matter ſo well, as none did dream of any thing that paſſed between them; I, my ſelf, who, as I ſaid before, had obſerved ſome diſorder in their Faces, was deceived like the reſt: And I had been ſo often accuſtomed to ſee alterations in his countenance, without any misfortune to follow, that I by this could not foreſee that which followed. At night, when Artamenes was retired, he ſhut himſelf in his Cloſet with Feraulas, unto whom he imparted his deſign, becauſe he had need of his help to get him out unſeen. Feraulas, as he told me, did diſſwade him, laying before him the inequality which was betwixt Philidaſpes and him, whoſe condition was ſo much inferiour, as that there was no juſtice they ſhould meaſure Swords together. But my Maſter anſwered him, that Artamenes did appear to be no more than Philidaſpes; and that in Combats, Valour was to be more valued than Quality: At laſt he told him, that he ſhould fight better againſt a valiant Soldier, than a great cowardly King. Neverthleſs, Sir, although the buſineſs which Artamenes had in hand, might well have taken up all his thoughts, yet it did not hinder him from telling unto Feraulas all the diſcourſe which paſſed betwixt the Princeſs, Philidaſpes and himſelf: And his Paſſion did ſo much reflect upon his ſoul, as that he ſtood firm in the midſt of greateſt dangers. What ſhould be Mandana's deſign, ſaid he to Feraulas, in ſo earneſtly deſiring that Philidaſpes and I ſhould love one another? Was it only a bare effect of her wiſdom and goodneſs? or was it ſome ſecret good-will that ſhe bore unto Artamenes or Philidaſpes? Has ſhe ſeen into my heart, and there found all thoſe jealouſies which cauſe my averſion to love him? But alas! if ſhe had done ſo, ſhe would have ſeen that I adored her, and would not have been ignorant of thoſe Paſſions which I endure for her, and would have been far off from commanding me to love him; I conceive ſhe would rather have commanded me not to come near him. Oh ye God's, ſaid he, How ſhould I know whether it be only Ambition in him, or whether he be in love? Whatſoever he be, I hope the Princeſs is ignorant of his Paſſion, as well as of mine; that which ſhe ſaid unto us in the beginning of her diſcourſe, tells me as much. I believe you too generous, ſaid ſhe, to ſuſpect any ſuch weakneſs in you. Ha! Mandana, Illuſtrious Mandana, ſaid he, this weakneſs is glorious, and it muſt be a great Soul only which is capable of it. But is it poſſible, ſaid he further, that my Eyes, and all my Actions have not yet given you the leaſt ſuſpition of my Love? Do you not conceive that all my Martial Adventures, and Acts which I have done, were done for you? Has any ſeen me ask any recompence for what I have done? or had I any Intereſt of my own in it? And cannot Mandana, the moſt divine Mandana, imagine that ſome Paſſion more noble than Ambition, did move Artamenes to his Adventures? Nevertheleſs, Feraulas, ſaid he, this amiable Princeſs, who is ſo far from having the leaſt knowledge of it, did add this unto her diſcourſe, And it may be there is not one of my Women that has not ſecretly chid her beauty, becauſe it has not captivated you ſince you came to this Court, where every one obſerved that your inclination was not that way. Ah, too unjuſt Princeſs, ſaid he, Why did you not obſerve it? and why did you not rather ſay in your ſelf, Since Artamenes does not love any in the Court, doubtleſs he loves me. But alas, ſaid he, Mandana tells me by this diſcourſe, that ſhe would not have me to be her Conqueſt; and that ſhe thinks ſhe has done me honour enough in telling me, that the Beauty of her Women might have captivated me. Sir, ſaid Feraulas unto him, this is only Artamenes who hath received this ſlight injury. It is true, replied he, But dare Artamenes be Cyrus? Can he ceaſe to be Artamenes, and not be hated? Ah cruel world (cried he again)! what abundance of ſorrow and deſpair doſt thou afford me? I wiſh Mandana knew I loved her, but I would not be the teller of it: and by what means can ſhe ever know it, if ſhe buſie her ſelf in ſeeking about the Court for one to captivate me; and if ſhe never apprehend, that none can look upon her, but needs muſt love her; and that though Artamenes be only Artamenes, having a heart ſo great as he has, he cannot abaſe himſelf to love elſewhere? That which gives me a little comfort is, ſhe treats my pretended Rival no better than ſhe does me; and that through all her diſcourſe, her words were more favourable towards Artamenes than him. If I had been well aſſured he had been my Rival, my ſorrows would have been my death, and my ſymptoms of Jealouſie would have diſcovered my Love unto my Princeſs: In ſhort, Sir, Artamenes talked with Feraulas as if he had nothing to do in the morning; but ſeeing he never thought of bed, he put him in mind of it, and my Maſter followed his Advice, riſing in the morning by break of day.

I had forgot to tell you, that Philidaſpes and my Maſter had agreed to fight on Horſeback, without any other Arms but one Buckler, and one Sword, leſt their Deſign ſhould be diſcovered; and that either of them ſhould have one Eſquire with them, to be Spectators of the Combat. Feraulas went out with Artamenes: as ſoon as they were ready, they went out at a Back-door, and ſtole away quietly, not being ſeen by any: They came upon the place appointed, half an hour before Philidaſpes: Here, Sir, Artamenes did begin very much to fear the Princeſs diſpleaſure, who when ſhe ſhould hear of a quarrel ſo ſoon after her deſires to love one another, had juſt cauſe of offence; yet this ſtrong averſion which he had towards Philidaſpes, was more prevalent than his fears, and concluded it better to expoſe himſelf once unto the diſpleaſure of his Princeſs, than not to be revenged of a Rival. He looked for Philidaſpes with much impatience: But he preſently appeared, and perceiving my Maſter ſtayed for him; I deſire your pardon, Artamenes, ſaid he, for coming no ſooner, but I will endeavour to make ſatisfaction for my ſluggiſhneſs, by that diligence which I bring with me to vanquiſh you if I can. I hope, replied Artamenes, that mine will prevent you, and we ſhall preſently know whether we ſhould love or hate one another. After this, both drew their Swords, and after they had either of them made a paſs with their Horſes, as it were to put them into wind; they then ſtaid a-while oppoſite one to another to take their meaſures, and ſeat themſelves in their Saddles; after which they fell to't, and ſtruck ſo furiouſly, as both of them had like to have fallen: Philidaſpes his Sword did glide upon the Buckler of Artamenes; and the Sword of Artamenes did graſe a little upon the right ſide of Philidaſpes: Their Horſes, which were ready guided, did not ſtartle at a Charge ſo violent; and theſe two terrible Rivals turning ſhort both together, did endeavour to crouper each other if they could; but they were both ſo quick, and fought with ſo much judgment, as it was not poſſible for either to do it. Then giving the rein to their Horſes, and making a ſecond Paſs, the Sword of Artamenes the ſecond time light upon the head of Philidaſpes, and gliding down to his Shoulder, gave him two wounds at one blow; the Sword of Philidaſpes alſo was ſtain'd with the blood of Artamenes, and run him into the Thigh through and through: My Maſter perceiving himſelf wounded, became more furious; and Philidaſpes ſeeing his blood run in divers places, did double his choller. Behold here, Sir, theſe two fierce Enemies as much animated, as if both of them had known each others qualities and loves: All that Skill, Strength and Valour could do, was done at this time: Artamenes preſſed upon his Enemy, his Enemy upon Artamenes again: Sometimes they would ſhift and husband their ſtrength warily, then upon a ſudden they would vanquiſh or die; and both did diſpute the Victory ſo ſtoutly, that they began to eſteem, though not love one another, much more than before. But without troubling you with a relation of every particular paſſage of this fierce Combat, I will only tell you, that my Maſter wounded Philidaſpes in ſix places, and received but three wounds himſelf. Being in this condition, Artamenes began to be deſperate to ſee himſelf ſo long reſiſted: and caſting his Buckler behind him, putting on his Horſe with ſpur and voice, and lifting up his Sword as high as his Arm could reach, he let it drive at the head of Philadaſpes ſo terribly, that it bore him down half in a ſwoon between the feet of their Horſes, catching his Sword into his hand as he fell. My Maſter lighted immediately from his Horſe, and holding both Swords in his hands, did run unto him, and cried, Philidaſpes, if thou canſt riſe, I will permit thee, and render thee thy Sword; but if thou canſt not, then acknowledge that Artamenes is worthy to be thy Friend. Philidaſpes at theſe words recovering out of his ſwoon, did offer to riſe, but he could not poſſible: ſo that looking upon my Maſter with his eyes like fire, Thou haſt overcome me, anſwered he, kneeling, but thou ſhalt not overcome me always, if thou beeſt ſo humane as to let me live. In this condition they were, when Aribees accidentally returned from hunting, and followed by many people, who ſeeing my Maſter with a Sword in his hand, came up to him, not well knowing whom it ſhould be: As ſoon as he was come near, and ſaw my Maſter, he was aſtoniſhed, eſpecially when he ſaw Philidaſpes whom he had overcome. What, Artamenes, ſaid he to him, you fight then with the King's friends as well as his enemies: I will fight, anſwered he, with the King's enemies whereſoever I meet them; and I will alſo fight with the enemies of Artamenes in what place ſoever I meet them. My Maſter then turning towards Philidaſpes, who was at deaths door for very ſpite and grief to be ſeen in this poſture, wherein he could not ſtir; Philidaſpes (ſaid he to him, throwing him his Sword) thou haſt uſed it too well to be deprived of it; and if thou beeſt as full of Reaſon as Valour, thou wilt never put me to that condition as to do thee the like favour again. Artamenes not ſtaying for his Anſwer, would have got upon his Horſe, but he ſtood in need of Feraulas his help, for his loſs of blood had extreamly weakned him; yet being a very little held up, he kept himſelf very firm in his Saddle. But it was not ſo well with Philidaſpes, for he was very much wounded, and carried by five or ſix Men unto the next Houſe, there to have his wounds dreſſed. Aribees leaving ſome of his Men with him, and having given order for ſome of the King's Surgeons to have a care of him, he went to acquaint Ciaxares with the accident: As for Artamenes, he would not go publickly into the Town, but went unto the Sacrificer, with whom he had diſcourſe the firſt time he came unto the Temple of Mars, having ſince that time confirmed a great league of friendſhip between them. As ſoon as he was there, and had taken order concerning his wounds, he ſent Feraulas unto the King and the Princeſs, to deſire their pardon, and to beſeech them not to condemn him before they underſtood the matter.

As Chriſantes was about to go on with his Relation, the King of Phrygia came in, who coming from Ciaxares, interrupted this Relation, and told all this illuſtrious Company, that the Prince did continue ſtill inflexible, and that he was every day more and more incenſed againſt Artamenes: Alas (ſaid the King of Hircania, and all the reſt of the Princes who had heard Chriſantes tell the ſtory) if you did but know who this Artamenes is, whom you ſpeak of, you would much more lament him than you do: It would be very hard for me (replied the King of Phrygia) to be more ſorry for him than I am, for I have ſo great eſteem of him already, that I cannot intereſt my ſelf in the preſervation of ſo brave a Man, more than I have: But you will change your thoughts (anſwered the King of Hircania) when you ſhall rightly know who Artamenes is: And you will confeſs (added Perſodes) that never was Prince more illuſtrious than he. A Prince (replied the King of Phrygia haſtily) yes Sir (replied Hidaſpes) and one of the moſt conſiderable Princes of the World. After theſe words, the King of Phrygia was very urgent with them to inform him further: Then all of them would needs tell him ſomething of it: One would tell him of his Birth; another would extol his Valour; a third would relate ſome particulars of his love; and all of them, according as paſſages did moſt move them, would needs ſet out the illuſtrious life of Artamenes. Chriſantes ſeeing this forwardneſs amongſt ſo many famous perſons, although this confuſion was very glorious unto his dear Maſter, ſince it was but an effect of their paſſions towards him, did intreat them to defer the buſineſs until another time; he himſelf undertaking to relate the beginning of this Hiſtory unto the King of Phrygia particularly, to the end that afterwards they might all together meet, and hear the marvellous ſequel of it, from the relation of Feraulas, who was better known in it than himſelf; he being younger and more imployed in all the Paſſages of my Maſter's love. All the Princes did conſent unto the reaſonable motion which Chriſantes had propounded: yet notwithſtanding they could not part ſo ſoon, but continued a good while together, extolling the unfortunate Artamenes, and magnifying equally his Virtues, his Misfortunes, and his Glory.

The End of the ſecond Book.

PART

PART I. BOOK III.

WHilſt theſe two famous Friends of Artamenes diſcourſed of his great Misfortunes, and high Qualities: he in the mean time rendred himſelf worthy of more praiſe than they did give him, enduring his Priſon with moſt admirable patience. The uncertainty of the Princeſs's life was the only diſturbance of his Soul; but his Captivity was too inconſiderable to move it at all. To ſpeak the truth, never man was more in love than he; this did ſo extremely torment him, as there was no need of any other Paſſion to be added. When he call'd in his memory the wonderful events of his Life; and remembred how many dangers he had eſcaped; what love he had purchaſed from Ciaxares; what ſervices he had done for Mandana, and what Paſſions he endured for her: what obſtacles he had met with in his deſigns; how quiet a life he might have led, if he continued in Perſia; what Travels he has undergone; how gloriouſly Fortune had ſhined upon him: what Illuſtrious Rivals he had met withal; what famous Victories he had obtained, and into what a ſad misfortune he was now reduced: All theſe, I ſay, coming confuſedly into his mind, he had much a-do to give credit unto himſelf; nor when he was alone ſolitarily in his Chamber, he knew not well whether he was Cyrus or Artamenes, or either of them; but he was ſure that he was the moſt unhappy Prince upon Earth, who, without ſome extraordinary aſſiſtance from the Gods, could never hope for any ſatisfaction in his life. The abſence of the Party belov'd (ſaid he to himſelf) is, in the eſteem of all the World, the worſt misfortune. But alas, I am not ſeparated for a time only, but, I fear, for ever: When I was in the Army, I knew ſhe was at Ancyra or Sinope:

I knew ſhe was well; I was certain ſhe was in pleaſant Company, and a delightful Place, ſo that then my abſence from her did not vex me; I had none but my own ſorrows to endure, and my only ſorrow was, to be abſent from her: The Gods do know my grief, and how the deprivation of her ſight was inollerable to me: But alas, alas, I am now in a moſt lamentable condition; for I know that my Princeſs is either dead, or elſe in the barbarous hands of ſome who detains her againſt her will; I am moſt certain ſhe is either in her Grave, or in a Priſon: And in what place ſoever ſhe is, I know ſhe ſuffers, and doubtleſs pities my misfortunes; yet (ſaid he) if I could with honour ſhake off my Fetters, I would find out either her Tomb, or her Priſon; for the Sea, according to its cuſtom, would render me this fair Corps either alive or dead: I would either die with her in the one, or deliver her out of the other; And it would be a greater conſolation to me in my misfortunes to do ſo, than to languiſh out my life in Priſon, where I endure an unjuſt Accuſation, not daring to juſtify my ſelf; not becauſe I ſhould appear unto Ciaxares more criminal as a Lover of Mandana, than as a Friend unto the King of Aſſyria; not becauſe it is a Crime whereby Artamenes is diſhonoured, but rather it is infinite honour unto him, and becauſe the honour of my Princeſs is infinitely above my own: that ſevere vertue whereof ſhe makes profeſſion, always forbidding me to give the leaſt ſuſpicion of my love unto any whatſoever; and therefore I will die a thouſands deaths rather than let the leaſt ſhadow of it appear: Not that (O my moſt illuſtrious Princeſs) you have any reaſon to make me hide my Love as if it were vicious; or conceal any of your Favours to me, as if they were not correſpondent with your Vertue: for indeed what have you ever done for Artamenes, which you had not good reaſon for? or which might contradict your pureſt innocence? you have oftentimes rigidly denied your ſelf and me, and hid ſome part of your good-will towards me; you never gave me any more teſtimonies of it than ſuch as by ſome weak conjectures I could draw, that you did not hate me; you have oftentimes deprived me even of your very looks; you have warily reſerved your very words; and all that I can ſay of you is, that you had the power to deſtroy me, but did not: But, O ye Gods, Can you have ſuch a thought as to ruine a man who loves you? A Prince who had concealed all his deſires from you, who ſtifled them in their birth, and never durſt deſire any thing which might offend the pureſt Virtue? A Prince, I ſay, who adores you as men adore the Gods, and who hath devoted unto you every minute of his life? Yet for all this, it is your pleaſure I ſhould keep cloſe my paſſion, and that to me is an abſolute command: Therefore I am reſolved never to diſcover my Princeſs: I will look for death without complaint, and never reveal the true cauſe of all my ſorrows; Thus did the Amorous Artamenes paſs his time: He had this benefit in his Priſon, that his Keepers did both lament and reſpect him; ſo that if he had been diſpoſed to make an eſcape, he might eaſily have done it: Andramias, who commanded the Guard, was a near kinſman unto Aglatidas, who bore ſo great a love unto Artamenes, that he neglected nothing which was in his power to deliver him. Beſides this Alliance which was between Andramias and Aglatidas, there was ſome other Obligations which tied Aglatidas unto him; ſo that he permitted Aglatidas to viſit Artamenes when he pleaſed. It happened one night when all were retired to their Lodgings, that Aglatidas went unto his Chamber, and offered him all his aſſiſtance; He ſpoke unto him of ſome ways which conduced unto his flight, if he pleaſed: Artamenes did thank him very civilly, but told him, that he would never come out of priſon, unleſs by the ſame power which put him in; he ſaid, that guilty men might do well to ſlip out of their Chains, but innocent men ought to ſtay till they were untied; and therefore he deſired him to reſt ſatisfied concerning that matter, and not to hazard the King's diſpleaſure for the love of him: He told him that it would be a very great comfort unto him, to ſee him ſome times, eſpecially ſince his melancholick diſpoſition did beſt ſute with his preſent fortune; but that it was not juſt to permit him for his ſake to run into danger. Aglatidas then anſwered Artamenes, That he found no ſuch joy in his life as to fear the expoſing it; but in this he did not run any hazard at all, becauſe firſt the King had not ſtrictly forbid the ſeeing of him. Secondly, Andramias being his Friend, his Couſin, and one that was obliged unto him, it was no extraordinary courteſie to let him viſit his Friend: Alſo his Chamber being within the Chamber of Andramias, ſo by conſequence far enough off from the Guard, he might conveniently viſit him often without being perceived, and might afford him that poor comfort to have one with him who might condole his Miſfortunes. Artamenes denied him; but Aglatidas was ſo urgent, that in the end he permitted him to come every night into his Chamber. There was none more fit to comfort an unfortunate man, than Aglatidas, who was always ſad, even then when any joy appeared in the faces of them who were in his Company. This Noble melancholly man came one night unto Artamenes, and after they had a long time diſcourſed of the mutability in Fortune, and miſeries of life, they both of them were a long while ſilent. Aglatidas, who knew nothing of his love, and who deſired to cheer him up a little, ſpoke thus unto him: Sir (ſaid he) I ſee you are unfortunate; yet for all that, you are not ſo unfortunate, but one may poſſibly be much more: That Grandure which you have loſt, may eaſily be found again: It is a common thing for a Prince to paſs from a Throne to a Priſon, and from a Priſon to a Throne again: There are many misfortunes which ſeem leſs glorious, are yet more ſenſible; and the more cloſe they are kept, the more are they inſupportable: You have this ſad comfort at the leaſt (ſaid he) that all the World laments you: and ſuch great falls as yours, do move compaſſion in all honeſt men. On the contrary, there are misfortunes of ſuch a dire nature, as they are not pitied by any; and are ſo far from inviting compaſſion, as they who endure them, are accuſed of weakneſs, of folly and ſimplicity: So that to prevent the growth or encreaſe of our misfortunes tunes and ſorrows, we muſt ſtifle our Sighs, and hide our Tears, or at leaſt never to publiſh the cauſe of our Afflictions.

Artamenes hearing Aglatidas talk thus, did imagine that the ſad melancholly which continually ſat upon his Soul, and appeared in his face, was doubtleſs cauſed by love, though he never did diſcover it before this time. As curioſity to enquire after the misfortunes of ſuch as have reſemblance of our own, is a quality incident to all unfortunate men; So Artamenes ſighing and looking upon Aglatidas, Is it not poſſible (ſaid he to him) that your melancholly which I have ever thought to proceed from your natural temper, may have ſome other ſecret cauſe which yet I never asked you? Yes, Sir, Replied Aglatidas, there is one, but it is of ſuch a nature, as I ought to conceal it from ſuch as you, whoſe Souls, perhaps, are ſenſible only of Ambition and Glory, who having never found the force of Love, would call all thoſe things which that Paſſion produceth, folly and weakneſs, as I ſaid before; Never fear (anſwered Artamenes, ſighing the ſecond time) that my Virtue is ſo ſevere as you believe; for though my unhappy Life be not yet far ſpent, yet in ſo many Travels as I have gone through, perhaps I have not been altogether inſenſible of that Paſſion: Therefore, my Dear Aglatidas (ſaid he to him) if you have any deſire to comfort me in my misfortunes, let me not be ignorant of yours, and I do conjure you not to think but my Soul ſhall be very ſenſible of them; and though I am overwhelmed with my own ſorrows, yet I ſhall make ſhift to condole yours alſo. Aglatidas did a-while deny him, but at laſt being overcome by his importunity, and by the perſwaſions of Andramias, who had been a witneſs of his misfortunes, he began thus, after that the Captain of the Guards had given all requiſite Orders to prevent either diſcovery or interruption.

The

The Hiſtory of Aglatidas and Ameſtris.

I Have often heard ſay, that Love above all other Paſſions does moſt fortify or moſt enfeeble men, according unto the occaſions which preſent themſelves: and that it never doth ſo abſolutely ſubdue a Soul, but it leaves ſome Reliques of its ancient dominion: but yet it is not ſo in my heart; this general Rule hath its exception in me; for ſince Love commanded in chief, it hath quite rooted out all ambition, it hath abſolutely extinguiſht all deſires of glory, and left no other reſentments but jealouſie and ſorrow. I will not ſtay you, Sir, in telling that I am deſcended from the Illuſtrious Race of famous Aglatidas, (whoſe Name I own) who did ſuch gallant Acts under the Reign of Phraortes, in his Perſian, Medean nad Aſſyrian Wars; for, perhaps, you do already know them: I will only tell you, how ſince that time all they of my Family have always held the firſt Rank (next after the Princes of the Blood) about the King: I was born then, Sir, in a high condition; and I dare ſay of my ſelf, that my Inclinations have not degenerated from the worthineſs of my birth. I had a Father, whoſe indulgent cares did doubtleſs give me good education; and if Love had not given a ſtop unto what he expected from me, perhaps I ſhould at this day have been much above what I am. I no ſooner attained unto my ſeventeenth year, but having a deſire to get ſome eſteem in the World, and ſeeing all was peace in Medea, I went unto the King of Saces, Father of Prince Mazares, who has ſuffered ſhipwrack, where I dare ſay of my ſelf, that in a little time I got ſome honour. But after his Wars were ended, and Peace was eſtabliſhed throughout all Aſia, I was compelled, after two years ſpent among the Saceans, and in my Travels, to return unto Ecbatan, which, as you know, is one of the goodlieſt, moſt magnificent, and moſt delightful Places in the World. I arrived there ſome few days after Aſtiages received news of the death of young Cyrus, Son to the King of Perſia, and the Princeſs his Daughter. Then I know you have been, Sir, ſo long in Cappadocia, as you cannot be ignorant of all the Paſſages in Medea: of the menaces of the Gods, of the fears and fright of Aſtiages, and of the joy which he conceived for that ſecurity which all Aſia hoped for by the death of that Prince, who, as men ſay, did promiſe mighty matters unto the World: I came then to the Court in a time of great jollity and feaſting, and there I ſtaid a-while with all delight imaginable: The King never hunted, but I was with him; There was never any meeting of Ladies, but I was ſure to be there; I wore rich Clothes, and recreated my ſelf in the pleaſant Walks: And, as you know, there is not a more delightful place upon Earth than the King's Palace, and Gardens at Ecbatan; ſo there was not one day which did not afford me freſh delights: The King was pleaſed to take more notice of me than I deſerved. I got the love of all the young Gallants in the Court; and if I durſt ſay it, there was none of the Ladies which did hate me; for as my deſign was general, to pleaſe all; ſo it had been a hard matter to have diſpleaſed any one in particular. Thus did I enjoy my youth and liberty with abundance of ſatisfaction: Whenas Artambaces, who, as perhaps you know, had heretofore been in love with the Queen of Perſia, before ſhe was married unto Cambiſes, Father of Cyrus (of whom I ſpeak, and who going from the Court upon that occaſion, was afterwards married in the Province of Ariſantine, unto the Daughter of a great Prince in that Countrey, and who went away from Ecbatan, and carried with him his only Daughter about fifteen years of age, whom he loved extremely, and who doubtleſs did deſerve as much.) It chanced ſo at that time, being glutted with variety of Pleaſures, and weary of the tumultuous Court, I took Horſe (being waited upon by only one ſervant) to go and enjoy my ſolitude, at a fair Houſe which my Father had ſome thirty miles from Ecbatan: I departed very melancholly and lumpiſh, not knowing any cauſe for it at all, my deſign being only to recreate my ſelf in viewing the Pictures, Statues, Gardens, Grotts, and Fountains about my Father's Houſe, that thereby I might make my converſation more pleaſant at my return to the Town. But alas, Sir, little did I think what would hap unto me in this Voyage! I have often wondred ſince at the pains which I took to captivate my ſelf, and how I found out a way which led me into ſuch a Labyrinth of trouble as hath diſquieted all my life. When I came into a great High-way, a hundred paces of the Caſtle, I ſaw a Chariot overturn'd which was quite broken in pieces; the magnificence of it did tell me that it belonged unto ſome Perſon of Quality; but ſince there was no Grooms about this Chariot, of whom I could enquire, I went on: being come unto the firſt Gate of the Caſtle, the Porter, who opened the Gate, told me, that Artambaces, whoſe Name and Quality I knew very well, coming from the Countrey to Ecbatan, had the misfortune to break one of his Chariots; and ſeeing he could travel no further that day, deſired to ſtay there that night whilſt his Chariot was repaired: The Porter told no more, than that Artambaces was there, but mentioned not a word of Hermaniſta his Wife, or Ameſtris his Daughter. So after I had given order for the beſt entertainment poſſible, I went ſtraight into the Garden, where I was told he was: But, Sir, I was much amazed, when croſſing a Quarter in the Garden, I ſaw in a green Arbour the faireſt Lady that ever eye did look upon, and whom I did not know at all; for Ameſtris had never been at Court: This Beauty was no leſs ſurpris'd to ſee me, than I to meet her in that place: For ſhe thinking there had been none in the Houſe but Servants, ſhe little expected there one of my Garb: It was very hot, and ſhe had none with her but one of her Women, ſhe had pulled off her Cypreſs, wherein ſhe uſed to cover her fair Neck; and being bare armed, ſhe lay negligently upon a bed of green Graſs, her Head lying upon the Knees of that Woman which was with her: I no ſooner ſaw her, but I ſtopt; and as ſoon as ever ſhe perceived me, ſhe ſtarted up, and put on her Cypreſs: we both did bluſh at the paſſage; but certainly it was out of different apprehenſions, Modeſty cauſing that in her which love did in me: For, Sir, the firſt minute of this fatal view was the firſt minute of my Paſſion; yet, notwithſtanding all my unparallell'd aſtoniſhment and wonder, I ſaluted the adored Ameſtris with much devotion; and beginning diſcourſe, Madam (ſaid I, to let her know who I was) I did not think to find ſuch fair and pleaſing company in my Father's Houſe; and if I had known that ſuch an one as you had been in the Arbour, the reverence I owe unto ſuch as you ſeem to be (though I think there is not ſuch another in the World) would have taught me better manners than to diſturb your reſt. Sir (anſwered ſhe) it belongs to me to deſire pardon for interrupting the pleaſure of your ſolitude, which it ſeems you came to take in this pleaſant place: But, Sir, (ſaid ſhe in beginning to walk on) It is my Father's part to make excuſes for the freedom which he took upon him to lodge with you to night, ſince an unexpected piece of luck did force him to it. Seeing then that her deſign was to conduct me to her Father, I preſented her my hand, and eaſily obſerved by this firſt Addreſs, that ſhe had a deſire to make me know who ſhe was: for there appeared in all her Actions ſo much gallantry, ſpirit and modeſty, as I ſaw ſhe was Miſtreſs of as much Soul as Beauty. Madam (ſaid I, conducting her, and anſwering unto what ſhe ſaid) it is a great happineſs to be interrupted by ſuch an one as you; and I think there is no reaſonable man, who would not for ſuch a bleſſedneſs not only quit his ſolitude, but the Court alſo, with all its magnificence and pleaſure: I always lookt for Flattery (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) out of Ecbatan, and perhaps I ſhall well enough defend my ſelf againſt it here; but I do confeſs unto you, that I do fear it a little here where I did not think to be aſſaulted. When you came into the Arbour where I was, I was commending unto my Woman whom you ſaw with me, the innocency of theſe Woods, and the honeſt ſimplicity of our Countrey; but for ought I ſee, the dominion of Flattery extends it ſelf further than I imagined, ſince there is no ſafety for humility and modeſty within thirty miles of Ecbatan; If you ſhould, Madam (replied I) forbid all thoſe praiſes which without doubt the Court will pay you, then certainly you muſt forbid your own knowledge, and be ignorant that you are the faireſt Beauty in the World. By this time we were approached ſo near Artambaces and Hermaniſtra his Wife, as in lieu of her Anſwer, ſhe told him who I was, and obliged me, as was fit, to preſent my Complement unto them: they made many excuſes for the freedom which they had taken; I profeſſed that my Father was much obliged unto them for it; and that for my own particular I took it for an infinite honour: they anſwered me with the like civility; and their converſation ſtood too much upon Ceremony: ſo dangerous it is to ſtay long in the Countrey from the Court: After this they began to commend the handſomneſs of the Gardens and Fountains. And Ameſtris did like the beauty of the Place ſo well, that ſhe could not believe Ecbatan had any place could pleaſe her better, altho' ſhe heard many wonderful reports of it. Artambaces inquired concerning Court-news, and was ſatisfied in a hundred things whereof he was ignorant before, becauſe they happened ſince his departure: I had the happineſs to find a great diſpoſition in Artambaces and Hermaniſtra to affect me: As for Ameſtris, I was well ſatisfied to find ſome hopes that ſhe would not hate me: And ſince ſhe was of an excellent judgment, knowing there was much difference between the Court and the Countrey-Tone, ſhe would ſpeak but little, and with much moderation, being reſolved to reſerve her ſelf until ſuch time as Ecbatan had a little gloſſed her, before ſhe would ſuffer her charming Soul to ſhine. And it was a ſecret which many who came out of the Countrey unto the Court, may make good uſe of, if they deſire to get eſteem there; for their Manners, Cuſtoms and Faſhions are ſo contrary, that let theſe new-comers do what they can, they will run into many Abſurdities, if they talk much; and the more they expoſe themſelves, the more they become ridiculous. Ameſtris therefore kept her firſt converſation very reſerved: but yet it was impoſſible to hide thoſe rare qualities wherewith ſhe was adorned.

During one day and a half that Artambaces ſtayed at my Father's houſe, I gazed ſo long upon the ſplendour of Ameſtris's Beauty, as I was dazled: I wondred at the cleanneſs of her accent; the ſweetneſs of her expreſſion; with what a natural Eloquence ſhe ſpoke: I admired alſo at the Solidity of her Judgment, the Gallantry of her Spirit, the quickneſs of her Wit; the Complacence of her Humour, and the Charms of her Diſcretion in reſerving her ſelf. During the time that theſe welcome gueſts were there, I ſtudied all the diverſione I could deviſe to entertain them: I carried them to hunt in a Park which was behind the Garden; I led them into all the ſhady Walks in the heat of the Day: where, what with the Singing of the Birds, the noiſe of the Fountains, the curioſity of the flowry Borders, the Statues and Pictures in the Galleries, and my converſe, I gave ſome ſatisfaction to theſe Illuſtrious Perſons, who aſſured me they thought themſelves welcome. After, Sir, I had treated them with all the Magnificence I could poſſible, they reſolved to depart; but it was not in my power to ſtay there any longer, though I came with intentions to ſtay ſeven or eight Days; I told Artambaces I would be his guide, and go to blaze the Apparition of that bright Star unto the Court, (pointing at Ameſtris); ſhe bluſht at the phraſe, and replied without Pride or Affectation. The Chariot being put into order, we parted; I took Horſe, and kept continually on that ſide where Ameſtris did ſit; and all the way I did, as I did the firſt minute I ſaw her, to wit, look upon her, and adore her with ſo much delight and ſatisfaction, as I thought it impoſſible there ſhould be ſo many vexations in Love as was talked of. My Eyes, my Heart, my Thought, my Soul, and all was upon Ameſtris: But all this while I found my ſelf ſo tranquil, and ſo pleaſingly contented, that I believed this kind of Love which I bore unto this excellent Beauty, was no other than ſuch as men uſe to have unto all Beautiful objects: I did find that I had nothing elſe in any admiration; and as I knew that I had never ſeen any thing ſo Beautiful, ſo I wondred not at any thing elſe: I did infinitely joy to ſee her; to have the honour to be near her, and hear her ſpeak: Thus did we paſs on the time and the way from my Father's houſe until we came at Ecbatan. During which interval, I acquainted Ameſtris with all the delights and diverſions of the Court: She asked what Ladies had the Empire in matter of Beauty, and who were eſteemed the beſt Wits? And a hundred ſuch Queſtions as theſe, which Artambaces, or Hermaniſta, or Ameſtris, do put unto me; She knew the Court before ſhe came there. At laſt we arrived at Ecbatan, and went unto the Ancient Palace of Artambaces, which is one of the faireſt there. I ſuppoſe, Sir, that you do well remember how this famous Town hath ſeven Walls, one within another; that the Battlements for diſtinguiſhment are all of ſeveral heights; And to make the object more Magnificent unto the Eye of thoſe who behold them; they are Painted all with ſeveral colours; thoſe of the firſt were White; thoſe of the ſecond height, Black; thoſe of the third Red; the fourth Blue; the fifth Orange; the ſixth Silvered; and the ſeventh Guilt. And Sir, be pleaſed to know, that within the Circuit of this laſt Wall was the Palace of the King of Medes, ever ſince the Famous Deiocus did build theſe Proud Walls; and within the Circuit of that Wall next it, were the Palaces of thoſe Perſons which were of the Higheſt Quality. The Palace of Artambaces was between the Wall with Golden Battlements, and that with Silver; and as chance would have it, my Father's joyned unto it. As we were arrived at the Gate of Artambaces Palace, there we found a great number of his Ancient Friends, who there expected him; ſo that I could not preſent my hand unto my adored Ameſtris, to conduct her unto her Chamber, becauſe that great number of men which were there, ſtept in before, and preſented themſelves unto Hermaniſta and her. Until now, Sir, my Soul was all Joy and Love, that dangerous Serpent was lurked ſo cloſe under thoſe pleaſing flowers, that I did not diſcover its ſting. But from the firſt minute of my thoughts to part from Ameſtris, and to take my leave of her, then did love appear unto me immediately in a moſt horrid ſhape, I ſaw him Armed with his Bow and Arrows; I ſaw him with a Torch in his hand, and knew him perfectly to be the moſt Terrible of all the Gods. No ſooner did I perceive the company preparing to depart, but I bluſht and became dumb immediately; I was all ſerious and ſad; and looking upon Ameſtris without a Heart or a Tongue, my Mind told her many things which ſhe could not underſtand: In concluſion, part we muſt, and part we did, but it was with ſo much Sorrow, and ſo much Love, that never was Paſſion like unto mine. My Father asked me at night why I return'd ſo ſoon? But as I was going to Anſwer, in comes a Gentleman from Artambaces to thank him for all Civilities which he had found at his houſe; and indeed it fell out happily for me, becauſe my Soul was unquiet, and all ſo diſordered that I knew not how to frame a handſome anſwer unto my Father's queſtion. I retired then unto my Chamber, and was very indifferent what became of me. Me thought the Idea of fair Ameſtris haunted me always, and I could not forbear admiring her Beauty, her Wit and her Judgment: My imagination preferred her before all that the Court had amiable; and I could find nothing comparable to her. I was aſtoniſhed to ſee one brought up in the Country, and in a Country ſo far remote, ſhould not be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe which were moſt accompliſhed in the Court, neither in her Garb, or her Habit, or her Language; I conſidered her as an abſolute Miracle. Then thus eſteeming of her, you may be certain that I admired her with abundance of ſatisfaction. But that which I did think moſt ſtrange, was that in ſpite of my heart, I was unquiet and melancholly. What would I have? (ſaid I unto my ſelf) How comes it to paſs that the Beauty of my Loved and Ador'd Ameſtris ſhould not produce the ſame effects in my Soul, which other Beautiful objects do uſe to do? For commonly the ſight of Fair and Fine things does fill our imaginations with delight; from whence comes it then, my divine Ameſtris, that in thinking upon you, I ſhould be thus turbulent and diſordered?

ordered? But on the contrary, have I not ſufficient cauſe to be content? I have ſeen you the firſt of any in your coming to the Court; and had the good fortune to find you in a houſe where I was able to pay ſome part of that ſervice which is your due; and after ſuch a manner it was performed, as the Civility muſt needs invite you to prefer me before the acquaintances you ſhall get at Court: At the leaſt I have this advantage, to be the firſt of your acquaintance who admires you, and —— (at this word I ſtopped, not knowing whether I ſhould ſay) who Eſteems, Loves, and Adores you. But determining the matter in my ſelf, after I had a while conſulted with my thoughts, No, no, my Heart (ſaid I) conſider it no more, confeſs that thou doſt Eſteem, and Love, and Adore Ameſtris; and if there be any other Phraſe more fit to expreſs ſo violent a Paſſion, make uſe of it upon this occaſion, and publiſh unto all the World how happy thou art to be the firſt Conqueſt of ſo perfect a Beauty. From whence then comes all this Melancholly? (ſaid I in my ſelf, and examining the cauſe) But alas Sir, I was yet a very ſimplician in Love; and did not know that the nature of this Paſſion was to bring a reſtleſs diſpoſition with it. I knew not that the happineſs, which a Lover hopes for, does afflict him; that the Favours he enjoys do make him reſtleſs; and that which he has loſt, makes him deſperate. I was ſuch a Novice as I knew not, that Grief and Melancholly were inſeparable Concomitants of Love; That a Lover never gets a Conqueſt without pain; That he can never keep his Miſtreſs without Trouble, nor cannot loſe her unleſs he loſe his Reaſon alſo. But yet I reſted not long in this Ignorance, for I had ſuch ſad experience of its rage, as never man became more knowing than my ſelf, in all the fantaſtical giddy humours of Love. After I had throughly conſulted with my apprehenſions; I did conclude, that without all manner of doubt, I was in Love; and that reſtleſs diſpoſition which reigned over me, did very apparently proceed from that Fear which is always born with Love, to wit, leſt he which Loves, ſhould not be beloved by her he does love And when I began to think, that perhaps all my Services would not find a Favourable reception : this Word perhaps did ſeem moſt ſad unto me ; and that uncertainty was ſo tormentive,that I became almoſtmad.So that if I durſt have followed that folly which poſſeſſed me, I ſhould have accuſed Ameſtris of that which ſhe never thought upon, and deſired her to recompence a Love which yet ſhe knew not of, and of which I my ſelf but a little before was ignorant. I ſhall deſire your Pardon, Sir, if I do parricularly relate unto you the rovings of my Paſſion: For I conceive it will be pertinent unto my deſign, that you ſhould know them ; leſt you ſhould be aſtoniſhed to find with what Violences I have been tormented in all the ſequel of my life. After I had then paſſed over that night with much turbulency of mind, I aroſe in the morning, and intended to preſent my ſelf with my father unto Artambaces, to accompany him when he went unto the King, ſuppoſing it to be in ſome kind a rendring of ſervice unto Ameſtris, in paying it unto one who was ſo near and dear unto her : In concluſion, Artambaces after he had ſaluted my Father, thanked me for my laſt civility, as a thing which obliged him very much ; for he was not ignorant that Aſtiages looked favourably upon me : We went then unto the Court, and to the King, where I could not chuſe but ſpeak of Ameſtris unto every one I met. I publiſhed unto all them whom I knew to be in love already, That their conſtancy would be put unto a dangerous trial ; and I warned all them which were not in love, that if they had any deſire to preſerve their liberty, to be ſure they never looked upon Ameſtris. Upon the matter, I may ſay, I ſpoke ſo, that I ſpoke too much , as you ſhall know by the ſequel of my diſcourſe. Preſently after, I asked my ſelf what deſign I had, in deſiring to gain ſo many hearts unto Ameſtris ? and where ſome ſecret reſentments of jealouſie bad me be ſilent in the midſt of all my diſcourſes of her. Going the next day unto Hermaniſta , I underſtood ſhe was not to be ſeen, becauſe ſhe found her ſelf very ill the laſt night.

The

Then I went to viſit ſome other Ladies, not in hopes of any diverſion, for there was now no thoughts of any ſuch thing in me, but only with Ameſtris: but my intentions were to ſpeak of her, not fearing to procure my ſelf any Rivals: ſo I went unto the rareſt beauties of all the Court and Town; and though it was not very judiciouſly done, to commend unto any fair one, the beauty of another, and that ſo extraordinarily as I did; yet I did it with ſuch aggravations, as I was ſure that I procured my ſelf the hate of all thoſe I ſaw that day: And I uſed the matter ſo, as there was none but Ameſtris her ſelf, who was ignorant that I was in love with her. I moved jealouſie in ſome, envy in others, and a curioſity in the wiſeſt. The next day Hermaniſta found her ſelf to be reaſonable well diſpoſed; all the Court came to viſit, and I, amongſt the reſt, the firſt. Ameſtris was very handſomly dreſt that day; and I thought her ſo wonderful fair, as I wiſh'd a hundred times that I might be ſo happy as to be her ſlave: She entertained me with much civility, and deſired me ſweetly, that I would tell her the names of all thoſe which came to viſit her, leſt ſhe ſhould out of ignorance commit a fault againſt their Quality: You may well ſuppoſe, Sir, that I received this command with abundance of ſatisfaction, and went not that day from her. I confeſs unto you, that I paſſed it over with different thoughts: both joy and ſorrow mingled in my ſoul; ſo that I could ſay, I enjoyed not pleaſure without pain; nor any pain without pleaſure: It is very true, as I told you before, that the whole Court came to viſit Hermaniſta; and it is more true, that the beauty of Ameſtris did charm them all: Not a Man did enter, but was amazed; nor a Woman, though the faireſt in all the Court, but bluſh'd to ſee her ſelf excelled by any Country Lady: It would be a hard matter to tell you, Sir, how much I joyed at the glory of Ameſtris; or to tell you how it troubled me to think that I was ſure to have as many Rivals as Men which ſaw her. That which moved moſt admiration in me, was, that in this firſt day of her viſits, ſhe committed not the leaſt abſurdity in all this ſo great and ſo long a converſation; and that ſhe received the commendations which every one did give her, with ſo much modeſty, that the faireſt of our Ladies, in ſpite of their eclipſe, could not chuſe but love her, and confeſs ſhe deſerved the eſteem of all the World. When moſt of the company was gone, only ſome five or ſix, whereof I was one; I began, like the reſt, to commend her; but ſhe told me, That though perhaps ſhe had not committed any groſs abſurdity in this meeting, yet ſhe had ſo many obligations to me, that though it may be ſhe did deſerve ſome commendations, yet ſhe was not to receive them from me. I would have anſwered her, and told her that ſhe might very well pretend unto my beſt commends and praiſes; yet ſhe would not ſuffer me, but began to diſcourſe of what ſhe had ſeen before: She highly commended the beauty of all thoſe who viſited her, and enquired more particularly of them; praiſing ſometimes the Wit of one, and ſometimes the Handſom Behaviour of another: I muſt confeſs unto you, Sir, that I was very much perplexed; for I obſerved every one found her to be ſo fair, that I was afraid to ſatisfy her curioſity, in ſpeaking over-well of any that might be my Rival: And I found by her inquiſitive curioſity of every one, that ſhe had a deſire not to be hated of them: I ſpoke therefore with as much moderation as I could: I commended my deareſt friends, though contrary to my cuſtom, with leſs zeal; leſt I ſhould perhaps help them to deſtroy my ſelf. Night drawing on, I muſt leave her; and as ſoon as I went from her, I went unto the King, where we talked of nothing but the beauty of Ameſtris, and that ſo advantagiouſly, as the King deſign'd a viſit unto Hermaniſta; and Artambaces told her, ſhe might expect him the next day; though his age, you know, might very well have diſpenſed with the curioſity of ſeeing fair Ladies: But the next day the King went thither, and, as the reſt did, acknowledged Ameſtris for a miracle: I cannot tell you how many ſlaves this Beauty captivated; how many Lovers threw off their old fetters, and entred into hers; and what a ſtrange Revolution ſhe cauſed amongſt all the Gallantry of Ecbatan. But I can very well tell you, that there was not one in all the Court which had not ſeen her, and which did not love her, or at the leaſt admire her, except one who was my friend, called Arbates, Brother unto Megabiſes, who was there; and who, as you know, is allied a little unto the Royal Family; This Man was of a good diſpoſition, and ſhewed much affection towards me; and I alſo returned unto him ſo much fidelity, that I preferred him before all the reſt of my friends: Arbates affected ſolitude, and never car'd for the converſation of Ladies, ſo that ſay what you would unto him, he could not be won unto this viſit; He was contented to ſee Artambaces, but he had never ſeen Hermaniſta, and by conſequence Ameſtris; yet I viſited this bright Star with a conſtant aſſiduity; and I had better opportunities than any other for it, becauſe there was a very great League of friendſhip betwixt Artambaces and my Father: Ameſtris had ſuch an abſolute power over my ſoul, and I ſo much reverence of her, that I durſt not diſcover the paſſions of my heart unto her, but did hide them with as much pains, as others to make theirs known; ſuch were my fears to anger her. Amongſt many others, I perceived that Megabiſes was one who was fettered in the chains of Ameſtris. This did very much vex me; and as I never uſed to conceal my ſoul from Arbates, ſo I acquainted him that his Brother Megabiſes was become my Rival, and asked his Counſel in the buſineſs: He gave it me, and doubtleſs moſt faithfully; He told me, That if he could poſſible, he would cure me of my dangerous diſeaſe; but if he found that he could not, then he would endeavour to cure his Brother: But he told me in the mean time how he thought it fitting, that ſince I was the firſt Lover of Ameſtris, ſince ſhe came to Court; So I ſhould be alſo the firſt which ſhould diſcover my Paſſion unto her: I thanked him for his faithful advice, and was ſo importunate with him to ſee Ameſtris, that in the end I prevail'd, upon condition I would undertake to prepare her, ſo as the converſation might be ſolitary, without multitudes of company.

I went then unto Ameſtris, whom by good fortune I found alone, ſo that I had an opportunity to ſpeak unto her unheard by any: Madam (ſaid I, after other indifferent Diſcourſe) you will perhaps think me very bold in not being contented with that honour which I have in coming to you my ſelf, but that I muſt alſo beg leave to bring a friend of mine, who paſſionately deſires to receive the ſame honour, altho it was never his cuſtom to viſit Ladies. I am the more obliged (anſwered ſhe) and ſince you think him worthy to be your friend, it would be a happineſs to me to become mine: Madam (ſaid I, and changing colour) I would deſire one favour from you, and, if it be poſſible, obtain it, That you would carry it ſo with my friend, as he may only eſteem and admire you, without loving you: I think (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling and bluſhing both together) that you deſire a very difficult matter; but ſince you forbid only impoſſibilities, I will do what I can to ſatisfie you: Ah Madam (ſaid I unto her) little do you think what you have ſaid; you would think this which I deſire, to be impoſſible, if yon did but know your ſelf as well as I do: Aglatidas (anſwered ſhe, with a more diſpleaſed ſmile) know, that I pretend unto no more, than that you who are a friend unto Artambaces my Father, ſhould not live with me as others do, from whom I endure their flatteries, out of complaiſance and cuſtom; but as for you, I would not have you uſe it; and if you continue theſe kind of ſpeeches unto me, you will force me to carry my ſelf ſo towards you, as perhaps may diſpleaſe you: Why, Madam (ſaid I to her) will you let all the world commend you, and will you not permit Aglatidas to ſay, that all the world does love you? or at leaſt I am certain it is ſo, if I may judg others by my ſelf. I confeſs, (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling, and turning her Diſcourſe unto jeſting) that ſince you ſpeak your affection unto me after ſo unuſual a way; and ſince, not in ſpeaking of your own fancy, but the fancy of the Court in general, I have no reaſon to blame you in particular; But (ſaid ſhe then, and changed her Diſcourſe) Go, bring your Friend, and as for the reſt, leave the care of it unto my ſmall merits, without any fear of his being captivated. I wiſh Madam (replied I) that he may be more happy than one of his deareſt friends is: You are ſo unwiſe (replied ſhe) that one may find out of your ſpeeches more ſubject to pity you, than to quarrel with you; therefore Aglatidas for this once I will be more indulgent to you; In ſaying ſo, ſhe roſe and went unto a Balcony which opened into a Garden, and called two of her women unto her, ſo that I ſaw ſhe deſired to break off diſcourſe. Then I went unto Artambaces and Hermaniſta, from whom, after I had held a little diſcourſe, I departed, and went to find out Arbates, unto whom I imparted the permiſſion I had obtained from Ameſtris. I related unto him all that I ſpoke unto her, and all her Anſwers, and how I deſired her to give Arbates leave to enjoy his freedom: It ſeems (ſaid he unto me ſmiling) that you are not only jealous of Megabiſes, and others who have ſeen your Ameſtris, but you are alſo jealous of Arbates who never ſaw her, and who never deſired to ſee her, and who never would have ſeen her if you had not deſired him: Arbates ſpoke this with ſuch an angry ſmile, that I was much puzled; certainly if I had not already asked leave of Ameſtris to bring him, I ſhou'd have been well contented to have let it alone: But as the caſe now ſtood, I ſhould have ſeemed too giddy-headed unto my Friend, and Ameſtris would have thought it ſtrange if I did not bring him; yet when I conſidered that Megabiſes was his Brother, and a Lover of Ameſtris, I thought my ſelf ſafe enough; and that which ſo much troubled me before, did now not at all diſquiet me, ſuppoſing that Arbates would never become a Rival unto his Brother and his Friend both at once. I remained ſilent a good while after I had propounded unto my ſelf that Arbates ſhould not ſee Ameſtris: But upon a ſudden I ſaid, No, no, I will not deprive Ameſtris of the acquaintance with ſo compleat a Man as Arbates; or him of the incomparable delight in hers; but if ſhe ſhould chance to enchain me (ſaid he ſmiling) what would become of our friendſhip? Then if you break thoſe chains (anſwered I) for the love of me, our friendſhip will be more ſtrong. But what if I cannot (replied he) will you then blame me? I know not (replied I) but yet I know that I do not ſee how any one ſhould love a Rival: Never then (anſwered he) put me to the hazard of loſing your friendſhip; and ſince Ameſtris is ſo terrible and dangerous, leave me to my ſolitude, and let me enjoy my liberty; for if I ſhould have the misfortune to loſe it, I know not whether I ſhould hate you more for being the cauſe of it, or you me for being your Rival: not that I find any diſpoſition in my ſelf why I ſhould fear any ſuch thing at all; but on the contrary, I perceive the ſpirits of the moſt rational Men are ſo weakned by this Paſſion, as I will never be without an Antidote againſt this ſo dangerous a Poiſon: Fear me not Aglatidas (ſaid he to me) and believe, that if I do loſe my Liberty, it ſhall not be without ſtrong oppoſition. When you were catcht, Love took you unprovided, and put a trick upon you: You went into the Countrey to enjoy your ſolitude, and unexpectedly you find Ameſtris there; you were not prepared for ſo ſudden an aſſault: Your eyes were blinded with over-ſudden light; your Reaſon was confuſed, and your Heart was ſurpriſed: and therefore it was no wonder if ſhe captivated a Man who had no Arms wherewith to defend himſelf? But it is not ſo with me; for all the world tells me of it, you your ſelf tell it, and that a hundred times, how Ameſtris is the Faireſt upon Earth; and from theſe reports I have fancied ſo perfect an Idea of her, that I am abſolutely perſwaded ſhe cannot ſurprize me; and perhaps too I have overfancied her, and ſhall find her a meaner Beauty than my expectation look'd for: Moreover, I go with reſolved intentions to diſpute with her for my heart, as much as poſſible; and ſince my Brother loves her, and you love her, very reaſon ſaies, that there is no danger I ſhall be captivated. I told him, that I wiſhed as much; yet I could not chuſe but fear the contrary. Arbates not being able to forbear laughing, You are ſo ſimple (ſaid he to me) that the very fear which I have to be like you, may well make your mind at reſt; yet notwithſtanding let me tell you whilſt it is time, if you pleaſe, I will not ſee her, ſince there is nothing but hazard in it. I confeſs unto you, Sir, that I was in a hundred minds whether or no I ſhould take him at his word, but I could not reſolve upon it; I found ſuch folly in my procedure, that I was confounded; at laſt I told Arbates that I would not alter my mind, but to morrow after dinner we would go unto Ameſtris. Arbates, as I have deſcribed him, was ſomething ſolitary, but he was none of thoſe angry Melancholiques whoſe converſation was clowniſh or incommodious; but on the contray he was of a very pleaſant diſpoſition in any company which pleaſed him. The cauſe of his reſervedneſs was not any melancholly compoſition in his natural temper; but it was becauſe he was of a more delicate fine ſpirit, which without much difficulty could not endure the leaſt fault in his Friends: he looked for perfection in every thing, and could not endure defects; ſo that ſince it was a hard matter to find many exactly perfect, therefore he found but few to love, and many to ſhun: As for me, he did me the favour to find an exception for me out of the general Rule, and forced his inclination to love me.

The next day we went unto Ameſtris, with whom we found Megabiſes, who was the moſt aſſiduous obſervant of all my Rivals, and moſt to be feared, being without queſtion the handſomeſt and compleateſt Man about the Court. As ſoon as we entred, I preſented Arbates unto Hermaniſta, and after to Ameſtris; they received us both with much civility, and treated us after ſuch a manner as I might diſcern they eſteemed thoſe whom I did; for beſides the common reſpect which was due, and which they rendred unto his condition and merit, they did things in ſuch an obliging manner, as told me, without words, that the Favours which Arbates received, were partly done for the love of Aglatidas, das. To ſpeak truly, thoſe firſt welcomes which he received, becauſe they could not be attributed unto his merit, in ſo ſhort acquaintance, therefore they were far from moving any jealouſie in me, but rather much joyed me; not but that I had ſome far-fetcht fears leſt this civility ſhould engage Arbates more than I would have him, but becauſe ſhe did quickly diſſipate them. The Converſation therefore was very pleaſant that day; for Megabiſes was ſo ſurpris'd to ſee his Brother amongſt Ladies, that he could not forbear telling Ameſtris, this was one of the greateſt miracles of her beauty: Think not, Madam (ſaid he) that my Brother comes hither to find in you all thoſe excellencies which all the world admires: But on the contrary, Madam, I dare aſſure you, that he would be raviſh'd with joy to find, if it were poſſible, any imperfection in your Beauty, or any fault in your Language: any dulneſs in your Wit, or any harſhneſs in your Humours. Perhaps it would be advantagious unto Megabiſes, and many others (replied Arbates) that the fair Ameſtris had ſome imperfections, ſo that ſhe could cenſure theirs; but as for me (who never look for any defects, but becauſe I look for perfections) I am raviſhed with joy to find them all in one; and to ſee my ſelf undeceived in that error wheren I have been, in believing that there was nothing perfect in the World. You are a very good flatterer, for a ſolitary Man, replied Ameſtris. I am very ſincere, Madam, (replied he) and therefore I freely tell you what I think: After this, Hermaniſta diverted the diſcourſe; News and Court-diverſions was all that afternoons entertainment. For my part, I ſpoke but little all the day: I was ſo taken up with looking upon Ameſtris, and obſerving Megabiſes, Arbates, and Otanes, that I cared not for diſcourſe: I ſaw Megabiſes grew every day more in Love; and a Hundred others alſo were daily captivated: Arbates, for a Man who affected ſolitude, methought was much pleaſed with this firſt days converſation; and Ameſtris did deal her civilities with ſuch equality, and covered her thoughts with ſo much Modeſty, that I could not diſcover any Partiality. Indeed I was very unquiet all the time, inſomuch as Ameſtris perceiving it, did pleaſingly chide me, ſaying, That if ſhe had not known how I had a better Reputation than my Friend, ſhe ſhould have taken Aglatidas for Arbates, and Arbates for Aglatidas: Yet I thought my ſelf happy that Ameſtris would take any notice of my naughty Humour; and Arbates was very well ſatisfied, ſo that his accuſtomed Solitude appeared no more melancholly than any other. Night being come, every one retires to his own Lodging: I carried Arbates unto my Father's Houſe; and becauſe I had a mind for to treat him civilly, I carried him upon a Tarras, where we ſaw the River Orontes, which runs by Ecbatan: We took two turns upon that Tarras, and ſpoke not a word: Arbates not daring, perhaps, to tell me what he thought of Ameſtris; nor I daring to ask him his Opinion. But here, Sir, you may admire at the fantaſticalneſs of Love: I proteſt unto you, I equally feared that Arbates would commend Ameſtris too much, or that he would not commend her enough: I feared that he would not diſapprove of my Choice; and I feared that he himſelf would chuſe where I had choſen before him. I being then thus perplexed, as I have told you, and walking ſilently two turns about the Tarras, at laſt I broke the ſilence, and ſaid with a little forced ſigh, Well Arbates, have you defended your ſelf very well? has not the fair Ameſtris made a Rival of the deareſt Friend I have? You are ſo jealous (anſwered Arbates) that to break that ill habit, I will not ſatisfie your curioſity: I will only tell you thus much, That I think Ameſtris to be worthy of all admiration: But if you admire her (ſaid I to him) I believe you love her alſo. That is not an abſolute neceſſity (anſwered he) nor a neceſſary conſequence; yet I will not talk any more of it; for I would work a cure upon your mind, and inſenſibly unaccuſtom you not to fancy Monſters to fight withal. Ah my dear Arbates (ſaid I to him) leave me not in the midſt of theſe uncertainties; Tell me, I beſeech you, what are your real thoughts of Ameſtris? What would you have me tell you (anſwered he)? if I commend her, you will ſay I am in love; and if I diſcommend her, you will ſay that I either deceive you, or have loſt my reaſon: It is no matter (ſaid I to him) though you ſhould let me know that you only eſteem her, but I would know whether your heart be not taken; and whether you love her ſo much, as you muſt one day hate me for it? I know not what's to come (anſwered he); but for the preſent I know I am infinitely obliged unto you, for bringing me to the knowledge of the faireſt Lady in the world. I confeſs, Sir, that ſeeing Arbates ſpoke with ſuch freedom of ſpirit, I did believe all his tart anſwers had been only in jeſt, and mocks at my imbecility: ſo that being aſhamed of my ſelf, I left off troubling him, and went quietly to ſupper. In concluſion, I found, that though Arbates was extreamly wounded with the beauty of Ameſtris, yet he would not be forced to love her; and by the power of his virtue, he reſiſted it as much as he could, and ſtrove with all his ſtrength not to become a Rival unto his Brother and his Friend, ſuch a Friend too, who had made choice of him to be his Confident, and without whom he had never ſeen Ameſtris.

It is to be believed, that what he told unto one who was a Friend both to him and me, was true; That he did all things poſſible not to love her: But, Sir, all was in vain; Love made a wonderful ſtrange alteration in him: until now he ſeemed to be the moſt ſincere and faithful Friend unto me of all men that ever I did meet withal; but he became upon a ſudden the vileſt Cheat upon the Earth: We met many days, but not a word of Ameſtris, as if he had never ſeen her. He did ſo cure all my Jealouſies of him by this cunning, that I deſired him to let us viſit her ſometimes, but he denied it very ſtifly: and indeed he was many days, and never went unto her: But to my misfortune, I knew afterwards that he had ſeen her thrice in the Temple, twice walking in the Garden of the King's Palace; and once walking upon the Banks of the River Orontes, where ſhe often uſed to walk. Arbates then ſeeming unto me to be far from any deſign upon Ameſtris, I kept correſpondency with him; I ſpoke to him concerning my Paſſion, and asked his Counſel. When I told him, that I had not yet followed his Counſel in diſcovering my love unto her as ſoon as I could, becauſe ſhe did ſhun all ſuch occaſions; then he anſwered me thus; When I counſelled you to ſpeak of your Paſſion ſo ſoon, I did not then know Ameſtris: But oh Gods, Aglatidas (ſaid he) I have much altered my Opinion upon ſight of her, and find, that the grave modeſty which I obſerved in her Countenance, doth tell me you muſt not diſcover your love too haſtily and lightly unto her. Believe me (ſaid this treacherous Friend) you muſt not think to tell Ameſtris of any love, until you rendred her a hundred ſervices, and until you have brought her to that paſs, as ſhe cannot deny you without ingratitude. This way (ſaid I) is very far-fetcht; Yes, it is ſo (ſaid he) but it is very ſure, and the other very dangerous: for (ſaid he) what if ſhe ſhould be diſpleaſed when you diſcover your Paſſion? if ſhe ſhould forbid you to ſee her? if ſhe ſhould ſhun you, or if ſhe ſhould hate you; what courſe would you take then? Surely (replied I) I ſhould die: But (continued I) if ſhe be never acquainted with my Paſſion; if I never muſt tell her, but let my Rivals be more favoured than my ſelf, and ſpeak of their loves, how can ſhe come to know of mine? Would you have her recompence me for that which ſhe is ignorant of? I would have her know it (anſwered he) but I would have it after ſuch a manner as will not diſpleaſe her; I would have her heart engaged a little to embrace your love when you tell it openly: But who ſhall engage, replied I, this illuſtrious heart of Ameſtris? Your endeavours, your ſervices, your reverence, and your ſilence (anſwered he) whereas others procure her hatred by their importunities: And believe me, Aglatidas, although I am not acquainted with matters of love, more than by report of others; as I have examined the Paſſion in it ſelf, knowing the cauſe, I can gueſs at the effects: Be aſſured then, that if you love, Ameſtris will come to the knowledge of it; Love is a fire, which ſhines as well as burns; and cannot be, but be diſcovered. Therefore Aglatidas, reſt contented concerning that: Let all your cares be to find out ways of ſerving her whom you adore, and make her plainly know your love without telling her. Thus, Sir, this cunning Arbates, who knew well enough my diſpoſition, cauſed me to reſolve not to diſcover my Paſſion more than I had already, unto Ameſtris, or any elſe: But though all the Court did ſuſpect me to be in love, yet I confeſſed it unto none but Arbates: And though many others did appear to be before me, yet I kept my ſelf within the limits which my unfaithful Friend preſcribed me; I promiſed to order my ſelf according to his directions: and he alſo promiſed me to take off one of my moſt dangerous Rivals, not conceiving it, as he told me, that this Deſign was advantagious unto Megabiſes. Indeed he promiſed very fair; but alas, all was for his own ends, as afterwards you ſhall know. Then, Sir, the true reaſon why he would not go ſo often unto Ameſtris, was, not only to hide from me his love unto her, but alſo that the counſel which he intended to give unto Megabiſes his brother, might not be ſuſpected. In the morning therefore he went into his Chamber, where he found him alone, and after diſcourſe of a hundred indifferent matters, he asked him how he would beſtow the day? Megabiſes, who did not ſuſpect the ſubtilty of his Brother, anſwered him ingeniouſly, that he would ſpend the day with Hermaniſta: You ſhould have ſaid (Ameſtris, anſwered Arbates, laughing and ſcoffing at him) for what vertue is there in Hermaniſta? If Ameſtris had no beauty, I believe you would not viſit Artambaces ſo often. It is true (anſwered Megabiſes) but what do I more than all the Court does? Aglatidas, who is your ſpecial Friend, is not he continually with Ameſtris as well as I? Yes (anſwered the falſe Arbates) and I would to heavens he were not ſo; for loving his quiet as I do, I wiſh he would not trouble himſelf with a Deſign which cannot be advantagious unto thoſe who are ſo much bent upon it. I know very well (replied Megabiſes) that Love is a reſtleſs Paſſion, which affords no ſerene delights; yet for all that, if Arbates did experimentally know it, he would not be ſo forward to blame thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it; and would find, that how rigorous ſoever the pains of love do ſeem to be, yet it affords more delight than all the pleaſures in the World, which are not cauſed by it. Yet this wherein you are engaged (anſwered Arbates) is ſo full of danger, that I would do any thing in the World which were in my power to divert you; begin then with Aglatidas (ſaid Megabiſes, embracing his brother) and believe me, I ſhall be more obliged unto you for curing his diſeaſe, than mine. I'll do my beſt (replied Arbates) and perhaps I have already done more to him than you. Oh Heavens (replied Megabiſes) is it poſſible that you can divert Aglatidas from prejudicing me concerning Ameſtris? Certainly (anſwered Arbates) I will do all that is in my power that Aglatidas ſhall not prejudice other Lovers of Ameſtris: But deceive not your ſelf, and know, that it is not with any intention that Megabiſes ſhall get any more intereſt in her by it. But on the contrary, I wiſh with all my heart that he would prejudice others no more than I would have Aglatidas prejudice him: What then would you have me do? (replied Megabiſes) I would (anſwered Arbates) have you ſtrive to ſtifle a Paſſion which has much weakneſs in it in general, and will in this particular procure you much unprofitable trouble: for, ſaid he, there are a hundred more which promote the ſame Deſign; and which is more, you are to court one whoſe heart is ſtone, and therefore difficult to be pierced. Difficulty (anſwered Megabiſes) is the life of love: Yes, replied Arbates, but impoſſibilities will make it die. It is true, anſwered Megabiſes, but why is it impoſſible that one of my quality ſhould marry the Daughter of Artambaces? I do not hold it abſolutely impoſſible, replied Arbates, that Megabiſes ſhould marry Ameſtris: But I do not hold it an eaſie matter to be beloved; for I know by Aglatidas, who is very well informed of it, that Ameſtris, for all her modeſty, is ſo paſſionately in love with her own beauty, that ſhe is abſolutely incapable of loving any thing elſe: Then Brother, do you imagine it ſuch a happineſs to marry a Woman who loves her Looking-glaſs better than her Husband? and whoſe Soul is ſenſible of nothing but her own attracts?

Moreover, continued he, aſſuming a more ſerious Countenance, Ameſtris is Daughter to Artambaces, a baniſhed man eighteen years ſince, and who has made his peace no otherwiſe, but becauſe Ciaxares (who hates him in behalf of the Queen of Perſia his Siſter) is not now here. Do you not think, ſince Aſtiages is ſo very old, that Artambaces muſt pack out of Ecbatan the very ſame day that Ciaxares leaves Cappadocia, and aſſumes the Crown of Medea? Imagine then, Megabiſes, what pleaſure you will have in leaving this Kingdom, to live in the Province of the Triſantines with a proud inſenſible Woman, who will waſt your Fortunes in lieu of advancing them; and who then, perhaps, will not be ſo fair (for a hundred things beſides Age may decay a Beauty) nor contribute any thing to your ſatisfaction. Ah Brother, ſaid Megabiſes, you are deceived, Ameſtris will be for ever fair: Do but aſſiſt me ſo far as to marry her, and never trouble your ſelf with my good Fortunes afterwards. What tho I be baniſhed? I care not tho ſhe be inſenſible, it is no matter, ſo we be baniſhed together; for then I ſhall enjoy my good fortune with more freedom; and if ſhe be incapable of loving any thing, then I ſhall be free from all cauſes of Jealouſie: Therefore if you love me, aſſiſt, but no more oppoſe my Paſſion: You deſire that of me which I cannot do (anſwered Arbates) we muſt not give poiſon unto frantick Friends when they ask it, principally to you. Hard-hearted, inſenſible brother (replied Megabiſes) I do almoſt wiſh you my Rival to puniſh you for condemning my Paſſion ſo ſeverely; and to teach you experimentally, that love is not a voluntary buſineſs: You would, perhaps, repent you of your wiſh, replied Arbates, if it could poſſibly be; but however, confeſs unto me thus far, That you would be more happy if you were at liberty, than you are at preſent: then promiſe me only, that you will endeavour a while to break out of your priſon. Never think it poſſible for me to do it, replied Megabiſes; but becauſe I will not deny you in every thing, I will promiſe you to try; though to tell you truth, it is as good as if I promiſed you nothing. Arbates perceiving that he could work no more upon the mind of his brother, left him for that time; reſolving to diſpence with the intereſt of a brother and a friend, and promote his own love before theirs. I was perſwaded, as he ſaid himſelf, that he was forced unto this by the extremity and violence of his paſſion, and that he did take up the humour without much reſiſtance unto himſelf. But I am perſwaded, that let love be never ſo potent, it neither can nor ought to force us unto things which are contrary unto Honour or Honeſty: and that though this paſſion be the moſt noble, yet it muſt not excuſe any baſe or wicked act. However Arbates was involved into a moſt perplexed condition: He was deeply in love with one whom he durſt not viſit, leſt changing his retired life, he ſhould grow too palpable, and become ſuſpected by his Brother and my ſelf. He was violently in love, but durſt not diſcover it: He had two Rivals whom he loved, and whom he was engaged to love. His Brother commanded him not to be his hinderance, and he had paſſed his promiſe to aſſiſt me. He aſſured me, that he would do all in his power to reclaim Megabiſes; and he told Megabiſes that he would ſet Aglatidas free. What ſhould he do then to ſee Ameſtris, to betray his Brother, to deceive his Friend, and to promote himſelf unto their prejudice? He knew they were inſeparable from Ameſtris, What courſe could he then take to viſit her every day without being ſuſpected by us both? And what cunning could he uſe to bring about his deſign? Prepare your ſelf, Sir, to hear the moſt notable piece of Treaſon that ever Love did prompt any man unto, and be perſwaded that you muſt needs be amazed at what I am to tell you. Arbates then a while after came and told me, that he had imployed the beſt of his endeavours to reclaim his Brother, and cure his paſſion: and indeed, as the thing was true, ſo he related it ſo punctually, as I made no queſtion of the truth: I thought my ſelf ſo obliged unto him for it, that I think if he had diſcovered his own love unto me, I ſhould have returned ſo much friendſhip unto him, as to have died, and yielded up my intereſt of Ameſtris to him alſo; ſo ſenſible was I of ſo great a benefit, and addicted unto the Laws of Generoſity. Whilſt Arbates had ſufficiently amuſed me for ſome time by the relation of all he had ſaid unto Megabiſes, and all Megabiſes anſwers unto him; he perſonated himſelf of another humour with his Brother, and feigning himſelf by little and little to be very compaſſionate unto his Brother, he acted his part ſo well, that Megabiſes made him his deareſt confident: He was his only Oracle, and was guided only by his Orders as well as I. As Arbates feared nothing more, than that Megabiſes and I ſhould find him alone with Ameſtris; and moreover, finding that according to his Plot there was a neceſſity of our being often with her; So I was ſure to give notice unto Megabiſes of the time when I ought to be with her, and alſo to give me notice in my courſe when my Brother ſhould be there; Inſomuch as ſince he tranſacted in our buſineſs, we never ſaw Ameſtris, one without the other. Love and Jealouſie moved him to fear one Rival ſingle with Ameſtris, more than many together. Yet he had this piece of prudence, to deſire me, both for my intereſt and his own, not to quarrel with my Brother, and to aſſure me alwaies upon his word, that he would tranſact with all his power to ruin the deſigns of Megabiſes, which alſo, as he told me, did not pleaſe him: He alſo adviſed my Brother not to quarrel with me, leſt when we were gone far off to fight, others might in the interim ſtep in and ſupplant him: and thus we lived. Megabiſes he complained that I was a perpetual obſtacle unto him; and I complained that Megabiſes was the ſame to me; As for Ameſtris, ſhe lived in ſuch wiſdom and reſervedneſs, that her vertue could not diſcover any of his Projects. It is certain, that notwithſtanding her impatial behaviour and civility which ſhe uſed unto all that came unto her; yet every one obſerved that Megabiſes and I had a greater ſhare in her eſteem than any elſe; and that Otanes, who doubtleſs you have ſeen in the Court of Medea, was the man moſt hated and ſcorn'd: for my part I could not diſcover any more extraordinary favour from her than unto many others: but thought that Megabiſes was the happier of the two; inſomuch as I could not forbear to complain continually of Arbates: Megabiſes for his part he thought that I was better treated than himſelf,and complained alſo of his Brother, who indeed intended to betray us both alike. One night then, when we were alone in my Chamber, My dear Arbates (ſaid I to him) how long will you hold me in hopes? and how long muſt the Paſſion of Megabiſes perſecute me? Why has the enticing eyes of Ameſtris made a Lover of my Friend's Brother? and ſuch a Lover upon whom they look more favourably, if my jealouſie do not much deceive me? Ah my dear Arbates (ſaid I) if Megabiſes had not ſuch relation unto you, my Sword ſhould long ſince have done me right, and revenged that injuſtice which is done unto my Love, which I am ſure preceded his, and which perhaps would have been more faithful and ſincere unto me. Arbates ſeemed much touched at my complaints and ſorrows: Sometimes he would deſire pardon for his Brother's injuries; ſometimes thank me for the reſpect which I had unto his friendſhip; and ſometimes he entreated me to continue it. After he had asked as much as he deſired, looking ſuddenly upon me with a troubled countenance: You ſhall ſee, Aglatidas (ſaid he) if Arbates did not love you, and love you as much as one can love another, he would not make that Propoſition unto you which he is about, and act ſuch a piece of Treaſon as he has premeditated: Know then (ſaid he) I know but one way which will infallibly break the deſigns of Megabiſes upon Ameſtris: Ha! my dear Arbates (ſaid I) let us quickly take that happy way, if it will rid me of my Rival, who is ſo much to be doubted; You know (ſaid he to me) that Megabiſes loves me with abundance of tenderneſs, ſo that he will perhaps do that for my preſervation, which he would not do for my prayers and reaſons: I muſt then (ſaid he) for a certain time ſeem more troubled and melancholique than I uſe to be; and when he asks me the reaſon of it, and preſſeth me importunately more than once, I will tell him that I am in love with Ameſtris; and that all my trouble and melancholly was nothing elſe but my endeavours to overcome my own paſſion, which I could not do: In concluſion, I will intreat him, and preſs him to take ſome care of my life, and with tears, and ſighs, and ſorrows diſpute with him for the Victory: I know very certainly (ſaid he) that he loves me moſt dearly, and that it will go hard with him to reſiſt me. I bluſh (ſaid this vile perfidious Arbates) my dear Friend, to propound ſo horrid a Treaſon, but what will not one do for a Friend he loves? But my dear Arbates (ſaid I, embracing him, and fearing he ſhould be offended at what I was intending to tell him) ſince the Friendſhip you have with me moves you ſo ſtrongly to deceive Megabiſes; what would you not do both to him and me, if you ſhould chance become in love with Ameſtris? And may I not fear, that counterfeiting to be ſo in Love, you ſhould become really ſo? Is it ſo (Replied the crafty Arbates, ſeeming very angry) do you thus take the proofs of my affection? Take heed Aglatidas, leſt if I keep within the ſimple limits of reaſon, I do not aſſiſt Megabiſes againſt you, and prefer the conſideration of Blood before that of Friendſhip. Arbates pronounced theſe words with ſo ſerious a look, that I thought I had angred him; ſo that checking my ſelf, I began to truſt in his Promiſes, and ſpoke him ſo fair, that his counterfeit choler was appeaſed, and his anſwers were ſo well, that my fears did vaniſh. I confeſs, Sir, that at the firſt this Propoſition did aſtoniſh me, but conſidering the benefit which I might perhaps receive by it, and reſolving that I would never loſe Ameſtris without loſing my life; I thought it better to have recourſe unto gentleneſs than force, and conſented unto his Plot, having no ſuſpicion or jealouſie, or any imagination of his real being in love with her: fearing only leſt he ſhould hereafter be intangled. Mean time this was ſufficient for him to have the freedom of ſeeing Ameſtris, without ut incurring any diſpleaſure from me; but yet he wanted the ſame advantage over his Brother's mind, therere the next Morning he went unto him and deceived im as well as me, and almoſt after the ſame manner, ough the reaſons which he uſed were not the ſame. He found Megabiſes in the King's Garden, where he was formed he might find him: as ſoon as he met him; What makes you here Brother (ſaid he to him) whilſt erhaps Aglatidas is with Ameſtris? at leaſt I am certain e went this Morning to Artambaces. You would do uch better (anſwered Megabiſes roughly) to be no ore his Friend, but rather leave him unto my fury d jealouſie, than to tell me of his tenders to Ameſtris: Never think that I am able to endure this complacential ay; my Patience will not always ſuffer Aglatidas to e the Friend of Arbates, and to be favoured by her I ove; Aglatidas (I ſay) who of all my Rivals is the nly man I fear, and he alone can come in competition ith me. Arbates was ſurpris'd and aſtoniſhed at this, nd looking upon Megabiſes, Why Brother (ſaid he) would you have me break with Aglatidas, becauſe he is our Rival? He who is ſo generous as not to break with e, although you be his Rival, and I your Brother; who has asked me pardon a hundred and a hundred imes, for that it was his ill fortune to be ſo ingaged n the Love of Ameſtris; who moreover loved her before you knew her; and who has lately given me ſome hopes to conquer his paſſion for the love of you and me? et for ought I ſee (ſaid the crafty Arbates, ſeeming very ngry, and offering to go away) you take all the good offices which I have done you, in ſo bad a ſenſe, as I will trouble my ſelf no more about them. Ah my ear Brother (ſaid Megabiſes, ſtaying him) I pray you pardon an unfortunate man, who hath loſt the uſe of his reaſon, and leave him not thus in deſpair: I ſaw (continued he) that you loved my Rival ſo much, that I took you for him, and againſt my will my anger ſurpriſed me, and forced me to ſay ſomething, which perhaps has angred you. But pardon me, I moſt heartily beſeech you: and ſince it is ſo that you love me, and love Aglatidas both, cauſe him, I conjure you, to leave loving Ameſtris, for I am not able to endure it; he muſt either leave loving, or elſe I muſt leave living. You are very violent (replied Arbates) and what likelihood is there to help a man who is ſo incapable of reaſon? one who would have me to renounce all manner of generoſity, to ſatisfie an unruly paſſion? Love (replied Megabiſes) excuſes all ſorts of injuries. Remember what you ſay (replied Arbates) and to prevent ſuch an inconvenience, as that my Brother and Friend ſhould quarrel, I will become a Traitor unto Aglatidas in behalf of Megabiſes. At theſe words Arbates ſtopt, the better to examine himſelf concerning the Propoſition which he was to make (for Megabiſes related it all afterwards) and after he had a while ruminated upon the matter, he began to ſpeak in a more ſerious Tone; Hitherto, Brother, (ſaid he) I have tranſacted with Aglatidas only by perſwaſive reaſons, to give over his Paſſion; he, I ſay, who reſpects you much, and who doubtleſs bears as great a Love to you as me: But now ſince I perceive your Love is grown unto ſuch an extremity, and ſince I fear my affection to Aglatidas ſhould hazard his Life, I will follow your own Maxims, without conſideration of what is juſt, or what unjuſt. I will therefore counterfeit a falſe Friendſhip unto Aglatidas, and ask his pardon for a ſecret which I am to reveal: I will tell him, that when I endeavoured to reclaim his Love, that it was meerly for my own intereſt, and not for his nor yours. In concluſion, I will earneſtly pray him and preſs him, that he will give me leave to love and ſerve Ameſtris, as a hundred others do the like; telling, that otherwiſe it will coſt me my life; conjuring with all feigned tears and ſighs, not to hate me, or ſuffer me to deſpair: But how will this feat advantage me (replied Megabiſes)? I hope (anſwered Arbates) that perhaps he will yield Ameſtris unto me, or at the leaſt when he knows that I am in love with her, he will not think it ſtrange if I viſit her, and not ſuſpect that I am with her upon your account. Ah Brother (ſaid Megabiſes) if Aglatidas knows how to love, he will never yield unto you, but will diſpute the matter as well with you as me. However, replied Arbates, you will get this advantage by it, that you will have a faithful man about Ameſtris, who will defeat all the deſigns of your Rival, and advance your own. Your Reaſon is good (anſwered the too credulous Megabiſcs) but Brother (ſaid he) I ſaw you once with Ameſtris, was it not becauſe you did then a little love her? When I was there (replied Arbates ſmiling) I loved your Rival too well, and it was at his importunity that I came thither; and he thought ſo little of any ſuch thing, that I think you need not be jealous of your Brother: Conſider it well, ſaid he, and reſolve whether I ſhould ſerve you, or whether I ſhould not: for I aſſure you, I ſhould think my ſelf much obliged unto you, if you would not employ me in any ſuch infidelity to my Friend. Megabiſes ſeeing ſuch an indfferency in the mind of Arbates, aſſured himſelf, nor could ſuſpect that man who loved both Aglatidas and himſelf ſo much, would ever fall in love with Ameſtris: And thus, Sir, he cozened both him and me, and brought all things to the paſs he deſired. In concluſion, he aſſured me, that he had acted his part unto Megabiſes, according as was covenanted between us: He expreſſed his ſorrows and deſpair to the life, and told me, that he would not abſolutely promiſe him to ſee Ameſtris no more, but he had given him permiſſion to ſee her, and to endeavour with her in his behalf, Swearing unto him, that if I found her more tractable, he ſhould then abſolutely retreat, and leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of his good fortune; Then, Sir, the ſame which Arbates told me, he told alſo unto Megabiſes: and perſwaded him that I reſpected you ſo much, as to yield up Ameſtris unto you, and that he ſhould alſo permit him his leave to ſee; and then, Sir, there was nothing which could oppoſe his joy; ſo that he told us ſeverally, there was no more to be done, but for him to court her in their behalfs daily, and to gain her eſteem by ſome particular civility. But ſaid I then to him, My dear Arbates, if ſhe ſhould chance to love you in earneſt, during this fiction, where were we then? I fear not that (anſwered he) and doubtleſs it was the leaſt of his fears) for my own defects aſſure me of the contrary: And moreover (continued he) I will faithfully promiſe you, that when I am alone with her, I will not then ſpeak a word to her but in your behalf, and therefore there is no danger at all. In a word, Sir, Arbates did ſo work upon the mind of Megabiſes and me, as we did conſent that he ſhould viſit Ameſtris, and that he ſhould be very aſſiduous with her; I leave you to judge, Sir, if ever the like chance happened: and if ever there was a more proſperous cheat for a while; for ſince I thought that Megabiſes retired himſelf, becauſe he thought Arbates would be better treated than himſelf: I wiſh'd Arbates all good ſucceſs: Alſo Megabiſes having the ſame thoughts, had alſo the ſame deſires. Thus did both of us pray for our greateſt enemy, and our moſt dangerous Rival: and whilſt he was tranſacting our Ruin, we gave him as many thanks as if he were perpetuating our Felicity: He went daily to Ameſtris, who treated him with abundance of civility, and ſhewed him more favours than any elſe, becauſe ſhe conceived his Viſits were only in conſideration that he had quitted his ſolitude, and changed his courſe of life: he had freedom of diſcourſe with Ameſtris when he pleaſed, and that with more reſpect than either of us: for as we were both of us perſwaded that when he diſcourſed alone with her, he ſpoke unto our ſeveral advantages, we endeavoured to facilitate the way unto him; and we our ſelves furniſhed him with Arms to deſtroy us: for in lieu of imploying thoſe precious minutes with her in private to the advantages of Megabiſes or me, he all the while was endeavouring to get himſelf into her good opinion: But for the firſt days, it was after ſo handſome and reſpective a way, that ſhe could not be angry: and if ſhe did ſuſpect any ſuch thing as love, ſhe thought alſo that he had never given her any occaſions of diſpleaſure; ſhe behaved her ſelf unto him with much reſervedneſs, but yet as I have ſaid, with very much civility, becauſe indeed he was worthy of it, both in reſpect of his quality, and of his wit: Megabiſes asked him every day whether I began to change my thoughts, and I asked him very often if his Brother did pity his counterfeit paſſion? To this he anſwered me, that he began to have very much hopes of him; and to the other, that yet he knew not what to hope of him: To the one, that the thing was poſſible, but difficult; to the other, that notwithſtanding all the difficulty, he would bring it about: and to them both, that nothing ought to be done precipitately, if they would have it done well; and that they ought to give time of conſideration and contrivance of the matter. In ſhort, Sir, this Impoſtor tranſacted his Enterpriſe ſo cunningly, that whereas he ſhould have acted for us, we both of us acted for him, and gave him a thouſand thanks for his knavery. We met oft all together at the Chamber of Ameſtris, and both Megabiſes and my ſelf endured torments beyond imagination. Sometimes our Paſſions were turned all into deſpair; ſometimes jealouſies mingled. Megabiſes ſuſpected his Brother was more my Servant than his: I alſo thought that Artabes would betray me to favour him; ſometimes we were all fears, and ſometimes we did apprehend that Artabes neither was in love, nor ever would be. As I remember I told you, that by the orders of my unfaithful Friend I was never to ſpeak openly concerning my Paſſion for Ameſtris. But though I obſerved that order moſt exactly, yet dare ſay the fair Ameſtris was not ignorant what power her charming eyes had over my heart: And although my tonge did never reveal the ſecrets of my ſoul, yet all my Actions, my Looks, and alſo my common diſcourſe in indifferent matters, did clearly evidence (I knew not how) the violence of my love, eſpecially unto any that was poſſeſſed with any inclination to judge things for my advantage: I was obliged for the juſtification of Ameſtris, and her favours to me, to ſay, that ſince it was her pleaſure to honour one ſo much, it was becauſe ſhe knew that Artambaces and Hermaniſta allowed of it; it being certain, as I was well informed ſince, that it was their deſire I ſhould become a Servant unto Ameſtris, becauſe I was the firſt man of all the Court which had the honour to be known unto her, and becauſe I had never ſaid or done any thing which diſpleaſed her, but was upon all occaſions diligent to ſerve and dilect her: Yet notwithſtanding her ſlight diſpoſition not to hate me, did not at that time afford me much happineſs, becauſe the ſeverity of her wiſdom, and prudence of her civilities was ſuch, that none could reaſonably gueſs ſhe bore any good thoughts of me; neither fear ſhe had any ill, becauſe of her aſpect, ſuch was the wiſdom and judgment of her behaviour. Yet I dare ſay, that Arbates, as proſperous as he was in his knavery, had ſome angry times; for when he was with Ameſtris, between Megabiſes and me, it was impoſſible but he ſhould be ſtung with ſome remorſe of conſcience, for betraying his Brother and his Friend, and ſometimes apprehend the end of the adventure; not but that he had foreſeen all things; and that if his deſign did not hit, he was not to ſeek for excuſes: His deſign was, that when he had aſſured himſelf of the favour of Ameſtris, to ask pardon of us both, for covering his love to Ameſtris with the cloak of a ſeeming it to be affection unto us, and to ſeem ſo extreamly ſorry for the accident, that we ſhould pity him: He imagined, that for his Brother there was no fear of his life from him; and as for me, he believed that our friendſhip, and the reverence which I bore unto Ameſtris, would hinder me from ſpoiling his deſign; and after all, the fair Ameſtrs would not expoſe her ſelf unto any danger of cauſing a quarrel. Thus had Arbates laid the foundation of his Plot: But Fortune, which meddles in many matters, would not ſuffer it to hit: And thus we lived for a reaſonable long time: Then Arbates ſeeing how he was baited, both by his Brother and my ſelf, and thinking that he was upon good terms with Ameſtris, he began to expreſs his paſſion more openly than formerly he had, and intended to open his deſign unto her; and a while after he found a favourable opportunity. He told Megabiſes and me ſeverally, that now he was reſolved to know which of us two ſtood beſt in the favour of Ameſtris; but to that end we muſt not go unto her theſe two days, but give him the opportunities to entertain her in private: We both conſented unto his deſire, tho on my ſide with much ado. He went then unto Ameſtris, unto whom he could not ſpeak the firſt day, by reaſon of much company: there happened to be then there one of her Lovers, called Otanes, an ill-favoured man, and moſt diſpleaſant both to her and all the Court: This man was ſeldom from her; not but that Ameſtris had a very great diſlike of him, but becauſe he being a man of quality, Artambaces would not forbid him his houſe: It was this man who did moſt hinder Arbates from ſpeaking unto Ameſtris the firſt day: but the next day after proved more happy, for he found her without any company beſides her own Women: ſhe her ſelf was leaning upon a Balcone which looked into the Garden; ſo that he might deliver his mind without being heard by any; At firſt their diſcourſe was upon indifferent things; but ſince he had a hidden deſign, and deſired to fall inſenſibly into diſcourſe of ſomething which might diſcover it unto her. Madam (ſaid he to her) I found you yeſterday in ſuch a ſolitude as was not uſual with you, very like unto that humour out of which you have drawn me; I ſhould think my ſelf much honoured (anſwered ſhe) in being a means to regain you unto your Friends: But I believe it rather the perſwaſions of Megabiſes and Aglatidas which had that power over you, than that I contributed any thing at all. Megabiſes and Aglatidas (replied he) has not ſo much power over me as the fair Ameſtris. You are very unjuſt then (anſwered ſhe) for in my opinion they have more right unto that power than Ameſtris hath, who deſires power over none but her ſelf. That which you reſerve unto your ſelf (replied Artabes) is doubtleſs much better than all the reſt of your Empire; though I aſſure you, that you have an abſolute dominion over all thoſe who have the honour to come near you; and for my particular, I prefer you before all the Crowns in the world. If difficulty in getting of any thing (anſwered ſhe) do add any thing to the value, then you have reaſon to eſteem me ſo, ſince it is moſt certain, that it is no eaſie matter, ever to get an abſolute power over the heart of Ameſtris. That would be too much, Madam, to deſire an abſolute ſovereignty in ſo glorious a place (replied Arbates) and I know ſome men, whoſe ambition would be contented with leſs, and account themſeves moſt happy if you would acknowledge them for your ſlaves. For my part (replied Ameſtris) without thinking that Artabes would more clearly explain himſelf, I would adviſe none, either to give or receive any fetters; and by my good will, none of my Friends ſhall ever become unhappy. Ah Madam (ſaid Arbates then) continue always in ſo juſt a mind, and never repent it. To repent of things which are juſt, replied ſhe, is doubtleſs a crime, which I do not intend ever to commit. If ſo, Madam, replied he, why do you ſuffer one man in the world (who adores you without parallel, and whoſe rigorous ſilence cannot expreſs himſelf) without ſhining upon his miſfortune, by your favourable aſpect? You, I ſay, who expreſs your ſelf ſo divinely, and ſay, that by your conſent, none of your Friends ſhall ever be unhappy? Ameſtris ſtood a while without an anſwer, not knowing well whether Arbates ſpoke concerning Megabiſes, my ſelf, or himſelf: She was ſo ſurpriſed at the diſcourſe, that ſhe knew not well how to expound it: but the firſt diſorder of her ſpirit being paſſed over; I know not Artabes (ſaid ſhe in a higher tone) whether or no you have any deſign upon me, to make me follow your accuſtomed humour, and prefer ſolitude before ſociety: but I know very well, that though you do not change me, you move me to adviſe you to reſt your ſelf quiet in your own Cloſet, and trouble my Chamber no more. I cannot be any where but with you (replied Arbates precipitately, who was naturally of a haſty violent temper, though he ſeemed dull and melancholique unto thoſe that knew him not very well.) Surely Arbates (ſaid Ameſtris, in looking upon him with many marks of anger in her eyes) you do not know me. Pardon me, Madam, (anſwered he) I know you very well, and cannot be ignorant, that you are the faireſt, and moſt amiable in the world: but it is you, Madam, (added he, who knows not the unfortunate Arbates; he, I ſay, who adores you, as devoutly as men adore the Gods; he, whoſe thoughts are all upon you; and who ſeeks nothing upon earth elſe; I ſay, who will die, and die a thouſand deaths rather than live without the love of Ameſtris. Then you muſt prepare your ſelf for death (replied ſhe, and broke off his diſcourſe) for Ameſtris will not beſtow her eſteem, nor love, nor friendſhip upon any, who want thoſe reſpects unto me which are fitting. Is to adore you, to want reſpect? (replied he.) To tell me as much, is, anſwered ſhe. Do as the Gods do then (anſwered Arbates) and know my thoughts; and, like them, receive my Prayers, and grant me that which it is your pleaſure I ſhould not ask. I'll grant nothing (ſaid ſhe) unto them who render themſelves unworthy, no not my compaſſion, which I ſeldom refuſe unto any in miſery: But Arbates (ſaid Ameſtris) I deſire no more of your company, and forbid you ever viſiting me any more. In ſaying ſo, ſhe would have gone away, but he ſtaid her. Since this is the laſt time (ſaid he unto her) that I muſt have the bleſſedneſs of your company, you may very well hear me all I would ſpeak, and it is but fit I ſhould let you know what Arbates is; to the end, that before you do abſolutely deſtroy him, you may conſider well whether you have any reaſon for doing it. I know but too much (replied ſhe) and it would have been better for him if I had known leſs. You do not yet know, Madam, (ſaid he) that he who ſpeaks unto you, does love you ſo extreamly violently, that there is no crime which he hath not committed for your ſake; he hath betrayed his Friends; he hath cozened his kindred; he hath diſhonoured himſelf, and there is nothing which he hath not done, which might make him reſt capable of getting your affection, and to hinder all others from poſſeſſing it. The reaſon, Madam, why I tell you what I have done, is, that you may know what I can do: If there be any of my Rivals which diſpleaſes you, do but ſeem to wiſh them well, and I ſhall preſently rid you of them; But (continued he) Megabiſes and Aglatidas, they are more fortunate than I; if you deſire to preſerve them, hide ſo all your advantageous thoughts of both of them, that I do not perceive them, and that they themſelves do not perceive them. Megabiſes and Aglatidas, replied ſhe, are wiſer than you are, in my opinion. I know not, Madam, anſwered he, whether they be wiſer; but I know very well, that if they be more happy than I, they ſhall not be ſo long. At theſe words Ameſtris grew ſo extremely angry, that ſhe uſed all the vile and ill terms ſhe could invent againſt Arbates, who doubtleſs did often repent him of his violence, though in vain. This crafty and ſubtle man, by the violence of his paſſion and ſorrow, had loſt all policy and craft upon this occaſion As they were upon theſe terms,a Servant came in and told Ameſtris, that there were a great number coming to viſit her; but ſince ſhe found her ſpirits a little diſordered, and leſt any ſigns of anger or ſorrow ſhould appear in her face, ſhe left Arbates on a ſudden, and went into her Cloſet to compoſe her countenance. Mean while Arbates went out of the Chamber, but in ſuch a fury, and ſo deſperate as poſſible a Man could be: Sorrow ſo poſſeſſed him, that becauſe he could not reſolve to ſee either Megabiſes or me, he took his Horſe and went for ſome certain days into the Countrey, leaving order to tell every one, that important buſineſs ſo happened that he was forced to go without bidding adieu to any of his Friends, or ſeeing us: Mean while, Megabiſes and I, who knew nothing of the truth, and who were in abſolute deſpair, becauſe Artabes had rendred us no account of the diſcourſe which he had with Ameſtris, we would go the next day unto her; but we were told that ſhe was not well, and would not be ſeen: The next day we went again and ſaw her, but much more melancholique than accuſtomed: Methought ſhe treated us more coldly than formerly ſhe was accuſtomed. I leave you to imagine, Sir, how troubled I was; for as I believed that Arbates had ſpoken to her concerning me, the laſt time he was with her; ſo I expounded this coldneſs in her, in a cruel ſenſe. Megabiſes, as I have heard ſince, he was at no more reſt than I, and therefore paſſed all that afternoon in much melancholly: But here may be admired, Sir, how Fortune diſpoſes of things: All the while I was thus tormenting my ſelf, and had truſted the conduct of my Love unto a Friend, who had betrayed me; my Father, I knowing nothing of it, was an earneſt ſollicitor for my happineſs, as you ſhall know. I was then very melancholly, both at the abſence of Arbates, and the coldneſs which I obſerved in the Countenance of Ameſtris; when my Father ſent for me, and propounded unto me a Marriage with the Daughter of Artambaces, not only as a thing which he wiſhed might be, but as a thing already done up amongſt them. Sir, replied I, this which you propoſe is too advantagious to be conſented unto without much Joy: But do you think, Sir, that Ameſtris does reſent it with the like gladneſs? Ameſtris, anſwered he, does not yet know of it; but I believe ſhe is ſo well educated, to be obedient unto her Parents, who I know do deſire it as much as I. Sir, ſaid I to him, I would know it from Ameſtris, and not from Artambaces: It is your own office, replied my Father, to inform your ſelf of her thoughts and deſires: I leave you to judge, Sir, how infinitely I was joyed at ſuch welcome news: it was ſo abundantly pleaſant, that I reliſhed it but imperfectly; and it moved ſuch violence in my ſoul, that I could not reſent it as I ought: Oh Heavens, how oft did I wiſh the perfidious Arbates were there to be a witneſs of my good Fortune, and to ask him pardon for the diſpleaſure Megabiſes did reſent. Mean time, becauſe I thought it ſtrange that they ſhould marry me to Ameſtris, before I had acquainted her with my Love: I took an occaſion the next morning to viſit her, and it was my happineſs to find her alone: I obſerved, that ſhe did often change colour; and I Imagined, as indeed it was true, that ſhe had been acquainted with the intention of Artambaces, concerning our Marriage, of which he had ſpoken unto her an hour before I came: But alas, Sir, what ſtrange inquietudes did this fair and amiable Divinity afford me? and how great were my fears, that ſhe had no diſlike of me, becauſe they had propounded it unto her! Madam, (ſaid I to her almoſt trembling) dare Aglatidas be ſo bold as to aſk the fair Ameſtris, whether the many changings which he perceives in her fair face, be a good or a bad omen for him? I think, ſaid ſhe, (bluſhing very much) that I have heard the Magi ſay, That men ought not to conſult with any but the Stars, to know their Fortunes, and not to ttouble themſelves at ſuch lame and ſlight obſervations. I think (replied I) that thoſe who deſire to know whether they ſhall be Rich, or fortunate in War, ought to do as you ſay; but I believe, that they who would know nothing elſe but what the heart of Ameſtris thinks, ought to conſult with nothing but her eyes; and ought to aſk their good fortune from nothing elſe but them. Ameſtris (anſwered ſhe) is not conſiderable enough to give Felicity or bad Fortune unto any: But Aglatidas may believe, that Ameſtris will never ſeek her own good Fortune, but by the will of thoſe who ought to diſpoſe of her: But Madam, ſaid I, if thoſe whom you ſpeak of, ſhould adviſe you unto a thing which is repugnant unto your mind, would you obey them without murmur? I would, doubtleſs (replied ſhe) as long as I have life; and I hold it better for my ſelf to do that which I ought, than to do that which pleaſeth me. It is a moſt ſevere virtue, replied I, and methinks it is a little too blind an obedience; for, Madam, unto how much deſpair would that man be driven, who ſhould be ſo happy, as by the choice of your Parents to be a Husband unto the divine Ameſtris, if he ſhould afterwards know that ſhe obeyed her Parents only, and married him by conſtraint? I would hide my thoughts ſo cloſe (anſwered ſhe) that he ſhould never know it: Ah, Madam, (ſaid I to her) do not abuſe your ſelf ſo much, this is a thing which cannot be; Therefore, Madam, I conjure you by all that is moſt venerable and holy, to tell me ingenuouſly, upon what terms am I in your heart? for I cannot think my ſelf more unhappy, than that you ſhould be ignorant how you are abſolute commander over mine; yes, Madam, ſaid I, you know that ſince the firſt minute I had the honour to ſee you, I have loved you with unequalled qualled paſſion: that I have ſerved you with as much reverence, as any can the Gods; and ſecretly adored you with every atom of my heart: Then, Madam, it's your part to let me know whether I muſt hope or fear, whether you can endure me without averſion, or whether you like me out of Complacency without compulſion; it is abſolutely in you to determine upon either my good or my bad fortune: I have already told you (replied ſhe) that I have no power in my own felicity, and therefore by conſequence cannot have in another's: But, Aglatidas, ſince I have received a command from Artambaces and Hermaniſta to entertain you, when you ſpeak of your affection, let me tell you with much ſincerity, that I think the choice which they have made for me, is very advantagious for me, and ſo much, that when I underſtood it, I was in much confuſion; and if you obſerved any alterations in my countenance, doubtleſs it was, becauſe I was aſhamed to be no more worthy of the honour which you do me, than I am. Ameſtris pronounced theſe words with ſuch reſervedneſs, that I could not diſcover her heart, which put me into great perplexity andmelancholly: I was at this time almoſt angry with my Father for ſo ſoon putting forward my good fortune; for, ſaid I to my ſelf, how ſhould I know now whether or no Ameſtris loves me; Ameſtris, I ſay, who is the wiſeſt Lady upon earth, and one who would dwell with the moſt ill-favour'd man, if ſhe once married to him: So very much was I poſſeſſed, Sir, with this kind of unquietude, that I could not hide it from Ameſtris: Madam (ſaid I to her) you ſee here before you the moſt happy, and the moſt unhappy man both, of all men upon earth: The moſt happy, in the noble hope which Artambaces gives unto my Fathe, that Ameſtris will not refuſe me; but the moſt unhappy, in that I cannot know whether Aglatidas be the choice of Ameſtris, or Artambaces: What will it advantage you to know it, or to know that which I know not my ſelf? For as I have ever been ſtrongly of this opinion, That I ought not to diſpoſe of my ſelf; ſo I am contented to deny my heart my own choice, and ſubmit my ſelf unto a blind obedience. Then Madan (ſaid I unto her) if your Parents ſhould command you to accepr of Megabiſes or Otanes, would you obey them? I have already confeſſed it, if I be not much miſtaken, (replied ſhe:) Oh heavens (cried I)! Madam, why will you not make me happy? I will not deny you happineſs (anſwered Ameſtris) if my conſent be neceſſary unto it: But, Madam, (ſaid I, interrupting her) how ſhall I be aſſured that your conſent is more than a conſtrain'd obedience? ſince you tell me that you will obey, though never ſo repugnant to your mind: You are very unjuſt, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe to me, to deſire that I ſhould tell you my thoughts, and I only to gueſs at yours; therefore endeavour to diſcover them if you can, and content your ſelf to know thus much, That Artambaces has the heart of Ameſtris in his power, and if he diſpoſe of it unto you, as very likely he will, then you ſhall have an abſolute and lawful power over it: This is not yet enough, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) I would preciſely know what you thought of Aglatidas, at that very time before Artambaces did ſpeak unto you in his behalf? I thought, ſaid ſhe, doubtleſs, as all other reaſonable people would think. But were you ſo abſolutely indifferent, ſaid I to her? You are too inquiſitive (anſwered ſhe, ſmiling and bluſhing both) and if I ſhould continue anſwering you thus, it ſhould go hard but I would ſay ſomething which ſhould be either to your diſadvantage or my own. After this manner, Sir, did this wiſe and nimble Lady free her ſelf from my perſecution,and cured me a little of my melancholly humour; for I thought ſhe ſpoke theſe laſt words in ſuch a manner, that I might very well expound them in a favourable ſenſe for my ſelf: Then thought I my ſelf moſt happy; and if Arbates had but been ar Ecbatan, there was nothing more which I could have wiſhed; yet ſince Perſons of Quality do never marry in Medea, without the King's conſent, Artambaces and my Father did conceal it ſome certain days, until they found a fit time to acquaint Aſtiages wirh it; But Sir, they were happy days for Agl t das; what delights did he not find in the converſation of Ameſtris? For ſince her Father commanded her to reſpect me as one that was to be her Husband, I found in her ſoul ſo ſweet a complacence, and obſerved ſuch tenderneſs towards me, that I might very well ſay, I was fully recompenced by theſe bleſſed minutes, for all the ill ones that ever I ſuffered: Yet ſhe would never confeſs that ſhe loved me, or ever did love me; but permitting me to hope what might be hereafter, ſhe ſaid enough to ſatisfie me that ſhe did not hate me: Artambaces and my Father having met with that fit opportunity which they waited for, ſpoke unto the King concerning our Marriage, who preſently conſented unto it, becauſe he knew not that Megabiſes pretended unto Ameſtris: The conſent of Aſtiages was no ſoonner obtain'd, but immediately the matter was divulged about the Court: Megabiſes being preſently informed of it, went preſently unto the King, and deſired him to forbid the Banes; but the King told him he ſpoke too late, that his word was paſt, and the thing was abſolutely without remedy: Megabiſes went away from the King ſufficiently malecontent, and reſolved of another way to compaſs his end; he ſought an occaſion to meet me, and having found me, without any more preamble, Aglatidas (ſaid he to me with a low voice in my ear) you ſhall not enjoy Ameſtris, but by the death of Megabiſes; therefore, without more ado, let us go out at the Gate which opens towards the Mountains, and compleat your joys by my deſtruction. Megabiſes (ſaid I to him) I need no preſſing to go whither you would have me; but I confeſs I would not, if poſſible otherwiſe, take Sword in hand againſt the Brother of Artabes: But you may (replied he) if you will yield Ameſtris unto me: Ameſtris, replied I, Ah, no, no, Megabiſes, I can never yield her; and if there be no other way to give you ſatisfaction, we muſt follow your intention: In ſaying ſo, we went out, as ſoon as we were rid of thoſe which were about us, and came unto the foot of a great Rock, under a great Hill, where he would have us fight; I confeſs that the friendſhip of Arbates troubled me a little, and I had no mind to loſe the blood of his Brother: But when I began to think that Megabiſes was my Rival, and that the poſſeſſion of his Ameſtris depended upon his life or Death, all other conſiderations vaniſhed, and fury became maſter of my ſpirit: We were no ſooner at the place which he aimed at, but we drew our Swords, for it was ſo near the Tower, that though we were on foot, yet we need no taking our breaths: Megabiſes came up to me with ſo much fury and violence, as let me know I had a dangerous enemy to deal with; and I dare ſay he received me with ſo much reſolution, as he had no ill opinion of my courage; We being both of us nimble and well skill'd at weapon, did hold out many blows without a wound, which I believe did anger us both: So that we reſolved to put the matter unto Fortune, and not to ſtand fencing any longer. Arbates, the politique Arbates, having in all likelihood invented ſome new cheat for us, and returning to Town, ſaw us afar off at the foot of the Rock: who, not knowing who we were, rid up unto us with drawn Sword to part us: But, O heavens, how he was ſurprized when he knew us; and what variety of thoughts he had upon it! Megabiſes being his Brother, it may eaſily be believed, he would intreat me to hold; and regarding me as his Friend, he obliged his Brother to uſe his Sword no more againſt me: But when he did reſent us as his Rivals, I know not whether he had a mind to ſet upon us both, and lay aſide all reſpects of fraternity or friendſhip: yet natural reſentments always appearing firſt upon ſudden accidents, Artabes no ſooner ſaw us and knew us, but he cried out as loud as he could, to hold our hands: his voice being known unto us both, and both Megabiſes and my ſelf being moved at it, we turned aſide and ſaw Arbates with a drawn Sword, as I ſaid before, who having got between us, in parting us, not lighting from his horſe, What ſtrange fury poſſeſſes you (ſaid he unto us) and what new quarrel is riſen between you? The fault's not mine, my dear Arbates (ſaid I to him) the Gods do know with what unwillingneſs I came to it; Why then 'tis you, Megabiſes (ſaid Arbates to him) who without conſideration that Aglatidas is my Friend, and contrary unto your promiſe, have begun this quarrel in my abſence? It was I indeed (replied he) who invited him to it, and who will ſend him to his grave, unleſs he either ſend me to mine firſt, or yield Ameſtris to me: Arbates, who knew not how things ſtood ſince his departure, and would not have his Brother Megabiſes to enjoy Ameſtris, no more than he would have his Friend Aglatidas; therefore looking upon us both; You are too furious (ſaid he) and have loſt your reaſon; I never heard ſay that Artambaces would give his Daughter unto him that was moſt valiant; therefore in lieu of fighting to no purpoſe, go both unto him together, and he to whom he conſents, let him continue quiet poſſeſſor of Ameſtris s Ah my dear Arbates, you have pronounced a moſt favourable Sentence, for Artambaces has promiſed his Daughter unto me: Yes, ſaid Megabiſes, and the King has conſented; therefore judge you if it be not time to fight with Aglatidas, or whether I am in ſuch a condition as to follow your counſel. At theſe words Arbates, who doubtleſs would never have given that counſel, but that he imagined Artambaces would never beſtow his Daughter upon men that would quarrel about her, and thereby he might get advantage by it, therefore he began to change colour, and looking upon me with eyes full of rage and deſpair; And is it true, ſaid he unto me, that they have promiſed you Ameſtris, and that Ameſtris hath conſented? It is true, ſaid I to him, and I rejoyce in the good Fortune, and Ameſtris did obey without any murmur: Hah, if it be ſo, ſaid he, Megabiſes, let me fight with the happy lover of Ameſtris, and do not you meddle, for I have more intereſt than you have, and Aglatidas ſhall be more innocent in cauſing my death, if it chance, than yours; In ſaying ſo, he fell upon me with much fury, and I ſtept aſide, not being willing to fight with my Friend, and yet wondring from whence theſe words ſhould proceed. Megabiſes very generouſly ſtept in betwixt us (and incenſedly ſaid unto him) What wilt thou ſhame us both, and make all the world believe we were two againſt one? Retire, or elſe my thoughts of Honour and Love ſhall make me forget thoſe of Nature; at theſe words I let fall the point of my Sword, to let Arbates ſee I had no deſire to ſight with him: How now Arbates, ſaid I to him, can I believe what I ſee? and can Aglatidas imagine that Arbates is become his enemy? Ah, no no, ſaid I, I can never believe it; for I cannot hate any unleſs the lovers of Ameſtris. And it is under that notion (anſwered the furious Arbates, lighting from his Horſe, and advancing towards me) that I cannot ſuffer your good fortune, and which prompts me to diſpute the matter with you unto my very laſt drop of blood: Are you a lover of Ameſtris (ſaid Megabiſes) as well as I? Yes, I am (replied he unto us) and ſo zealous a lover too, that none ſhall ever enjoy her as long as I live. I leave you to judge, Sir, how Megabiſes and I did wonder, and admire a little the various effects of Arbates his language: I, who a little before did love this perfidious friend, and hated Megabiſes, as ſoon as I heard him ſo expreſs himſelf, the love I had formerly to him extinguiſhed, and the hate which I bore unto the other, ſuſpended; this new jealouſie operating upon my fancy more ſtrongly than the old one: Megabiſes for his part, looking upon me as one that had been deceived by Arbates as well as himſelf, did leſſen his averſion to me, and increaſe his hate of the other: And Arbates being all deſpair and violent paſſion, made no difference, as I thought, between his Brother and me his Friend; although I think he was the moſt unhappy, it being to be thought, that the image of his crime and double treaſon did often preſent it ſelf into his mind, and tormented him without ceſſation; yet Arbates could not now fight with me, becauſe indeed I refuſed, and becauſe Megabiſes would not ſuffer him; and on the other ſide, he would not ſtay to be a witneſs of the Combat which was begun between Megabiſes and my ſelf; nor was he, as furious as he was, able to fight againſt us both, nor would I have ſuffered him to fight with his Brother. But becauſe Megabiſes was not leſs amazed at the love of Arbates than I was; Since when, Brother (if I may call you Rival, ſaid he to him) have you been in love with Ameſtris? Since the firſt minute that ever I ſaw her: (anſwered he) What (ſaid I to him, interrupting him) did you fall in love with her that day I carried you unto her? Yes, cruel Friend, replied Arbates, it was you which forced me to go, and who forced me to betray you afterwards; to deceive Megabiſes, to offend Ameſtris, and to diſhonour my ſelf: Therefore Aglatidas (ſaid he) ſince I can be no longer your Friend, it muſt of neceſſity be, that either you or I muſt die: It were better (ſaid I unto him, that you did repent of your crime; I cannot repent (anſwered he) until Aglatidas and Megabiſes leave loving Ameſtris: Since it cannot be but upon thoſe terms (ſaid Megabiſes and I both together unto him) we muſt bethink our ſelves whether it be better to pardon or to puniſh you. As we ſtood thus arguing the matter, we ſaw a number of people coming towards us, who being told that we went out of the Town together, came to ſeek us, having ſome ſuſpicion of our quarrel. The furious Arbates having no mind to ſtay, took horſe, and told me in my ear, that three days hence he would expect me from morning till night, in a certain place which he appointed, and told me, that if I were not the baſeſt coward that ever lived, I would come thither and give him ſatisfaction: Then he preſently rid away, and we loſt the ſight of him. Thoſe men who ſought us, did find us, and brought us to the Town, but for all their vigilance, both Megabiſes and I eſcaped them, and went out to fight ſome five hundred paces from Ecbatan. I will not trouble you with relating the particulars of our Combat; I will only tell you, that I was ſo fortunate as to hurt Megabiſes ſlightly in the hand, and diſarm him: I thought it not fit to go into the Town the ſame day, becauſe Megabiſes was allied unto the Blood-Royal, and it would ſeem ſome diſreſpect in me to fight with him, though it was not I who began the quarrel: I went therefore unto a Friend's Houſe, without thinking that this way led me unto the place which Arbates had appointed: for if I had conſidered it, it may be I ſhould not have took that way, ſo much was my former love to him ſtronger than my preſent hate. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that in diſarming Megabiſes, my own Sword did break, ſo that in the end of the Combat I could not reſtore unto him his own, ſince it ſeemed not juſt unto me, that he who had the good fortune to be Conqueror, ſhould himſelf be diſarmed: Therefore I had then Megabiſes Sword, by reaſon of the Hilt, which was of a very extraordinary faſhion; ſo that as I came to the place Artabes had appointed, and where he punctually expected me; he no ſoonner ſaw me, but he knew the Sword of Megabiſes, and thought I had killed him: This ſight ſuſpended all other thoughts for a time: Why now (ſaid he in coming towards me) I do not only ſee him who enjoys Ameſtris, but alſo my Brother's murderer: Your Brother (ſaid I to him in going back) is not in that condition; and if it were as eaſy for me to leave loving Ameſtris, as it is to render you your Brother, we ſhould be quickly Friends: That cannot be ſo (ſaid he) for none of our Family uſe to quit their Swords but with their lives; but however it be, you muſt fight with me; and though that ſhould not be, yet I have other cauſes to hate your life, and wiſh your death. In the name of the Gods, Arbates (ſaid I to him) do not urge me to kill the Man I ſo much love, and lend me ſo much patience as to hear me a little: Arbates at theſe words ſtayed, and did not preſs upon me ſo hard: I began then to ſpeak of a hundred things (notwithſtanding my hate, and my reſentments) to bring him unto reaſon, though I could not do it; Why, ſaid I to him, do you not remember that I was your Friend? Yes, ſaid he, but I remember better that you are my Rival, and ſuch a Rival who is to marry Ameſtris: The Gods are my witneſs, ſaid I to him, I would yield her to you, if it were in my power, notwithſtanding all your treaſons againſt me. So would not I, anſwered this deſperate man) if it were my caſe; for if I thought my heart could ſtoop to yield her unto any one, I would run my Sword through it, for a puniſhment, for a thought ſo baſe and unworthy of Ameſtris: But (replied

I) though I ſhould not marry Ameſtris, perhaps Arbates would never be the better, but another might be more happy than us both. That other, replied he, ſhould be unto Arbates as Aglatidas is at preſent, that is, a man whoſe ſight nor life I could endure: If I look upon you as my Friend, I am confounded at my treacheries which I cannot repent of: If I look upon you as the Vanquiſher of my Brother, I muſt revenge his diſhonour: If I look upon you as my Rival, I muſt hate you, and kill you if I can. But, ſaid I to him, muſt I fight with you with the Sword of Megabiſes? and wound you with the Arms of your Brother? My Brother, ſaid he, is my Rival as well as you, and you imploy none but the Arms of an Enemy againſt me, when you imploy his. In the name of our former Friendſhip, (ſaid I to him) do not force me to fight. In the name of our hatred and love to Ameſtris (replied he) diſcourſe no more. Upon theſe words he fell upon me, and I was forced to look to my ſelf: I was a long time only putting by the blows he gave, ſo long, that I obſerved his anger and fury had loſt him his judgment; he ſtruck at random, and laid himſelf open all the while; and if I had a mind, I could have run him through a hundred times: But when I obſerved how he fought, I pitied him; and he ſhould not have died, if he himſelf had not cauſed his deſtruction. When the Combat had laſted a long while, he obſerved how I ſpared him, and then that which ſhould have relented him, did the more exaſperate his fury; ſo that making a paſs at me, and ſteping on the wrong ſide, with great violence he ran himſelf upon my Sword, which pierced him to the Hilt; I drew it out inſtantly, but it ſeem'd I gave a freer paſſage for his Soul, for he died immediately, without ſpeaking one word.

I confeſs to you, Sir, I never found my ſelf more troubled than now; for indeed I loved Artabes very dearly, moreover; I was ſorry it ſhould ſo fall out as to be with his Brother's Sword; but that which I was moſt ſenſible of, was, becauſe it would retard my Marriage, and force me for a time to forbear the Court, ſince Ar- bates was a Man of that Quality: yet it ſo fell out, that Arbates fell upon me, there were divers people ſpectators of our actions, and ſuch as were able to teſtifie in my behalf, if neceſſity ſhould require it. But as my ſorrows were extream, after I had intreated thoſe people to take care of the Body of my unfaithful and unfortunate Friend, I went unto a Kinſman's Houſe, not far off from that place: I was no ſooner there, but I diſpatched a Letter to my Father, to Artambaces, and to Ameſtris, to acquaint them with the Accident, and I neglected nothing which was fit to be done upon ſuch an unlucky occaſion. I will not loſe ſo much time as to relate the various cenſures of ſeveral men, ſince you will eaſily conjecture them: The Death of Artabes made a great noiſe throughout the Court: The chance to fight with two Brothers in a day, and to kill Arbates with his Brother's Sword, were circumſtances that in appearance did aggravate the matter; but in ſubſtance did not at all make me more guilty: yet notwithſtanding Aſtiages ſeemed much incenſed, and Megabiſes thought his Brother had betrayed him, and was his Rival, yet he could not chuſe but ſhew much reſentment of his Death, and cloak the intereſt of his Love with Revenge of his Brother's Death: Artambaces therefore, and my Father, reſolved that for a while I ſhould keep cloſe, and get from Ecbatan as I could, to the end a new quarrel with Megabiſes might be prevented; and they did both of them contribute all their endeavours to compoſe the matter: they had no ſooner reſolved upon my departure, but I was acquainted with it; and tho' I did foreſee as much, yet I could not chuſe but be much ſurpriſed at it: The thought of that felicity wherein I was before, and the condition wherein now I was fallen, did ſo much ſad me, as I hardly had the power over my own reaſon; I therefore ſent to beſeech my Father, that he would be pleaſed to give me a little time to reſolve upon this irkſome departure, and to prepare my ſelf for it, which was eaſily granted unto, becauſe he knew I was in a Houſe which would ſafely conceal me; and he thought though Aſtiages was much incenſed againſt me, yet he ſuppoſed that he would not long continue ſo againſt the Son of one who had ſo long time ſerved him. I ſtayed here ſome few days, during which time I writ three Letters unto Ameſtris, to obtain leave of her that I might come and bid her adieu; but notwithſtanding all my urgent prayers, and reaſons, I believe ſhe would never have ſuffered me, if I had not employed a Kinſman unto her, who was alſo a prevalent Friend of hers. In concluſion, Sir, I obtained licenſe to come one night into the ſtately Gardens which are about a hundred paces from Ecbatan, on the South ſide, and whoſe vaſt extent was ſuch, that it deſerved the phraſe of a great Park, rather than a great Garden: Hither it is where thoſe who are weary of the tumultuous Town, uſe to come and walk, there being much leſs company than in the King's Garden, or upon the Bank of Orontes. Perhaps you remember, Sir, that in that place there is a great Border, whoſe Partitions are Graſs, in the midſt of which there is a ſtately Fountain whoſe Baſin is half ſable, half argent; whoſe ſides are coloured Maſſy green, whoſe largeneſs and coolneſs affords a very pleaſant ſeat unto thoſe which deſire to reſt themſelves: Then, Sir, this great Border is environed with a Table and thick Wood, in which is many Paths cut, and which by a hundred turns and returns, makes the Walk very long and difficult to find the way out. Alſo it is much leſs frequented, but not at all leſs pleaſant than the reſt; But becauſe the other Borders are nearer the entrance, therefore they were more uſed, and none but ſolitary and melancholly perſons uſed to go unto this Fountain: It was in this place where the fair Ameſtris, being perſwaded by my Kinſwoman and her Friend, reſolved to meet me. It would be hard, Sir, for me to tell you all the joy which I received at this welcome news: I forgot that I was to ſee her upon terms of bidding her farewel, and never thought of what might follow this interview; I thought only of her permitting me to ſee her in a place where I might diſcourſe of my Love; and where perhaps I might receive ſome teſtimony from her, that ſhe was not diſpleaſed with me. I came thither before break of day for fear of diſcovery: I paſſed away all the morning and the afternoon in a little Lodge at the far end of the Walk, where none dwelt but the Gardener, who for a little Money will do what you pleaſe; the Sun no ſooner began to decline near her bed, but I aroſe, and went into the thick Wood, which compaſſeth about the green Borders of Graſs, looking and longing with much impatiency for the coming of Ameſtris with abundance of impatience; The Wind whifled not a Leaf, but I thought I heard her coming, and her fair Idea preſented it ſelf ſo lively in my fancy, as though I ſaw her often, when I ſaw her not: At laſt, the Sun being ſet, this glorious Star appeared, and I ſaw her come out of a part of the Wood, attended by my Kinſman, and three or four of her Women; for though this ſecret meeting was no crime, yet this Wiſe Lady did chuſe rather to come accompanied with a ſeaſonable number, than a few. I no ſooner ſaw her, but I went to meet her, and preſenting her my hand, I led her unto the Fountain, where we were certain to be heard by none, nor fear any ſurpriſal: At firſt I thanked her for her goodneſs towards me, with all the reverence and reſpect that was poſſible; but ſince time was precious, ſhe was no ſoonner ſeated, but I kneeling unto her, whilſt my Couſin and the reſt of her Women diſcourſed of the beauty of the place, ſome ſix paces from us: Madam (ſaid I to her) may the unfortunate Aglatidas believe that you have honoured him ſo far as to ſee him here with a good will? and was it not by chance that he hath this delight to meet you? No, Aglatidas, (anſwered ſhe) it was by my own conſent that I ſee you; and I believe that my Father having commanded me to honour you very much, would think it no crime in me to give you this teſtimony of my eſteem, and (if I durſt ſay it) of my friendſhip. Ha, Madam (ſaid I to her) hide not my happineſs from me; and if it be ſo that I am ſo happy as to move you unto any ſlight acknowledgment of my Paſſion, let me know, Madam, whether it be your pleaſure to preſerve my life; and think not that I am of their humour who uſe to flatter themſelves, and expound all things to their own advantage; but on the contrary, I do always uſe to be jealous of my ſelf, and doubt whether any can eſteem me: therefore, Madam, I beſeech you, be ſo indulgent unto my weakneſs, as not to incline ſo much unto that ſevere humour, which makes you think Love to be a crime, and which cauſes you to uſe only theſe cruel words of eſteem and friendſhip in all your diſcourſe, but thoſe of Love and Paſſion are never heard from you: Be pleaſed to conſider, that I am an unfortunate man, and am to be an Exile in ſome Countrey where I can find no joy: Think, I conjure you, that I have need of ſome conſolation during this cruel abſence; and that if you do not afford me ſome ſigns of your affection, I muſt die with deſpair and ſorrow. Do you think, Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe to me) that theſe are ſmall things which I do for you? To come into the Garden, to admit you private Diſcourſe, and to hear you diſcourſe of your Paſſion, which how lawful ſoever it be, yet has danger in it, ſince it is ſo powerful? and which cannot be endured by a Maid without injury to her Modeſty, if ſhe be really reaſonable. Why, Madam, ſaid I to her, does a Paſſion which Artambaces and Hermaniſta approve of, leave any ſcruple in the mind of Ameſtris? and is it a crime in Aglatidas (who has not one ſingle thought to offend you) to tell you of his Love? Ha, Madam, if it be ſo, I ſhall think my ſelf the moſt unhappy man upon Earth: No No, Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe to me) I will not be ſo ſevere: I confeſs, ſaid ſhe, caſting down her eyes, that I eſteem you too much to be angry with you for loving me, and I wiſh you may always do ſo: I know not, Aglatidas, if it were true that I did love you, ſince you would have me believe you love me; I know not, I ſay, whether it be not out of courſe to tell you as much, or whether it be not better to let you gueſs at my thoughts, than to explain them plainly; for indeed Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe, abſence does often weaken the ſtrongeſt affections: and if it ſhould ſo fall out that you ſhould alter, Ameſtris ſhould never enjoy her ſelf, if ſhe had once confeſſed her ſelf ſenſible of your Love: Ha! Madam, ſaid I unto her, let not that conſideration deprive me of one favourable word from you; and be confident, that when Aglatidas does not love his adored Ameſtris, then he is not in this world: Time and abſence are two potent enemies (replied ſhe). Yes, Madam, againſt weak men (replied I); but Aglatidas is not of that number; your fair eyes have too ſtrongly tied his heart, ever to be diſengaged. But you, Madam, ſaid I, whom all the earth adores, do tell me, that you have reſerved one corner of your ſoul for ſome one of my illuſtrious Rivals, which you have not given unto me; for, Madam, I muſt conclude this from all that you have ſaid, That I am beholding unto Artambaces for all the favours of Ameſtris: You are not beholden to him for this Walk (replied ſhe) ſince none knew of it: Good Gods, Madam, ſaid I to her looking upon her, will you not determine my fate? and either poſitively tell me,you hate Aglatidas, or you love him? The firſt is not juſt, replied ſhe; and the other,though it were no fault, yet it were not very handſome. I beſeech you then, Madam, ſaid I to her, be pleaſed to let me explain all your actions, and all your words unto my advantage, to make your eyes confeſs you love me, and let ſilence be a conſent, ſince words muſt not. I permit you, ſaid ſhe to me bluſhing, to think all that will preſerve the life of Aglatidas, and to bring him to me full of fidelity home again: It is enough, Madam, ſaid I to her, it is enough; and ſince it is your deſire I ſhould be conſtant, there needs no more to make me the happieſt of men: But, Madam, ſince you have by ſuch a glorious Commandment engaged me to be faithful, dare I then perſwade my ſelf, that ſince you have done ſo, you will be ſo your ſelf? Believe it, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe then unto me, Ameſtris does not uſe to engage her heart upon eaſie terms; and ſince you have a place in it, nothing ſhall take it out but death. I leave you to judge, Sir, what effects theſe favourable words wrought in my ſoul: Then I took Ameſtris by the hand, and kiſſing it whether ſhe would or no, with as much reverence as love, I thanked her in ſuch paſſionate terms, that I dare ſay they mollified her heart; yet ſince I left Megabiſes, Otanes, and a hundred more in love; Madam, ſaid I to her, I have one favour to deſire which I dare hardly name, and which yet I cannot conceal. Then ſhe preſſed me to know what it was, aſſuring me that any thing which was not unjuſt, ſhould not be denied: That which I deſire, Madam is, if without forfeiture of my reſpect I may name it, that you would be pleaſed to be as reſerved of your favours as you can, both unto Megabiſes and Otanes, and a hundred others who are your ſervants, and not to let all my Rivals be happy, whilſt the unfortunate Aglatidas ſuffers unimaginable torments: I do ingenuouſly confeſs, Madam, that my deſire is unreaſonable, but Love knows no Laws of reaſon, nor can be kept within limits: I cannot promiſe you, anſwered ſhe, not to ſee them whom you call your Rivals: but I will aſſure you, I will not give them any favourable reſpect. This is too little to ſatisfie my jealouſie, Madam, replied I, unleſs you will be pleaſed to do me ſo much honour, as to promiſe me to reſpect them as little as can be poſſible; for, Madam, ſaid I, though your eyes be never ſo much diſpleaſed, yet they are always lovely, ſo ſprightly and ſo divine, that it is much better to ſee them in their anger, than not to ſee them at all: Therefore, Madam, I beſeech you have compaſſion upon my imbecility, and refuſe me not the conſolation to hope that my enemies ſhall not gain by my abſence; and that I may not be the only man which ſhall be deprived of that happineſs in ſeeing you: I would have you, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe to me, ſet your heart at reſt concerning that, and aſſure your ſelf, that I will with as much care affect a ſolitude, as I ſhould rejoice in your preſence and preſervation: But in conſenting unto this which you deſire, I muſt tell you thus much, That I will engage my ſelf no further than civility will permit, thinking it not juſt I ſhould promiſe more. That perhaps may be too little, Madam, ſaid I, to ſatisfie my Love, though it be enough to ſatisfie one that gives Laws unto the whole World, and receives none from any but his own will:

And indeed it is too much for me, if I do rightly conſider my little, and your great merit. I ſhould conſume too much time, Sir, if I ſhould relate all that was ſpoken at this ſad but pleaſant conference; but ſince it was grown very late, Ameſtris wou'd part, and I parted from her both with ſorrow and ſatisfaction: The more obliging words ſhe had given me, the more unhappy did I conceive my ſelf in leaving her: and I could almoſt have wiſhed that ſhe had been leſs favourable, that I might have been leſs grieved: After I had a while continued my ſo much intereſted thoughts, I did ſo much love the cauſe of my grief, that my grief became precious and pleaſant unto me: And I cheriſhed them with more care than I can expreſs unto you: and from that fatal minute when I left Ameſtris, until this, wherein I ſpeak unto you, I almoſt never ceaſed from entertaining them: I followed Ameſtris by my eyes as long as poſſible, and parted from her ſighing, not being able to ſpeak Adieu: I returned unto my melancholly lodging, not minding my way, nor any thing elſe but my ſorrows; The Idea of Ameſtris, with all her attracts, and charms, and all her ſplendour, appeared unto me, notwithſtanding the darkneſs of the night. Two days after this interview, I went into the Province of Ariſantines, where Artambaces procured a convenient Retreat for me, with one of his Friends who had been Governour of a conſiderable place; I will not relate my melancholly ſorrows all this Voyage and Exile. It's enough you know, that the violence of my love was ſo predominate in my heart, and my ſoul was ſo much infected with that paſſion, as I was never at reſt: And the more to augment my ſorrows, I was no ſooner departed, but I received the ſad news, that Hermaniſta being ſeized upon by a violent Fever, did die the ſeventh day; and that Artambaces, who loved her with unſpeakable tenderneſs, was fallen ſick upon it; But the misfortune ended not here; but a few days after, I heard that the loving Husband followed his Wife to the Grave; And that Ameſtris by Orders from the King, was committed unto the Guardianſhip of one that was allied unto Megabiſes, and not at all a friend unto me: Imagine, Sir, into what a condition this diſmal news tranſported me; for I was infinitely bound unto Artambaces and Hermaniſta; and moreover I reſented the ſorrows of Ameſtris: I imagined that I ſaw her in the hands of her enemies, who would not eaſily ſuffer me to ſee her; and upon the whole matter, I had nothing to rely upon but the fidelity of Ameſtris, which me thought I had not well enough deſerved, to put too much confidence to it: Not but that I knew my Father did very much deſire our Marriage: But yet there was ſome cauſe to fear, leſt if when he ſaw the King alter his mind in favour of Megabiſes, who had already made his peace, that then my Father ſhould comply with the time, and alter his mind, in hopes he might more eaſily obtain my pardon: Thus I lived in ſuch Melancholy as may be more eaſily conceived than expreſſed: Ameſtris alſo for her part, her life was very full of bitterneſs: I did write unto her conſtantly every week by an expreſs Meſſenger whom I ſent, and ſhe did me ſo much favour as to anſwer me, and that with ſo much wit and wiſdom both, as her Letters moved no leſs wonder than love in me. As ſhe was extremely troubled for the loſs of Artambaces and Hermaniſta, ſo ſhe writ unto me in ſuch ſad expreſſions as would have inſpired ſorrow in a ſoul that was in its height of jollity: She expreſſed ſuch tenderneſs for thoſe ſhe loved, that I almoſt wiſhed my ſelf in the room of Artambaces and Hermaniſta, that I might ſo receive the feeling teſtimonies of her affection. Alas, ſaid I, how well does this fair Lady know how to love thoſe whom it is her pleaſure to love? and how infinitely happy ſhould I be in the enjoyment of her affection in quiet and liberty? But whilſt I ſigh'd and complain'd away my days and nights, without any other comfort but the Letters of Ameſtris, my buſineſs rather went worſe than mended, becauſe Megabiſes having ingratiated himſelf in the Kings favour, did impede it; inſomuch as my Father always ſent me word I ſhould come no nearer Ecbatan, but reſt in patience: Ameſtris alſo feared I ſhould run ſome hazard for the love of her;

and leſt I ſhould expoſe my ſelf unto ſome freſh quarrel with Megabiſes or Otanes, who were buſie about her; ſhe prayed very importunately not to return too haſtily: Thus I ſaw I was arreſted, and remained in the moſt cruel anxiety that ever did Lover: I knew that Megabiſes was ever upon better terms with Ameſtris than any other of my Rivals; that for a long time ſhe had treated us with equal reſpect: that Megabiſes was handſome, and had Courage, Wit and Quality enough. Moreover, I conſidered, that his Eſtate was much augmented by the Death of his Brother Artabes, and that he was much in the King's favour: So that as I made all theſe things Arms wherewith to perſecute my ſelf, I did charge my ſelf with all thoſe misfortunes which I feared; imagining, that if I had not killed Artabes, I ſhould not have had ſuch cauſe to fear that Megabiſes could marry Ameſtris, becauſe he was not ſo rich, nor perhaps in ſuch favour: Thus did I live the moſt unhappy of men, always perſwading my ſelf, that what I wiſh'd for, would never happen; and that which I feared, would fall out every minute. Sometimes I could not hope that Ameſtris would continue ſincere and faithful; ſometimes I conceited her Letters were but diſguiſements of her thoughts, and that all the teſtimonies of her affection were but tricks to delude me: but yet (as I knew afterwards) the amiable Lady preſerved her faith, and her ſelf inviolably for me; for ſhe did not only reſerve her love for me; but ſhe acted ſo vigorouſly and ſo ſeverely with all the reſt of her Lovers, that if ſhe had inſpired meaner paſſions, her cruelty to them had abſolutely cured them. But as her beauty never begat any but violent loves, they could not quite give over their deſign, but did daily perſecute her; yet her time of mourning, which ſhe did really (as well in her heart as habit) obſerve, furniſhed her with a ſpecious pretence of reſervedneſs and melancholy; ſhe kept her ſelf within thoſe limits as exactly as upon ſuch occaſions is required: And ſhe became ſo ſolitary and retired, as thoſe who loved her had much ado to get ſo much opportunity as only to ſee her; The firſt month of her mourning ing being over, ſtill ſhe did not alter her ſable mode, but did refuſe all manner of diverſions whatſoever; only the converſation of Menaſtes (for ſo they called him that was my kinſman and her friend) was ſome comfort and pleaſure unto her: They went out ſometimes together to walk in the ſame Garden where I ſaw her laſt, and ſhe teſtified all that love could infuſe into a virtuous Lady; and certainly he infuſed in my behalf as much reſentments as he could into the adored Ameſtris: But alas, I was not a jot more happy; and I looked upon things much otherwiſe than they were: not but that I ſuppoſed Ameſtris to be faithful unto me, and did really love me: But, O Heavens, this pleaſant imagination, how delightful ſoever it was, yet did it not free me from impatience; but I had an extream deſire, which moved me to go unto Ecbatan, with greater hopes to ſee Ameſtris conſtant, than to ſee Ameſtris unfaithful. In concluſion, I was ſo prompted both by my Love, and by my Jealouſie, that I reſolved for Ecbatan ſecretly, and to go unto that Gardener, where I ſtayed a day when I took my leave of Ameſtris, and whom I found very pliable to receive gifts, and to do me any good office I ſhould employ him in; ſo I went with one man only, making all poſſible haſte to be at Ecbatan before any report of my departure could come either to my Father or to Ameſtris, becauſe I had obliged him with whom I dwelt, not to write of it unto the Court: My deſign was to arrive in the night, for fear of being known; and having ſent my ſervant unto the Lodging which I appointed him, I went preſently unto the Garden, reſolving to inform my ſelf ſecretly how Ameſtris did, before I ſaw her; after my ſervant had carried my horſe unto their lodging at the next Town, I paſſed away all rhe night in that place where I ſaw her laſt; and calling into my memorial the favourable words which I had from her fair ſelf, I was in ſuch delighting ſatisfaction as I cannot expreſs unto you: I know not by what ſecret charms this place did qualifie the turbulency of my ſoul; but I am certain that ſince I came thither, not any jealouſie or melancholy, or any other diſtempered Paſſion troubled me, only my impatience and longing deſires to ſee Ameſtris; and that was ſo great, that as I told you, I walked all the night, it being an abſolute impoſſibility to ſleep. Then, as I could no way let Ameſtris know of my arrival but by my Kinſman, I muſt thereſore ſtay until day time; but I had the misfortune to underſtand that he was gone into the Countrey, and would not return until the next day: Yet notwithſtanding I conceived it better to confine my ſelf unto my patience, than to hazard the diſpleaſure of Ameſtris, by letting her know the news by any way than as ſhe was accuſtomed to receive it. I will not tell you, Sir, how reſtleſs I was that day in the Gardener's houſe, whither I was retired to prevent my diſcovery: But I will tell you, that as ſoon as the Sun was ſet, that I thought there was no danger to be within the little paths of the thick wood which compaſſed about the graſs border, in the midſt of which was the Fountain, as I have already told you; then I went thither to rejoice my ſelf in that place, where I laſt ſaw her I loved: I looked upon all the places where Ameſtris had been, eſpecially that where ſhe did ſit: It was here, in this very place (ſaid I) where the incomparable Ameſtris aſſured me of her conſtancy, when ſhe commanded it upon me, and where ſhe permitted me to think any thing that might conduce unto the preſervation of Aglatidas, and bring him back full of fidelity unto her: See (ſaid I to my ſelf, and as if I had ſeen her) ſee here, adored Ameſtris, the ſame Aglatidas, the very ſame you deſired him to be, that is the moſt faithful, the moſt amorous, and moſt paſſionate of all your Lovers: But my loved and adored Ameſtris (ſaid I) I hope you alſo will retain the ſame I left you; and I hope to have nothing to contend about, but that ſevere virtue, which fordids you things moſt innocent. As I was in the midſt of theſe pleaſant contemplations, I diſcovered through the boughs of trees, on the other ſide of the green border, one who ſeem'd to be Ameſtris, waited upon by three other Women. I looked upon her moſt earneſtly, and I was confirmed in my belief: I ſaw ſhe made towards the Fountain, after ſhe had looked about her, to ſee if the coaſt was clear from any interruption of her ſolitude; ſhe ſat down by that pleaſant ſource, directly in the ſame place where I kneeled unto her when I took my leave: She leaned her head on one ſide upon her left hand, which did lie upon the moſs-colour edge of the Fountain, and letting her right hand lye negligently upon her garment, ſhe looking upon the water like one that was in a profound ſtudy, at leaſt, as I might judge by her poſture, for her face was not towards me: But, O heavens, what operation had this viſion upon my ſoul! My heart trembled, my ſpitits were diſordered, and I was not maſter of my reaſon; I would have advanced towards her, though I had no power to ſtir; and I know not what odd fancy, which I cannot expreſs, moved me to ſtay unſeen, rejoicing a while at that good fortune which chance afforded me beyond my hopes: Indeed, Sir, my joy was ſo abſolutely predominate to my ſoul, as I was never ſenſible of the like; for I did not only ſee Ameſtris in a place where I hoped preſently to ſpeak unto her, but I ſaw her in ſuch a place as moved me to think ſhe thought of me; and that the end of her coming thither was but to remember our laſt diſcourſe: O moſt happy Aglatidas, ſaid I to my ſelf, what doſt thou muſe upon? Why doſt thou not preſent thy ſelf unto thy faithful Ameſtris? upon theſe words, violently bending the boughs which hindred my paſſage, I was going out of the wood to throw my ſelf at her feet, and to interrupt the thoughts ſhe had of Aglatidas, by rendring her Aglatidas himſelf: But when I was almoſt out of the Wood, and ready to enter into the green border, I ſaw one on the other ſide, who by his garb and gallant array, ſeem'd to be a man of quality: Then I retir'd with as much haſte, as I advanc'd before; and as Love is always ingenious to perſecute thoſe who acknowledge it for their Soveraign; I ſuddenly exchanged my joy for inquietude: Which of my Rivals is this, ſaid I, which comes to interrupt the thoughts of divine Ameſtris from her dear Aglatidas? Ha, ſaid I, if it be true, that I am in any corner of her heart, why ſhould I envy him that throws himſelf at her feet, to acquaint her with his paſſion? But who knows, ſaid I preſently, whether or no Ameſtris does not ſtay here to meet this happy Rival? and whether ſhe do not prophane that place by her infidelity, which I took to be a teſtimony of her affection? Doubtleſs, ſaid I, being much tranſported, and hardly my ſelf, when I ſaw him advance towards her, this inconſtant woman ſtays for him; for if it were not ſo, he would not make ſuch haſte, but would approach her with leſs ſtraining himſelf: But, O Heavens, what multiplicity of ſorrows ſeized upon me, when I perfectly ſaw that he who came unto her, was not only my Rival, but the moſt of all dangerous Rivals, Megabiſes: I could not think of it without extraordinary turbulency: Yet ſince from the place where I lay hid, I could not ſee the face of Ameſtris, neither durſt I change place for fear of making ſuch noiſe as might diſcover me, therefore I could not preciſely know whether ſhe ſaw him coming or no: Yet as jealouſie blinds all objects, I did imagine ſhe ſaw him coming towards her, and by conſequence, becauſe ſhe did not riſe and go to him, therefore I believed ſhe ſtayed for him, and that there was a great familiarity between them, becauſe ſhe did him not the honour to ſalute him, nor uſe any manner of Ceremony: I know not, Sir, how I ſhould expreſs unto you my ſad reſentments at that time; but I am moſt certain that love did never invent any ſo cruel to torment thoſe ſhe would puniſh, than that which I endured upon this occaſion. In concluſion, Sir, to make it known unto you, that what joy ſoever the ſight of that fair and dear Perſon had given me in the inſtant before, I muſt tell you, I could not chuſe but paſſionately deſire I were deſtroyed; I wiſhed ſhe would riſe and be gone from that place: But, ſaid I, if ſhe go away, I ſhall ſee her no more; yet if ſhe ſtay, I may perhaps ſee her beſtow her favours upon my Rival; If ſhe ſhould riſe, he would follow her, and I ſhould not ſee the manner of his treatment: But if ſhe do not go away, ſaid I, is it not an infallible proof that Megabiſes and ſhe are upon good terms? Go then, adored Ameſtris, (ſaid I, joyning my hands) and ſtay not for my greateſt enemy. But alas, this illuſtrious Lady, never thought of going; for ſhe was ſo taken up with thoughts of Aglatidas, and his long abſence, that ſhe never ſaw Megabiſes, until he was ſo near her, that ſhe could not ſhun him. She no ſooner perceived him, but ſhe roſe, contrary to my expectation: and as I knew afterwards, asked him with much ſeverity, why he came to moleſt her ſolitude: But, O Heavens, as I did not ſee the face of Ameſtris, nor her fidelity to me, nor her rigor towards Megabiſes, ſo I was not a jot ſatisfied: I was in a hundred minds to ruſh out of the wood, and break off their diſcourſe, which I could not underſtand: I thought to aſſault Megabiſes before the face of Ameſtris: yet ſeeing he had not a Sword, and I but one, I changed that deſign, and deferred my revenge; and notwithſtanding my deſpair, my jealouſie, and all I ſaw, I had ſo great reſpect unto Ameſtris, that though Megabiſes had had a Sword, as I had mine, yet in conſideration of her, I think that I ſhould not have dared to have ſet upon him; beſides the conſideration of a ſcurvy noiſe which this manner of doing it would have raiſed: Therefore then I remained an immoveable ſpectator of this tedious diſcourſe: for as I exactly learned afterwards, after ſhe had ſhewed Megabiſes how ill ſhe took his abrupt intruſion, ſhe would have gone away, but he did conjure her ſo urgently to hear him, as the laſt time, proteſting unto her, That if after he had expreſſed himſelf,ſhe ſhould then forbid him any hopes of her affection, he would never importune her any more, nor ſee her. Ameſtris thinking ſhe had found a good occaſion to be delivered from the perſecution of Megabiſes, told him at the laſt, That he might ſpeak, upon condition it ſhould be the laſt time; and upon condition he would abſolutely reſolve to follow her order, whatſoever it might be: Megabiſes being glad in the midſt of his deſpair, that he had obtained permiſſion to ſpeak, After a low reverence, thanked Ameſtris for the favour ſhe had done him: But alas, Sir, How deep a wound did this thanks make in my heart?

and how little did I underſtand the truth of the paſſage? the Fountain was in the midſt of the green Border; the Border was very large; the Wood which compaſſed it about, was every where equally diſtant from the midſt where they were, and the Border round: I was too far off to underſtand: I could come no nearer without diſcovery: I ſaw not the face of Ameſtris: I ſaw Megabiſes in a poſture of thanks for ſome favour, and I could conceive nothing but cauſe of deſpair; nor do nothing, but endure the moſt iutolerable Hell that ever was. Yet Megabiſes, not to loſe his precious time, whereupon the joy or the ſorrow of all his life did depend, began to ſpeak unto her in theſe terms. You know, Madam, ſaid he to her, that my love to you has ever been ſo full of reverence, that it never almoſt durſt appear in your eye, but when deſpair had rob'd me of my reaſon, and forced me to reveal it: Yes, Madam, I have ſuffered, I have endured without complaint, until the news of that good fortune which Aglatidas was to enjoy; for me to diſpute with him for an Honour, unto which I thought I had as much right as he: For, indeed, Madam, our Qualities are equal: I have loved you ſince the firſt Minute I ſaw you: I have ſerved you with an unparallel'd aſſiduity, and unexampled fidelity: and all this, Madam, without receiving one favourable word from you, nor one common ſmile which had the leaſt ſweetneſs intended in it towards me: I have found you civil, it is true, as long as only matters of indifferency were in agitation: but as ſoon as I had diſcovered my paſſion, ha! Madam then thoſe eyes, thoſe fair eyes, which I adore, never looked upon me but in anger: you have ſhun'd me as an enemy: and to lap up all in a few words, I believe you have hated me: Yet for all this, Madam, I have not left adoring you: you, I ſay, who has deprived me of my reſt, and troubled the tranquility of my Life: who has made me loſe a Brother whom I much loved: You rob'd him of his reaſon and virtue, and cauſed me to hate him; you have preferred the man who kill'd him with my own Sword: Yet, Madam, I love you ſtill, and ſhall eternally love you: yet notwithſtanding, there remains ſome beams of underſtanding in me, though my ſoul and ſpirits be infinitely troubled: and I deſire to conjure you to tell me without diſſimulation, What is the Cauſe of your averſion towards me; to the end I may regulate my reſentments: for although I know very well that your Marriage was reſolved upon with Aglatidas, and I know that Artambaces loved him; yet I am not reſolved whether it was by his choice or yours. Therefore tell me, Madam, I conjure you, Whether your inſenſibility of my Love, be an effect of your Sympathy with Aglatidas, or your natural antipathy to Megabiſes? Speak, Madam, I beſeech you, to the end I may know after what manner I ought to tranſact; and fear not my deſpair: but on the contray I promiſe to acknowledge your ſincerity for a double favour, when you ſhall pronounce the ſentence of death upon me. I could, Madam, ſaid he, without further troubling my ſelf to diſcover your true thoughts, make uſe of other means, and take other courſes to effect my deſigns; you know that I do not ſtand upon ill terms with the King: and that you are at preſent with one of my friends and allies, who might advantage me more ways than one; and that either by cunning, or the Authority of Aſtiages, I could take more violent and infallible courſes. But, Madam, I cannot, I am not capable of ſuch ways: the heart of Ameſtris is a thing which can never be gotten with ſatisfaction, but by her ſelf: therefore, Madam, it muſt be you only which with ingenuity can tell me the ſecret of your ſoul: for if it be not engaged, then I ſhall eſteem my ſelf a moſt happy man, and will not deſpair of good fortune; but if, Madam, it be engaged, it is but juſt, that I only ſhould be unhappy, and not be perpetually a trouble unto you, either to your ſelf, or to that happy Rival whom you have choſen: Speak, Madam, I beſeech you (ſaid he to her, in a moſt ſuppliant and paſſionate manner) and deny not unfortunate Megabiſes this ſmall favour: At theſe words he ſtopt; and with much impatience waited for the anſwer of Ameſtris, which I could not underſtand. But alas, mine was more cruel; and when I thought that perhaps the anſwer of Ameſtris unto Megabiſes was favourable, I was upon the point of reſolving to leave the place where I was, and intertupt their Diſcourſe: Yet notwithſtanding, it being the nature of jealouſie to nouriſh poiſon, and to ſeek that which will maintain it, and ſhun that which would deſtroy it; ſo I kept my ſtation, and endeavoured to know by the countenance of Megabiſes, whether the anſwer of Ameſtris was gracious to him or no: for (as I told you before) I could not ſee hers: This wiſe Lady then, being moved with ſome compaſſion towards Megabiſes, reſolved to try if ſhe could cure him, by telling him her very real thoughts. But here admire, Sir, the fantaſtical effects of love. Ameſtris diſcovered more things now to my advantage, unto Megabiſes, than ever ſhe had diſcovered unto me in all her life; and whilſt ſhe was telling them, I took them for ſo many injuries done unto my own heart, ſuppoſing all her actions and geſtures to be Teſtimonies of a new Paſſion; and all thoſe Words which I could not underſtand, to be ſo many infidelities. After then a little ſtudy upon that which ſhe would anſwer, I know not (ſaid ſhe to him) whether what you tell me be your real thoughts or no; but I know very well, that I will not diſſemble mine: Know then, Megabiſes, that I have eſteemed you according to your deſerts, and I held you in a degree of friendſhip as long as I believed you intended nothing but civility towards me; but ſince you have given me ſuch Teſtimonies of a violent Paſſion, I do think that I ought not to deceive you by any falſe ill-grounded hopes: for ſince I was reſolved abſolutely to obey my Father, I would never give my own mind leave to determine upon any thing. What, ſaid Megabiſes interrupting her, if Artambaces had commanded you to accept of my ſervices, would you have conſented? Doubtleſs I had (anſwered ſhe:) But, (ſaid he) have you the ſame reſolved blind obedience for Aglatidas? and did not your own choice precede the choice of Artambaces? It did not precede his (anſwered this lovely Lady: But, Megabiſes, it is ſo ſtrongly confirmed, that nothing can alter it: Never think (ſaid ſhe) that by acknowledging I do not hate Aglatidas, this ſhould give you any ground for hope, that ſince my heart is ſo ſenſible of him, it can ever be ſo of yours: No, Megabiſes, deceive not your ſelf, I love Aglatidas, becauſe my Father when he was dying commanded it, and becauſe my own inclination does not refuſe it, and becauſe my own reaſon argues for him: But beſides all this, I muſt acknowledge ſomething more unto you, and tell it in hopes to cure you, though I cannot without bluſhing tell you, That I do love him, and I will love him eternally: I have no other reaſon to give you, but I do and will love him: Love (ſaid ſhe) is doubtleſs a Paſſion, which if it were poſſible we ought not to have: But when it is entertained, and innocent as mine is, it ought to be made illuſtrious by an inviolable conſtancy: My Father's command hath rendred the original of this Paſſion in me to be no crime; and I muſt not make it become criminal by infidelity: Never think, Megabiſes, that there is any thing offenſive unto you in the affection I have unto Aglatidas; I choſe him not, but he was given unto me; but ſince I have accepred of him, I muſt preſerve him till death, and keep my ſelf for him as long as I live: yet notwithſtanding, to teſtifie that I will do all I can for you; I perſwade you to regulate your thoughts if you can: Content your ſelf with my eſteem and friendſhip, and be confident you ſhall enjoy both them as long as I live. Ameſtris having done ſpeaking, the unhappy Megabiſes, who bore an unconceiveable reſpect unto her, in lieu of breaking into complaints and reproaches, thanked her for her freedom and ſincerity, and teſtified with tears in his eyes, that he was much obliged unto her for offering unto him her eſteem and friendſhip: but as he had a little changed his ſtation, ſo that I could ſee no more than his ſide, I could not perceive any melancholy in his face, I only ſaw a geſture, as if he had given thanks for ſomething, which (as you may conceive) did not a little vex me; yet Megabiſes after he had a little deplored his misfortune, and admired at the change, and his own moderation, tion, told Ameſtris, that he durſt not promiſe her an alteration in his thoughts: But at the leaſt, Madam, ſaid he, I will ſo hide them, that you ſhall never perceive them, and ſo far I will promiſe you: I will not have you, ſaid he ſighing, divide your heart: No, Madam, ſince I can have no room in your affection, ſuch as I wiſh, never beſtow your eſteem nor your friendſhip upon me neither: Drown all thoſe petty favours in the love you bear unto too happy Aglatidas, and give nothing unto unfortunate Megabiſes, only one favour which he deſign'd to ask you: After this, Madam, he will be as good as his word, he will ſpeak unto you no more: Therefore, Madam, (ſaid he, with eyes full of tears) refuſe not to grant me this Requeſt; and permit me, during this Baniſhment which I intend, to ſay, that you have not abſolutely forſaken me? Aſſure your ſelf (ſaid Ameſtris to him) any thing which will neither offend againſt my own duty, nor Aglatidas, ſhall not be denied you. Say then only, Madam, added he, That if deſpairing Megabiſes had been happy, he might have been loved by the divine Ameſtris; and that being unfortunate ſhe hath only ſome ſlight compaſſion upon his misfortune. I have already ſaid the firſt (anſwered ſhe); and for the ſecond, I am neither blind nor ſtupid, but do ſee things as they are, and as I ought to ſee them, and to ſay more, I think as I ought to think of them: but ask me no more, and remember your promiſes. I dye, if I remember them, Madam, anſwered he; but I will never forget them: At theſe words he kneeled to give her thanks, and bid his laſt adieu; and before ſhe had any time to hinder it, or make any ſign ſhe was diſpleaſed with it, he kiſſed her hand twice: Oh Heavens, Sir, what did I think when I ſaw what I now tell you! at that very inſtant both my love and my jealouſie gave place unto another paſſion, and that was hatred; or to ſay better, Hatred, and Love, and Jealouſie, Anger, Fury, Rage, met and mingled all together in my mind, and all ſtriving to be predominate in my ſoul, put it into a great diſorder, ſo that I had no reſpect for Ameſtris; I began then to come out of the Wood where I was hid, and reſolved to beſtow a thouſand taunts upon her, and perhaps worſe upon Megabiſes; when preſently I diſcovered the King attended by the whole Court, who contrary to cuſtom came to walk there: The Guards no ſoonner appeared, but Ameſtris parted from Megabiſes, who for his part went to lament his misfortune in ſome ſolitary place: But they neither of them came towards the place where I was, and ſtayed alone, not being able either to complain or revenge my ſelf: I went into the thick of the wood, but ſo tormented by all paſſions, that I could not fix my mind upon any object; I no ſoonner began to think of the infidelity of Ameſtris, but I thought of Megabiſes his good fortune: and as ſoon as I thought to complain of my Miſtreſs, I began a deſign to revenge my ſelf upon my Rival: my ſoul was ſo tormentingly toſſed, that I was not a minute at quiet in my ſelf; yet as the King came late, ſo he ſtayed not long: Night coming on apace, I only waked and ſtayed in the Garden; I remember the Moon ſhined very weakly that Night, becauſe ſhe was at the laſt end of her courſe, and that dim melancholy light ſuited beſt with my humour; after I had ſent my Servant to fetch my Horſe, I paſſed away the Night without ſitting down or reſting my ſelf, only a little while upon the ſide of the Fountain: I walked in every path, and one might have ſaid I was ſeeking my Miſtreſs and my Rival in every corner of the wood, although I knew neither of them were there. But when I came to the place where I ſaw them together, It was here, ſaid I, where I ſaw the unfaithful Ameſtris beſtow a favour upon my Rival, ſuch a one as I durſt never pretend unto: Here it was, in this place, added he, where I received ſuch a favour as I thought none could ever have obtained but my ſelf: Yes, Ameſtris, I thought your virtue was ſo preciſe, that without the aſſiſtance of Artambaces, I ſhould never have obtained any place in your heart: but for ought I ſee, Megabiſes need none to help him unto the ſovereignty of your heart; and your inconſtancy has excluded the unfortunate Aglatidas: But cruel Lady (ſaid he) muſt you needs chuſe the very ſame place which was the only Teſtimony of that love you gave me, and there beſtow your favours upon Megabiſes? Muſt you needs betray me there where you promiſed your fidelity unto me? Is it poſſible but that in ſpeaking unto Megabiſes, you ſhould remember Aglatidas? Does not the murmur of this Fountain, with which you ſaw me mingle my tears at parting, put you in mind of him? Did not that moſſe-green Cuſhion upon which you leaned, remember you that I bedewed it with my tears? Cruel and perfidious Lady, have you forgot how you drew back your fair hand which I would have kiſſed, and which Megabiſes hath obtained with your full conſent: Why (unjuſt and ungrateful Ameſtris) were you ſo liberal unto him, and ſo niggardly of your favours unto me? Do you not remember how you permitted me to think of any thing that might preſerve Aglatidas, and bring him back unto you full of fidelity? Would you have him preſerve himſelf only to ruin him? and did you deſire him to continue conſtant, to the end he might be more ſenſible of your infidelity? If it had been your mind I ſhould have been unhappy, had not that been enough, but you muſt make me ſenſible of it alſo? Had it not been more honour for you to have treated me ill, than to betray me? You had been only cruel then, and perhaps leſs unjuſt; But as you have now uſed me, you are cruel, wicked, perfidious, and inhumane: But alas (ſaid I) is it poſſible that all the while I courted Ameſtris, ſhe did not love me? Whether is it that ſhe always did deceive me, or has changed her mind? Muſt I look upon Ameſtris as one that is a cheat, and inſenſible, ſuch a one as laughs at the misfortunes of another? or muſt I think her weak, unconſtant, and a lover of novelty, who loves thoſe ſhe ſees, and forgets thoſe ſhe ſees not? Such a one as gives her heart to any that asks it? But alas (ſaid I) that heart, that glorious heart, has coſt me too dear in the obtaining, for that to be ſo: How many tears have I dropt? how many unprofitable ſighs? and what abundance of pains have I taken, before I could receive the leaſt ſhadow of any good-will unto me? what then can I think of you, unfaithful Ameſtris? have you ever loved me? or have you ever hated me? Ha! No, no, ſaid I preſently, you did love me when I laſt left you; I diſcovered your heart moved; I perceived in your eyes whether you would or no, ſome tears of tenderneſs which your modeſty did ſtrive to keep in; You did hide ſome of your reſentments from me; you grieved when I left you, and certainly you did then love me, moſt lovely Ameſtris: But unhappy man that I am, you did not love me more than you had reaſon for: I know (ſaid I) that abſence is moſt dangerous; but alas, I was abſent for the love of you. Moreover, you have alwayes writ unto me, as if you had continued faithful: and yet I ſee you the moſt unfaithful woman that ever was: Ha! too happy Megabiſes (ſaid I) never think you ſhall enjoy your happineſs quietly; for I muſt revenge the wrong that you have done me. Is it thou, who by ſome trick or other haſt altered the heart of Ameſtris, and ſeduced her from her good inclinations to me? It muſt be thou, doubtleſs, who is the only cauſe of her crime, and my misfortune: I will therefore have this reſpect unto Ameſtris, as not to ſpeak any thing unto her concerning it; nor complain of her injuſtice, nor charge any but him only who has made her culpable. But, O Heavens, ſaid I, Ameſtris is one of a moſt excellent wit and judgment; ſhe cannot eaſily be deceived: Artabes, as cunning as he was, could do no good upon her: No, no, let me not flatter my ſelf (ſaid I) the heart of Megabiſes holds correſpondence with Ameſtris; ſhe is as culpable as he: and he enjoys not her affection, but becauſe ſhe has given it unto him.

If I ſhould tell you all I ſaid, Sir, and all I thought upon, I ſhould not finiſh my ſad ſtory this night, but ſhould too much abuſe your patience and goodneſs; I will only relate, that I intended a hundred times to quit Ameſtris, to forget her, and ſcorn her: then again I reſolved a hundred times alſo, to repent and love her eternally, maugre her crime: there was only one reſolution which I kept conſtantly in my mind, which was to kill Megabiſes whereſoever I found him; but yet I did not know ſometimes whether I ſhould love or hate Ameſtris: yet however, I was fixed upon it to ruin my Rival: Day and my Horſes were no ſooner come, but I ſent my Servant to know whether Megabiſes was with her, and inform me of it; but to my ill fortune he was gone into the Countrey, and none of his men could tell which Rode he took. This chance did much diſpleaſe me; and the thought, that this meeting of Megabiſes and Ameſtris, was only to bid adieu in that place, did double my deſpair. Then I ſent to ſee whether Menaſta was returned out of the Countrey, to the end I might make my complaints unto her of the perfidy of her friend; but I underſtood ſhe was fallen ſick, and could not ſo ſuddenly return: Then was I the moſt deſpairing man upon earth: I had ſeen ſuch paſſages as moved me not to doubt of the infidelity of Ameſtris: I ſaw her more fair than ever, at leaſt in my imagination: My Rival was abſent: my only Confident was ſick, ſo that I had no opportunity either to lament or revenge my ſelf. I ſtayed two days cloſe in a little Town neer Ecbatan, in this deplorable condition, with intentions to be informed whither Megabiſes was gone; but do what I could, there was no certainty of it to be learned: I was only told, that he went that way which leads into the Province of the Ariſantines, which was the place of my retreat: yet becauſe there was divers croſs ways conducting to ſeveral places, I could not conclude any certainty thereupon; yet I did imagine that he was gone to ſeek me out, and fight with me, that ſo he might more quietly enjoy Ameſtris: This thought made ſuch impreſſion in me, that I took horſe to return, enquiring very exactly all the way for him: ſometimes thinking I had found him, and then preſently found my ſelf deceived: I came at laſt to the place of my retreat, without any intelligence of Megabiſes. At my return I found a Letter from Ameſtris, which came during my abſence, and which did vex me ſo much as it would have pleaſed me if my mind had not been prepoſſeſſed: but ſince it is not very long, and ſerves to the purpoſe which I intend; I will relate it to you; and if I be not miſtaken, it was thus indited;

From

From Ameſtris unto Aglatidas.

Since you have ſo much curioſity and deſire to know how I do, and what my diverſions are; know, that I do ſhun the tumultuous Court as much as handſomely I can; that there is only one, whoſe converſation I can endure without regret; and that I do as much as I can, make this Converſation ſolitary and retired; you may very well imagine that I do not chuſe the Gardens of the Palace for my Walks, but the Fountain in the Green Plain, is the ordinary Place where I entertain that only one Perſon, who at preſent can afford me any delight in Ecbatan: There it is where I entertain my ſelf. I will not tell you Aglatidas, all my thoughts in this retired Place, for perhaps it will more conduce unto your quiet, to keep you ignorant; and perhaps alſo it will be more advantagious unto Ameſtris if you do not gueſs at them.

I beſeech you, Sir, to wonder at the odneſs of this accident; If I had received this Letter, before I had ſeen what I did, I had been raviſhed with joy: for then I ſhoold have underſtood this ſolitude whereof ſhe ſpeaks, to have been for the love of Aglatidas; I ſhould have taken that only Perſon which ſhe could endure, to have been my Couſin with whom ſhe had diſcours'd of me; I ſhould have thought her going to the Fountain in the Green Plain, had been to remember the laſt time I ſaw her: and ſhould doubtleſs have thought her Letter to be infinitely obliging, ſince in telling me, it would not conduce to my quiet, that I ſhould know her muſing thoughts, I ſhould have interpreted her meaning was, that the knowledge of her ſorrows would augment mine: And I ſhould have thought that none could expreſs affection more ſtrongly and gallantly than ſhe did in the end of her Letter, in ſaying, That perhaps alſo it would be advantagious for her that I ſhould not gueſs her thoughts.

But, Sir, this Letter did work a far different effect in my mind; and I expounded it in a quite oppoſite ſenſe to what ſhe did mean it: I did apprehend it ſo inhumane, that ſeeing ſhe betrayed me, and had written to me in a double ſenſe, I believed that the more to oblige Megabiſes, ſhe had ſhewed him the Letter: Yes, yes, perfidious Ameſtris (ſaid I in reading the Letter, and commenting almoſt upon every word) I have ſome deſire to know what you do, and what are your diverſions; I know indeed that you do not lie when you write unto me, that you ſhun the tumult of the Court, and that there is but one Perſon whom you can endure without regret, and that you alſo do what you can to have that converſation in a ſolitary and retired place: you tell me, cruel Ameſtris, that I may imagine you ſhun the Gardens of the Palace for your Walks; but perfidious as you are, I cannot imagine you go unto the Fountain in the Green-Plain unto any other end than to entertain Megabiſes: yet I do underſtand, and ſaw with my own eyes, that the only perſon in Ecbatan which can pleaſe you, is the too happy Megabiſes: You ſay further, that you entertain your ſelf: Ah, I have ſeen too much, cruel Ameſtris, I wiſh the Gods I had not ſeen it: But you have reaſon, ſaid I, to ſay, that it would conduce unto my quiet to be kept ignorant of your Muſings, and more reaſon to ſay that it would not be advantagious unto Ameſtris that I ſhould gueſs at them: But how (unjuſt Lady) can you acknowledge them a wrong, and not repent of them? But perhaps you writ this Letter before that cruel diſcourſe with Megabiſes: and indeed I was not miſtaken in my conjecture; for looking upon the Date of the Letter, and remembring the day I ſaw them together, I found it was writ the day before it.

This did put me into ſo hot a chaſe, that I was reſolved to uſe all poſſible means for the curing of my ill-grounded Paſſion: You may eaſily conceive that I took up this reſolution with abundance of ſorrow, and that I was to endure more than one Combat, before I could overcome: I reſolved to wait until Fortune gave me an opportunity to be revenged of Megabiſes, and not to travel the World over in queſt of him, as I once intended:

tended: and I reſolved to ſurmount thoſe reſentments which Love had infuſed into my Soul: I would not anſwer Ameſtris, nor ſeek for any Conſolation in reproaching or taxing her for her Crime; but I commanded him who uſed to receive the Letters, to ſend them back again, without letting me ſee them, or opening of them.

If you ever were in Love, Sir, I need not tell you what I endured upon this occaſion: You will eaſily know that it is a moſt difficult thing to break ones heart of a violent Paſſion: That I have reaſon enough not to think upon Ameſtris; yet I thought perpetually upon her: and it is in vain to make any offers to ſcorn her, ſince I did ever eſteem her more than all the World. I ſought out company and diſcourſe, thinking to divert my ſelf that way; but it was ſo diſtaſtful, that ſolitude was leſs ſupportable. I called Books to my relief, but in them I found nothing but good unprofitable Counſels. I went to hunt, but I found that my wearineſs of body did nouriſh the diſtempers of my mind. In concluſion, I reſolved to let time cure that which nothing elſe would. But, O Heavens, this remedy was long and tedious. All this while the innocent Ameſtris, ſhe hearing no news of me, and ſeeing all her Letters ſent back, gave over writing to me any more, and was in a very ſad condition. Sometimes ſhe imagined I was dead, but my Couſin underſtood from my Father, that it was not ſo. They endeavoured, but in vain, to find out the cauſe of my ſilence; and the innocence of Ameſtris was ſuch as ſhe could not gueſs at it. She had ſome fears that Megabiſes would render but an ill account unto me, and had told him ſome tales of her: But upon ſecond thoughts ſhe could not believe him ſo baſe as to do ſuch a vile act, nor me to be ſo weak as to believe him, ſince I was his Enemy and Rival: ſo that there was no likelihood of any ſuch thing; for he was too much a man of honour to uſe any ſuch cheats; alſo he was going to live in a place where he could enjoy no fruits of his policy, ſince it was then known that his deſpair had carried him into thoſe wars which were then up in Lydia: What did not then the amiable Ameſtris think? and of what crime did ſhe not accuſe the unfortunate Aglatidas? She thought him to be unconſtant, that ſome new beauty and freſh paſſion had wrought a change in him, and upon that thought ſhe would forget her ſorrows, and repent ſhe had ever loved him: She told a hundred ſtories againſt me and my Love, and did all ſhe could to take that heart from me which ſhe had given me: Menaſta, who loved me very well, and who was returned out of the Countrey, was not able to excuſe me, but ſhe nouriſhed all her angry thoughts againſt me.

Indeed, Sir, it might very well be ſaid, that we were both of us as unfortunate, as we were innocent. In the mean time, he with whom Ameſtris lived, and who had a deſire to pleaſure Megabiſes, and who ſeeing that he was abſent, alſo knowing that there were abundance which pretended unto Ameſtris; intended to take a Voyage in the Province Ariſantines, where the greateſt part of his Eſtate was, to take ſome order concerning urgent buſineſs there: For, Sir, it was unknown at Court whither I was retired, and this man did not know I was there. Ameſtris, who could not endure the Court, it was much againſt her mind, and who deſired to hide her ſorrows, was very glad of the motion; and much the more (as I heard ſince) becauſe ſhe hoped coming into that Province where I was, ſhe might find out the cauſe of my alteration, of which yet ſhe was ignorant: In the mean time, as the abſence of Megabiſes did faciliate the matter, my Father having obtained my favour with the King, commanded me to return unto Ecbatan, juſt at the ſame time when Ameſtris went out of it. I confeſs I received this news with ſorrow, and would have been content to have continued longer in baniſhment: Yet notwithſtanding I thought to tell things as they were, and ſeemed to believe that my heart was ſufficiently cured from fear of any more wounds at the ſight of Ameſtris: I then returned unto Ecbatan and met her not, becauſe ſhe took another way.

I cannot relate, Sir, what troubles my mind was in when I came near Ecbatan, when I entred into it, and paſſed by the Palace-Gate of Artambaces. I feared to meet Ameſtris, and I looked about me exactly in paſſing through all the ſtreets. I would have deceived my ſelf, and not known the place where ſhe was: But alas, that I ſhould know my ſelf ſo little, and that I ſhould be ſo ignorant of what was to come. I was no ſooner lighted from my Horſe, but I went to my Father's Chamber, who received me with unexpreſſible joy; though he reſented ſome ſorrows to ſee my face ſo altered as it was: For indeed, Sir, I was ſo much changed, that I doubted whether I ſhould have been taken for my ſelf. My Father at laſt told me, that he had been ſo ſolicitous about the buſineſs which concerned my life, that he never thought of preſſing forward the buſineſs of my Marriage, becauſe that might have too much incenſed Megabiſes both unto love, and unto revenge. Sir, ſaid I to him, you have done very well, for at the preſent, Marriage is a thing which I more fear than deſire. My Father deſired me to explain that Enigma; but I excuſed it, and went unto my old Chamber in a mighty melancholly. The next Morning my Father carried me unto the King, who received me very well, and who would have reconciled the Family of Megabiſes and ours: but as for Megabiſes, he was not yet returned unto Ecbatan. In going from the Court, I was not long alone, for the report of my return was no ſooner divulged in Ecbatan, but many of my friends came to viſit me. And ſince my love unto Ameſtris was known unto every one; After the firſt Complements were paſſed, Arbatan, the Brother of Harpagus (whom the King had heretofore employed to deſtroy Young Cyrus) who was in the Catalogue of my beſt Friends, asked me, if I did not meet the fair Ameſtris upon the way as I returned to Court. I bluſh'd at the Name of Ameſtris, and asked my Friend, Whether Ameſtris was in Ecbatan or no? To which he anſwered, That queſtionleſs ſhe was not.

But here, Sir, admire what love can do! I was no ſooner aſſured of her abſence, but I reſented both joy and ſorrow together: and my mind was ſo divided upon this occaſion, as I could determine upon nothing: Yet notwithſtanding, I think that if the ground of my heart had been well examined, I ſhould have more deſired her return to Ecbatan, than rejoyced at her abſence: not that I was fully reſolved never to make the leaſt ſhadow of love unto her; but, not to diſguiſe the matter, I did yet love her more than I thought I ſhould: and it is the natural quality of Love to deſire the ſight of the party loved. I reſerved my mind ſo cloſely all the time of this converſe, that I never was the firſt which ſpoke: I had a hundred deſires, that every one ſhould ſpeak unto me of it, but I never durſt ſpeak of it my ſelf: ſince I had no other Confidents unto whom I durſt open my Paſſions, but Arbates, who now was dead, and Menaſta who was gone with Ameſtris: I could not make misfortunes known unto them, who already knew them not. Yet notwithſtanding I altered my reſolution, and Artaban did ſo diligently ſeek my friendſhip, and enquired concerning the cauſes of my profound melancholly which appeared in my face, and all my actions; that I being moved by his affection, and my own ſorrows, I did acquaint him with the original of my love, with its progreſs and end; for ſometimes I was ſo bold as to ſpeak as if I were no more in Love. It chanced one day when we were both alone together, and diſcourſing, of ſome paſſages at Court, I took the heart to tell Artaban, that the time was when I loved Ameſtris; But Sir, in pronouncing theſe words, I bluſh'd: And Artaban, embracing me, ſaid, Ah my dear Aglatidas, you do love ſtill, your face does betray you, your heart has more ſincerity than your tongue: I know not whether I love yet (ſaid I unto him ſighing) but I do know very well, that I ought not to love her any longer; and more than that, I will not love her any longer. Love (anſwered he unto me) does not uſe to ask counſel of Reaſon, nor deſire the conſent of our wills to ſubject us: The ſame violence which made it maſter of our hearts, whether we would or no, can maintain it by the ſame ways. Love (ſaid Artaban) is not a lawful King, but a Ty-a Tyrant, which does not more kindly uſe them who do not defend themſelves, than they who will diſpute with it for their liberty, and who will have the Soveraignty where it would reign. Whatſoever it can do, ſaid I, whether I love Ameſtris, or whether I love her not, ſhe ſhall never have any more ſhew either of Love or hatred from me. You will ſoon change this Opinion (replied he unto me): There needs not many words to prove that every minute of your life ſpeaks Love unto her: all your Diſcourſes, and all your Actions do manifeſt that you will be always faithful unto her: your paſſion of her is very lively painted in your eyes: For (ſaid he, not giving me time to anſwer him.) from whence elſe can this ſtrange alteration, which appears in your face, in your ſpirits, and in all your humours, proceed? From what cauſes can ariſe this profound melancholly, this ſolitude which you prefer before all your friends; theſe continual ſighs; that indifferency wherewith you look upon all Court-diverſions; from whence can theſe proceed but from your being in love? I do not, nor will not love Ameſtris any more (replied I) and I hate all the reſt of the world beſides, except Artaban. And why do you hate them? (anſwered he) ſo many brave and gallant men, who do court you, and infinitely honour you? what will they do? what will ſo many fair and amiable Ladies as are in Ecbatan ſay? what has Nature and they done, that you ſhould thus hate them? No, no, Aglatidas (continued he) deceive not your ſelf, you do love Ameſtris, and you do love her ſo much, as you hate all the world beſides. If you did not love her, doubtleſs you would not hate others, but would love them as all other grave men uſe to love them. If I did love Ameſtris (ſaid I to him) I ſhould have wiſhed her return, and have known of her departure, and have reſented it. This Reſentment (replied he) is no leſs a mark of your love, than your wiſhes; for Ameſtris cannot be terrible unto you: you cannot fear her return, but you muſt love her. Moreover (ſaid he) what other ground can you find for your Melancholly? You are beloved of all the world; you have a

Father which conſents unto any thing you deſire; your Quality is inferior unto few; you are abundantly rich; you enjoy youth and health; you are of a compleat and handſome deportment (ſaid he flatteringly) you have courage and reputation enough: What is it then Aglatidas that you want? Where is any ground for your Melancholly? The remembrance of my Misfortunes (anſwered I). The remembrance of your Misfortunes (replied he) ſhould cauſe your Joy, when they are paſt: You had better have ſaid, your Misfortunes do continue. But I beſeech you (ſaid he) what will make you happy? They muſt be things impoſſible (ſaid I to him) nothing elſe, but that Ameſtris had never been perfidious. What then (replied Artaban) is your good fortune ſo inſeparably annexed unto Ameſtris? Can you never be happy without Ameſtris? You are very urgent (ſaid I to him) and I will anſwer you no more: Tell me, you cannot anſwer; but at the ſame time confeſs that you are the moſt in love of any man in the World: But my Dear Aglatidas (ſaid Artaban) why do you conceal ſo great and dangerous a Diſeaſe, which can never be cured but by diſcovering it? I hide it (ſaid he and changing colour) becauſe I think it incurable; and if I did not infinitely love Artaban, I ſhould not tell him as I do, that in deſpite of my reaſon, and againſt my will, Ameſtris, the perfidious Ameſtris, does take up all my thoughts, and poſſeſſes my heart whether I will or no. As I left ſpeaking, Artaban embracing me, began:

Now (ſaid he to me) you have told me your Diſeaſe, I will endeavour to cure it. I believe you wiſh it, (ſaid I to him) but it is not ſo eaſy to do as to ſay it; for know, Artaban, that though Ameſtris ſhould repent her of her Infidelity, and come to me with tears in her eyes, I could not yet be perfectly ſatisfied; the remembrance of what is paſt, would keep me in continual inquietude for the time to come; and I ſhould poſſeſs a treaſure which I ſhould be in perpetual fears to loſe. As often as ſhe gave me any obliging Language, I ſhould imagine that the ſame expreſſions were uſed in favour of my Rival: And I could not reſpect the heart of Ameſtris otherwiſe than as a prophaned Altar. What if Ameſtris (ſaid then Artaban) ſhould with all her charms and beauty aſk pardon for her weakneſs and change, would you refuſe her? Ah cruel Friend! (ſaid I to him) what delight can you take in perſecuting me, in lieu of preſerving me? and telling me of ſuch impoſſibilities? But if it ſhould ſo happen (ſaid he to me) how would you uſe her? In ſpight of all my inquiſitive jealouſies which fills my heart, I think I ſhould throw my ſelf at her feet, and hearken unto her repentance, to aſſure her of my eternal love, and to require more exact fidelity from her than hitherto ſhe has obſerved. But alas, how far am I from that condition? But will you follow my counſel (ſaid Artaban to me)? I will do any thing (ſaid I to him) that would procure me ſome conſolation. If ſo (ſaid he) neglect not what I ſhall tell you, and know, that conſidering the ſtate of your ſoul, I have found an infallible remedy, either to make Ameſtris give you full ſatisfaction, or elſe to rid you of your paſſions to her. If I ſhould hearken unto Reaſon (ſaid I unto him) I ſhould rather chuſe the ſecond, than the firſt; but if I hearken unto my own heart, I ſhould prefer the firſt before the ſecond. Know then (ſaid Artaban unto me) ſince Love is ſo noble a Paſſion, as nothing can recompence it but it ſelf; and is ſo powerful that nothing can overcome it but its own forces: you muſt love, to make love ceaſe; and the hatred which commonly ſucceeds that love, is but love diſguiſed under an appearance of anger; which is more dangerous than if it appeared in its natural colours. In ſhort, Aglatidas, (ſaid he to me) you muſt cure one paſſion with another; and to make you leave loving Ameſtris, you muſt love another Beauty. Alas, (replied I then) how eaſy a matter is it for Artaban to give ſuch counſel, and how hard is it for Aglatidas to follow it? But (anſwered he me) the remedy which I will tell you, ſhall be eaſie, and not ſo impoſſible as you think it. Truly (ſaid he) as long as you remain in this kind of ſolitude wherein you now live, it will not be an eaſy matter for you to engage your ſelf in any new love: But you ought to look upon thoſe which may entangle you: you muſt expoſe your ſelf unto the Waves, and throw your ſelf into the Sea, to avoid ſhipwrack. The Diſeaſe is ſo dangerous, and the Phyſick ſo extraordinary, that you muſt almoſt die, in hopes to live the longer. But do you believe (ſaid I to him) that it is poſſible that I ſhould not only love any other Beauty, but that I can endure it? You may queſtionleſs, if you will (anſwered he); but at the firſt you muſt only feign a love of ſome other, and perhaps it will at length become a real love. If it do come to paſs, that you do love another, then you'll jeer at the inconſtancy of Ameſtris; and if it do not come to that paſs, yet at leaſt, it will be a handſome revenge for the injuries you have received. Perhaps (ſaid he) this fiction may bring your Miſtris unto ſome reaſonable terms; and her jealouſie may give you that, your love could not bring about. This remedy (ſaid I to him) is very dangerous, very uncertain, and very difficult: for you ſay, that perhaps I ſhall love, and perhaps I ſhall not love another; perhaps I may revenge my ſelf; perhaps Ameſtris will ſee her error. In a word, all is grounded upon perhaps's; that is to ſay, upon little or nothing; and I ſee ſo much uncertainty in this remedy, that I cannot think it good. Will you have another (ſaid he to me)? I have one (ſaid I to him) which is infallible, and that is death, which will, doubtleſs, rid me from all my ſorrows. That is the laſt remedy which you muſt uſe (anſwered Artaban) and it muſt never be made uſe of, but when all others have failed. In concluſion, Sir, what Arguments ſoever he could uſe, I could not conſent unto him that day: But a while after, hearing that Ameſtris was to return, he did ſo importune me to follow his counſel, as I reſolved to follow this Counſel, though it went much againſt the ſtrain of my mind. There was then in the Court a Lady called Anatiſa, one indeed of great merit and beauty, yet one whoſe beauty had never made many Conqueſts, and was doubtleſs far leſs fair than Ameſtris; yet fair enough. Chance would have it ſo, that the ſame day whereon I had conſented to try the remedy which Artaban had preſcribed, bed, I found her in the Walks of the Garden in the Palace, where I had not of a long time been, becauſe I had ſhunned company as much as poſſible: And as I neither had, nor could have any particular inclination unto any, nor had any liberty to chuſe in a time when none but Ameſtris could pleaſe me. Chance, I ſay, making me meet Anatiſa ſooner than another, I did not refuſe diſcourſe with her, as I was uſed to do with all other Ladies, ſince my return to Ecbatan; I mean, as much as civility would permit me: I ſpake then unto that Lady divers times that day; and although our diſcourſe was upon nothing but upon very indifferent things, ſhe thought her ſelf much obliged to me, becauſe I had done more unto her than unto any other Lady ſince my return to Court. And certainly it was advantageous to me, that the ſolitude wherein I had lived, did help me to perſwade the World unto that which I would have it believe; elſe doubtleſs it had not been ſo eaſy for me to deceive it, as it deceived it ſelf; and likewiſe if Anatiſa had not helped me to delude it.

For, Sir, I did not think that the complacency which this fair Lady rendred me, was any effect of my merit; but on the contrary, I plainly ſaw it had a reflection from Ameſtris, it being moſt certain that Anatiſa would not have treated me ſo favourably as ſhe did, but that ſhe conceived it did redound much unto her honour, that the man who had formerly loved the faireſt Beauty of the World, ſhould quit thoſe fetters to be captivated in hers. This petty jealouſie of Beauty, cauſed Anatiſa then to treat me with all poſſible civility; and I finding ſo much facility to execute what Artaban adviſed me unto, did tranſact as he would have me. Not, Sir, that I could ever reſolve to tell Anatiſa that I loved her, as well becauſe in very truth I had no ſuch Paſſion in me, as becauſe I thought it did too much treſpaſs upon the Laws of Generoſity; yet my manner of living with her did tell the Court as much, and likewiſe told the thoughts of Anatiſa the ſame, for I did viſit her very oft, I almoſt ſpoke unto none but her; I appeared very melancholly and diſordered; ſo that all the World took theſe things to be effects of a freſh Paſſion. Anatiſa, on the other ſide, did ſee that I was chained unto her Society, and that I did upon all occaſions which were offered, commend her; that I refuſed the company of all other women but ſhe; and that in our Diſcourſes I did often appear as if I were a little frantick, not knowing what I would ſay. But alas, all theſe, which ſhe took to be effects of my love to her, were only effects of that which I bore unto Ameſtris, how perfidious ſoever ſhe ſeemed to be unto me. Really, I did ſometimes repent the following of Artaban's counſel, and all others alſo, when I began firmly to reſolve of loving Anatiſa, and to baniſh Ameſtris from my heart and memory. Change, change, (ſaid I to my ſelf) this feigned Paſſion unto a real one, and be no longer faithful unto one that hath betrayed me; do not betray one that has nothing in her but ſincerity for me. 'Tis true, Anatiſa is not ſo fair as Ameſtris, yet perhaps ſhe will love me more faithfully. Tell her then, that thou loveſt her, ſaid I to my ſelf, although thou yet doſt not; ſo that being obliged by Generoſity not to lie, thou mayeſt no longer remain in any fears of returning unto inconſtant Ameſtris, or ever to ſee her, or ſpeak unto her, when ſhe returns, as they ſay ſhe will.

This thought, Sir, did ſo fortifie it ſelf in my mind, that I went three or four days together unto Anatiſa, with intentions to tell her, I loved her; but ſome intervenient paſſage or other hindred me from executing them; but when I found the opportunity, notwithſtanding all my determinate Reſolutions, I was dumb when I was about to ſpeak unto her; I diverted the diſcourſe; my tongue would not obey, my heart revolted againſt my will; my will it ſelf altered, and was unſetled; and indeed, not deſiring that which I deſired but one moment before, I dejected my eyes, as being equally aſhamed of what I did, and what I would have done. But, O Heavens, that which ſhould have deſtroyed me in the Opinion of Anatiſa, did confirm me; for ſhe ſuppoſing that the love and reverence which I bore unto her, had cauſed all theſe diſorders which ſhe diſcovered in my mind, ſhe did treat me more kindly, and would not ſee it. All the Court, Sir, believed I was in love with Anatiſa; one of my Couſins did write as much unto Menaſta; who, as I have told you, was with Ameſtris; but this Lady who writ, did mention it very obſcurely, knowing that ſuch news would be reſented with ſorrow, and therefore ſhe would not plainly tell it, until ſhe came to Ecbatan to ſee it. Meantime, I heard of two things together, which much grieved me; the one was, That Ameſtris would preſently come back: and the other, That Megabiſes would very ſhortly be in Town; This buſineſs which fell out only by accident, did ſeem unto me a thing agreed upon; and I did abſolutely conclude, that the voyage of Ameſtris was cauſed by the abſence of Megabiſes, tho' I could not gueſs at the reaſon. But as jealouſie always inclines more unto that which will augment it ſelf, than that which would leſſen it, I did not buſie my ſelf to reaſon the matter, from whence I might perhaps draw ſome conjectures unto my advantage; but I ſought out thoſe conjectures which would more torment me. They return (ſaid I) to triumph over my miſeries before my eyes; and they cannot eſteem themſelves happy, unleſs I be the witneſs of their felicities. However, perfidious Ameſtris, you ſhall not have ſo much ſatisfaction, as to think that I am unhappy; I will carry the matter ſo with Anatiſa, as you ſhall not ſo much as ſuſpect that I love you. But as for you, Megabiſes, never hope to enjoy your conqueſt quietly; for though I will pretend no more unto her, yet I will take away the enjoyment from thee, in taking away thy life, or at leaſt diſpute it unto the laſt minute of my life. Theſe tumultuous thoughts being a little appeaſed, I had ſome comfort to think, that Ameſtris ſhould believe I was in love with Anatiſa; and I was for a certain time ſo cloſely with her, as I my ſelf did wonder at it. In the mean while Ameſtris came to Town, and Menaſta was much confirmed in her belief of my new paſſion; yet notwithing ſhe would ſpeak with me before ſhe would abſolutely condemn me; and ſhe quickly found the opportunity; for indeed, as ſhe was my Couſin, I was in civility obliged to give her a viſit, which with much ado I reſolved upon; yet I would not go alone: but do what I could, ſhe ſpoke unto me particularly of it. Is it poſſible (ſaid ſhe to me) that what I hear can be true? Can any man who has been ſo happy, as not to be hated by Ameſtris, think upon loving Anatiſa? Ameſtris (ſaid I unto her) has not thought Aglatidas worthy of her; and I do not know, Menaſta, whether ſhe or I has made the worſt choice. She perhaps did that out of weakneſs, or an humour, which I have done out of reaſon, and to be revenged on her. But, Menaſta, let us talk no more on it; ſhe was always your friend, and I my ſelf believe ſhe concealed it from you, to betray me. It muſt needs be (anſwered ſhe) that ſhe has kept it ſecret, if it be true that ſhe betrayed you, for I never knew of it; but I confeſs, I have much ado to be perſwaded of the truth. I have had more to do (replied I); and if I my ſelf had not been a witneſs of her infidelity, if I had not with my own eyes ſeen her perfidious Treaſon, I ſhould never have believed it; no, though you your ſelf ſhould have aſſured me of it: But as I would not have believed you, ſo you your ſelf would have ſpoke againſt her; nor do I think that you will juſtifie her now. No, no, Menaſta, ſpeak no more of it, Ameſtris has betrayed me, and I have left her; ſhe has not thought me worthy of her affection, and I have not thought her worthy of mine; though, ſetting her infidelity aſide, ſhe is the admiration of all the Earth; and ſince ſhe either hates or ſcorns me, I am diſpenſed from that fidelity which I promiſed unto her. I confeſs (ſaid Menaſta) if ſhe be culpable, you are not to be much blamed: But however, you are to blame; for did you ever complain unto Ameſtris? have you ever accuſed her? did you ever give her time to juſtifie her ſelf, or to repent of it? Complaints (ſaid I) are requiſite, when the Crime of the party beloved is in any doubt, or when it is ſo ſmall, as a Confeſſion may wipe it off: But when the Offence is of ſuch a nature as that is which I have received, complaints do but procure new matter to be again deceived. Spare therefore fore your pains unto Ameſtris (ſaid I) and move her not to confeſs a thing which ſhe cannot confeſs without confuſion, as anticipated as ſhe is in the love which ſhe poſſeſſeth. Menaſta was ſo ſurpriſed to hear me ſpeak ſo, as ſhe could not anſwer; for ſince Ameſtris never told her of any converſe which ſhe had with Megabiſes, ſhe could not imagine any other colour of complaint which I could have: ſhe thought, that to excuſe my inconſtancy, I had ſuppoſed a Crime whereof ſhe was innocent, as appeared by her eyes, and that I was much more culpable than ſhe. That which confirmed her in her opinion, was the diſorder which ſhe had obſerved in my mind; not doubting, but that the diſorder was grounded upon my being aſhamed of my weakneſs, and upon this change which I had made; yet notwithſtanding, being deſirous to augment it, I do aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) that during all this voyage which Ameſtris hath made, there was not one Lover which could commend her for her indulgency towards him, nor brag of any favour. I do not doubt it (anſwered I) for ſhe is more faithful unto him whom ſhe has preferred before me. But who is that ſo happy lover of Ameſtris (replied ſhe in anger) that Menaſta ſhould not know him? Since you will have a ſecret of it (ſaid I unto her) I will have ſo much reſpect unto her, as not to reveal what I know, and help her to hide that which cannot but be too much publiſhed, and of which within this little time you will make no doubt of. As we were upon theſe terms, there came in ſo much company, that our diſcourſe could not continue longer; and I went from Menaſta in a doubled perplexity. For (ſaid I) if Ameſtris were within the compaſs of repentance, her ſoul would have confeſſed ſome part of her weakneſs, or at leaſt would have found out ſome handſome pretence and excuſe for it; but in denying all, it renders her culpable of all; and ſince ſo, I have nothing to do but to revenge my ſelf. Revenge, then (ſaid I) the real infidelity of Ameſtris, by a feigned infidelity. I will render my diligence unto Anatiſa, though I cannot render her my heart; I will puniſh her by this bad choice, and neglect nothing that may ſatisfie my reſentment, though I cannot ſatisfie my love. Mean while Menaſta, who was really incenſed againſt me, and thinking none would tell Ameſtris of my new Paſſion, thought fit to tell her of it, and went unto her that ſame Evening. She was not the firſt who brought her the news; for amongſt ſo many as did viſit her, there was ſome who out of malice, or ſimplicity, had told her of that thing, wherein all the World knew ſhe had ſo much intereſt. Menaſta found her very ſad; for, Sir, to make you underſtand my miſfortune the better, I am conſtrained to acknowledge, that Ameſtris did love me, and loved me with ſuch tender affection as I cannot yet think upon it, without extreme joy, and extreme ſorrow, and ſtrange confuſion both together. She no ſooner ſaw Menaſta, but ſhe made it evident by her melancholly, that ſhe was acquainted with my new paſſion; yet at the firſt ſhe ſpake only of indifferent things. Menaſta for her part, not knowing well where, or how to begin ſo vexatious a diſcourſe, nor knew well what ſhe ſhould ſay, did anſwer her with half-broken-off words. But in the end, the adorable Ameſtris not being able to hide her reſentments any longer, asked her whether ſhe had ſeen me? and whether my new Love was ſo ſtrong as to make me forget my Civilities unto her? I have ſeen him (anſwered ſhe) but I have ſeen him ſo deprived of reaſon, that I would no longer acknowledge him for my Kinſman, nor believe that it was Aglatidas, whom I formerly knew, and ſo much eſteemed. Indeed (ſaid ſhe to her) he courts Anatiſa, he follows her every where, and I think he really loves her. But although this Crime be too great, yet it is not that which animates me moſt againſt him; for thoſe who are naturally weak and inconſtant, do deſerve rather compaſſion than reproaches, ſince they do no more than what they cannot help: But Aglatidas would excuſe his fault by laying it upon you; this is that which I cannot endure; and this is that which I thought fit to tell you, to the end that you may puniſh his folly and ingratitude by your hatred and ſcorn. What (ſaid Ameſtris) doth Aglatidas accuſe me of any thing? Yes, replied Menaſta, he ſays that you have betrayed him; he ſays he ſaw it with his own Eyes, that he cannot doubt of it; and that your new choice is more unreaſonable than his. Indeed, (ſaid ſhe) I can ſay no more, but that he is full of Folly and Malice both. Ameſtris was ſo ſurpriſed at the Story, that her Soul, as great as it was, could not chuſe but tremble; ſhe changed Colour, Tears ſtood in her Eyes, and her Wiſdom had much ado to reſtrain them. If ſhe called to mind the Love which I profeſſed unto her, and the Reverence wherewith I ſerved her, ſhe conſidered my Change as an unrepairable loſs; if ſhe remembred the Goodneſs which ſhe uſed to me, ſhe could not enough condemn my Ingratitude; if ſhe conſidered the Fidelity which ſhe conſtantly preſerved for me, ſhe abhorred my perfidy; and if ſhe obſerved the difference which was between Anatiſa and her ſelf, ſhe could not but be aſtoniſh'd at my Weakneſs and Blindneſs. But upon the whole matter ſhe muſt needs conclude me capable of both, and ſhe could not poſſibly doubt of it. Menaſta did aſſure me afterwards, that the wrong which I did unto her Beauty, in preferring one who was in all things ſo much inferior to her, did not ſo ſenſibly move her, as the wrong which I did unto her Virtue, in accuſing her of Inconſtancy. What, ſaid ſhe, does Aglatidas take from me that heart which he had given me? Will he neither Love me, nor ſee me? And has he forgot all his Obligations which were upon him, for ſuffering him to manifeſt his Paſſions? But for for all this, I will puniſh my ſelf without anger, and perhaps I will cheer up my ſelf by reaſon.

But Menaſta, that he ſhould excuſe his own imbecilities by accuſing me, this is a thing which is above my Patience; and makes evident unto me, that Love is a moſt dangerous Paſſion. For truly, did he ever meet with any more excuſable than I, or more innocent? I loved Aglatidas, it is true, but I loved him not only becauſe he loved me, but becauſe my Parents did believe him to be a Man of Wiſdom and Judgment, and that he had all the Qualities requiſite to be in a compleat Man.

Moreover, might I not well believe, that Fortune having made me Rich enough, his own Intereſt might move him unto that which my mean Beauty could not? And whether it was Love or Ambition which he was ſenſible of, I might well hope he would be faithful. Yet it ſeems I was deceived in my Conjectures, and I was ignorant that he could not love any thing. But, alas, ſaid ſhe, is it not in our Power, when Innocence and Reaſon has planted Love in my heart, to find a means to root it out? Yet it muſt be, added ſhe, and I am ſo fully reſolved, that I cannot hope to bring it to paſs. In ſhort, Sir, the adorable Ameſtris being not well at peace in her ſelf, could not reſolve what to do; and ſhe deſigned the next day to take ſome ſolitary Walk with her dear Confident, and endeavour to ſettle her Reſolutions upon the Buſineſs, and to ſhun the Converſation of all indifferent People, who as the ſtate ſtood with her Soul, did but importunately trouble her. They went the next day unto the Garden, whither very few uſed to Reſort, and where Artaban by accident did meet them; he no ſooner ſaw them, but he had a great Curioſity to underſtand their Diſcourſe; to that end, he hid himſelf behind a thick Hedge, and following them by the eye, he ſaw them ſit down in a green Arbor. Thither he went, ſhading himſelf by the Boughs of a great Tree which hung down, and there couched himſelf behind a little Buſh of Myrrhe, which was cloſe to the Arbor; he was no ſooner ſetled, but he underſtood that Menaſta anſwered unto ſomething Ameſtris had ſaid, and which he could not underſtand. No, no, ſaid ſhe to her, you muſt not take Revenge upon your ſelf; it is fit that Aglatidas alone ſhould bear the Burthen of his Crime. Do not confound Innocency and Culpable together; hate Aglatidas if you can, and do not puniſh Ameſtris, who is in no fault. Ameſtris (replied this lovely Lady) not being able to hate where ſhe loves, what would you have her do? And why ſhould ſhe not think her ſelf as Culpable, for loving where ſhe ſhould hate, as Aglatidas is, for hating where he ought eternally to Love? After this, theſe two Ladies began to diſcourſe upon that which might have given me the boldneſs to accuſe Ameſtris; for (ſaid Menaſta) what likelihood is there that without any pretence or colour, he ſhould be ſo inconſiderate? Ameſtris reflecting upon what Menaſta ſaid, began to tell her that which ſhe knew not before, to wit, the Converſe which ſhe had with Megabiſes; but (added ſhe) if Aglatidas had been preſent at it, he would rather have thanked me, than complained; but he was far off; and Megabiſes for his part, being ever ſince in Lydia, could not inform him any thing. No, no, ſaid Menaſta, that cannot be the cauſe, for he did not ſo much as name Magabiſes unto me; and without all queſtion, if it had been he, Aglatidas would have named him to me, and ſpoke of him; ſo that it muſt be concluded, that he being aſhamed of his Weakneſs, was forced to fly unto this Impoſture, thereby to excuſe himſelf when he ſpoke unto me. Truly thoſe who commit Crimes, ſaid ſhe, do ſeverely puniſh themſelves in committing them; and had you ſeen how reſtleſs and unquiet Aglatidas was, when he ſpoke unto me, you would have conſented unto it. That which does moſt wonder me, ſaid Ameſtris unto her, is, that when we were in the Province of Ariſantines, we did underſtand that Aglatidas ſeemed always to be Melancholly; if this change had chanced ſince his return to Ecbatan, then I muſt needs conclude, that out of a capricious Humour, or elſe out of reaſon, he has preferred the Beauty of Anatiſa, before that of Ameſtris. But I conceive Menaſta, that his change took beginning during his Exile, in a time when he received moſt Teſtimonies of Affection for me; for I writ unto him, and that in a moſt obliging manner. But after all this, (ſaid Menaſta) what do you intend to do? I intend (ſaid ſhe) to puniſh my ſelf for my misfortune, to lament it eternally, to repent me of my Weakneſs, and ſtrive to forget Aglatidas, tho perhaps it is not in my Power; and to lead a cloſe, and more unhappy Life than ever any did. But (replied Menaſta) I had rather you would take into your Conſideration, one of theſe two important Courſes: The firſt is, That if you cannot perſwade your ſelf to hate

Aglatidas, then to try all poſſible means that may bring him unto reaſon. The ſecond is, That if you can bring your ſelf to hate him, then to puniſh him ſeverely for his Crime. Alas, alas, replied Ameſtris, how difficult a thing it is to hate, where one is reſolved to love all their Life long, and how hard it is to puniſh where one loves! I have one infallible way, (ſaid Menaſta.) But by the way you may admire, Sir, the odd Deſtiny of things in this World; for Menaſta did propound the very ſame way unto Ameſtris, which Artaban had propounded unto me; to wit, that ſhe ſhould feign to entertain ſome one of her Pretenders very kindly; for ſaid this Lady unto her, I have ever known Aglatidas to be extream ſenſible of Honour; ſo that when he plainly ſees that his Mutability has put Ameſtris into a Capacity of preferring another before him, then one of theſe two things will come to paſs, that is, he will either forſake Anatiſa, and return unto Ameſtris; or elſe at the leaſt, he will be ſufficiently tormented in his heart. Moreover, who knows but that by permitting your ſelf to be loved, you may come to ceaſe loving him? Love, for ought I underſtand (ſaid ſhe), is never cured by contrary Remedies, nor by any violent Applications. Time and Reaſon, by more inſenſible ways, brings many things to paſs; therefore if you will believe me, follow my advice; it conduces much unto your Honour, (added ſhe) that the World ſhall not ſuſpect you ever loved Aglatidas; and to prevent it, you muſt do as I adviſe. This laſt conſideration was very forcible upon the Soul of Ameſtris, who after much other Diſcourſe, reſolved to take my Counſel. In the mean time, Artaban, who was raviſhed to hear the Diſcourſe of theſe two Ladies, did gently ſteal away without being perceived; going in haſte unto all places where he thought to find me; but as my ill fortune was, he could not find me; after he had in vain ſought me at the Court, in the Palace-Gardens, and at Anatiſa's Lodging, he reſolved to ſtay till Night when I ſhould return, not imagining that the ignorance of what he knew, could be of that importance, as to be ſo prejudicial unto me. But, O Heaven! how fatal it was unto me? And, how many Sighs did that Journey which I then took, coſt me? I have already told you, Sir, that the Garden where Ameſtris was, is a very ſolitary place, where very few People uſe to Walk; but all ill Fortunes conſpired together to afflict me,and to make me the moſt unhappy Man upon Earth. Anatiſa prompted by my evil Deſtinies,deſigning to walk with ſome of her Friends, made choice of that place, becauſe ſhe had never ſeen it; and I did particularly chuſe it, that I might there enjoy my ſad Thoughts, becauſe I did verily think not to meet Ameſtris there, nor Anatiſa, nor any thing that might interrupt my muſing Contemplations. But, Sir, I was wonderfully ſurpriſed, when in entring into the Garden, I ſaw Ameſtris afar off walking with her dear Menaſta, and at the ſame time I ſaw Anatiſa at the foot of an Arbor, compoſing ſome Flowers which ſhe had gathered; this unexpected ſight did much trouble me, and ſo ſurpriſed me, that I ſtopt upon a ſudden. I knew not whether I ſhould apply my ſelf unto her whom I loved, and had betrayed me; or to her who loved me,and whom I betrayed; I ſtood in ſuch an Anxiety, as I could not reſolve, nor can expreſs; I was in a mind to go unto Ameſtris, and my Jealouſy did almoſt ſubmit unto my Love;I thought to go and throw my ſelf at her feet,without regarding Anatiſa; but her Crime coming freſh into my Memory, I altered that Determination, and began to incline towards Anatiſa; yet I made my approach ſo gentle, and was ſo unwilling to turn from Ameſtris, that I was in a mind to go unto neither, but to ſink down under the load of my Sorrows; yet my diſdain driving me out of an extream Anxiety into an invincible Obſtinacy, I regarded not Ameſtris, but went unto Anatiſa, unto whom I ſpoke as I was accuſtomed; but yet I acted it with ſuch diſtraction of Spirits, as that if this Lady had not been diſtracted her ſelf with obſerving the actions of Ameſtris, ſhe might eaſily have perceived the cauſe of my inquietude; but ſhe was wrapt into ſuch an extaſy of Joy to ſee her ſelf preferred before the faireſt Lady in the World, as ſhe neither minded the Alteration in my Countenance, nor the Obſcurity of my Words. Ameſtris (as ſince I heard) now ſeeing that her ſelf, which before ſhe had heard only by report, was extraordinarily ſurpriſed: Until now, this adorable Lady reſented only Sorrow for my change; but now, ſeeing with her own eyes, Aglatidas at the feet of Anatiſa, her Anger began to rouſe up her ſpirits; and a ſecret reſentment of Honour did infuſe into her ſo great a deſire to be revenged for the ſcorn which I offered unto her, as ſhe could not forbear to teſtify as much unto Menaſta. Here, Sir, may be admired the prodigious accident, which chance only brought about in this buſineſs: I think I told you how Megabiſes was to return within a few days; and after he had been in the Wars of Lydia, he reſolved to return unto Ecbatan, and never thought to call me unto any account, neither for the Death of his Brother, whereof he knew I was culpable, nor for any other of our ancient differences. The King did ſend unto him, to forbid him abſolutely, after the Reconcilement which was made between our Families, and had commanded me to Quarrel no more, but to ſhun meeting as much as poſſible, it being but juſt to have reſpect unto a Man whoſe Brother I had killed. Megabiſes came into the Town in the Night, that he might be more particularly informed in the ſtate of things, before he received any Viſits; and reſolved to paſs away the reſt of the day in the Garden where I was, knowing it the leaſt frequented, and where alſo was Ameſtris and Anatiſa. Megabiſes then, who knew him unto whom the Garden belonged, entred into it as ſoon as he lighted from his Horſe, and at the very ſame inſtant, when Ameſtris being tranſported with Anger to ſee me with Anatiſa, did ſay unto Menaſta, that ſhe had good reaſon to Counſel her to puniſh me: Megabiſes entring in confidently, was infinitely ſurpriſed to ſee both his Miſtreſs and his Rival in that place; but he was more amazed to ſee me not with Ameſtris; yet, Sir, ſince Megabiſes had not ſeen her ſince the time he promiſed to ſee her, or ſpeak to her no more, he would make it known unto her by his reſpect, that he had not forgotten to keep his word; ſo that after he hadm ade her a moſt low Revence, he retired, and would have gone out of the Garden; but Ameſtris, whoſe Spirit was highly incenſed, and thinking it a fit occaſion to be revenged, called him unto her, and received him with much civility; this afforded him as much Joy, as me Sorrow. For, Sir, I ſaw Megabiſes enter; I obſerved how he would have gone away, and ſhe to ſtay him; I ſuppoſed that he offered to go away, becauſe he ſaw me there. And I doubted not, but that Ameſtris knowing of his coming, came thither purpoſely to meet him. I leave you, Sir, to gueſs at the trouble of my Soul, and the agitation of my Mind: For my part, I never think upon the condition wherein we were, but I wonder at the capricious humour of Fate. For Anatiſa was wrapt up into the height of Joy to ſee her ſelf preferred before Ameſtris, by Aglatidas, who neither preferred her, nor loved her. Megabiſes for his part, he was infinitely glad to be called back by her, who had for ever baniſhed him, tho ſhe which called him back, did it not out of any Affection ſhe bore unto him; only Ameſtris and my ſelf, who if we had rightly underſtood one another, had been the happieſt of all, we were the moſt perplexed Souls upon Earth. Mean time, tho Megabiſes thought himſelf very happy in being with Ameſtris; yet the remembrance of his Brother's death, and the ſight of him who kill'd him, did ſo reflect upon his heart, as he had no good mind to be where I was. Madam, (ſaid he unto Ameſtris) I ſhould make a doubt whether the command which I received from the King, could work ſo prevalently upon my Spirit, as to hinder me from my juſt Reſentments againſt a Man whom I ſee before me, if the Reſpect which I owe unto you did not reſtrain me; therefore, Madam; fear leſt this Reſpect ſhould not be ſtrong enough to reſiſt the apprenhenſions of Blood and Nature, I moſt humbly beſeech you to pardon my Incivility, and give me leave to leave you. Upon thoſe words he made a very low Reverence unto Ameſtris, and without ſtaying for any anſwer, he went out of the Garden; ſhe who only ſtayed him to anger me, was not forward to retain him. As for me, Sir, who never underſtood what they ſaid, I no ſooner ſaw him gone, but I was in as great a chafe as I was to ſee him enter, imagining that he only went out to diſguiſe the appointment which Ameſtris had given him.

Not being to ſtay where I was, and thinking I ſhould better hide my perplexity in walking, than in ſtaying there, I propoſed a departure unto Anatiſa, who conſented unto it. But ſhe more out of vanity than complacency, would needs, do what I could, go unto Ameſtris, thinking it would be a triumph unto her to carry her Slave whither ſhe pleaſed: Then we went to meet Ameſtris and Menaſta; and as we came near one another, Anatiſa, not telling me her deſign, began to ſpeak unto Ameſtris; whereat I was ſo angry, that I was in a mind to leave her, and be gone from that place where the object of my love, and the object of my hatred were together. I neither durſt nor would look upon Ameſtris, I wiſhed with all my heart that Megabiſes were there, that I might fight with him. Sometimes I thought Ameſtris leſs fair, and Anatiſa more. But, O Heavens! that ſometimes was quickly over, and I thought Anatiſa ugly, and Ameſtris angelick-fair: yet Anatiſa, who as I told you, would needs triumph, and better aſſure her ſelf of her Conqueſt, ſpoke very ſpitefully unto Ameſtris; and in accoſting her, I am very happy (ſaid ſhe unto her) to meet ſuch good Company in a place which is uſed to be very ſolitary, and I have reaſon to think my ſelf ſo, ſince expecting only the pleaſure of the Walk, I have met alſo with the delight of company My company (anſwered Ameſtris very coldly) is ſo far from pleaſant, that you have rather cauſe to complain, if you had not ſome other to divert you. If you ſhould put to Judges (replied Anatiſa maliciouſly) I am ſure Megabiſes, whom I ſaw with you, would not be of your mind; and as for Aglatidas, he is no competent Judge, for he would give ſentence in my behalf. As for my part (ſaid I in a great confuſion) I do not doubt but Megabiſes finds Ameſtris to be incomparable in all things; and I confeſs (ſaid I, changing colour) that he has good cauſe to publiſh, that the converſation of Ameſtris is the moſt complacential of any in the world, when ſhe pleaſeth. Ah! Madam, (replied Anatiſa, who was raviſhed with joy to ſee ſuch ſigns of anger in the face of Ameſtris) be not now of that humour, and be pleaſed to ſuffer all thoſe commendations which I will give you: I deſerve ſo little (anſwered ſhe) that I will not adviſe you to imploy your time to ſo little purpoſe. There is a kind of humility (replied Anatiſa) which honour will not admit of: Yes (replied Ameſtris) and there is alſo a kind of falſe humour, which covers oftentimes abundance of baſeneſs: I ſuppoſe (anſwered Anatiſa) that neither you, nor I, are guilty of either: I know nothing (replied Ameſtris) for none do know themſelves very well: It is much more hard, ſaid I unto her, to know the thoughts of another; Eſpecially of thoſe (replied ſhe) who do counterfeit to be generous and ſincere, but indeed are not ſo; I am confident (ſaid the malicious Anatiſa) that Megabiſes cannot diſguiſe his thoughts: Thoſe who like him (anſwered Ameſtris, thinking to ſpight me) do affect true honour, do never uſe to do ſo: there is none but baſe men uſe to diſſemble their thoughts. I confeſs unto you, Sir, that I was infinitely perplexed to hear Ameſtris thus expreſs her ſelf, that I could not poſſibly ſtay any longer in that place: As I came not into the Garden with Anatiſa, I thought my ſelf not engaged to ſtay with her: Furthermore, I was not in a condition to obſerve an exact correſpondency in my actions. I had ſeen Megabiſes pleaſed ſo well, I obſerved Anatiſa ſo well content; I ſaw Ameſtris ſo fierce, contrary to her cuſtome; and I found my ſelf ſo ſad, ſo angry, and ſo deſperate, that at laſt being ſtirred by my love, my hate, and my jealouſie, I left this both dear and intollerable company: I went then out of the Garden with an ill intent, reſolving to be revenged upon Megabiſes for all the wrongs that Ameſtris had done me: And to that end in lieu of entring into the Town, I went to conceal my ſelf in the Houſe of one of my Acquaintance, with intention to ſend the next day unto Megabiſes, to meet me with his Sword. I would not advertiſe Artaban of my deſign, becauſe I knew he would contradict it; but alas, I did not know that I ſhould have been the happieſt man upon Earth, if I had ſeen him, whereas now I am the moſt unfortunate. In the mean while Ameſtris, who had not treated Megabiſes ſo well, but only to anger me, had no ſooner loſt the ſight of me, but not being able to endure the company of her Rival, ſhe ſought out a pretence to leave her, and went to complain of her misfortune in ſecret unto her dear Menaſta. As for Megabiſes, it may be ſaid, that his good fortune was but a flaſh and away; which ending as ſoon as it begun, made it more dusky and intollerable than before: And as for Anatiſa, though her joys to be preferred before Ameſtris did laſt a little longer, yet it was but to torment her more ſenſibly afterwards. For my part, Sir, I never thought my ſelf ſo unhappy as now I found my ſelf. At the firſt time when I ſaw Ameſtris favourable unto Megabiſes, I had this advantage, as that ſhe took a little pains to delude me; ſhe knew not that I ſaw her; and at that time when ſhe ſpoke unto him ſo mildly, ſhe did not write roughly unto me. I might then think that her heart was divided, and that he did not ſo abſolutely poſſeſs it, but there might be a corner of it for me. Moreover he then ſaw her to bid her adieu: but now, doubtleſs he came not with any intention to leave her; and Ameſtris was certain in the Garden ſtaying for him: She now ſaw me before he came in, and cared not whether or no I was a witneſs, ſince ſhe did not go away before he came. As for Megabiſes, he would be ſomething more diſcreet, he ſeemed to have no deſire to ſtay when he had diſcovered me; but ſhe did moſt cruelly call him back to ſpight me; ſhe looked upon me with anger, but upon him with ſweetneſs, and commended him before my face: She (I ſay) who heretofore made profeſſion of ſuch auſtere virtue; ſhe who denied me her affection ſo obſtinately; ſhe who was ſo ſevere and rigorous unto me. How comes it to paſs, Ameſtris (ſaid I) that you have thus changed your humour? But however, I muſt be ſo bold as to trouble your felicity as well as you have done mine; and tho my reſpect be ſuch, as I will not revenge my ſelf directly upon you; yet you ſhall give me leave to be revenged upon Megabiſes. See, Sir, how I did draw poiſon out of the moſt innocent things; and how I interpreted all the actions of Ameſtris; who for her part did as much upon mine, and who determined to be revenged upon me in a moſt cruel manner. Bur, Sir, I muſt tell you before-hand, that he with whom Ameſtris lived, being bribed unto it by Otanus, did no longer take the part of Megabiſes for her, and did continually perſecute her, to the end that he might bring her unto that paſs, as to prefer riches, before all other things in the world, and never to conſider the good or the bad qualities of him whom ſhe was to marry: Moreover, Artaban not finding me, went to her; but her mind was not for any converſation; therefore ſhe left me alone with Menaſta in her Chamber, and ſhut her ſelf in her Cloſet. Then, Sir, the diſcourſe between theſe two, was only upon me: Menaſta, who knew that Artaban was my Confident, did ſo preſs him, as he acknowledged that it was a terrible jealouſie, which had taken me off from the ſervice of Ameſtris: But do what ſhe could, ſhe could ſcrue no more out of him; for ſince he was to meet with me at night, therefore he would not diſcover any more unto her, leſt I ſhould perhaps not allow of it. His viſit continued not long with Menaſta, becauſe he did ſit upon thorns until he had diſcourſe with me: He was no ſooner gone, but ſhe went unto Ameſtris in her Cloſet, who was retired thither under precence of writing ſome Letters of importance: She told her, how after much other diſcourſe, Artaban had confeſſed, That it was a horrid jealouſie which cauſed my change. How! (anſwered Ameſtris) Aglatidas extremely jealous! Good Gods! how is it poſſible he can be ſo? What cauſe have I given him? Which of his Rivals is it that I have favoured ſo much as to give him any colour or cauſe of change? Has any obſerved any ſuch complacence in me? Have I ſought out any occaſions to ſee, and be ſeen? Have I held any private diſcourſe with any one? Have I been a frequenter of any ſuſpected Walks? Have

I received any ſecret Letters, or writ any? Is there any one that can vaunt of any favour received from Ameſtris, except the perfidious Aglatidas? Indeed Menaſta, what have I done? what have I ſaid? or what have I ſo much as thought, which can excuſe his inconſtancy? for my part (ſaid ſhe) I never knew the like jeaalouſie to this: But I pray tell me, ſuppoſe I could learn the ground and commencement of it, what can I do to help it? I muſt certainly never look upon any, but mew up my ſelf eternally: How is it poſſible in a great Court, in a populous Town, where I am ſeen by all the world, and where I ſee with equal indifferency, all thoſe who come to me, that I ſhould ever find out who it is which cauſeth his inquietude? For perhaps it is Andramias, perhaps Araſpes, perhaps Megabiſes, and perhaps the King; How ſhould I then help it, Menaſta? How ſhould I cure him if I would? It muſt needs be confeſſed (anſwered my Couſin) that Aglatidas has carried it very ill: Say (ſaid Ameſtris) that he has loſt his reaſon, in loſing that eſteem which he ought unto me; for conſidering how I have carried my ſelf unto him, he ought never to have madean ill interpretation of my actions, or ſuſpected them, or believed any thing againſt me, though his own eyes had perſwaded him unto it. Muſt inconſtancy be a conſequent of jealouſie? For my part, I think that jealouſie makes men unhappy, but I do not believe that it ought to make them perfidious: That Aglatidas, becauſe he thinks no ſincerity in my words, will not ſee me, nor love me any more, but hate me, I do not blame him: I look upon his hatred as a conſequent of his violent love unto me; but that Aglatidas as ſoon as he thinks that I do not eſteem him, ſhould at the very ſame inſtant have a ſoul ſenſible of a freſh new Paſſion; this, Menaſta, is a thing which cannot be. If he had loved me very well, what cauſe of complaint ſoever I had given him, it was impoſſible but he ſhould love me yet, or at leaſt not hate me; and it is more impoſſible (if I may ſay it) that he can ſo ſoon love Anatiſa. Ha! (ſaid ſhe) whoſoever ſhould have told me heretofore, that I ſhould ſee Aglatidas come into to a place where I was,and leave me, to go unto Anatiſa, I ſhould not have believed it: Yet it was injuſtice (not to ſpeak of love) after he had ſeen me this laſt time,entertaining thoughts very advantageous for him, to accoſt me in ſo offenſive a manner; Could he not have reſtrained Anatiſa from coming to me? Might he not have ſhun'd the meeting? No, no, (ſaid ſhe unto Menaſta) he would not, but he on the contrary had a deſire to put my patience unto the moſt vigorous Teſt: I know (added ſhe) that at the laſt he quitted the company, and went alone out of the Garden; but it was confuſion and anger, not repentance which drove him away; he was aſhamed of his crime, but he had not ſo much virtue as to diſingage himſelf: So that after all this, tho' he ſhould have repented, yet I ſhould not have been ſatisfied. But (ſaid Menaſta unto her, interrupting her) What do you reſolve upon? I will (anſwered ſhe, with a quite altered complexion) never think upon Aglatidas any more; and ſo carry the matter, that he ſhall,whether he will or no, think eternally upon Ameſtris; I will make him acknowledge his own crime by the thought of my innocency; and that he ſhall know my innocency by my misfortune: I muſt make him ſee,that I never loved any but him, and that I have been ever faithful unto him: But in letting him ſee it, it ſhall be done after ſuch a faſhion, that he ſhall get nothing by it. If he do not repent of his fault (ſaid ſhe) I ſhall puniſh him for loving; and if he do repent, then I ſhall puniſh him for betraying me, and puniſh him according to his deſert. I do confeſs (ſaid Menaſta to her) I cannot eaſily deviſe what kind of revenge it is that you have contrived: It is ſo ſtrange a one (anſwered Ameſtris) that I dare hardly tell it, leſt you ſhould divert me from it, either by your reaſons, or your prayers. But how can you make him certainly ſee that you have continued faithful, ſince you do not know what it is which hath made him jealous. 'Tis true indeed (replied Ameſtris) I do not know the cauſe of his jealouſie, but I do know him who is not the cauſe of his jealouſie, and that ſhall ſerve me both for my juſtification, for my revenge, and for my puniſhment all in one. Menaſta hearing her ſpeak ſo, and finding little ſenſe in her obſcure words, was very urgent with her to explain her ſelf, and did oftentimes aſſure her, that ſhe would not contradict her intentions, until at length ſhe told her. You are not ignorant (ſaid ſhe to her) neither you Menaſta, nor the inconſtant Aglatidas, what an extream averſion I have ever had againſt Otanes, notwithſtanding all his wealth and quality; for I have told you both a hundred and a hundred times, that for all his riches and condition, he is the man whom of all the world I do moſt ſcorn and hate: you know alſo (ſaid ſhe) that he has loved me ever ſince the firſt day I came to Ecbatan; and that I have hated him ever ſince the firſt minute I ſaw him: Know then, Menaſta, that before I will in any part reclaim the perfidious Aglatidas, I will obey my Kinſman, who is my Guardian, that is, I will marry Otanus, who is the ill-favouredeſt man alive, and thereby make Aglatidas ſee whether I ever loved any of his Rivals. What (ſaid Menaſta) will you marry Otanus? Yes, anſwered Ameſtris) I will marry him, and I cannot make choice of a greater puniſhment wherewith to afflict my ſelf for loving Aglatidas, and alſo to chaſtiſe Aglatidas for betraying me: This is the way Menaſta (ſaid ſhe), whereby I will both juſtifie and revenge my ſelf, although I do not know him whom Aglatidas thinks to be my partner in my crime: By this courſe I ſhall be ſure to cure Aglatidas of his jealouſie: for indeed Otanes has ſo many defects, that I am ſure I cannot deceive my ſelf, it being abſolutely impoſſible that Aglatidas ſhould have been jealous of him.

Ah! Ameſtris (ſaid Menaſta then) Do not confound innocency and crime together; puniſh Aglatidas alone, but do nor puniſh Ameſtris; rather marry Megabiſes, and believe that you will be ſufficiently revenged of my perfidious Kinſman that way. No Menaſta, (ſaid ſhe) that which you propoſe is not juſt; that way would be a revenge upon my ſelf, and not upon Aglatidas; for Megabiſes is handſome enough to make Aglatidas think that I loved him; ſo that if it were ſo that ever he loved me, he would then quit that paſſion, and ſtick cloſe unto his dear Anatiſa: Then indeed he had ſome ground to believe that I might love a man whom indeed was worthy of it. But when he ſhall ſee that I have choſen one for a Husband, whom he knows certainly I could never love, then perhaps his heart, as perfidious and inconſtant as it is, will repent it of its fault: But it ſhall be an unprofitable repentance; for when I have married Otanes, I will then be as faithful unto him, as if I did love him, and as if he were the moſt accompliſhed man of the World. Ha Heavens! (ſaid Menaſta, interrupting her) take good heed what you ſay. Can you have ſuch a Reſolution? (Or, to give it a fitter Phraſe) can you be ſo inhumane unto your ſelf, as to expoſe your ſelf unto the greateſt of Misfortunes? Do you think, that you can all your Life long endure the preſence of a Man, whoſe Converſation has glutted you in one ſingle hour? I cannot endure it; doubtleſs (anſwered Ameſtris) the torment which I ſhall endure, will juſtify me yet in the mind of Aglatidas; and after I have in that manner cleared my ſelf, my Death immediately and infallibly following, will beget ſuch a Torment alſo in his Soul, as ſhall never extinguiſh; if there were any other way to juſtify my ſelf, then perhaps I ſhould not take this. But upon the whole matter, ſince Aglatidas does himſelf complain, how can I gueſs at his Diſeaſe, and Cure him otherwiſe? Yet (ſaid Menaſta to her) appearances are oftentimes fallacious; and for ought you know there may be ſome other Cauſe which has begot this Jealouſy in Aglatidas, which you are ignorant of. Tho that ſhould be ſo (anſwered Ameſtris) yet Aglatidas is more innocent; I do confeſs he might be Jealous, and I ſhould not have been offended at him; but it ſeems he could not love Anatiſa ſufficiently, without doing me this irreparable wrong; therefore Menaſta, I muſt, if it be poſſible, I muſt choak this new taken-up Love in him by an eternal Sorrow, and an unprofitable Repentance. But do you not conſider (ſaid Menaſta) that in deſtroying this Love in him, you deſtroy your ſelf alſo by ſuch an unheard of way? That's it which I deſire (replied Ameſtris) and if I did not know that melancholly is a gentle Poyſon, which by inſenſible degrees does operate its effects, I would not abandon my ſelf unto it. Permit me (ſaid Menaſta) to ſpeak once more with Aglatidas: When I am dead, ſaid Ameſtris, I will permit you; and then I conjure you to aggravate my Sorrows unto him, that it may increaſe his. What (ſaid Menaſta to her) do you ſpeak of Death and Marriage together? Yes, (replied Ameſtris) and as I am going to the Church, I will imagine it to be unto my Grave, and ſhall hope that the Nuptial Torches will ſoon be changed unto Funerals. But why would you dye, replied Menaſta? But (anſwered ſhe) I cannot both live happily and innocently, ſince I find it to be very criminal to love Aglatidas. In concluſion, Sir, Menaſta was conſtrained to leave Ameſtris, becauſe it was very late. This prudent Lady was no ſooner come unto her Lodging, but ſhe ſent to ſeek me, being reſolved to ſpeak unto me, and if ſhe could, to cure my mind both of this jealouſie, and this new paſſion; for ſhe did verily believe that I was in love with Anatiſa, but all her labour was loſt: The next Morning ſhe ſent alſo unto Artabam, to deſire his help in ſeeing me, but ſhe ſent a little too late, for he was newly gone out: Mean while Artabam as well as Menaſta did deſpair of finding me: and theſe two which had ſuch pleaſant things to relate unto me, were both of them much troubled that they could not learn what was become of me: They were not like to know, ſince I concealed my ſelf as cloſe as I could with intention to let Megabiſes hear from me.

Indeed, day did no ſooner dawn, but I ſent a Man with a Note unto him, which acquainted him, how I deſired to fight with him upon that Quarrel which he might eaſily gueſs at; and to let him know that the man whom I ſent, would conduct him unto the place, where I would expect him with a Sword in my hand.

But ſo it chanced that he whom I ſent unto him, found abundance of Company with him, becauſe three of his Friends came to him and would have him go unto the King who intended to hunt that day, and to be with him before he went; this Note therefore could not be ſo handſomly delivered, but it was perceived, and ſuſpected what the buſineſs was, ſo that it was impoſſible for Megabiſes to give me Satisfaction. Artaban coming to hear of theſe Reports, acquainted the King, who gave order to ſecure Megabiſes, and commanded to look out for me: But here, Sir, may be admired how Fortune does ſport her ſelf at the Deſtinies of Men. Although I did challenge Megabiſes, yet there was almoſt none in the Court that would believe it, unleſs thoſe which were with him when he received the Note; and the report of it being ſpread abroad that Megabiſes and Aglatidas would fight, it was not thought likely that I who had killed his Brother ſhould alſo call him to an account. Ameſtris thought it to be Megabiſes who called me in queſtion, and not I him; and did imagine that this would more confirm me in the opinion I had of her, ſo that ſhe reſolved to go on in her odd Determination. Mean while Artaban with ten or twelve of his Friends took horſe, and all the care they could to find me out: I knew by the return of the Man whom I ſent, that Megabiſes was clapt up, and that he ſent me word by him he would give me ſatisfaction as ſoon as he could: But when I perceived Artaban ſome two hundred Paces off, and becauſe I would not be clapt up as Megabiſes was, I galloped away, and as I often turned my Head, I ſaw Artaban before the reſt riding as hard as he could, and making Signs with his Hand to ſtay me, becauſe he would ſpeak with me. But as my Misfortune had reſolved my Ruine, I perſwaded my ſelf that the Wiſdom of Artaban thought it not fit I ſhould call that Man in queſtion whoſe Brother I had killed, and indeed I my ſelf did think it unreaſonable; ſo imagining that he had nothing to ſay unto me, unleſs that the King would make Megabiſes and me Friends, the more he made ſigns to ſtay, the more I ſpurred my Horſe: I did oft underſtand what he ſaid, but would not make anſwer; and I think he had overtook me, had I not met with a great Ditch which my Horſe did freely take, but his would not under a quarter of an hours beating. In the mean time, I having found a thick Wood which hindred his ſight of me, I quit the common Road, and took ſuch an obſcure Path, that Artaban was conſtrained to return very ſorry and angry that he had not ſpoke with me. I not well knowing what Reſolution to take after I had contrived and deviſed a hundred Deſigns, I went unto a Church which was not far off, the Prieſt whereof I knew, with whom I had an intention to ſtay four or five Days concealed, imagining that they would reſtrain Megabiſes very long, and that as ſoon as he was at liberty, he wonld give me Satisfaction: It would not be at all advantagious to you, Sir, to tell you what kind of life I led in this place, ſuppoſing that you will imagine it to be moſt reſtleſs and melancholick. This Church was built in an ancient Forreſt, the Trees whereof were ſo thick, that the Sun did never ſhine upon it: I wandred all the day in places leaſt frequented: Sometimes I paſſed away the time with the Magi which dwelt thereabouts, and with him with whom I lodged: I had told him that ſome Grumblings at Court cauſed me to retire for a time: But whoſoever I entertained my ſelf withal, and whereſoever I walked alone, Megabiſes and Ameſtris took up all my Thoughts: Perhaps, ſaid I, they are juſt now together; perhaps Ameſtris is talking of me unto him with Scorn; perhaps ſhe is entreating him not to expoſe himſelf unto a new Quarrel; perhaps ſhe is praying againſt my Life; and perhaps Megabiſes and ſhe are married: To tell you, Sir, how ſadly this laſt Thought was reſented, and how deeply it wounded my Soul, is a Story which I cannot poſſibly relate. Upon a Day then when I was moſt dejectedly walking in the Forreſt, I diſcovered a Coach full of Ladies; I no ſooner ſaw it but I ruſh'd into the Wood: But one of the Ladies ſpying me, Aglatidas (cried ſhe) do not fly, and but ſuffer me I beſeech you to ſpeak one minute with you: I knew the Voice full well to be Menaſta's, and imagining that perhaps Ameſtris was with her, I knew not whether I ſhould ſtay or ſhun her. But at laſt hearing her call very earneſtly and very often, I turned and came to her, as ſhe was coming out of the Coach, which was very near the Church; ſhe having two Friends and one Servant with her, did leave them, and deſired them to go and ſtay in the Church whilſt ſhe did ſpeak with me concerning ſome Buſineſs ſhe had with me: We being Couſins, the Ladies which were with her did not think ſtrange at her freedom to me, ſo that Menaſta giving me her Hand, and walking ſome twenty or thirty Paces into the Wood without ſpeaking a word to each other, ſhe ſaid unto me, looking me earneſtly in the Face; I do not know Aglatidas whether what I have to tell you will be welcome or unwelcome unto you, for ſince you love Anatiſa ſo well, you will not regard the Marriage of Ameſtris. Ameſtris (cried I out, being tranſported with Sorrow and Jealouſy) is ſhe married? Yes, replied Menaſta faintly, but Aglatidas, what does the News concern you, that you ſhould be ſo troubled at it? you who have told me you did not, nor would not love Ameſtris any longer? I think ſo too, replied I, and I believe I ſhould not love her; but I do hate Megabiſes ſo much that I cannot hear of his Happineſs without an unimaginable Deſpair: If Megabiſes (anſwered ſhe) have no other Joy but what the Marriage of Ameſtris affords him, I would adviſe you not to trouble your ſelf at his good Fortune: What (ſaid I to her, with a Mind full of Hatred, Sorrow and Jealouſy, not knowing her meaning) can Megabiſes marry Ameſtris and not be the happieſt and moſt ſatisfied Man in the World? Ah Menaſta (ſaid I, not giving her time to anſwer) this is not poſſible, but you have more reaſon to ſay that ſince he enjoys ſo much good Fortune, that he ſhall not enjoy it long; for indeed that unjuſt Raviſher of the Treaſure which belonged unto me, and which I thought to obtain, ſhall die by my own Hand. Menaſta wondring to ſee me ſo troubled, and tranſported with Anger, ſhe looked upon me, and interrupting me, ſaid, If you do not hate Megabiſes, I tell you again, but as the Husband of Ameſtris, you may let your Soul be in quiet, ſince it is not Megabiſes who has married her: Is it not Megabiſes that has married her, ſaid I? No, ſaid ſhe: Ah Menaſta (ſaid I with a leſs troubled Mind) do not mock me, but ſpeak more ſincerely unto me. I proteſt unto you (ſaid ſhe) I do not lie; for Ottanus is the Man whom the incomparable Ameſtris hath married. Ottanus (ſaid I to her) married Ameſtris? Ottanus the uglieſt of Men; he whom ſhe moſt hated? Ah, if it be ſo, then either her Kindred or the King has compelled her unto this ſtrange Marriage. Not at all (replied Menaſta) and you had more intereſt in her Affections than any had. I (replied I) being all Amazement? I confeſs unto you (ſaid I, not knowing well what I ſaid) that I had rather ſhe ſhould have married Ottanus than Megabiſes: But for all that, know Menaſta, that Aglatidas could not marry Ameſtris; or if he had been diſpoſed, it would not have been advantagious to him. Yes, (replied Menaſta) it would before the Beauty of Anatiſa had razed out of your Heart the love of Ameſtris. Anatiſa (replied I haſtily) had never any place in my Heart: Ameſtris, the perfidious Ameſtris, only did reign there with Soveraignty. Menaſta not being leſs aſtoniſhed to hear me ſay ſo, than I was to hear ſay Ameſtris was married, did ask me if it were very true that I loved Ameſtris yet? Yes Menaſta (ſaid I unto her) I do love her yet; and though my own Eyes did ſee ſuch things, as I did not think I ſhould ever ſee, yet I did not leave adoring her perpetually: The love I ſhewed unto Anatiſa, was but counterfeit, and a meer effect of my Deſpair: But Menaſta (ſaid I to her) what was it that ſet Megabiſes and Ameſtris at odds? and what moved her to marry Ottanus? Megabiſes (ſaid ſhe to me) was never in league with Ameſtris. Ah Menaſta (replied I) you ſaw not that which I ſaw. Ah Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe) you ſaw nothing but what I know. You may here admire, Sir, what ſtrange effects Love produced in my Soul: The news of Ameſtris her Marriage did infinitely afflict me; but becauſe I thought ſhe had been married unto Megabiſes, and afterwards heard ſhe was not, I did a while reſent ſome Joy to mingle amongſt my Sorrows; this gave me a little comfort. But in concluſion, Sir, after that Menaſta had cauſed me to ſwear a hundred and a hundred times that I did not love Anatiſa: She began to aggravate the Obligations which were upon me unto Ame- ſtris for her Fidelity to me, and her Rigour unto Megabiſes: And to make me more reſent it, ſhe told me how Ameſtris had forbidden Megabiſes for ever ſeeing her, and how he promiſed her that he would not, at the Fountain in the Green Border within the Garden, where accidentally they met. Ah Menaſta (ſaid I, interrupting her) then have my Eyes moſt cruelly betrayed me; and done me very bad Service. So it was, Sir, that Menaſta telling me nothing but truth, and finding my Soul ſoftened with Sorrows, it was no hard matter for her to perſwade me. The Miſt of Jealouſy which was before my Eyes did vaniſh; and I immediately ſaw that which I ſaw not before; that is, I ſaw Ameſtris appear extreamly innocent, and my ſelf infinitely to blame. After this, Menaſta told me all that I have told you; the deſpair of Ameſtris to ſee me unconſtant, and to know that I was jealous, not knowing of whom, and at laſt to juſtify her ſelf in my Mind, ſhe undertook this ſad Deſtiny to marry Ottanus, knowing well that it was impoſſible it ſhould be he of whom he was jealous. In concluſion, Menaſta told me that whereas I might have been the happieſt of Men, and given Ameſtris ſatisfaction, I had made my ſelf the moſt unhappy, and made her more unfortunate than my ſelf: Ah Menaſta (cried I out) this is not poſſible; if it be, then never was Misfortune equal unto mine: She told me further, that the Quarrel which I intended with Megabiſes, did haſte on her odd Reſolution: That my abſenting my ſelf, and Anatiſa going into the Country at the ſame time, cauſed her to think that the Voyage was agreed upon betwixt us; and ſhe told all thoſe who ſpoke unto her in the behalf of Ottanus, that ſhe was reſolved to marry him, ſo that the buſineſs was not protracted, but quickly diſpatched. At the ſame time ſhe asked the King's conſent, who conſented willingly thereunto, ſuppoſing it to be a good Expedient to reconcile Megabiſes and me, both of us being equally in the principal cauſe of our Differences: Menaſta told me alſo that the King ſpoke to my Father concerning it; and that my Father ſeeing the coldneſs that was in me towards Ameſtris, and being glad that I ſhould be no longer intereſted in the Love of Megabiſes, did himſelf deſire the King to conclude up the match. In ſhort, Sir, Menaſta told me, that the buſineſs was ſo cloſely carried, as almoſt none knew of it when they went unto the Church to be married. Alas Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe unto me) had you ſeen Ameſtris in that condition, you would have rather thought her going to a Puniſhment than a Marriage; and might very well have ſeen her Innocency by her Sorrows: I ſaw her (ſaid ſhe) an hour before this ſad Ceremony, and ſhe no ſooner ſaw me, but looking upon me with Tears in her Eyes, I know not (ſaid ſhe to me) whether the unconſtant Aglatidas, if he ſaw me, would reſent my Sorrows, and repent of his Crime; But however Menaſta, it were requiſite that I did juſtify my ſelf: I would let him ſee his Jealouſy was ill-grounded, and I muſt die for Grief; but if my Prayers have any prevalency in them he muſt eternally lament it. As ſoon as ſhe had uttered theſe doleful words, they called her to the Church, and I followed after with Tears in my Eyes like a ſad Mourner: Every one who ſaw her, wept alſo; all that knew of the Marriage were amazed, Megabiſes although he was very patient at it, yet it infinitely ſtung him: Artaban was ready to forbid the Banes when the Ceremony was almoſt finiſhed, coming into the Church no ſooner: Ottanus himſelf was ſo ſurprized, and not ſo well ſatisfied as he might be, becauſe he did not very well underſtand how this good Fortune did come about; and becauſe he was ſo conſcious of ſo many defects in himſelf, as he knew that he could not be beloved. Indeed it was the Diſcourſe of all the World, and every one vented their Conceits concerning it, though there was none but Ameſtris and Menaſta which knew that Aglatidas was the only cauſe of this ſo unjuſt, ſo unreaſonable, and ſo diſcordant a Marriage. Never ask me (ſaid ſhe unto me) what Ameſtris did after this diſmal Day; ſhe was all Melancholy, all altered, and I could never look upon her but with Tears; if you ſaw her your ſelf, you would pitty her and be ſad. As we two were thus together, Artaban (to compleat my Misfortune) having at laſt diſcovered where I was, came and found me hearkening unto Menaſta: He no ſooner ſaw me, but coming to me, Ah cruel Friend (cried he) what have you done? And why did you ſo obſtinately fly me? I who had the beſt and moſt delightful news in the World to tell you? I that could have told you that your own Eyes had deluded you, and that Ameſtris was moſt innocent. Menaſta much ſurprized to hear him ſay ſo, asked him what he meant by ſaying ſo? Then he told her before me, how he heard Ameſtris and ſhe in the green Arbour, where he had learned by their Diſcourſe, how that Ameſtris was faithful unto Aglatidas, and that ſhe never loved Megabiſes; how that their meetiug in the green Border by the Fountain, was by meer chance and not appointed; how that ſhe had commanded Megabiſes never to ſee her more, and that accordingly he went away and obſerved her order, and in concluſion that he heard how Ameſtris was purely innocent. I hearing then Artaban ſpeak thus, and being no longer in any ſuſpicion of the Fidelity of Ameſtris; Tell me ſome more cruel Friend (ſaid I to him) and double my Misfortune by telling me thus of my good: Forget nothing which might have made me happy, to the end I may be eternally miſerable. It is hard for me to tell you, Sir, what confuſion my Thoughts were in upon this Accident: I looked upon my Errour with a horrid ſhame; I hearkned unto the Juſtification of Ameſtris with abundance of Joy; and I reſented my own Misfortune with a ſtrange Deſpair: But when my Imagination preſented unto my Soul, that Ameſtris the faireſt Lady in the World, ſhould be in the Poſſeſſion of the moſt ugly and odious Man; I quite loſt all Patience, and could not chuſe but lament and be ſtupid. But ſince Menaſta could ſtay no longer, ſhe left me: At laſt I ſaid to her, May I not once more ſee Ameſtris? I do not think (replied Menaſta) that ſhe will permit it; and in that Mind which I left her, you can never hope for any more favour from her: Ah Menaſta, (ſaid I) do not add to my deſpair; I would gladly ſee Ameſtris, I would diſcourſe with her, I would throw my ſelf at her Feet; and if you would be pleaſed to facilitate the way, I may perhaps do ſomething which would pleaſe Ameſtris, and which might render my Deſpair more publick. In ſhort, Sir, I ſpoke with ſuch violence as moved Menaſta to pitty me; and promiſed me to deceive her Friend for once; and to let me hear from her when ſhe found a fit time for her to meet me in ſome place. After this, Menaſta went away, and Artaban who had no other buſineſs but to find me out, and tell me that it was his deſign to prevent my Misfortune, he ſtayed with me, and would not leave me in that condition wherein I was: and ſo much the willinger, becauſe he ſaw the Counſel which he had given me took ſuch unfortunate Effect: But I was ſo juſt as not to be angry with him for it: I accuſed only my ſelf, not my Friend: Muſt it not be confeſſed (ſaid I) that I am the moſt unfortunate, the moſt culpable, and therefore moſt to be blamed of any Man in the World? for indeed (ſaid I to Artaban) I have had a greater loſs than ever any had; I have been in greater fault than ever any was; and I have ſuffered more than the moſt unfortunate Man ever did. After I had ſaid ſo, I was a while ſilent, then again upon a ſudden I began to ſpeak: But Artaban (ſaid I unto him) did you ſee Ameſtris in the Church? No (anſwered he) for I was ſo troubled when meeting Menaſta who told me that Ottanus had married Ameſtris, that I could be no more inquiſitive concerning a Buſineſs which I could not help, and which I had helped doubtleſs, if I had but known it one quarter of an hour ſooner: What then (ſaid I to him) is it moſt true that Ameſtris did always love me? and is it alſo certain ſhe never favoured Megabiſes? and after all this, can I be happy? How, Artaban, can this poſſibly be? No,no (ſaid I) I cannot comprehend it; ſince Ameſtris is Fidele, and Megabiſes not happy, in this reſpect the Heart of Aglatidas muſt needs rejoyce: But alas, the thought that Ameſtris is Fidele, and muſt never be mine, this Reſpect makes me dead in Sorrow; No,no,I had rather you were unconſtant than faithful; and ſince you are never to be mine, Why do you, cruel Ameſtris, preſerve your Affection for me, yet deprive me of all the Conſequents? To deprive me of your Sight, your Diſcourſe, and your fair Self? This is (inhumane Ameſtris) to conceal a Serpent under Flowers; This is the way to poiſon your Preſence; and indeed it is to be barbarous under a colour of being pitiful; Alas, had it not much more availed me not to have juſtified your ſelf, than to have done it in ſuch a ſtrange, ſuch an extraordinary, and ſuch a cruel way? For in believing you to be unconſtant, I had none but my own Misfortunes to ſupport: I then thought you happy whilſt I ſighed, and I did not know that your Felicity did not cauſe my greateſt Puniſhment: I had not experimentally tried that I ſhould be more ſenſible of the Misfortunes of the Party beloved than of my own. What, Ameſtris? Muſt you be for ever unhappy, and unhappy for the Love of me? Muſt you eternally endure the ſight of a Man whom you hated, and never ſee another whom you once honoured with your Love? and all this becauſe Aglatidas ſeem'd to be perfidious unto you, and becauſe he was jealous without reaſon, though not without ſome kind of Appearance, and by conſequence without any ſhew that I loved you ſtill; though none are ever jealous of that which they do not love. Alas Ameſtris (ſaid I) Did you ſo little know your own Beauty, that you ſhould ſuffer your ſelf to be deluded by a trick ſo eaſy to be diſcovered? Could you ever think that any Heart which once loved you and adored you, could offer any Victims unto any other Divinity? As for Aglatidas, he might with reaſon think himſelf not beloved by Ameſtris, his own Defects might authorize his Suſpition: But as for Ameſtris, how is it poſſible, ſhe ſhould ſo much as conceive, much leſs firmly believe, that any one could ceaſe from loving her? and ſo ceaſe to love her as to love any other? yet ſhe did think it, ſhe believed it; and ſhe has revenged her ſelf, and after ſuch a ſad manner as muſt make me eternally ſigh; for to ſay truly, there neither is, nor was, nor I think ever can be any Misfortnne comparable unto mine. I know not (ſaid Artaban then unto me) whether all thoſe who are not beloved will acknowledge what you ſay. Thoſe who are not loved (anſwered I) may hope that one day they may be, and that Hope may ſupport them amidſt their Inquietudes. But as for me, on the contrary, though I confeſs I was beloved, I ſhall never receive any ſigns of that Affection: I muſt never ſee Ameſtris again, never ſpeak to her; ſhe will never write unto me again, but ſhall be treated as one ſhe hates: No, no

Artaban, I am certainly the moſt unhappy Man in all the World; yet thoſe who lament for the Death of their Miſtreſſes will diſpute with you for the firſt rank in unhappineſs, although you would have all they would yield it unto you; they do diſpute with me for it without reaſon (replied I) for who hinders them from following thoſe they love unto the Grave? There are a hundred ways which lead to Death, and the end of their Evils is in their own Diſpoſition: But it is not ſo with me, for as long as Ameſtris lives, this Remedy is denied me: I muſt preſerve my Life as if ſhe were delighted with it; for indeed I cannot leave Ameſtris, becauſe I cannot omit any occaſion which may ſerve her, and becauſe after all this I would ſee, as well as I can, how far the Fidelity of this Lady will go. Then confeſs, ſaid Artaban, that thoſe who ſee their Miſtreſſes not only unconſtant and married, but married unto thoſe whom they are more indulgent unto than the firſt they loved, have more cauſe to complain than you. I ſtayed a while at this before I anſwered; but preſently beginning to ſpeak as if I had ſeen Ameſtris: Pardon (Divine Lady) my Imbecility, and do not hate me, if in this Accident I do conſider my ſelf more than you. Yes, yes, Artaban (ſaid I, in turning towards him) I do confeſs that I do contradict my own Thoughts; and although I am deſperate at the Misfortune of Ameſtris, yet I would not have her happy with Megabiſes, but I had rather ſhe ſhould be unfortunate with Ottanus; I had need to call all my Reaſon and my Generoſity to aſſiſt me, and to keep this criminous Joy from entring my Heart: I cannot forbear the entertaining it when I know that he who now enjoys Ameſtris ſhall never enjoy her Love; and when I know ſhe thinks upon me with Sorrow, and eternally regrets me: I would have her know my Innocency as I know hers, and that I ſhould be juſtified in her Thoughts as ſhe is in mine: I know (ſaid I) this will augment her Sorrow, ſince it may come to paſs that Deſpite will choak ſome part of that Affection ſhe bears unto me: But, adorable Ameſtris (ſaid I) ſeek out ſome other Remedies for your Sorrows, and find it rather in the ſweetneſs to know, that you are perfectly, fectly, though improfitably, loved. After this I went ſilently to walk; afterwards upon a ſudden I began to ſpeak, anſwering unto what I had thought upon: No, Megabiſes, ſaid I, I will not fight with you; and though you ſhould offend me, yet if you ſtill love Ameſtris, you are more cruelly puniſhed than any Death can inflict: And afterwards to ſpeak the very truth, without that Paſſion which hath blinded me, I did owe ſo much Reſpect unto the Blood of his Brother which I had let out, as not to think of ſpilling his. But as for Ottanus (ſaid I) how can I ſuffer him to live? and knowing the Vertue of Ameſtris, how dare I ſo much as to deſire his Death? What then (ſaid I to Artaban, with more Anger than I can now expreſs) muſt I all my Life long ſee Ameſtris, the incomparable Ameſtris, ſubject unto a Man unto whom the Gods have denied all things except his bare Condition and his Riches? and unto whom they have not given any more Soul than as much as will render him odious? Why Artaban, is it not permitted me to ſet Ameſtris at liberty? Ah, no, no, (ſaid I to my ſelf) I dare not attempt it, I dare not propound it unto her; I dare not ſo much as have a thought of it, leſt ſhe ſhould forbid it; What ſhall I then do (ſaid I to Artaban) and what ſhould I think? So it was, Sir, that I can well ſay, that I ſuffered as much as was poſſible to be ſuffered, and not die; the Joy which I reſented at the Innocence of Ameſtris did doubtleſs keep in my Life, it not being poſſible without that Cordial to have kept my Heart from breaking when I heard ſhe was married. But though I lived, yet ſurely it was to endure more Sorrow; for certainly the Obſcurity of a Grave was much to be preferred before the Trouble and Miſery which I endured. Sometimes Ottanus did not ſeem ſo odious unto me as he always before did ſeem; ſometimes I thought that Ameſtris did not apprehend his Defects ſo great, becauſe it was grown habitual unto her to ſee them. I feared alſo that the Treaſure which Ottanus poſſeſſed, did not really reach his Heart: but thoſe Fears laſted not long. My greateſt Conſolation was, to think that Ameſtris could not love him who poſſeſſed it. In the mean time the Night drawing on, it was time to retire: I paſſed that Night away without ſleep, and I complain'd away the two next Days. Upon the third in the Morning I received news from Menaſta, who ſent me word, that if I would be in the Garden about the green Border where the Fountain is, by ſix of the clock at Night, ſhe would bring Ameſtris thither, as not knowing that I would be there; but to prevent any diſcovery of this meeting, it were requiſite ſhe went into the thick Wood on the right Hand of the Fountain. Whoſoever ſhould have told me, Sir, but one minute before that I ſhould have another minute of Joy in all my Life, I could not have believed him; yet I no ſooner knew that I ſhould ſee Ameſtris again that day, but I abandoned my ſelf entirely: I went thither an hour before, never thinking either of Megabiſes or Ottanus, or of the Marriage of Ameſtris; and never thinking of any thing elſe but that I ſhould ſee her, that I ſhould ſpeak to her, and that perhaps ſhe would anſwer me favourably. And afterwards reviving upon a ſudden out of the pleaſant Lethargy of thought: Alas! (ſaid I) what can ſhe poſſibly anſwer me, which can render me leſs miſerable, ſince the more ſweet ſhe is unto me, the more miſerable does ſhe make me? yet for all that I deſire her to be ſo, and not incenſed againſt me. I entertained all that day on this manner with Artaban, and I ſent unto Menaſta that I would not fail to be there. Mean while, this witty Lady did really delude Ameſtris (as ſince I came to know) and propounded this ſolitary walk unto her, as moſt ſuitable to her Humour and preſent Condition; yet notwithſtanding, ſhe thought it convenient, that Ameſtris ſhould not reſent me ſo culpable as formerly ſhe did, therefore ſhe brought her an hour ſooner unto the Walk than ſhe appointed me, to the end that ſhe might have more time to prepare her: As they were then in that little Wood where ſhe led her, the fair afflicted Lady did her ſelf begin to contribute unto the Deſign, and begun a Diſcourſe of which my Couſin was very glad. It muſt be acknowledged Menaſta (ſaid ſhe to her) that the Misfortune which thus perſecutes me, is very rigid againſt me, ſince it will not ſuffer me to have that comfort as to know what Aglatidas does think of my Misfortune:

He is ſo taken up with Anatiſa, that perhaps they mock at my melancholy Deſtiny; and perhaps Aglatidas thinks my Marriage rather an Effect of my humour than as a Misfortune whereof he is the real cauſe: But (ſaid ſhe) my Soul is a little more reaſonable, for I cannot forbear wiſhing two different things at once: I no ſooner had wiſhed to know that Aglatidas was ſenſible of my Misfortune, but preſently after I deſire for my own quietneſs to underſtand no more of him; never to meet him as long as I live; nor hear no more ſpoken of him; but alas, all theſe Deſigns have but an ill bottom in my Heart; and I have more reaſon to reſent my Marriage as a great puniſhment for my loving ſuch a perfidious Man. I wiſh, ſaid Menaſta, that you had never thought him ſuch a cruel Man, or that you would no longer think him ſo; but as I think you are more unhappy by reſenting him ſo: What (ſaid Ameſtris, interrupting her) ſhould I not believe that Aglatidas was perfidious? and can I think that he is not ſo ſtill? Ah, no, no, Menaſta, I muſt not think him otherwiſe, and for the future I muſt not perſwade my ſelf of any thing that may juſtify him: I wiſh only that he would repent of his Crime, to the end that he may be a Puniſhment unto himſelf; But know that as long as I do not think Aglatidas repentant and unhappy, he does not put the Stability of my Soul unto any dangerous Trial: And it would be more cruel unto me to tell me that I was deceived; that Aglatidas was never culpable; that what I have ſeen was but an illuſion; that he hath been always faithful unto me; That he never loved Anatiſa, and that he hath ever loved Ameſtris; I confeſs Menaſta, that if I could be perſwaded of all this, then I ſhould be more unhappy than I am; and though I ſhould not become more criminal, yet doubtleſs I ſhould become more unfortunate: But this is a thing which can never be, and a thing which I need not fear; I would to God (ſaid Menaſta to her) it were poſſible you never were acquainted with the innocency of Aglatidas: The Innocency of Aglatidas, replied Ameſtris? Ah, I do entreat you not to make merry at my Misfortune; it is too great, Menaſta, to be uſed for your Diverſion; and I am more your Firend than to be treated ſo.

No, no, replied ſhe, I ſpeak ſeriouſly; Aglatidas it is true was very unwiſe, but he was ever faithful: What, replied Ameſtris, did not Aglatidas love Anatiſa? Aglatidas, anſwered Menaſta, never loved any but you: O Heavens! (cried out this wiſe Lady) mercileſs and cruel Woman that you are, why do you ſpeak thus unto me? If this you tell me be falſe, why do you tell it? and if it be true, why did you not either tell it ſooner, or eternally conceal it from me? I could tell it no ſooner, replied Menaſta, becauſe I knew it no ſooner; and I could not hide it, becauſe Aglatidas is reſolved to tell it you himſelf: Oh (replied ſhe, with a quite altered Countenance) whether Aglatidas be culpable or innocent, I will never ſee him as long as I live; if he be culpable, he is not worthy of it; and though he be innocent, yet I ſhall be criminal to ſuffer it; therefore Menaſta talk no more of him, he does but too much take up my Memory; he is but too much in my Heart, and I wiſh to Heaven he were leſs. After theſe words ſhe was ſilent; and Menaſta ſeeing her Mind was ſo much troubled, did repent of her Promiſe, and was a good while before ſhe durſt ſpeak any more unto her: After ſome minutes had thus paſſed on, Ameſtris looking upon her with Eyes ſwimming in Tears, and beginning to ſpeak with leſs violence: But yet, ſaid ſhe, Menaſta, what moved you to ſpeak thus unto me? I durſt tell you no more, anſwered Menaſta, for ſeeing the Innocence of Aglatidas did torment you as much as if he were criminal, I thought it better to ſpeak no more of him, neither as faithful or as inconſtant: Know Menaſta, replied ſhe, that I love you ſo much as to pardon ſuch a Fault, and know (ſaid ſhe, bluſhing) that I deſire you to tell me all you know concerning Aglatidas, and diſguiſe nothing from me: Menaſta ſeeing Ameſtris deſired it, told her all ſhe knew concerning my Adventure; to wit, how I came to be jealous by ſeeing Megabiſes with her in the Garden; how that moved me to leave writing unto her; how I did not ceaſe to love her; how Artaban had counſelled me to love Anatiſa, or at leaſt to ſeem as if I did; and how I challenged Megabiſes, and hid my ſelf to no other end but to fight with him; and in concluſion, ſeeing

ing Ameſtris hearken favourably unto what ſhe told her; then ſhe told her further what I had told unto her; and confeſſed ſhe had diſcovered in me ſo many ſigns of abſolute Deſpair, that ſhe was not able to deny me one requeſt which I made unto her, which was, that I would be a means that I might once more ſee her. In concluſion, Madam (ſaid ſhe) that you may not be too much ſurprized at it, be pleaſed to know, that I induced you hither, only to the end that Aglatidas might preſent himſelf unto you. Ah Menaſta (ſaid Ameſtris) what have you done? unto what have you expoſed me? how do you think I can endure the ſight of a Man whom I have made ſo unfortunate? and how can I deny that unto a Man who might have made me all happineſs? Yes, Menaſta, you have done me great wrong, if this Meeting ſhould be diſcovered, would the World not think it was by my conſent? What will all the Court ſay? what may Ottanus think? unto how much danger do I hazard my Reputation? No, no, I muſt never conſent unto what you have promiſed him; how would you have me ſpeak unto him? what would you have me ſay? Shall I tell him I love him ſtill? alas I cannot do ſo without a Crime, or at leaſt it is not handſom to do it: Shall I tell him that I hate him? Ah, good Gods, how can I ſay it? I who did not ſo, when I thought him perfidious? Speak then Menaſta, I conjure you; you have Wit and Virtue, and Diſcretion, I beſeech you adviſe me, and adviſe me faithfully: Yet (replied ſhe, not giving her leave to anſwer) it is better to ask no counſel at all, and ſhun ſo dangerous an Occaſion: In ſaying ſo, ſhe began to walk, and go away; when Menaſta did bid her look where I was coming; ſhe no ſooner ſaw me, but ſhe ſhed Tears; and as ſhe turned from me to hide them, I kneeled down at her Feet, before ſhe was well recovered in her Sight; I thought, Sir, that I had ſuch a ſhare in thoſe Sorrows which I obſerved in Ameſtris, and they did ſo augment mine, that I had much ado to ſpeak; yet after much ſtraining my ſelf, I ſaid unto her, You ſee at your Feet, Madam, the moſt culpable, the moſt innocent, and the moſt unfortunate Man that breathes, who, as criminal, comes to ask Puniſhment; who, as innocent comes to juſtify himſelf before you; and who, as unfortunate, comes to beg Compaſſion, and ſome Comfort in his Miſery: Not, Madam, that I ſeek to live, but that I deſire to die more cheerfully and gloriouſly both: And this will be (Divine Ameſtris) if you will be pleaſed only to acknowledge that I have not merited my Miſfortune; and that you would not judge me unworthy of a more happy Deſtiny. I know not Aglatidas (anſwered ſhe, and raiſing me up) neither whether I ſhould anſwer you, nor whether I ſhould hear you, but I know very well that you are the only cauſe both of your Miſfortunes and mine; for indeed Ameſtris is not one of whom one ought to be jealous: Why, Madam (ſaid I) ſhould I give the lie unto my own Eyes? Should I truſt more unto your Merit and your Goodneſs, than to their Teſtimony? Do you not know, Madam, that except the laſt time when I had the honour to ſpeak unto you, you never had given me any ſtrong Arguments to believe, that I ſtood upon any good terms in your Mind? What then would you have it, Madam, which ſhould ſuſtain my Weakneſs upon ſuch an Occaſion? If I had received ſeveral Proofs and Tryals of your Affection to me, then it had been a horrid Crime to ſuſpect your Inconſtancy: But what Engagements had I from you, Madam, which might create in me ſo great a Confidence? It is true indeed that I have had ſome favourable Expreſſions from you, and was permitted to interpret them in the beſt ſenſe for my ſelf, and that I have received ſome civil and obliging Letters from you; but, Madam, were all theſe ſufficient to belie my own Eyes? and had my Paſſion been worthy of you if I had retained all my Reaſon upon ſuch an Accident? No, Madam, to love you perfectly is to loſe all Reaſon as I have loſt it; and to preſerve only Reſpect as I have preſerved it; for indeed I did not complain before all the World; I lamented in ſecret, I ſought out ſolitude to ſigh it out there; and when I returned to Ecbatan, I was forced to it: You returned (ſaid Ameſtris to me, interrupting me and changing colour) to wait upon Anatiſa before my Eyes, and to force me againſt my Will to receive a Paſſion which could not enter into a Soul that was not preceded by another.

ther. Ah, Madam, ſaid I to her, I beſeech you do not upbraid me with a Fault which indeed I have committed, but I committed it by the counſel of another : 'Tis true I did counterfeit a Love unto Anatiſa, but it was only becauſe I ever loved you ; that open Love was but an effect of my true concealed Love ; and I know not how the adorable Ameſtris ſhould ſuffer her ſelf to be deceived by ſo groſs an Artifice, and which I uſed with ſo little care : Do not think, Madam, that I have prophaned the ſame words which I imployed to perſwade you of my Affection, and that I ever courted Anatiſa ; No, I never told her that I loved her ; I let her interpret my Melancholy as ſhe pleaſed, but I never did ſay ſo much as I love you. I do confeſs that I once did intend it, but my Heart and my Tongue were, whether I would or no, faithful unto you : Yes, Madam, when I fled from you, when you thought I courted Anatiſa, even then I gave you convincing Teſtimonies of the greatneſs of my Affection : For to love the faireſt Lady in the World as long as ſhe is gracious and favourable, this is a thing moſt ordinary ; but for me to continue loving her, when I thought ſhe had forſaken me, when I believed ſhe had betrayed me and loved another, and I for fear of diſcovering my Weakneſs, ſeemed to love another ; Ah, Madam, this is it which makes it evident, that nothing can extinguiſh my Paſſion but Death, and that you will reign eternally in my Soul. Ameſtris all the time of this Diſcourſe dejected her Eyes, and afterwards upon a ſudden lifting up her Eye-lids with extream Melancholy : Juſtify your ſelf no mo[illegible]aid ſhe to me) for you are yet but too much in my M[illegible] and let me imploy that little time I have to be with you in telling you ingenuouſly my real Thoughts : I would, Madam (ſaid I to her) if it may be without prejudice to that Reverence I owe you, beſeech you firſt not to make me deſpair, but to let me die leſs violently ; I would gladly ask you why when you thought me culpable, you ſhould then be revenged upon your ſelf ? Could you not invent a Puniſhment which I alone might have ſuffered the Miſery which you thought I deſerved ? Why did you not rather doom me to die before your Eyes ? Why, Madam, did you puniſh me by making

Your ſelf unhappy? I thought it beſt (anſwered ſhe) in my opinion to make you miſerable by this courſe, becauſe I could not otherwiſe juſtify my ſelf in your Mind, and I thought I could not do it more certainly than by marrying Ottanus, whom you knew well I did not love, and of whom I knew moſt aſſuredly you were not jealous: Ah, Madam (ſaid I to her) what do you tell me? Muſt Aglatidas hear from your own Mouth ſuch cruel Words? What, Madam, Ottanus? that ſame Ottanus who I have ſeen to be the greateſt object of your Averſion: Can he ever be the Husband of Ameſtris? Yes, anſwered ſhe, ſince Aglatidas would not: I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid I to her, have not ſuch a Thought of me; but on the contrary, believe that if you will but let Aglatidas alone, Ameſtris ſhall not be long the Wife of Ottanus; I pronounced theſe Words in a very paſſionate violence: But O Heavens! how aſtoniſhed I was, when I ſaw Ameſtris go back and look upon me with an imperious Air, wherein appeared no leſs Anger than Sorrow: Know, Aglatidas, ſaid ſhe to me, that as I have not changed my Opinion of you, ſo I have not changed my Vertue, I am the ſame you knew me, and ever will be, it is incapable of any Injuſtice; I have loved you, I confeſs, but I loved you without a Crime; Never think then, that although I ever had a great Averſion towards Ottanus, and had never married him out of ſuch a Thought as I cannot my ſelf expreſs, yet I ſay never think that I can ever deſire not to be his Wife: The time was indeed when I did not deſire it; but ſince I am ſo, it befits me to live with him as my Husband, and not to deceive. You know (ſaid ſhe, with Eyes full of Tears which ſhe would have reſtrained) that I will live out all the reſt of my days with Ottanus, whom I have ever hated, as if I had ever loved him; and with Aglatidas whom I ever loved, as if I ever hated him. Why, Madam, ſaid I to her, will you live with Aglatidas as if you ever hated him? What rigid Vertue can impoſe ſuch a ſevere Law upon you? No, no, Madam, ſaid I to her, do not fear that I will uſe any violence; do not puniſh me ſo cruelly for one Word pronounced againſt my Will in Paſſion, and without any deſign to execute it: I would have killed Megabiſes becauſe I thought you loved him, and I will not attempt againſt Ottanus, becauſe you do not love him, and I will hope that you will never love him: Let then this happy Husband of the fair Ameſtris live, ſo I may have ſo much happineſs as ſometimes to ſee her, that I may be put in mind of thoſe glorious Hours, wherein by the Will of Artambaſes I might have poſſeſſed the place which Ottanus now enjoys; let him enjoy that glorious Place in peace, ſince the fatal Deſtinies would have it ſo; but let me alſo poſſeſs in peace that which you have given me; let me, Madam, enjoy ſome glimpſe of that Felicity to the laſt minute of my Life: You may, if you will, bring me to my Death, as they uſe to bring Victims, that is, with Songs of Joy, and Crowns of Flowers: Yes, Madam, I ſhould die with Joy and Honour, if you would only permit me to render you an account of my Sorrows: And never fear that I ſhall ever deſire any thing from you which can diſpleaſe you; No, divine Ameſtris, I would only have my Complaints to be favourably heard, and I would only be comforted by ſome words of pity; you have hearkned unto Megabiſes whom you ſo love, and will you refuſe the ſame favour unto a Man whom you have not hated, nor perhaps do yet? That's the reaſon (replied ſhe) why I ought to deny it; for indeed, Aglatidas, I did love you, and I cannot hate you, ſo that for that very reaſon I ought to miſtruſt my own Thoughts: It is not (ſaid ſhe) and the Gods do know it, the Affection which I bear unto you can ever cauſe me to fail in that Duty which I owe unto Ottanus, nor in that which I owe unto my ſelf, but becauſe I am not in a capacity ever to be yours, therefore I ought not to admit of ſeeing you, or loving you. What then, Madam, ſaid I to her, do you intend then to hate me? I cannot do that if I would (anſwered ſhe) but I can forbear ſpeaking to you: Ah if you can do that (ſaid I to her) then you will not love me any more: And take heed, Madam, you do not renew a freſh Jealouſy in a deſperate Soul, and perſwade me, that perhaps the Riches of Ottanus did gain your Heart: Do not, Madam, ſtir up ſuch a violent Paſſion in my Mind; and to prevent it, afford me at the leaſt ſome ſmall ſigns of indifference: For indeed, Madam, if you ſhould cauſe me to deſpair, I ſhould again loſe my Reaſon abſolutely, as I did in my firſt Jealouſy, and perhaps ſhall not be able to preſerve that Reſpect which I ever have done: Tell me then, adorable Ameſtris, that you do not hate me, and that you would have me love you; and alſo permit me ſometimes to tell you that I am ready to die for the love of you. I will tell you more than that (ſaid ſhe,) for I will confeſs that I eſteem Aglatidas, as I ought to eſteem him; and that I love him as well as ever I did love him; and that I will love him ſo until I die: But after all this, he muſt ſee me no more as long as he lives: All that I can do for you is to permit you to think that when you ſhall hear of my Death (which I believe will be ere long) that Melancholy was the cauſe, and that my laſt Thoughts would be of Aglatidas. Now (ſaid ſhe) you ſee all I can do, and perhaps more than I ought to do, and therefore never hope for any more. Who ever ſaw (ſaid I unto her) the like Adventure unto mine? You tell me that you have loved me, and that you love me ſtill; you tell me that you will die in thoughts of me, and why will you not whilſt you are alive hear me ſometimes? It is becauſe I cannot (anſwered ſhe) without ſome offence to Vertue, and without too much expoſing my Reputation: Does not your Innocency (ſaid I) ſuffice to ſatisfy that? No (anſwered Ameſtris) it behoves to appear as well as be vertuous: Appear then (ſaid I to her) to be good and pitiful, if it be true that you are ſo: Do you (ſaid ſhe) appear reaſonable and generous, if you will continue to be always what you are: Would you have Aglatidas, Madam, ſaid I, ſee you no more, and perhaps love you no more? I ought to wiſh the latter as well as the firſt (replied ſhe) but I confeſs I cannot: What would you then have me do, ſaid I? I would (anſwered ſhe) have him love Ameſtris without any hope; that he ſhould comfort himſelf without ſeeing me; that he ſhould live with deſire of Death; and that he never forget me: In ſaying ſo, ſhe would have left me, but I took her by the Hand whether ſhe would or no, holding her by force, and kneeling down: In the Name of the Gods, Madam (ſaid I) either grant me what I deſire, or do not forbid my Death: I can conſent unto no more (ſaid ſhe to me) Honour bids me deny what you deſire, and my Affection bids you live at leaſt as long as I. Have patience Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe) perhaps the time will not be long: Ah, Madam (ſaid I to her) ſpeak not thus of your Death; rather forget Aglatidas than let the faireſt Lady in the world find a Tomb; you might do better (ſaid ſhe) to phraſe her the moſt unfortunate, and perhaps alſo the moſt unjuſt, and the moſt inhumane: But in the Name of thoſe Gods which I have already invoked, Madam (ſaid I to her) let me ſpeak unto you but once more: Adieu Aglatidas (ſaid ſhe) adieu, I begin to think my Heart would betray me if I ſhould hearken to you any longer, and that I ought to truſt unto my own Vertue no longer: Live (ſaid ſhe) if you can, and if it be poſſible love none but Ameſtris, and never ſee her more; ſhe prays you, and if you will admit of it, ſhe commands you: In pronouncing this ſad Sentence, ſhe left me all in Tears; and all that I could do was to kiſs her fair Hand which ſhe drew away from mine with too much violence: You may judge, Sir, in what a condition I was when I ſaw Ameſtris going away with Menaſta, who all the while of our Diſcourſe, ſtood five or ſix paces from us, to watch leſt any came, and underſtood nothing at all what we ſaid: I will not inſiſt, Sir, upon repetition of my Apprehenſions, for it would but too much abuſe your Patience: Let this ſerve for all, that there was never any eſteemed himſelf more undone and unfortunate than I; for indeed I found that I loved and was beloved, but for all that there is not any ingredient of hope left for me: I found that it was not permitted me to force my happineſs from him which enjoyed it: I had no more Rivals to puniſh, I had no more inconſtant Miſtreſſes to complain upon: What comfort could I ever hope for amidſt my Sorrows? I had no power to forget one which loved me, who had all my Heart, my Spirits, my Soul, my Memory, and all, and for whom I forgot all the World beſides. There was not any hope for me to ſpeak unto her; She had forbid me to die: Indeed I found nothing but what did extraordinarily afflict me; yet notwithſtanding I would try whether by the aſſiſtance of Menaſta I could ſpeak once more unto Ameſtris; but, Sir, it could not poſſibly be obtained; and from that day this cruel el Lady would never walk in any place, leſt ſhe ſhould meet with me; alſo ſhe feigned to be ſick, to the end ſhe might not go out at all. When I underſtood by Menaſta the full reſolution of Ameſtris never to alter, I then determined to remove from that place where I could not ſee her; leſt in conſideration of me, I might perhaps have contributed unto her Death, by cauſing her reſtraint: As for Megabiſes who was as much vexed at the Marriage of Ameſtris as I was, although he was thought not to love any longer when he came to Ecbatan; yet he found as well as I, that it was not ſuch an eaſy matter to extinguiſh a violent Paſſion. Aſtyages having heard where I was, did reconcile us, without ſeeing or embracing one another, commanding me, becauſe I had killed his Brother, to ſhun meeting him as much as I could poſſible. The cauſe of our laſt Quarrel was not known unto any, no not unto Megabiſes himſelf, who was always ignorant that I had ſeen him in that fatal Garden, near the Fountain in the green Border. As concerning Anatiſa, I left Ecbatan before ſhe returned out of the Country; ſo that I cannot tell you what ſhe thought of me: I did write a Letter at my Departure unto Ameſtris, which I ſent unto Menaſta, but I never had any anſwer unto it. I went wandring a while from Province to Province, not well knowing what I did, nor what courſe to take, until ſuch time as the War begun in Aſſyria; I hoped there to put a period unto my Misfortunes, in finding out an honourable Death. During all the time I was there, I never received any news, neither from Menaſta nor Ameſtris; although I uſed all poſſible means to engage ſome or other to enquire of them: And ever ſince that, you have been a Witneſs of my Melancholy, although you knew not the cauſe. And ſince that I never heard more of Ameſtris, unleſs what I knew by Araſpes, how that Ottanus was yet living, and that yet ſhe was unfortunate, and in all likelihood, ſince Melancholy did ſo remain in her Face, ſhe yet perhaps loves the unfortunate Aglatidas: Now, Sir, you underſtand what the Adventure was which you deſired to know; and what were the Misfortunes of that Man who more than any Man in the World wiſhes a happy end unto yours, and who expects nothing but Death to put an end unto his own.

After theſe words Aglatidas was ſilent ; and Artamenes thanked him for the pains which he had taken ; asking him pardon for cauſing him to revive his Sorrows, and did ſeem to be extreamly ſenſible of them. I confeſs, ſaid he to him, that you are much to be lamented, and the Accident which has made you ſo unfortunate was a very extraordinary Event : But for all that, ſaid he to him ſighing, you do know that Ameſtris is living, and you need not doubt but that yet you are beloved : So that you may hope that Time and Fortune may work a happy change in your Affliction ; But I do know ſome more unfortunate than you. I know not that, Sir, replied Aglatidas, but I do know very well that I did loſe an ineſtimable Jewel in loſing Ameſtris, and that if Ambition ſhould join it ſelf unto Love to perſecute me, I could not be more melancholy than I am ; yet, Sir, it is very generous in you, to intereſt your ſelf more in the Miſfortunes of others than your own : You have unjuſt and heavy Fetters of your own to complain of, and need not trouble your ſelf to lament the Unhappineſs of Aglatidas, who is not worthy of that Honour. Aglatidas, anſwered he, is worthy of all that is great in the World, and therefore I hope that one day, the Gods will put a period unto his Misfortunes. Although I had all the Qualities in the World, replied Aglatidas, thoſe which you do attribute unto me, would not create any Hope in me ; and as long as Artamenes continues unhappy, I know not why any who have any Vertue, ſhould ground their Hopes upon that reaſon which is not always infallible. Thus did Artamenes and Aglatidas diſcourſe away the time until Andramias told them that it was time to retire : Aglatidas asked Artamenes, whether he could do him any ſervice, deſiring to let him know that he could contribute ſomething towards his Delivery : but Artamenes thanked him, and told him that his Priſon was not ſo great a Misfortune, that if he could, he would never come out, unleſs by the ſame Hand which put him in.

ARTAMENES, OR, THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part II. Book I.

THough this Illuſtrious Priſoner was careleſs of his Liberty, yet his Friends did contribute all their diligence to procure it: and Hidaſpes entertained not a thought of any thing elſe ever ſince he knew Artamenes to be Cyrus: Not only Hidaſpes, Aducius, Artabaſes, Chriſantes, and Feraulas, who were native Subjects unto the King his Father, and hereafter to be his, did all of them in particular, contrive all Expedients for his ſafety. But the King of Hircania, the King of Phrygia, Perſodes, Thraſibulus, and many others alſo, were not leſs ſolicitous. So that, to loſe no time, Chriſantes went the next morning betimes unto the King of Phrygia, with intentions to relate unto him, in a more conciſe manner, all that which the day before he had related concerning the unhappy Life of his dear Maſter: but ſince they thought it expedient to keep always ſome about Ciaxares, to prevent him from taking any violent Reſolutions againſt Artamenes, the King of Phrygia ſaid, he thought it fitteſt for him to undertake that Office, ſince he was moſt affectionate, and had moſt prevalency with the King of Medes. In that conſideration therefore, Chriſantes did in ſhort tell him the ſtory of Artamenes, whereof he himſelf had ſeen a great part, and reſolved hereafter, at more leaſure, to relate the Particulars in a more ample manner. Chriſantes did ſo ſatisfy the curioſity of this Prince, and did ſo extreamly charm him by his relation, although it was but a bare abridgment of his Life, that he did infinitely redouble his eſteem of Artamenes: and cauſed him to go with more diligence unto Ciaxares, and obſetve all his Reſentments. In the mean time, Chriſantes and Feraulas went unto the Houſe of Hidaſpes, where the King of Hircania, Perſodes, Thraſibulus, Artabaſes, Aduſius, and all thoſe who heard Chriſantes the day before, did rendezvous. They no ſooner ſaw Chriſantes and Feraulas, but they did very importunately deſire them to finiſh their Diſcourſe of the glorious Life of Artamenes. The Princes would have ſent for the King of Phrygia: but Chriſantes told him how he had already ſatisfied his Curioſity, and then they did ſit down, whilſt Feraulus did purſue that Story which Chriſantes had begun the Day before.

The Continuation of the Hiſtory of Artamenes.

WHen I call to memory all the great Acts which Chriſantes told you yeſterday, I have much adoe to think it poſſible there ſhould be any thing elſe to tell you; and when I think upon all which remains, that I am to relate unto you, then methinks Chriſantes hath told you nothing, ſo full of Miracles is the Life of my Maſter. I know Sir (ſaid Feraulas to the King of Hircania) you have not forgot, how after that Combate 'twixt him and Philidaſpes, wherein he had the Advantage, he retired unto that Sacrificer whom he ſaw in the Temple of Mars, when he came firſt to Sinope, and from thence he ſent unto the King and the Princeſs, to preſent his Excuſes, and beg pardon for the Combate which he had made, but I think you know not the Sequel of that Accident: Aribeus who did patronize Philidaſpes, did all he could to cauſe the fault to reflect upon Artamenes; but although Aribeus ſpoke all that his Genius could ſuggeſt in behalf of Philidaſpes, yet the Eloquence of my Maſter's great Services ſpoke more effectually for himſelf. Nothing made a greater noiſe in the Court than this Combate; every one was inquiſitive of the Cauſe, but none could find it: It was the common Diſcourſe of the Court, and every one imagined that Ambition cauſed the Quarrel; but yet as none did particularly know the Original, ſo each one took the liberty to think as they would. The King was extreamly angry at the Miſchance; for as they were Men of high Service, both of them, ſo he was afraid to loſe them both, or at leaſt one, becauſe their Wounds were very great, eſpecially Philidaſpes, whoſe Hurts were much more dangerous than thoſe of Artamenes. And though the King did highly prize them both, yet his Mind did put a great difference between them; when he began to conſider how he owed his Life unto Artamenes, and unto his Valour all his Illuſtrious Victories, he could not chooſe but in ſpite of Aribeus and all he could ſay, prefer Artamenes before Philidaſpes. He was extreamly diſpleaſed at the matter, but he conceived he ought not to puniſh them, as well becauſe he loved them, and was obliged unto them, as becauſe neither of them were born Subjects unto him, and therefore by conſequence ought not to treat them rigorouſly; yet notwithſtanding, for Formalities ſake upon ſuch occaſion, he would have the Princeſs come to ask their Pardon, which by abſolute Command from the King ſhe did, tho not without ſome repugnancy. After this formal Ceremony, he ſent to know of their Healths, and to tell Artamenes, that he had done worſe in ſo expoſing himſelf, than if he had hazarded a Battel: He alſo ſent ſome obliging Complement unto Philidaſpes, ſo that the Buſineſs was better paſſed over than every one did think it. That which did moſt vex Philidaſpes, was to ſee all the Court take Artamenes part, except ſome old Friends of Aribeus, who fawned upon his Favourite. Now Sir, it is time to tell you what the Princeſs thought upon the matter; for altho by the King's Command ſhe had begged pardon for theſe two Illuſtrious Offenders, yet ſhe knew not, whether for her particular, ſhe could conſent unto it. I am now about ſpeaking ſuch Secrets concerning her, as you will be inquiſitive how I ſhould come to the knowledg of them; therefore it is requiſite I ſhould now tell you, that a long time ſince, one of Mandana's Women, called Marteſia, with whom I had a great League of Friendſhip, did tell it unto me; for at that time there paſſed between us only a bare common Civility, and I was then altogether ignorant of what I now intend to relate. You may be pleaſed to remember, that the Day before this Combate was fought, the Princeſs uſed all her endeavours to contract a League of Friendſhip between Artamenes and Philidaſpes, and how ſhe entreated them to live at leaſt, as if they did (tho they could not) love one another: So that as ſoon as ſhe underſtood of their Fighting, ſhe was in a great Choler, and thought that they failed in their Reſpects to her. Marteſia, of whom I ſpoke, was ſhe, whom of all her Women ſhe loved moſt, and in whom ſhe had moſt Confidence; but until that time Marteſia had taſted more of her Liberality than her Truſt: and I believe that what the Princeſs thought of Artamenes upon this occaſion, was the firſt great Secret which ſhe imparted unto her; nor had ſhe, as I think any other, who ſhe pleaſed to create her Confident. It was now a long time ſince the Princeſs looked upon my Maſter with much Eſteem, and indeed, I learned from Marteſia, that ſhe did extreamly commend him, ever ſince the firſt time ſhe ſaw him; and ſince that time, upon an hundred Accidents, ſhe has ſpoke of him after ſuch a manner as ſhe was not wont to ſpeak of any elſe; ſhe obſerved his handſome Garb, ſhe liked his pleaſant Spirit, ſhe commended his Wiſdom, ſhe admired his Valour, ſhe could not comprehend his good Fortune; and indeed ſhe ſaid, that Artamanes was every way a Miracle, and one whom the Gods had ſent as a Protector of her Father's Life, and Glory of his Reign: But upon this laſt Accident, her Anger had ſo incenſed her Mind, as it compelled her to open her Heart unto Marteſia. I know not (ſaid ſhe to her that Night the Fight was) whether or no I ſhould, after the Example of the King, pardon

Artamenes and Philidaſpes: for indeed, Marteſia, could there be any thing more offenſive unto me, than this their Procedure? I no ſooner deſired them to love one another, but they preſently quarrel; I wiſh'd them to live, as if they loved at the leaſt, and they immediately fight, even that Morrow after I deſired them; in truth I cannot think they could have ſet ſo ſlight a value upon my Words, neither do I think I can pardon them. I do believe, Madam, replied Marteſia, that there is ſome hidden cauſe in the Buſineſs, which is not underſtood, and which perhaps would juſtify them if you knew it; for certainly they are Men of Souls, and high Judgment, and Men alſo who much reverence you. But they have afforded me very ill Teſtimonies of it (replied the Princeſs very ſharply) and I intend to let them ſee I am ſenſible of the Injury. But you are alſo ſenſible of their good Deeds, and being ſo, what will become of all their brave Services (replied Marteſia?) But Marteſia, I would fain know (ſaid the Princeſs to her) what I ought to think of the boldneſs of Artamenes and Philidaſpes, and know which of them was the firſt Aſſaulter: The Event of the Combate tells me that Artamenes had the better of it; but nothing tells me which of them was moſt culpable. I think Madam (replied Marteſia, who was alone with her in her Cloſet) that both of them may without injuſtice be blamed; for did you not entreat them both to love one another? Yes, replied the Princeſs, but tho neither of them can be innocent, yet it is probable they are not both of them equally culpable, and that is it which I would preciſely know; not but that I think Artamenes is leſs in fault. And why Madam do you think ſo (anſwered Marteſia) ſince you have no more proofs for the one than the other? I know not (replied the Princeſs) but I do more ſuſpect the haſty violent humour of Philidaſpes, has failed in his reſpects unto me, ſooner than the wiſe temper of Artamenes: moreover (added ſhe) the Victory which Artamenes got over him is an infallible mark of the juſtneſs of his Cauſe: Indeed (ſaid ſhe bluſhing) tho I cannot tell for what Reaſons, yet I cannot chuſe but wiſh Artamenes be found leſs culpable then Philidaſpes; and I ſhould be very glad that a Man who has ſo much obliged, ſhould give me no cauſe of Complaint. It is very true (anſwered Marteſia) that Artamenes is a Man incomparable, and one whoſe Merits does doubtleſs deſerve a higher Eſteem than any other: But Madam (added ſhe) what ſhould be the reaſon that a Man of ſuch extraordinary Vertues ſhould conceal his Quality and place of Birth? It is to be believed (ſaid the Princeſs bluſhing) that his Quality is equal to his Carriage, for if it were not, he would never conceal it. But (ſaid Marteſia) what brought him to this Court? and why ſtays he here? for I hear ſay he never asked any thing of the King. Never any thing (anſwered the Princeſs) but only leave to fight againſt Enemies; yet (ſaid ſhe) his Services have not been ſmall, nor all his Actions meanly Glorious; and here this great Princeſs began to repeat what my Maſter had done in the firſt Battel, when he preſerved the King her Father's Life out of the Hands of his Enemies who had inviron'd him with Danger: The prodigious Advantages that he got above all others; the wonderful Combate, wherein he remained the only Conqueror of two hundred Enemies; How he erected a glorious Trophe: The Combate which he had with Artanes: The taking of Ceraſia: The Battels that he won againſt the King of Pontus: The remarkable Arms which he wore, to make himſelf better known unto thoſe who conſpired againſt his Life: The poor ſimple Arms which he made choice of to conceal himſelf from thoſe who had order to ſpare his Life: His generous Behaviour unto theſe valiant Souldiers which would not yield their Bucklers, and of his rendring them their Money again: And alſo all his other Gallantries, which ſhe remembred as freſhly and preciſely, as if they were done but yeſterday: and yet after all theſe (ſaid ſhe to Marteſia) there appears not the leaſt Ambition in his Mind, and I neither know what brought him hither, what he ſtays for, nor what he aims at: not but that the King my Father would do very much for him; but upon the whole matter, his Services are infinitely above all Recompences; and this is the reaſon Marteſia, why I wiſh him more innocent than Philidaſpes. And although Philidaſpes daſpes be a Man of a high Soul and excellent Spirit, alſo in divers occaſions hath done good ſervice, yet there is a great difference between them: The turbulent humour of Philidaſpes, does not pleaſe me; Moreover, I think him more Ambitious, and fuller of ſelf-ends than Artamenes.. After this manner, Sir, was the firſt diſcourſe of him: Mean while, as the King did pardon theſe two illuſtrious Offenders, the Princeſs would not make her Reſentments of them to appear; ſo that ſhe ſent to know how they did. Philidaſpes was a long time very ill, and his Life in ſome doubt: but my Maſter's Wounds were never in any danger: and within three Weeks after the Fight he preſented himſelf unto the King and Princeſs; to thank the firſt for his Grace towards him, and the ſecond for interceding in his behalf. She was then in her Cloſet, and none but her Woman with her, ſo that as Artamenes did addreſs himſelf to give her Thanks, and acknowledg the Favour; Think not (ſaid ſhe to him) tho I did beg your Pardon, that I my ſelf in particular did conſent unto it: No Artamenes (ſaid ſhe in a more imperious Tone) it is only the King hath pardoned you, but Mandana is yet diſpleaſed. If to die at your Feet (anſwered Artamenes) would give you that ſatisfaction, I am moſt ready to do it. But Madam, what's the Crime I have committed? How can that Man, who does reverence you with as much Devotion as he does the Gods, poſſibly offend you? Pray tell me then (ſaid ſhe to him) whether it was not neglect in your Duty to ſlight my Requeſt as you did, when I deſired you to live peaceably with Philidaſpes? But Madam (ſaid he) you alſo deſired Philidaſpes to live peaceably with Artamenes. 'Tis true (ſaid ſhe) and I intend not to juſtify him by accuſing you; I would only know which of you is more or leſs culpable than the other. Indeed I know not my ſelf (replied Artamenes, and changing Colour) the ground of our Quarrel is ſo dubious, that we did not explain it one to another, nor perhaps ever ſhall. Did you know one another (demanded the Princeſs) before you came hither? No Madam (anſwered Artamenes) our Acquaintance and our Averſion began together, at this Court, and almoſt at the very ſame Minute: But Madam, it befits not me to ask what moved you to deſire that I ſhould love Philidaſpes: It is the Duty of Artamenes only to ask Pardon for not obeying you. As I ſeldom uſe to make unjuſt Requeſts (replied ſhe) ſo I am not uſed to be denied; and I did not think that Artamenes and Philidaſpes would have been the firſt. My Maſter, ſeeing the Princeſs angry, was moſt extreamly ſenſible of it: Ah Madam (ſaid he to her) if I had thought I could not revenge my ſelf without incenſing you, doubtleſs I had never done it: But Madam, is there no hope to obtain a pardon for that Crime which was not voluntary? Is the Princeſs Mandana more inexerable than the Gods, who are indulgent to all repentant Tears and Prayers? The Princeſs who did really eſteem Artamenes very much, and had already entertained ſome diſpoſition to love him; ſhe ſeeing him much troubled, was afraid leſt her being more ſevere than Ciaxares, ſhould offend him; ſo that, overruling her own ſelf, ſhe reſolved to qualify him, and freely pardon him: Well Artamenes (ſaid ſhe to him) the inquietude of your own Soul does ſufficiently puniſh you; and I will inflict no other Penance upon you, but that you do not any more expoſe your ſelf unto any more Dangers. Ah Madam, ſaid he to her, your Goodneſs is Divine in pardoning me; but it is very rigorous that you ſhould impoſe it upon me, to be indulgent unto him who oppoſeth himſelf againſt all my Deſires. I promiſe you (ſaid ſhe to him) that if Philidaſpes do prefer any thing unto the King which may be prejudicial unto you, I will take your part againſt him. No Madam (replied Artamenes) there is nothing I can crave of the King; I have received more from him than I can deſire, and if Philidaſpes do contend with me for nothing but Recompenſes we ſhall never fall out again; and for what elſe, replied the Princeſs, can he diſpute with you about? At theſe words, Artamenes being much plunged, could not chuſe but bluſh, and looking moſt paſſionately upon the Princeſs, I think he would have diſcovered part of his deepeſt Secrets unto her, if the King had not come into the Room: Mandana, who had a moſt admirable Wit, and having exactly obſerved all the Actions of Artamenes, took eſpecial notice of his troubled Soul, yet ſince the King was there, ſhe could not poſſibly make any long reflection thereupon. Ciaxares, after much other Diſcourſe, told her how it was his abſolute pleaſure, that Artamenes and Philidaſpes ſhould for the time to come live lovingly together; and to that end, he would have Artamenes accompany him in a Walk which he intended to take; and that as they paſſed by the Door of Philidaſpes, they would in paſſing by, viſit him, becauſe Aribeus deſired as much, and then he would cauſe them to embrace each other. Artamenes would gladly have ſtayed behind; but Ciaxares obſerving his repugnancy, told him that Conquerors ought not to keep at ſuch diſtances with their Enemies conquered; moreover he would have the Princeſs take this walk, and viſit, ſhe ſhould be his Uſher, and thereby make the buſineſs more handſome and advatageous for him. When the Princeſs ſaw the Kings deſire, ſhe refuſed not, and indeed ſhe thought ſhe ought not to be any hindrance unto ſuch an Accommodation. As for Artamenes, he ſeemed much vexed at it, and did obey with much adoe; for, as he reſented it, it was a very croſs Adventure to agree with Philidaſpes, and go unto him, and alſo to be conducted thither by the Princeſs her ſelf: yet ſince he ſaw there was no remedy, he reſolved upon it. The King and the Princeſs took their Coaches, and went out of the Town, for Philidaſpes was not yet returned into it, by reaſon of his Hurts. After they had took the Air and ended their walk, they came unto the place where he was: The King diſcourſed in a low Voice privately with Mandana, at the foot of the Stairs a long while: Mean time, my Maſter addreſſed himſelf unto Marteſia, but ſo diſturbedly, his Mind and his Countenance ſo altered, that he was ſcarce knowable. Marteſia, who perceived it, could not chuſe but chide him, telling him that his Hatred was too violent, and that if he knew as well how to love as to hate, his Friendſhip were the moſt excellent Jewel in the World. Doubt it not, Marteſia, ſaid he, and if ever I love, I ſhall love more violently than I hate Philidaſpes. You make me very inquiſitive, ſaid ſhe to him in a low Voice. And I extreamly deſire to know, whether or no you do love, and who it is you love? I cannot (replied he bluſhing) ſatisfy the half of your Curioſity; it not being juſt that I ſhould tell you that which I never told unto any, and perhaps never will. As they were thus diſcourſing, the King and Princeſs ended theirs; and my Maſter was obliged to preſent his Hand unto the Princeſs, who eaſily had obſerved the turbulency in Artamenes Mind. The King found Philidaſpes that Day in a good condition, but ſo ſurprized at the ſight of Artamenes in his Chamber, that his Wounds began to open, and bleed afreſh, at the ſight of him who made them, ſuch was the violent agitation of his Reſentments. Ciaxares, to prevent the like Reſentments in Artamenes, told him that he would have them embrace each other. The violent diſpoſition of Philidaſpes, upon this occaſion, had much adoe to contain it ſelf: Yet ſeeing the King was peremptory, and would have it ſo, and that the Princeſs complained of him, alſo all the Court being preſent, he recalled himſelf and obeyed. Mandana then cauſing Artamenes to come nearer, and telling him that it was the part of him who was moſt in health, to come the greater part of the way, and indeed ſhe did gently puſh him forwards towards Philidaſpes, who embracing him by force, told him that Kings ought to be obeyed in their own Dominions. You have good reaſon for it, anſwered my Maſter, and upon the ſame ground I do as the King and the Princeſs commands me. Whoſoever, Sir, did well obſerve the motions of theſe two gallant Strangers, might eaſily diſcover that there was ſome great Secret which did lie at the Heart, but none could know what it was. This Viſit laſted not long, but whilſt it continued, Artamenes was always looking upon Mandana, or elſe upon Philidaſpes, who for his part was ſo quaſht that he almoſt looked upon no Body. The King being retired, and the Princeſs following, both returned to the Pallace, where Mandana was no ſooner arrived, but ſhe had no diſpoſition to ſee any one. As for Artamenes he ſtayed yet with the King, but with ſo much reſtleſsneſs that he could not ſtay there long, therefore he alſo returned unto his Chamber. He was no ſooner there, but ruminating upon all the paſt Paſſages, he thought it no diſpleaſure, ſince he could pick ſome comfort out of it. Why, ſaid he, ſighing, muſt it not be permitted me to hate my Enemy? Will Mandana eternally contradict all my Inclinations? What hidden Intereſt can ſhe have in this Deſign which muſt oblige me to love Philidaſpes, and Philidaſpes to love me? Is it only a bare Deſign to preſerve the Lives of two Men whom ſhe thinks are not unprofitable unto the Service of the King her Father? Or elſe becauſe, having ſome particular eſteem of Philidaſpes, ſhe would take off from him an Enemy; who by all treatable means would not be reconciled? and under pretence of treating us equally, ſhe has ſome unequal biaſſed Thoughts of us: But alas, (ſaid he) why ſhould I be ſo unjuſt, as to interpret the Actions and Words of my Princeſs in ſuch a Sence? She who ever did treat me well, what can I in reaſon complain of? Can Artamenes, as Artamenes, ask any thing of the Princeſs of Cappadocia, which he has not already obtained? She has highly commended me; ſhe has treated me with all Civility; ſhe freely honours me with her Diſcourſe without diſdain; ſhe has offered to be his Advocate unto the King; ſhe has taken care of his Life; when he offended, ſhe procured his Pardon, and indeed, there is nothing which the illuſtrious Mandana does not do for Artamenes; But alas, although Artamenes be contented as Artamenes, yet Cyrus is nothing ſatisfied as Cyrus: This Artamenes, ſaid he, whom the Princeſs thus favours, is not he whom I wiſh ſhe would favour: Artamenes ſeems to affect nothing but War; he aims all at Honour and Glory; but he whom I would have her know and favour, loves nothing but Mandana, and ſeeks for nothing but her affection. Sir, (ſaid I to him, for I was cloſe by him when he thus diſcours'd with himſelf aloud and all alone) How can this amorous Artamenes be in any hopes to be favoured as you deſire, if Mandana do not know him? Would you, Sir, have the moſt vertuous and glorious Princeſs of the World to love you, before ſhe knows ſo much as that you love her? And would you, replied Artamenes, have this moſt glorious and vertuous Princeſs endure that I only as Artamenes ſhould ſpeak unto her upon terms of Love? No, Sir, (ſaid I) but Artamenes is Cyrus: This is reaſon (replied he) but is there not as much danger in appearing Cyrus, as Artamenes? As Artamenes, ſhe will perhaps only put me off with a little pitty, but as Cyrus ſhe will puniſh me with hatred and anger: But however, anſwered I, if you will ever be beloved, you muſt ſome way or other let her know you love her, otherwiſe you will never bring it to paſs: Though you ſhould gain a hundred Battels, and conquer as many Kingdoms and Empires, after all your Victories and Conqueſts you will never triumph in the Heart of Mandana, unleſs you make Mandana know that ſhe triumphs in yours. Love, Sir, can never be gotten without Love: The Princeſs will commend you; ſhe will eſteem you, but never love you: for indeed, Sir, all your great Acts which you have performed, relates only unto your ſelf; the conqueſt of your own Heart is that which belongs to her, and which will only pleaſe her: If you deſire that your Victories ſhould become ſerviceable unto you, let her know that ſhe hath vanquiſhed the Conqueror of them all; and that he whom none could reſiſt, is captivated by her Charms and Beauty. But Feraulas (ſaid he to me) how dare I ſpeak to her of it? and how can I chuſe but be affrighted at the anger of a Lady whoſe Modeſty is extream? and whoſe Vertue is ſevere even to the very height of Rigour? I do not ſay, Sir, replied I, that it is convenient to ſpeak unto the Princeſs downright and openly of Love; but only to give her ſuch an eaſy taſte as that ſhe may gueſs at the reſt: But if in gueſſing at it (replied he) ſhe ſhould chance to hate me, what would then become of me? Fear it not (replied I) and know Sir for certain, that Love was never the cauſe of Hatred: Mandana may perhaps command you to be ſilent; and perhaps ſhe may reject you, but ſhe cannot hate you for loving her: The manner, Sir, of making her to underſtand it, may indeed be ſomething dangerous; and therefore in diſcovering your Love unto her, you muſt not hint a word of your being beloved; you muſt not ask any thing, nor hope nor pretend unto the leaſt favour; only comfort your ſelf in making your diſeaſe known unto her who is the cauſe of it; and as long as you carry it only ſo, Sir, believe me, it is hard for her to hate you, let her Vertue be never ſo ſevere: Indeed, ſaid I, as long as Mandana does not know you love her, it is a queſtion whether ever ſhe will love you; yet on the contrary, if you let her gueſs at your Paſſion, perhaps in ſpight of all her Rigour ſhe will love you: But Feraulas, ſaid he to me, what if ſhe ſhould baniſh me? No, no, (ſaid I to him) never fear any ſuch rough Treatment: So many great Actions as you have done, will plead unto her in your behalf, ſo that ſhe cannot be ſo inhumane, and if I be not extreamly deceived, the buſineſs will work better than you imagine. So, Sir, after this manner, a good part of the night was ſpent in reaſoning upon the matter between Artamenes and me: Artamenes reſolved to find ſome fit opportunity of making his Paſſion known unto the Princeſs, without any point-blank expreſſions of it: But alas, whilſt we were hamering out this Reſolution, Mandana took a quite contrary courſe to our Expectations, and defeated our Plot.

I told you, Sir, how ſhe retired into her melancholy Cloſet, whither ſhe was no ſooner entred, but ſhe called for her confident Marteſia, and asked her what Artamenes ſaid unto her, whilſt ſhe was ſpeaking with the King her Father in the entrance into Philidaſpes his Houſe? for ſhe had an Eye upon them when they diſcourſed: This Lady was obedient, and told her word for word all the Diſcourſe; and adding her own Thoughts unto thoſe of my Maſter; for my part, Madam (ſaid ſhe to the Princeſs) conſidering the manner how Artamenes anſwered me, when I deſired to know whether or no he was in love, and whom he loved; I do verily think he is in love. Mandana bluſh'd at the word, for ſhe her ſelf began already to ſuſpect ſome ſuch thing: But ſhe being deſirous to pump the Thoughts of Marteſia without diſcovering her own: With whom (asked ſhe) do you think it is that he is in love, with me? Madam (anſwered Marteſia) I have thought ſo ever ſince; though my own reaſon could not abſolutely conſent unto it: For truly, Artame- nes viſits not any ſolicitouſly, he does not ſo much as ſpeak unto any of my Companions, but only as far as common Civility requires: he paſſes away all the day with the King or you; and if Artamenes were of any other quality than he is, he might eaſily be ſuppoſed to be in love. For, Madam (ſaid ſhe to her, quaking a little) Artamenes looks upon none but you, nor ſpeaks unto any elſe; he commends you, he eſteems you, and it may almoſt be directly ſaid he adores you. He follows you to the Temple; he walks, he hunts with you, and waits upon you to all publick Feaſts: when the King your Father comes to you, he is ſure to come with him; and though the King comes not, yet he never fails: He bluſhes as oft as he comes near you, or when you are alone where he is. Indeed ſaid ſhe, laughing, If Artamenes were a King, or the Princeſs Mandana, Marteſia, I ſhould believe he were in love with her: I think (ſaid the Princeſs, interrupting her) that Artamenes has done you ſome ill office or other, for if you ſhould perſwade me of the truth of what you tell me, you may well conceive he can never be happy, nor could you ever find out a worſe way to be revenged of him. I ſhould be very ſorry, Madam (replied Marteſia, aſſuming a more ſerious Look) to be a cauſe of any ill unto Artamenes: But as your intereſts are more dear unto me, Madam, than his; I thought it my Duty to tell you, that I knew not whether it were not worth your pains, Madam, to obſerve his Actions, ſome certain days, that my doubts might be made more clear unto you. The Princeſs bluſht at this diſcourſe more than ſhe did before; and leſſening her Voice, as if ſhe were afraid, that Marteſia, unto whom ſhe ſpoke, ſhould hear her; As you are wiſe and diſcreet (ſaid ſhe to her) I confeſs that ſince this Morning, I have had ſome ſuſpicion of what you ſay, and I am poſſeſſed with ſuch confuſed Thoughts, leſt Artamenes ſhould diſcover any of his Folly, as I cannot expreſs my ſelf; for truly in one minute I have obſerved a hundred things which before I took no notice of; or to expreſs my ſelf better, I look upon them after another manner than I did before. Do you remember Marteſia, the firſt day he ſaw me, after he had ſaved the Life of the King my Father? did you not then think that he looked upon me with an extraordinary obſervant Eye, and full of Paſſion, how alſo he did not ſo much as look upon any one of thoſe Beauties which were then in my company? have you not forgot, after what a faſhion he deſired me to obtain permiſſion from the King, to fight with his Enemies, and after what a manner he took his leave of me? Did you not further obſerve him when I deſired him not to wear thoſe remarkable Arms? Did you not ſee, I ſay, after what kind of odd manner he denied me? and with what an amiable air he asked the Scarf which I refuſed? In what terms he did interpret it, when I told him, I wiſht Artamenes would neither be too prudent, nor too raſh? It is not poſſible, Madam (ſaid he to me) that I can regulate my Thoughts, according to that which you deſire. Do you not remember alſo ſince the day that Philidaſpes and he came together to bid me adieu? For my part I do now admire that I ſhould at that time interpret the inquietudes which I then ſaw in his Face no better: Do you not yet further remember the Joy which appeared in the Eyes of Artamenes at his return? and alſo that converſe which you had with him and Philidaſpes? But above all the reſt, (ſaid ſhe) do you remember what were the Reſentments of Artamenes when I would have obliged him to love Philidaſpes? For my part (ſaid Marteſia, interrupting her) I think, Madam, by all which you have remembred, and by a thouſand other trivial paſſages, which I have particularly obſerved, and which you could not ſee, that Artamenes is not only in love, but that he is alſo jealous of Philidaſpes; and that perhaps, Philidaſpes is in love with you as well as Artamenes. You are not too wiſe (ſaid the Princeſs to her) to let me hear of too many Injuries at once: No Marteſia, no, Philidaſpes is only ambitious, and for my own quiet's ſake I would not ſuſpect him of any other humour; That would be too many Crimes to puniſh, eſpecially for one who loves not to inflict any Puniſhments at all; therefore let us not think upon any but Artamenes: But for that (ſaid ſhe) ſome handſom order muſt be taken; and if it be poſſible, I muſt prevent receiving ſuch a ſenſible diſpleaſure, for indeed I do eſteem Artamenes very much; I have many Obligations upon me to him, and I ſhould be very ſorry to be put unto any neceſſity of treating him ill: Therefore Marteſia, I command you to be continually near me, and cauſe all the reſt of your Companions to be ſo alſo; and leave me not alone at any time; It cannot now be long before he depart, and the time of drawing into the Field comes on, therefore this conſtraint will not continue long. After this ſhe diſmiſſed Marteſia, and remained alone in her Cloſet; But O Heavens! what vexing and tyrannical Thoughts did toſs her Mind? that ſmooth Tranquility which heretofore was Regent in her Mind, did now no more viſit her turbulent Soul; yet ſhe continued in that Reſolution which ſhe fixed upon with Marteſia. You may judge then, Sir, how difficult it was for Artamenes to execute his deſign of diſcovering his Paſſion unto the Princeſs, ſince ſhe had obſtructed all thoſe ways which formerly were wont to be open. For three Weeks together, it was carried ſo handſomly, that he did not think Mandana to be at all acceſſary to it; he rather thought it to be unlucky chance which cauſed it: yet, as oft as he bethought himſelf of how many favourable Opportunities he had let ſlip, maugre the aſſiduity of Philidaſpes, he was almoſt in abſolute deſpair: But when he bethought himſelf again, how that it was not now Philidaſpes who prevented the execution of his deſign reſolved upon, he thought it then only the Malignity of his Deſtiny: But ſo it was, that he was not long without this obſtacle alſo; for within twenty days after, the King and the Princeſs did viſit Philidaſpes; he came to preſent his Thanks, and to take up the ſame room about Mandana as he was accuſtomed before; therefore Marteſia was not ſo much neceſſitated to attendance; and now Artamenes did quite deſpair of ever getting an occaſion to diſcourſe particularly with his Princeſs. There paſſed many general Diſcourſes, wherein Mandana did let Artamenes know, how dangerous a Deſign his was to talk of any Love; for though it was but in Speeches by the by, addreſſed unto another, yet ſhe ſo explained her Thoughts, as he could not chuſe but think, they related unto him, conſidering the method and decorum of her Words, and therefore he concluded, that to diſcover his Paſſion unto the Princeſs, were to expoſe himſelf unto danger: The difficulty which he reſented, and had not foreſeen, cauſed in him moſt ſenſible Sorrow; and it might well be ſaid, though his Tongue was tied, and did not ſpeak of any Love unto the Princeſs, yet all his Actions ſpoke plainly for him; ſo that as I knew ſince by Marteſia, his dumb eloquence was well underſtood: and the Princeſs did interpret his Perplexities, his Melancholy, his Impatience, the alteration in his Countenance, and his Muſings, as they ought to be; ſo that ſhe doubted not at all but Artamenes was paſſionately in love with her. Here, Sir, may be admired, how fallible is all humane Prudence; for if my Maſter had then ſpoke unto the Princeſs of any Love, conſidering how things then ſtood, he had irrecoverably been undone; for then ſhe would have ever treated him but badly; and doubtleſs would have for ever baniſhed him from her; notwithſtanding all the eſteem ſhe had of him, and notwithſtanding all the great Services he had done unto the King her Father: But becauſe he ſpoke not a word of it unto her, yet patiently endured, and ſtill had her in amorous reverence, the Princeſs had pity of him, and whether ſhe would or no, did entertain into her Heart, ſuch a tenderneſs of him, as might perhaps be phraſed Love; not that this vertuous Princeſs did think it ſo, for if ſo, doubtleſs ſhe had ſurmounted her ſelf whatſoever came of it; nor that ſhe did with any heed obſerve her ſelf; but becauſe Love carries with it ſuch a blinding Quality, as that the cleareſt Judgments cannot look about them, and which hinders them who are poſſeſſed with it both from knowing others, and themſelves alſo. Sometimes ſhe would ask her ſelf many odd Queſtions, which ſhe her ſelf would not preciſely anſwer: She would oftentimes wonder, that Artamenes whether ſhe would or not, ſhould come into her Thoughts; and why ſince ſhe knew of his Love, ſhe ſhould not be more angry. Why (ſaid ſhe unto her ſelf) ſhould I permit a Man who goes into the Court but as a common ordinary Cavalier, to love me, and I endure his Sight and Company? Ah no, no Mandana, this ſtrict ſevere Vertue, whereof you make profeſſion, muſt not endure it; And though 'tis true, that Love can never be without hope, yet it befits me to puniſh Artamenes for his Raſhneſs and Folly, for what can he ever hope for, without a wrong unto me? what can he deſire without extravagancy? and what can he ask me, without offence? But alas, ſaid ſhe, he has told me nothing that does anger me, nor indeed ought to anger me: he asks me nothing which can diſpleaſe me: I owe unto him the Life of the King my Father; and the King owes many Victories unto him; and perhaps I owe unto him, the Joy of my days, ſince it is to be believed, that the King of Pontus would have been victorious but for him; and then, I ſhould either have been his Wife or his Priſoner; Let me not therefore hate Artamenes becauſe he loves me; and ſince he ſpeaks nothing to me of his Love, let not me ſpeak any thing unto him of my Anger. Alas (ſaid ſhe ſometimes unto Marteſia) why ſhould Artamenes have any ſuch Thoughts in his Mind? why does he not keep within the limits of a good Eſteem? For my part, Madam, (ſaid Marteſia to her) I think you know not well what you ſay; nor I cannot imagine what kind of Vertue that is, which takes up your Soul, and had rather that Artamenes ſhould not love you at all, than that he ſhould love you as he does, as long as he does not ſpeak of it unto you. You put me very much to it Marteſia, (replied the Princeſs) yet notwithſtanding I will tell you, that I do ſo much eſteem Artamenes, as in conſideration of himſelf I ought always for his own Tranquilities ſake, to wiſh that he were not in love with me: I know indeed, Madam, (replied Marteſia) that in conſideration of himſelf, you ought to wiſh his Tranquility, but I know alſo very well, that in conſideration of your ſelf, the ſame is in ſome ſort advantagious to you, to ſee the gallanteſt Man of the World, and the moſt accompliſhed in all things, to eſteem and love you, even to the height of Adoration. I doubt not (replied Mandana) it is honourable unto me; and I muſt tell you, that Honour is it which I prefer before all the Earth; but, Marteſia, I would have him keep within the Limits of Eſteem, and obſerve ſuch a Friendſhip, as a Man of his Condition ought to keep unto one of mine. Tell me, Madam, I conjure you, (ſaid Marteſia) whether it would pleaſe you, that Artamenes, who loves you ſo well, ſhould love any other better than he does you? Indeed, you put me into a Dilemma, (replied the Princeſs); but I always thought, that tho Artamenes eſteemed me more than any in the World, yet I would not care if he did love me a little leſs. Ah, Madam, (replied Marteſia) you abuſe your ſelf; and one cannot have that Indifferency to the Affection of thoſe whoſe eſteem they deſire: Indeed, Madam, it would be a great wrong to you, that he, who of all Men in the World has moſt Spirit and Judgment, ſhould not eſteem you moſt of all the Earth. Pray, Madam, what does the illuſtrious Artamenes want? A Crown (replied the Princeſs, bluſhing) and let that ſuffice, Marteſia, to make me fear the Paſſion of any Man who is not a King, and to hold all his future Actions in ſuſpition, and indeed to make me more than my ſelf; for truly (ſaid ſhe) I have an Enemy which holds ſecret Intelligence in my Heart, and bids me love him, if one invincible Remora were removed; which doubtleſs does forbid me Artamenes, and all his high Accompliſhments, and cauſes me, maugre his Love, his Merit, and my own Reſentments, to keep my own Liberty entire.

Thus, Sir, was the ſtate of Things at that time; Artamenes was deep in Love, and durſt not tell: Philidaſpes was no leſs amorous, nor leſs cloſe, being for divers Reaſons engaged to diſguiſe his Thoughts: Ciaxares loved them both, but Artamenes incomparably more than Philidaſpes: And Mandana, though ſhe knew it not, did doubtleſs love my Maſter a little, and eſteem Philidaſpes, although his humorous Diſpoſition did much leſſen it.

At this time the Son unto the King of Armenia, called Tygranes, came to the Court of Cappadocia: A great League of Friendſhip ſprung between him and Artamenes. Mean time, the Spring approaching, certain Intelligence was brought, that the Confederate Kings had already drawn their Armies into the Field. This News haſted on all the New Levies, and all requiſite Orders were given to prepare all things in readineſs to receive the Enemy in a ſhort time: One Brigade of the Army was already in the plain of Ceracia; yet in all likelyhood it was not in any condition to reſiſt the King of Pontus, and the King of Phrygia, although they were advangiouſly entrenched. Now ſee, Artamenes conſtrained to depart, and to depart, without power to reveal that he loved; this was no ſmall diſguſt unto him. He went in all haſte to take leave of the Princeſs, becauſe ſecond Intelligence came, which aſſured Ciaxares that this Army was ready to be ſhut up, between the King of Pontus's Forces, and a puiſſant Recruit come out of Phrygia in a few days; ſo that my Maſter, not having time to ſtay a minute, leſt he ſhould come too late, was forced to depart abruptly, and to lock up all his Paſſion in his Heart; yet for all that it appeared plain enough in his Eyes, and he ſignified it ſufficiently unto the Princeſs by his Sorrows. Go, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him, in bidding him adieu) and be as happy as you have been; if you will oblige the King, my Father, have not a greater care to vanquiſh his Enemies, than to preſerve your own Life. Mandane ſpoke this before all the People, ſo that Artamenes durſt return her no other Anſwer, than as all the reſt there did; that was, with much reverence and acknowledgment: then he left her, without any further explaining himſelf, than by ſtolen Looks, and reſtrained Sighs, half cut off in the middle as ſoon as they were breathed. As for Philidaſpes, his turn was not yet to go, for he was to command thoſe Troops which were not yet in readineſs. But my Maſter went, and was followed by all the young Gallantry of the Court; who upon this Occaſion, which in all appearance was like to be full of Danger, did ſet out themſelves in the braveſt Equipage: The Prince Ty- granes would needs be one, and ranked himſelf among the Volunteers, of whom he was Chief. We made all poſſible haſte; but ſince Artamenes was not throughly informed concerning the Enemies, and how they lay, when we came within fifty Furlongs of the Plain of Ceracia, he ſent out Chriſantes with a Party of ten or twelve only, to enquire of News, and to know whether all the Paſſes were open or ſhut, and whether the Army was incloſed between the King of Pontus, and thoſe Auxiliaries from Phrygia: Mean time he made a halt, at a ſmall uninhabited Village, where they might defend themſelves, in caſe the Enemies Scouts came upon them: We found hid, among the old Ruins of the Town, ſome poor Peaſants, who told us for certain, that the confederated Kings had two mighty Armies; and that if our Army were not hemmed in, it would be preſently.

Artamenes finding the ſtate of the War, to ſtand upon as bad Terms as the ſtate of his Love, was vexed beyond all expreſſion. He could not endure to hear that thoſe Enemies which he had formerly conquered, ſhould now be in a likely condition to conquer. He abſolutely reſolved to die a thouſand Deaths, rather than to ſurvive a Defeat. No, no, (ſaid he in himſelf) I cannot ever look the Princeſs in her fair Face after a being beat; and if ill Fortune will needs have it ſo, that I muſt be beaten, then there is no way but to prepare for Death: I (I ſay) who after all my great Victories, durſt never approach her Preſence but with trembling; nor ever had ſo much confidence, after I had conquered Kings, to let her know I was her Slave. But (O Heavens) muſt I die, and Mandana not know that I die for her? And can I not have ſo much ſad Conſolation, as to hope, that ſhe ſhall not be ignorant of all thoſe Torments that I have endured ſince the firſt time I ſaw her? Perhaps, when ſhe underſtands my Love, by hearing of my Death, that the knowledg of it will not then incenſe her Soul, but eaſily pardon a Man, who in loſing his Life, did not loſe his Devotions to her: Let me tell her then by my Death, that I lived not but for her. And to leſſen my Crime, let me acquaint her with my Condition, though not abſolutely to know who I am; it will be enough ſhe know that Artamenes is o Royal Extract, without knowing that Cyrus and Artam nes are the ſame; Let me not be my ſelf the Obſtacl which ſhall hinder her from that compaſſion which I expect from her Goodneſs, nor ſtop thoſe Tears which hope will flow from the tenderneſs of her Heart. I kno well enough, (ſaid he) that the Delights of the Grav are leaſt ſenſible; but however, if I loſe the Battel, an my Life, I ſhall more delightingly loſe them both, by virtue of this Hope, and I ſhall murmur leſs at the rigou of my Deſtiny.

This thought, Sir, did ſo flatter his Deſpair, tha preſently he ſet himſelf to write unto the Princeſs, and to diſcover that unto her which he had ſo long ſo carefully concealed. After he had writ, and read, and overread the Letter, he ſealed it; and calling me in privat Feraulas (ſaid he to me) you muſt do me a piece of very important Service, and do it with all poſſible exactneſs. Sir, ſaid I to him, I ſhould eſteem my ſelf ver happy, if I could find that which I have ſo long looke for, and would gladly make you know my Zeal unto you Service. You may doubtleſs, (ſaid he) but I fear tha the Courage of Feraulas will fail and deny me, and ſhall have much ado to perſwade him not to fight at thi time. I confeſs, Sir, (ſaid I to him) I cannot eaſil conceive, what it is you would command me; and it is hard task for me, not to partake of that danger unt which you expoſe your ſelf. Yet it muſt be ſo, (ſaid h to me) conſider me either as your Maſter, your Princ or your Friend, and deny me no more: You know (ſai he, with abundance of ſweetneſs) that I am very we acquainted with the couragious Heart of Feraulas, and need no more Teſtimonies of his Valour; therefore le not that trouble you, and believe it, you can never in a your Life ſo much oblige me, as you may at this time though indeed I might perhaps command you to do wha I deſire, yet upon this occaſion I will earneſtly entrea you. At theſe words I was not able to endure any longer; Sir, (ſaid I to him) you make me wonder extreamly, therefore I beſeech you defer no longer, but te me preſently what I muſt do that I may as preſently obey you. You muſt not fight at all, my dear Feraulas, (ſaid he) but always keep in that Quarter which is freeſt from any danger, and there expect the event of the Fight, which we intend ſhall be preſently : If ſo it chance that I fall, and die, as certainly I will if I be vanquiſhed, then go in all haſte,and carry this Letter unto Mandana ; and let her ſay what ſhe will, tell her not that I am Cyrus: you may declare my Quality, but not directly the place of my Birth ; This is all, my dear Feraulas, that I would have you do, and fail me not I conjure you ; be as faithful to me in this Buſineſs as ever you have wont to be. Sir, (ſaid I to him) with Tears in my Eyes, this is moſt cruel, that I ſhould receive a Command, which I muſt not execute till after your death : But I hope, Sir, Fortune will ordain it otherwiſe. I wiſh it may, (anſwered he) but it is not likely : Yet however, do not you fail in that which I deſire you, ſaid he, embracing me, and teſtifying unto me, that there is no Service ſo difficult, which you will not perform for me. I promiſed him, Sir, to do all I could ; and how could I deny a Prince that was extreamly troubled, and in Love, and alſo ſtaggering in his Reſolutions ?

Preſently after, Chriſantes returned, and brought two Priſoners with him which he had taken, and who told Artamenes that the King of Phrygia's Army would not come up until the next day ; and that the King of Pontus his Army, in which was the King of Phrygia himſelf, would decline fighting until the other Army was joined with it, and then they would infallibly ſurround the Cappadocian Army, and between them both, hem it in. Artamenes was very glad of the News ; and to underſtand from Chriſantes, how he had diſcovered a Paſs which the Enemies did not guard, where he might eaſily convey his Men.

Chriſantes had no ſooner brought this Intelligence, but we immediately took Horſe, and marched with ſo much haſte, and ſo happily, that Night favouring our Deſign, and concealing our Motion, we came unto the Camp undiſcovered, or meeting any. I will not ſtand to tell you, Sir, how great was the Joy of all the Officers and Souldiers when they ſaw Artamenes, him whom they looked upon as a God, and believed invincible. As ſoon as he arrived, he took a view of the Army, which he found not to exceed the number of ſixteen thouſand Men: So that though indeed theſe Troops were the beſt of all Cappadocia, yet Artamenes thought himſelf very hard put to it; for the King of Pontus's Army, which had quitted their Trenches and Gariſons, and whoſe Van-guard was within ſight of my Maſter's Army, conſiſting of 20000 Men; and thoſe which were to join with them were fifteen thouſand Men effectual. Finding himſelf brought unto this Extremity, and ſuppoſing that his Enemy would force him to fight, before Ciaxares could be advertiſed of it, he reſolved upon as bold an Enterprize as ever any did. Beſides thoſe Reaſons which I have already declared, he had one more, which in my Opinion was of no ſmall conſideration: He knew that Philidaſpes would exaſperate the King to make all haſte, and would come with all thoſe Regiments which were ready to march; but Artamenes would not ſuffer him to have ſo much advantage as to engage himſelf in ſo great a Danger.

After ſerious conſideration of the Buſineſs, he call'd a Council of War: But the Opinion of Artemenes was always the Reſolution of every One; and how hard and difficult ſoever, it found no contradiction: He told all the Commanders, that if they were once ſurrounded by the King of Pontus, and the King of Phrygia's Armies, there would be no ſafety for them, but if poſſible they muſt fight them ſeverally: That if they ſhould fall upon the King of Pontus's Army firſt, it was to be feared that the Enemy would decline it, and delay until the Phrygian Army came up, whilſt we were buſied with them, and ſo infallibly defeat us: That if we ſhould ſtay ſtill in our Trenches, and relie upon Relief, doubtleſs they would be forced out before Ciaxares could come to them: So that conſidering the ſtate of all things, the beſt courſe was to fall upon the Phrygian Army, unperceived by the King of Pontus; and that to be effected according as he had already contrived: That our Army being more in number than theirs, and theirs tired out with a tedious March, they might eaſily be defeated; after which, perhaps we ſhould be upon even Terms to fight the King of Pontus: So, Sir, all that Artamenes propounded, was approved of and followed. He ſent out a Party to ſtop that Paſs where the Phrygian Army was to march: And being certainly inform'd, that this very Night they would encamp ſome thirty Furlongs off; as ſoon as Night came on, he and his Army began to march ſilently, without either Trumpet, Drum, or any noiſe; and left in his own Camp, only a ſmall Guard, ſome hangers on, and ſuch as could not fight, commanding them, that as ſoon as he was a pretty way off, they ſhould kindle many Fires, thereby to deceive the Enemy, and to take away all ſuſpicion of his Enterprize from the King of Pontus. I ſtaid, Sir, in the Camp againſt my Will, with an abſolute Command from Artamenes, that if I ſaw him not return the next Morning, then to go preſently unto Sinope, and acquit my ſelf of my Charge: Not, Sir, that you ſhould think, a Camp wherein almoſt none were, was a place of any Security; but becauſe Artamenes had hopes his Deſign would ſucceed, but if it did not, then I might more eaſily and ſafely retire as ſoon as I heard of his Death: Yet, Sir, though I went not with my Maſter, I knew all the Paſſages of this dangerous Adventure: But not to forget any thing which I ſaw, let me tell you how Artamenes before his departure did encourage his Officers and Souldiers; how he embraced them, flattered them, commended them; and promiſed mighty Matters to them.

'Now is the time, my dear Companions, (ſaid he to 'them) when I muſt remember you of your ancient 'Vertues, and bid you fight with as much fury, as if all 'the World were Spectators of your Actions: I cannot 'now look upon your Valour, neither will this dark 'Night let me ſhew you what you ſhould do by my own 'Example: I cannot exaſperate you by my Voice, 'ſince our Deſign is to ſurprize an Enemy in the obſcurity of Night, and vanquiſh them before they awake:

‘ wake: your ſelves muſt be the only Witneſſes of your ‘ own Valour and Fidelity. Never think that Darkneſs
‘ can cover, either our Valour or our Cowardize, it ‘ will be known do what we can: The Victory of our ‘ Enemies, if they get it, will teſtify what you do. And ‘ on the contrary, when I ſee your hands full of bloody ‘ Spoils of dead Phrygians, to morrow at the break of ‘ Day, and all their Enſigns broken, then ſhall I teſtify ‘ on your behalfs what you have done: Theſe are the ‘ Signs, my Friends, which muſt ſpeak your Actions;
‘ and theſe are the Marks by which you ſhall know my ‘ own Valour.

After theſe words, all the Commanders and Souldiers did lift up their Spears and Swords to teſtify their Approbation, and by a ſilent kind of confuſed Noiſe, did aſſure my Maſter that they would punctually obey him. Then they began to march with all alacrity and ſpeed; and after he had put about him a white Scarf to be known by in the Dark of Night, they went upon this Expedition, without any other Arms than Spears and Swords, becauſe Bows and Arrows were uſeleſs in the Dark of Night. Artamenes was ſo fortunate as to find his Enemies faſt aſleep, which did not a little facilitate his Enterprize: Since they knew the King of Pontus's Army did wait upon ours, they could not dream how it was poſſible they ſhould be ſurprized; ſo that they ſlept ſecurely, without any fear of Quarters being beat up: Their firſt Guard did not fail in their Duty; but it was ſo quickly repelled, that before the Souldiers were awake, or could rank themſelves under their Colours, or get into any poſture of Defence, they were many of them killed. He who commanded theſe Forces was called Imbas, and was very valiant; he made it appear upon this occaſion that he was ſo, ſince notwithſtanding this Surprize and Diſorder of his Army, he had rallied a very conſiderable Body together, and did ſo gallantly entertain Artamenes, that for a while he was in hopes of Victory. The like was never heard of, as thoſe who were in the Combat did report; for after the firſt ſhock was over, wherein Artamenes had commanded all ſilence to be obſerved, he began to make himſelf known by his Voice, to the end he might encourage his Men: And as all did anſwer him in a triumphant and mortal Language, they made ſo great and terrible a Din, that the Enemy thought themſelves very ill informed, and gueſſed us to be at leaſt thirty thouſand Men. The Night, though dark, becauſe there was no Moon, yet not ſo obſcure by reaſon of a ſtarry Firmament, but one might perceive another: And in this gloomy Light, Artamenes failed not to keep good Order in that Combat, which was ſo full of Confuſion and Diſorder.

Artamen

As he found that there was yet a good cloſe Body to contend with, and which ſtoutly reſiſted him, he doubted whether Imbas, whom he knew to be a Man of Courage, and commanded this Army, could be found or no? but ſince he could not directly ſee how to aſſault him, he bethought himſelf of a Project which took effect: He ſpoke as loud as ever he could theſe words: If the Valiant Imbas would be victorious, why does he not come out and fight with Artamenes, and diſpute with him for the Victory in Perſon? This Language cauſed Imbas to come unto him with a drawn Sword: I did not think (ſaid he) I had ſuch an Illuſtrious Enemy ſo near me, nor ſo lawful an excuſe for my Defeat if it chance. At theſe words they fell to work, and fought, and often charged that none ſhould part them: but in concluſion, my Maſter being ſtronger, and more fortunate, he ſtruck the Sword of Imbas out of his Hand, and ſeizing upon his Bridle, threatned to kill him if he did not render himſelf: Imbas being in that condition, without more ado rendred himſelf; and Artamenes committing him to the Guard of four Souldiers, went to conſummate the Conqueſt which yet remained. The Cavalry of Artamenes trod the Phrygian Infantry under their Horſes Feet; and almoſt all the Cappadocian Infantry were become Cavalry; for in the Diſorder, as the Phrygians were taking Horſe, our Men killed them and got into their Saddles, riding their Horſes againſt their Maſters Friends: ſome exchanged their natural Sleep for an eternal Nap: others, half armed, defended themſelves as well as they could; ſome again took the advantage of the Night's Obſcurity, and fled for ſhame; others, without any Arms, did obſtinately diſpute for their Lives, and all in general was in a mighty confuſion. In concluſion, Sir, after two hours Diſpute Artamenes found none to fight with; and ſounding a Retreat, every one repaired to his Colours, and altogether returned to the Camp.

This Enterprize was ſo judiciouſly contrived, and ſo happily executed, that at break of Day I ſaw Artamenes return in the head of his Troops; who calling unto thoſe who guarded his Priſoner, ſuffered him to march by him. My Maſter held a Sword in his Hand which he had forced from one of his Enemies; and Imbas who knew it, aſſured him, that it was the Sword of his Lieutenant-General: Never was beheld a more magnificent Triumph than this; there was not a Captain nor Souldier which had not ſome Trophy of Victory in his Hands: Some had Phrygian Bucklers, others Sutes of bloody Arms; ſome Enſigns half broken, others whole bundles of Spears upon their Shoulders; ſome had the Heads of dead Souldiers, which they carried by the Hair, and a great number brought chained Priſoners: the Prince Tigranes had two Enſigns of his Enemies which he had forced from them; and there was not one but could ſhew an aſſured Mark that he was in Combat. When Artamenes ſaw them all, he was extreamly joy'd, he commended and cheriſhed them; and to make his Word good, he ſhewed them the General of their Enemies which he had taken Priſoner; alſo the Sword of their Lieutenant General which he had forced from him.

Artamenes was thus in his Triumphant Conceits, when News was brought, that there appeared about fifty Men on Horſes, from Sinope ſide: He ſent out a Party to diſcover who they were; but it was found to be Philidaſpes, who being envious at Artamenes's Honour, was come from Court without leave; and could not endure that his Rival ſhould be in any dangerous Adventure wherein he was not: yet I think, Sir, that he repented himſelf of his forwardneſs, when he underſtood that he was not to have any ſhare in that Victory which was got without him. He came unto Artamenes, when all the Commanders and Souldiers held their gallant Trophies in their Hands; and when he knew how Squares went by that Party which was ſent out to meet him, he had a mind to go no further, yet Civility would not permit him to return. My Maſter no ſooner ſaw him, but he was troubled; yet notwithſtanding there was never Man more ſweet and civil after a Victory than he, and he went to meet him: Judg, Philidaſpes (ſaid he to him) what we ſhould have done if you had been with us, ſeeing we have done thus much in your abſence. I know not (anſwered he) whether I ſhould have been partaker of your Glory; but I am ſure I ſhould have been a partaker of your Peril. There is enough of that yet, (replied Artamenes) ſince we have yet an Army of 20000 Men before us to fight with. The firſt Victory you have got, (anſwered Philidaſpes) is it not a certain Omen of a Second; and perhaps in participating of the Peril with you, I ſhall be no partaker of the Glory? We ſhall preſently ſee that, anſwered Artamenes, for I do not think it good to let our Enemy fortify himſelf before we fight him: We muſt make the beſt benefit we can of thoſe Favours which Fortune affords us; ſhe is a capricious Lady, and would not be ſlighted, and ſometimes withdraws her Favours for ever, if they be not taken when ſhe preſents them. You are better acquainted with her than I am, (anſwered Philidaſpes) who never yet received any good from her. Let us ſee (replied Artamenes, who was a little netled at this Diſcourſe) whether the Good or the Bad which I have received, hath brought me to that Acquaintance.

After this, turning towards the Commanders and Souldiers, and ſpeaking unto them with ſo much boldneſs, and ſuch pleaſant Eyes, as ſeemed a happy preſage.

'Certainly (ſaid he to them) my brave Compani'ons, Conquerors are never weary: Tell me, were ye
'not more weary before, than ſince you have vanquiſhed
'your Enemies? But my dear Companions, let us not ‘deceive our ſelves, for we have yet only begun to conquer, and we muſt ſecond that good beginning, as long as there is any to oppoſe us. Let not the Number of your Enemies affright you, for I can aſſure you, that we are more terrible to them than they ought to be to us: It being a more difficult task to fight with Souldiers accuſtomed to conquer, than with thoſe that never fought. The noiſe of our Victory has animated our Army, and fainted the Hearts of our Enemies: Fear and Terror has half defeated them before we come at them; and if my Conjectures do not much deceive me, this ſecond Victory will come at as eaſy a rate as the firſt: The preſence of the Valiant Philidaſpes will render it more facile; and Fortune which always favours bold and dangerous Enterpriſes, will not forſake us in this. Come on my brave Companions, let us go, for if you love Difficulties, you will never be without Honour; and if you expoſe your ſelves to Eaſe, you will never be in ſafety, but put your Enemies into a condition to be always as Thorns in your Sides.

As ſoon as Artamenes had ended his Oration, all the Officers and Souldiers did applaud the Reſolution he had taken: In purſuance whereof, he took a Muſter of his Army, to ſee how many he had loſt; and he found wanting only five hundred Men, though he had defeated ſixteen thouſand: After this he commanded them all to take a little Repoſe, and within two hours after to prepare for Combat: Mean while he treated Philidaſpes with all Civility. But as he would have the Report of this firſt Victory animate his Army, and be a Foundation for a Second; he ſent back to the King of Phrygia, Imbas his Lieutenant-General whom he had defeated, and took Priſoner, as I formerly told you; commanding the Herauld which was to conduct him, to tell that Prince how gallantly this valiant Man had defended himſelf; and had given ſuch a teſtimony of a noble Soul, during his Diſgrace, that he would not do him the diſpleaſure to keep him Priſoner during the Battel; nor deprive himſelf of that Honour to vanquiſh him the ſecond time, if good Fortune failed not. Philidaſpes hearing him ſay ſo, could not forbear contradicting him, and told him, that this Man might be made uſe of after the Battel, if the Succeſs ſhould not be fortunate. If we be overcome (replied Artamenes) we ſhall have no uſe of Priſoners, ſince then we ſhall be either dead or Priſoners our ſelves; and thoſe whom we have already taken, will then be releaſed in ſpight of our Teeths: And if we be Conquerors, (ſaid he) then all will be in our own Power. But it muſt be acknowledged (replied Philidaſpes) that you have given a valiant Man unto your Enemies. 'Tis true, replied Artamenes, but in giving that one, we have releaſed many which otherwiſe ſhould have guarded him. Yet ſo it was, Sir, that my Maſter did what he pleaſed, and Philidaſpes was ſilent.

Mean while the King of Pontus, and the King of Phrygia, were extreamly ſurprized, when at break of Day they were advertiſed in their Tents of the great Shouts of Joy which were heard in Artamenes his Army, and that many Phrygian Enſigns were ſeen there. Theſe Princes having ſeen the Fires in the Camps of their Enemies all the Night long, could not imagine how it was poſſible they ſhould fight, and defeat the Forces which they expected: Neither could they believe that Imbas would betray his King and Country, and take part with the Cappadocians. So that in their Uncertainties, they neither knew what to think or ſay: All the Captains and Souldiers were no leſs troubled; and altogether concluded that things went not well. But as they were ſending out to know what the Matter was, they ſaw Imbas arrive, who being moved by his own generoſity, and intending to excuſe his Defeat, by the Valour of his Enemies, did ſo much extol their Courage, and magnified Artamenes ſo highly, that he ſtruck Terror into the Souls of all who heard him. You have ſaid enough, (anſwered the King of Pontus) to take away the diſhonour of your Defeat, in ſaying it was Artamenes who overcame you. And it is enough (ſaid the King of Phrygia) to oblige us not to fly ſuch an Enemy, who if we be vanquiſhed by him, it is no diſhonour: Tell then Artamenes, (ſaid the King of Phrygia unto the Herauld) that we will prepare to receive him as he deſerves, and if we can, render him favour for favour, and endeavonr to be in that condition as at our return we ſhall ſend him Priſoners after the Battel. Mean while, Artamenes was reſolved to finiſh this War at this bout, and neglected nothing which might conduce to his Happineſs, he met not a Captain unto whom he did not promiſe ſome Recompence from the King: He never ſaw a common Souldier paſs by, whom he did not call by his name; and unto whom he did not beſtow ſome obliging Language: He did inſpire into them all both by his Words and by his Actions, ſuch an ardent deſire of Glory, that he was hardly able to reſtrain them, ſuch was his powerful Art to invite Mens Hearts, and make himſelf abſolute Maſter of their Minds.

After then all the Troops had ſolaced themſelves with a ſlight repaſt, and offered a Sacrifice unto the Gods in in the Head of their Army: Artamenes marched ſtraight to the Enemy in Battalia, with Prince Tigranes and Philidaſpes who would not leave him, to the end that Artamenes ſhould do nothing which he did not do as well as he. I confeſs, Sir, that when I ſaw things in that condition, I could not reſolve any longer Obedience unto the command of Artamenes, but I put in amongſt this young Gallantry of the Court, which made up a Troop of Voluntiers, and followed my Maſter. But yet I know not how he got a ſight of me, and as ſoon as he ſpied me, he made a ſign with his Hand; then I quit my Rank, and he came forward to me ſome fifteen or twenty Paces, Sir, (ſaid I coming to him) I beſeech you give me leave to fight: No, no (anſwered he) I will not; and your diſobedience has offended me: I have done, Sir, (ſaid I) ſince you will not permit it, and I will retire my ſelf. However Feraulas (ſaid he) if I die at this time, you may aſſure the Princeſs that the day of my Death was a bloody Day unto my Enemies, and that in one day I was both Conqueror and Conquered. After theſe Words my dear and beſt Maſter, commanded me aloud to obſerve his Orders, to the end that none ſhould think worſe of my Courage and my Retreat, which otherwiſe might have been blemiſhed: After this I left him, and he marched towards the Enemy, who did prepare to receive him. They endeavoured to perſwade their Souldiers, that the former defeat of their Troops would be advantagious to them, ſince they had ſo wearied their Enemies as they muſt needs be weak; yet for all that, ſay what they could, the very name of Artamenes, did more daunt them, than all the good Language of the Princes could encourage them: Mean while both Armies ſeemed to be inſpired with the ſame Spirit and the ſame Fury, they both advanced, and join; the Air is obſcured with Arrows; the breaking of which, as they met, and claſht one againſt another, added a terrible noiſe to the martial Harmony: Theſe firſt blows on both ſides, did redouble their ardent deſires of vanquiſhing in the Hearts of both Parties. After they had emptied their Quivers, Bows were uſeleſs, and they drew nearer; thoſe whoſe Arms were Spears did puſh them with furious Violence; Swords followed preſently after; And both ſides coming to handy-Blows, all behaved themſelves like valiant Souldiers, led on by valiant Commanders, and now begins the mortal Millelany: Every one fights, every one would vanquiſh, and every one is both Aſſaulted and Aſſaulter: The left Wing of Artamenes his Army, did foil the right of the Confederate Kings: And the right of the Princes did much ſhake the left of Artamenes: As for him, he did not only do according as he was accuſtomed, but he did that which never was done: The Prince Tigranes did alſo ſignalize himſelf at this time: Philidaſpes after their example, did all that could be expected from a Man of a great Soul: and my Maſter himſelf, has often told me, notwithſtanding his hate of him, that he deſerves immortal Praiſes: It is no wonder therefore if the leſſer Army get the better of the greater; having three ſuch extraordinary Men in it which ſuſtained it. It muſt be confeſſed, that the getting of the Battel deſerves to be wholly attributed unto Artamenes; Not only becauſe a hundred times more valiantly than any other; Not only becauſe he gave out Orders with more excellency of Judgment than any other; Not only becauſe he did extreamly animate his Souldiers, whom he often rallied, whom he often ſupported, whom he often defended, and was in every place where need was; but alſo becauſe he did one thing which put more Enemies to rout than any thing that all others did: My dear and invincible Maſter, who was reſolved to vanquiſh or die, and to preſerve the Honour of his firſt Victory, which he knew he ſhould loſe if he loſt this Battel, and would be accuſed for hazarding it too much: Artamenes, I ſay, who would either Triumph or Periſh, did not now ſtudy to pick out Enemies to fight with, and ſpare their Blood, as almoſt always he uſed, thinking it better to hazard being wounded by endeavouring to take valiant Men Priſoners, then to kill them, as he eaſily could have done: But now at this time, he fell upon all that ſtopt his Paſſage; he wounded all which did not render themſelves, and killed all that obſtinately reſiſted him: Meeting then with a Body of Horſe which ſtood firm, he charged them; he foiled them, and made them fly, not obſerving that the King of Pontus, that generous Rival, whom he ſo much eſteemed and loved, was he which made moſt Reſiſtance; But having wounded him in the right Arm, and this Prince being out of Combate, and out of hopes to be relieved; ſince he was ſo compaſſed about with the Souldiers of Artamenes; ſeeing himſelf, I ſay, in this Condition, and knowing my Maſter, he had rather render himſelf unto him than any other; and in this thought, ſeeing himſelf preſt on every ſide, and ready to periſh: I muſt render my ſelf Artamenes (ſaid this wounded Prince) I muſt ſubmit and confeſs you deſerve to conquer. At theſe words, Artamenes knowing him, came neer, and ſeeing he could not lift his Sword, he deſperſed thoſe who preſſed upon him; you yield rather unto my Fortune than my Valour, (replied he): But however, I muſt make uſe of my good Fortune, and will endeavour to ſhew you that it is accompanied with ſome Vertue; in ſaying ſo, he turned towards Chriſantes, who fought always near him, and putting the King of Pontus, into his charge, go Chriſantes ſaid he, conduct the King unto our Camp: for he will be better waited upon there than in his own, where all is in confuſion; but look to him, (ſaid he) as a Prince who would have been our Conqueror, if all his Souldiers were as valiant as himſelf. Chriſantes obeying my Maſter, and guarded by two hundred Horſe, did convey the King of Pontus: to whom Artamenes ſaid at parting with him, with much Civility, Sir, I would go my ſelf to wait upon you, if the neceſſity of my Office would permit me. But ſince I ſee ſome of your Souldiers with Arms in their Hands, your Majeſty will pardon me if I leave you, and go to put my ſelf into ſuch a condition, as I may return with more Reverence and Leiſure to ſerve you: At theſe words, ſtooping as low as the skirt of his Saddle, he turned his Horſe; And this conquered Prince, ſubmitting himſelf to the Law of a Conqueror, who treated him with ſo good a Grace, and followed Chriſantss, not at all then King of his Liberty: yet the King of Phrygia, coming preſently after to know that the King of Pontus was taken Priſoner, began to be in a mighty Fury, and though he was not now much above the Age of a young Man, yet was he Maſter of much Vigour and Generoſity, ſo that apprehending this loſs, he doubled his ſtrength in his endeavonrs to repair it: he muſtered together as many Men as he could, and went himſelf into places fulleſt of danger: Artamenes being informed where this Prince did fight, went thither, and took as many of his Men with him as he met in the way, and began a freſh Combate: Nothing was to be ſeen in all places, but dead, and dying Men, Souldiers throwing away their Arms, either to render themſelves or fly. And the Victory was clearly on Artamenes his ſide; yet the Night drawing on apace, it could not be diſcerned where Men fought, and where Men fought not: And Philidaſpes, whom the Croud had ſeparated from Artamenes, notwithſtanding his Reſolution not to forſake him; having vanquiſhed all thoſe which reſiſted him, and not ſeeing my Maſter to give out Orders, cauſed a retreat to be preſently ſounded: Immediately after, every one was rallied under his own Enſign:

ſign: The Party of Artamenes was abſolute Maſter of the Field, and of all the Enemies Baggage which they had forſaken: But as for the Conqueror himſelf, none could tell any tidings of him: All the Captains asked one another where he was; and all the Souldiers were inquiſitive what was become of their General: one ſaid, I ſaw him not, ſince in the Head of our Company, he routed a whole Squadron which reſiſted him: another ſaid, I never ſaw him ſince he killed a brave gallant Man which oppoſed him: And indeed every one obſerved him the laſt time they ſaw him, by ſome heroick Act or other: But though all ſaw him in the Combate, yet none knew now where he was; he was not to be found any where: He was neither in the Camp, nor in the Field of Battel; ſo that it muſt clearly be concluded, he was either a Priſoner, or dead. Philidaſpes himſelf was much moved at it, whether it proceeded from his Generoſity, or from a quite contrary reſentment, he was very careful to enquire him out. For my part, Sir, I never was ſenſible of ſo great a Sorrow: Chriſantes was not a little ſad: And it was well ſaid, that there was not one in all the Army, which grieved not more for this loſs, than the gaining of two Battels did rejoyce them: In the mean time ſince Philidaſpes undertook the Command of the Army under the notion of the General: All the Officers did without any difficulty receive Orders from him: As for the Prince Tigranes, he was not to ſtay long in Cappadocia, nor take upon him any Employment, only as a Voluntier: All the Souldiers had Souls ſo inquiſitive after their General, that they muſt be better ſatisfied concerning his Fortune: They ſpoke unto Philidaſpes, to enquire of the King of Pontus into what place they believed the King of Phrygia was retreated, to the end a Herald might be ſent thither, to know if Artamenes were there a Priſoner; for indeed there were two Souldiers, who were certain they ſaw Artamenes a good way off juſt at night, purſuing his Enemies on that Quarter where the King of Phrygia made his Retreat. It was I, Sir, who was imployed unto the King of Pontus, who was logded in my

Maſter's Tent. He aſſured me, that the King of Phrygia was at that Town neareſt Ceraſia cloſe upon the River Sangar. But, Sir, I never in all my Life found a Prince more reaſonable than he; for when I expreſſed my Fears that Artamenes was taken Priſoner: If that be all (ſaid he to me) never fear him; and calling for Pen and Paper, though he was wounded in his right Arm, yet he writ a Letter unto the King of Phrygia, by which he deſired, that if Artamenes chanced to be in his Power, to treat him with all poſſible Civility: a Herauld then was diſpatched to the King of Phrygia: Chriſantes and I, with an infinite number of others, of all Conditions, lighting abundance of Torches, went to ſearch amongſt the dead for that which we wiſhed never to find, though we much feared we ſhould: Alas, (ſaid I to Chriſantes) can the Gods be both ſo favourable and ſo averſe unto Artamenes? would they permit him to get two glorious Victories in one day, to let him periſh thus, and let Philidaſpes enjoy the Fruits of all his Hardſhip? Though day did break, yet we continued in our Fears, and glad we were to ſee we ſought in vain. Since we knew that Quarter where Artamenes was ſeen the laſt time, Chriſantes and I went thither, not well knowing why we ſcattered ſo from the reſt of the Company: But the Deſtinies who conducted us, knew that which we were ignorant of. As we began to be in abſolute deſpair of ever finding our dear Maſter, and were reſolving to return back, we heard a pittiful weak Voice calling us; we went thither in all haſte, and found two Souldiers ſore wounded, the one in the Leg, the other in the Thigh, who not being able to riſe, lay there all night, hoping for ſome Paſſenger to help them; having both of them received their Wounds in that Place, as they purſued the Enemy: But though their Wounds were great, and weakneſs extream, by reaſon of their loſs of Blood, yet the firſt thing they ſpoke, was not to ask any help, although they were our own Men; but on the contrary, one of them ſpeaking and looking upon us (for he knew we belonged unto Artamenes,) Go (ſaid he to us) towards the ſide of that River ver which you ſee ſome two hundred Paces off, and look carefully there, whether your Illuſtrious Maſter be not in the ſame condition that we are in. Our Maſter (ſaid Chriſantes and I both together) Alas, my Friends, what can you tell us concerning him? We ſaw him yeſterday very late (anſwered the Souldier which ſpoke before) purſuing the King of Phrygia, who retreated from fight, but as they paſſed by us, we ſaw that Artamenes was wounded, at very parting of day, for we ſaw his ſuit of Arms all bloody: We, alas, were as you ſee us, amongſt theſe Buſhes, which did interpoſe between our ſight of the adverſe Party; but we ſaw the King of Phrygia before him, and a great Company following after him; and we ſaw him in yonder place, which I point at, maintain a furious fight, and if I be not much deceived, there I ſaw the Illuſtrious Artamenes fall, at leaſt, I am certain, there was none ſtayed there, nor any went off, but ſome which ſwam the River, of which I am certain Artamenes was none of them. The Souldier had no ſooner ended ſpeaking, but Chriſantes and I began to run to the place which he ſhewed us, with doubled Fears which we could not expreſs: I think we had left theſe two poor Souldiers without help, had we not accidentally met ſome of our own Men, unto whoſe care we committed them: Mean while we came to the River-ſide, which is the River Sanger, that parts the Kingdom of Pontus, from the Kingdom of Bithynia: As ſoon as we came there, we ſaw all the Banks covered with killed Men: There was a little Wood-bridge, which ſeemed newly broken; and as the ſtream of this River was not impetuous, we ſaw all along as far as we could look, Men killed, and Arms broken; the Water it ſelf was changed colour, and all the Graſs on the Bank-ſides was ſanguin'd: never was object more mournful than this; we found many of our own Men amongſt the dead, and many alſo of the King of Phrygia's; But O Heavens, how I trembled, when following the River a little lower, I knew my dear Maſter's Horſe, which I ſaw dead on the ſide of the Water; two of his Feet in the River, as if he would have paſſed over, when he was ſhot dead with an Arrow which ſtuck in his Flank:

Alas, alas Chriſantes (cried I) doubtleſs our Illuſtrious Maſter is periſhed either by Steel or Water; which way ſoever it be, we have loſt, alas we have loſt the Great Artamenes.

It is impoſſible to tell you, Sir, how great was our Sorrows and Aſtoniſhment: We ſaw his Horſe which was very remarkable; and within two Paces further we found his Head-piece, and as the River was narrow, we could ſee his Buckler, which being within lined with Wood, did flote in the Water, and ſtopt by ſome Ruſhes which grew there. In concluſion, Sir, we abſolutely concluded him loſt, ſince we had ſearched ſo exactly all along the River, and found him not; and ſince upon our return to the Camp; the Herauld, which we ſent to the King of Phrygia brought no News of him; upon a ſecond reviewing of our Sorrows, Chriſantes and I went again unto the fatal River, and mixed our Tears amongſt it: We followed the Sides, as far as in all probability the Waves could convey the Corps of our dear, dead, and honoured Maſter; and ſince this River did empty it ſelf into the Sea, not far diſtant, we imagined it might convey the Corps into that Abyſs: at laſt, Sir, we returned again unto the Camp all in deſpair, we abſolutely thought him dead; and ſo did all the Army as well as we. Never was Victory ſo ſadly reſented as this, and the loſs of twenty Battels had not moved ſo much Sorrow as this; every one ſighed, all wept and lamented; the Captains had much adoe to keep in their Souldiers from disbanding themſelves, and they did publiſh aloud that now there was no more hopes of any Victories ſince Artamenes lived not: Some ſaid that now they would ſerve no longer becauſe there was no more recompence to be looked for; others that they would never more expoſe themſelves to any Dangers, ſince never any would be ſo exemplary as Artamenes was: All ſaid, let us lament a General who made us to conquer without almoſt any Danger, who, ever did more himſelf than he commanded others to do: who did magnificently recompence us for the leaſt Services; who took all the Danger to himſelf, and left the Plunder to us; who by his ſweetneſs and charming familiarity, was as well our Companion as our General. You may ſee, Sir, what the Souldiers ſaid, whilſt all the Commanders lamented as much as they, either publickly, or elſe privately in their Tents. The Priſoners we had taken were alſo very ſenſibly ſad at it, and could find no Conſolation in their Captivity, ſince they were not now under the Power of Artamenes, from whom they hoped for favourable treatment: The King of Pontus particularly was extreamly grieved at it, and ſeemed to be more ſorry for the loſs of him who had wounded him, who had vanquiſhed him, and who had taken him Priſoner than he was for the loſs of two Battels, and his Liberty. Philidaſpes himſelf, notwithſtanding all their Thwartings and Averſions, ſeemed to be much grieved at this pitiful Accident; and if he did entertain any Joy, he diſguiſed it ſo well that it appeared not in his Face. But whilſt all the World was mourning, I departed from the Camp full of diſpair, and told no body, no not wiſe Chriſantes, and I went to Sinope, to acquit my ſelf of that ſad Commiſſion which my Maſter impoſed upon me, and to carry his Letter unto the Princeſs of Cappadocia. I made ſuch haſte as I arrived there four hours ſooner than he who Philidaſpes ſent to acquaint the King with all Paſſages, and to bring new Orders. But ſince I deſired to ſee none but Mandana, I went the back way of the Town, and footed it unto that Gate which is next the Caſtle, and which as you know is not above twenty Paces from it; after I had told them, who ſtopt me at the Gate, that I came from Thermicira, they let me paſs, ſo that I came into the Caſtle unknown unto any, becauſe it was almoſt Night; and going up a pair of back-Stairs which conducted unto the Princeſs Chamber, I came into her outward Room unſeen by any. I ſent firſt unto Marteſia, to tell her that Feraulas had ſomething to impart to her in private; I underſtood ſince by this Lady, that the Princeſs had been extreamly ſad all the Day, and that ſhe was much moved when ſhe was told that I deſired to ſpeak with her, before any knew what I had to ſay. What would Feraulas have with me (ſaid ſhe to Marteſia?) If Artamenes be Conqueror, it is the King unto whom he ought to render an account of his Victory; and if he be conquered (ſaid ſhe ſighing) I ſhall but too ſoon know his Misfortune. Madam (anſwered Marteſia) I can ſay nothing, for I no ſooner ſaw Feraulas, but without giving almoſt as much time as to tell me he deſired to ſpeak with you, I came to tell you: Let him come (ſaid ſhe) into my Cloſet, whither I will go, and do you bring him thither. Marteſia having received this Order, came to me where ſhe left me, and conducted me to the Princeſs, without opening my Mouth, ſo full was I of Sorrow: I no ſooner ſaw the fair Mandana, but in ſpight of my reſtraint, my Cheeks were all Tears. The Princeſs ſeeing me in that ſtate, changed colour, and ſpoke firſt with much haſte; Has Artamenes (ſaid ſhe) loſt the day? and are our Enemies Conquerors? Artamenes, Madam (ſaid I) has vanquiſht your Enemies; he has brought the King of Pontus to be your Priſoner, and has won you two Battels in one day: But, Madam (ſaid I doubling my Tears, and much ado to ſpeak) at laſt Artamenes loſt his Life, and won the Day. Is Artamenes (ſaid ſhe in the ſaddeſt Tone that ſhe could expreſs) loſt in this Battel? yes, Madam (replied I) Artamenes is no more of this World: See (ſaid I in preſenting the Letter which my Maſter writ unto her) what he gave me before he went to fight, aud what he injoyned me to deliver unto your Hand, after his Death, if it ſhould chance in this diſmal Battel. The Princeſs at theſe words, could not reſtrain her Tears no more than I: She went to a Table where there was a Light, and did ſit ſo as I could not ſee her Face, purpoſely to hide her Tears: But do what ſhe could, and notwithſtanding my own ſorrows I obſerved that her Grief was extream. I owe ſo much unto Artamenes (ſaid ſhe in taking the Letter) that I ſhould be very ungrateful, if I did not ſadly reſent his loſs; and if after his Death, I do not whatſoever he deſires me; for (ſaid ſhe turning a little towards me) I do imagine that this illuſtrious Man would commend ſome of his Servants unto me, and ask ſome Recompences for them, which he never would for himſelf. I know not, Madam (ſaid I to her) what my Maſter has writ: But I know that they who had the honour to be his, deſire now nothing but Death; and neither pretend either unto any Fortune or any Life. Mean while the Princeſs, after ſhe had dried her Eyes from thoſe Tears which ſhe could not keep in, ſhe began to read my Maſter's Letter; which as Marteſia told me afterwards, was thus indicted.

Artamenes to the Princeſs of Cappadocia.

B*Efore you read what an unfortunate Prince does write, think, I beſeech you, that he which takes this liberty to write unto you, will never write again; and he could not reſolve to fail in that reverence which he ows you, until after he had loſt his Life in your Service. But, Madam, as he durſt not diſpleaſe you as long as he lived, ſo he would not deprive himſelf of ſo much conſolation, as to hope, that you ſhould know after his Death, how he lived not but unto you, and how he never loved and adored any elſe but you; Yes, Madam,* Artamenes, who by his Birth is not abſolutely unworthy of the Princeſs of Cappadocia, is ſo conſcious of deſerving the Princeſs Mandana, that from the firſt Minute he ſaw her, he never durſt tell her that he loved her; and how his Love was it which cauſed all his good Fortune in Arms, and all the Torment of his Life. No, Divine Princeſs, it was only for your ſake that I was here in this Court diſguiſed and unknown: It was for you I fought; I vanquiſh'd, and refuſed all the Earth; though it is one of the moſt noble parts of it, which if I had lived I had commanded. That which moſt perplexeth me at preſent is, that I cannot know whether I ſhall die Conqueror, or Conquered: If the firſt, then, Madam, receive the Victory as the Fruits of my Love, which I purchaſed at the price of my Blood: If the latter, then pitty an unfortunate Man who died in your Service, and who died adoring you. Since I have nothing to hope for, I believe your Vertue will not be offended at my reſpectful Paſſion; and you ſhall never find worſe than I diſcover, ſince the firſt time that I writ unto you is the laſt of my Life. There needs no other anſwer, Madam, unto what I deſire, but ſome ſlight Teſtimonies of Sorrow and Pitty; refuſe them not then I conjure you. And that you may be the eaſier induced to pardon my boldneſs, conſider, if you pleaſe, Madam, that if I had lived, ved, you had perhaps been for ever ignorant of what I now tell you, when I am entering into my Grave.

Artamenes.

As long as the reading of this Letter laſted, Tears did ſo abundantly trickle, that ſhe was forced divers times to break off: But when ſhe had ended, knowing that ſhe was not able to reſtrain her Lamentations more than ſhe could her Tears; and being deſirous that I ſhould be no witneſs of her exceſſive Sorrows: Feraulas, (ſaid ſhe to me) you ſee that I have not forgot how the illuſtrious Artamenes ſaved the Life of the King my Father, ſince I ſo condole his loſs, that I can take no joy in all thoſe glorious Advantages which he hath atchieved for us: But (ſaid ſhe, ſighing) what can be done leſs for him, who in one Day hath won two Battels? hath taken an Enemy's King Priſoner, and hath beſtowed an everlaſting Peace upon all Cappadocia, than to make that memorable Day, a Day of Sorrow and Tears for his Loſs? Grief did ſad this Princeſs, that ſhe could hardly pronounce theſe laſt words; ſo that to be at more liberty of Lamentation, Go, Feraulas, (ſaid ſhe to me) lament your glorious Maſter, and come hither in the Morning, for I ſhall be glad to ſee you. Then I made a low reverence to depart, and was at the Cloſet Door when ſhe called me back; Feraulas, (ſaid ſhe to me) tell me before you go, of what Country was the Famous Artamenes? and exactly tell me what was his Quality? He was a Prince, Madam, (ſaid I to her) and had, if he had lived, been a King of a great Kingdom: But, Madam, this is all I have in Commiſſion to tell you, my Maſter having expreſly forbidden me to tell his Name. 'Tis enough, ſaid ſhe, for the Glory of Artamenes, and too much for the Tranquillity of Mandana. She being more loaden with Sorrows at theſe words, diſmiſſed me, and ſtaid alone, only with her dear Confident Marteſia.

I was no ſooner gone, (as ſhe told me afterwards) but giving her my Maſter's Letter to read; See there (ſaid ſhe) alas, there you will find the Cauſe of my exceſſive Sorrow; conſider, I pray you, if ever any was more lamentable. Marteſia obeying the Princeſs, began to read the Letter in a low Voice unto her ſelf; but Mandana would not ſuffer her: No, (ſaid ſhe) Marteſia, I would underſtand what I confuſedly beheld, and what perhaps I have read falſe. Marteſia began to read the Letter aloud; but, O Heavens, how oft was this reading interrupted! and how happy had Artamenes been, if he had known her Reſentments of him; whoſoever ſhould have told me, within this hour, (ſaid the Princeſs to Marteſia) that I ſhould receive a declaration of Love without Anger; and that I ſhould pity him which made it, and dearly loved his Memory; Ah, Marteſia, I ſhould not have believed it: yet I cannot chuſe but confeſs my Weakneſs unto you, and acknowledg that I do infinitely compaſſionate the unfortunate Artamenes. I am not angry at him for loving me; yet I know not (added ſhe) whether if he ſhould riſe again, I ſhould repent of what I ſay, and all I would do, ſhould be to hide my Reſentments; yet, Marteſia, I do well find, that Artamenes had a greater ſhare in my Heart than ever I thought, and perhaps more than he ought to have, or I to afford him. Indeed, Marteſia, my Soul is extreamly troubled, I am very ſenſible of thoſe Sorrows which are in me; and whether I will or no, all theſe ſad Paſſions do not offend me: I perceive, (added ſhe) that the knowledg of his Quality mingles a ſerret Sentiment of Joy in my Soul: I recal his Life, and all his heroick Acts, into my Memory; and againſt my own Mind and Conſent I cannot forbear to be glad when I find all theſe Things and Circumſtances which have been told unto me, confirm me in the belief of his Birth and Love. Indeed, Marteſia, not to diſſemble the Truth, I do think, that as Artamenes loved me, and I had no certainty of it, ſo I did love him alſo, and knew it not: That which I named Eſteem and Acquaintance, (ſaid ſhe, and bluſh'd) might perhaps have been called ſomething elſe: Indeed, I know that I did oft-times wiſh a Crown upon the Head of Artamenes, and knew not well why I wiſh'd it: And I knew moreover, that though the ſuſpicions which I had of his Paſſions did diſturb me, yet I was never abſolutely unwilling that he ſhould love me. But, O Heavens, that which is moſt conſiderable, and moſt vexatious, is, that I know I ſhall reſent his Death ſo deeply, as it will moleſt all the Tranquillity and hopes of my Life.

The ſad Mandana ſtopt at theſe words; and Marteſia, though ſhe was much troubled at the loſs of Artamenes, yet to comfort the Princeſs, told her, that the Gods were ever wont to mix Bitters and Sweets, Goods and Bads together, and never the one without the other; and therefore at this time ſhe muſt think that all theſe Victories are bought at a dear Rate. Ah, Marteſia, (ſaid ſhe to her) that Victory which is at the price of Artamenes's Life, is infinitely too dear, though it had brought me a Crown with it; for, my dear Marteſia, it is a hard matter ever to be comforted after the loſs of ſuch a Prince as he; a Prince, I ſay, who was owner of all excellent Qualities, and no bad Ones; alſo one who loved us. But (ſaid Marteſia to her) if he had lived, you had never known as much; or if you had, you would have been offended at it. I confeſs, (replied the Princeſs haſtily) I ſhould have been offended, and that mortally. But, Marteſia, he never told me of it, until he was at the point of Death; I knew it not, until he was in ſuch a condition as he could not know what I thought of it; and it is this principally which cauſeth my moſt ſharp Sorrow. All the great Acts of Artamenes, and all his high Vertues, were things which truly did gain and merit my eſteem; but I muſt confeſs unto you, that his reverence and reſpect of me, has abſolutely gained my Heart; The Combats which he fought, the Battels which he won, and all his other glorious Actions which he did to merit my Approbation, did not ſo much appertain unto me, but that he and others did ſhare in the Glory with me: But that Artamenes ſhould love me, and out of his profound reverence and reſpect unto me, ſhould not tell it me until his Death; this, Marteſia, reflects wholly upon Mandana: this is it which makes me plainly ſee that Artamenes did value me: And this is it which obliges me to love the Memory of a Man, who had Reaſon in his Love, and loved me without offending or diſpleaſing me. Madam, (ſaid Marteſia then unto her) I do conceive it juſt indeed, that you ſhould cheriſh the memory of Artamenes; but yet I know not why you ſhould ſo much injure your ſelf as to grieve ſo exceſſively. I know not (replied the Princeſs) whether it be juſt, or handſom, but I am ſure I can do no leſs. I ſhould never have finiſhed my Relation, Sir, if I ſhould tell you all that Mandane ſaid and did upon this occaſion; ſhe went to Bed, and would not eat any Meat; ſhe paſſed away all the melancholy Night without a wink of ſleep.

The ſame Night that the King knew of the Victories and Death of Artamenes, by him whom Philidaſpes ſent to advertiſe him; he teſtified an extream ſorrow for the loſs: All the Court and all the Town were ſad; one would have thought his Battel had been loſt, and the whole Kingdom utterly ruined: All were quite deceived, only Aribeus, who was glad in his Heart, though he durſt not let it appear, ſince the King thought that the Princeſs was yet ignorant of this ſad News; he ſent to tell her, and went himſelf the next Morning to condole, and alſo comfort her, for he knew very well that ſhe did very much eſteem Artamenes. This Meeting was condoled on the King's part very tenderly and ſadly; and very wiſely and reſervedly on the Princeſs part; for ſhe diſcovered no more Sorrows and Compaſſion, than the Intereſt of the State might reaſonably cauſe in her Soul for ſuch a loſs: But as ſoon as the King was gone, ſhe ſent to ſeek me; and as I could not ſtay any longer at Sinope, ſo they found me coming to take my leave on her. When I came into her Chamber, Madam, (ſaid I, coming near her Bed) I come to deſire your leave that I may return to the Camp. What will you do there? (replied the Princeſs). I would go (replied I) to ſee if Chriſantes have ſince my departure from him, yet found the Corps of my dear dead Maſter, which before we could not find. What (ſaid the Princeſs, ſighing) has not the unfortunate Artamenes received the honour of a Burial? No, Madam, (ſaid I, with Eyes ſwell'd with Tears) unleſs Chriſantes have found him ſince my departure.

Then ſhe enjoined me to relate unto her all that I have told you; to wit, all that we found along the River of Sanger, and all I knew concerning the Death of my dear Maſter: After I had told her all, and by my ſad Relation cauſed her to bedew all her fair Face with a Deluge of Tears, ſhe began to preſs me again to tell her his Name: For, ſaid ſhe, what good reaſon could he have to conceal it? I know not, Madam, (anſwered I) nor can I, I confeſs, comprehend it, conſidering the greatneſs of his Birth: But it belongs not to me to examine my Maſter's Reaſons; it is my duty only to execute his laſt Commands with all punctual obſervance. You have reaſon (ſaid ſhe to me) and I have done you wrong in preſſing you unto ſo unjuſt and unreaſonable a thing; It is ſufficient that I know that he was of a Royal Extract; and there is not any Prince in the World, let him be as great as he can be, but may deſire a Son like unto him: Mean while, (ſaid ſhe to me) believe it Feraulas, and aſſure Chriſantes of as much, that all they which had relation unto the moſt glorious Artamenes, may obtain any thing from the Princeſs Mandana, and that which ſhe has not done for him, ſhe will do for his. You are too generous, Madam, (ſaid I to her); but I have already told you, that we ask no more from the Gods, but only the Corps of our dear Maſter, and the honour to bring him unto his Grave. Theſe words did ſo extreamly move the Princeſs, that putting out her hand unto me, ſhe ſaid, you are worthy Servants of ſuch a Maſter as you have loſt: Go and ſeek out with all diligence thoſe glorious and ſad Relicks, until you have found it out; and when you have found it, let me be acquainted with it, to the end I may move the King, my Father, to pay thoſe honours which are due unto his Merit, and unto thoſe Services which we have received. After this, ſhe diſmiſſed me with a profound ſigh, and would have given me a Jewel, but I refuſed it, and went from Sinope to the Camp, that I might follow the invincible Artamenes, if I could do nothing elſe.

Mean while, although the King was much troubled at the loſs of my [illegible] of his Victory; and fearing leſt the King of Phrygia ſhould bring freſh Forces into the Field, and relieve the King of Pontus, therefore he ſent, the next Morning that I parted from Sinope, a command unto Philidaſpes, to bring the Priſoner (King) to Court; ſo that the day after I came to the Camp, Philidaſpes with ſix thouſand Men, went to conduct him. He left the Command of the Army, by Order from Ciaxares unto Artaxes, Brother of Aribeus, and came unto Sinope with intentions to Triumph, and aſſume unto himſelf all the glorious Labours of my moſt Illuſtrious Maſter. Neither Chriſantes nor I would return to Court, but both ſtaied in the Camp, and continued our ſearch all along the fatal River Sangar, and in all places thereabouts for what we had loſt, and to lament our Misfortune. The Prince Tigranes, who ſaw there was no more to do in the Army, returned to Sinope, much grieved for the loſs of Artamenes; As for Philidaſpes, as generous as he was, I do believe that if he was not glad of the Death of Artamenes, yet he had ſome reſemblances of it, which preſently after produced the ſame Effects in his Heart. He departed from the Camp, in ſuch a manner as was not ordinary, but very magnificent: As for the King of Pontus, he had contrary reſentments in his Soul, for he was extream ſad at the loſs of the Battel; much grieved at the Death of him which won it; angred to follow Philidaſpes as his Conquerer who was not ſo; and in extream confuſion, to appear as a conquered Priſoner, before that Princeſs whom he loved: yet amongſt all theſe bad Reſentments, he had ſome ſecret Joy, that he ſhould ſee her again.

Mean time Philidaſpes march'd in all haſte, and as he went to Sinope, he ordained a petty Triumph, wherein might be ſeen all ſigns of Mourning, as well as Victory for the Death of their General, not daring to expreſs it otherwiſe. Then, as at the laſt Battle, all the Baggage of both Kings was all taken; ſo alſo they met with many things which the King of Phrygia had formerly taken from Ciaxares, in a War which was betwixt them. Philidaſpes made uſe of all the rich Plunder to make the Pomp more proudly Magnificent; He cauſed two thouſand Men of War to march firſt, in the Head of which were carried abundance of Enſigns gained from the Enemy; and the better to ſet forth the Death of their General, they which carried them were in Mourning; Fifty Trumpets followed theſe Enſigns, in black Mantles and Pennons; afterwards followed forty Coaches, covered with black, all fill'd with magnificent Coats of Arms, Head-pieces, Plumes of divers Colours, Bucklers of an hundred ſeveral Faſhions; Swords, Bows, Quivers, Arrows, and Lances; and all this in ſo handſom a mixture, and ſo well ſet out, with Order and with Confuſion both, that as they who were there told us, nothing could be beheld more Beautiful and Pompous: Six other Chariots followed theſe forty firſt, all fill'd with that which Ciaxares had formely loſt, to wit, magnificent Pavilions, great pieces of Plate, both Silver and Gold, prized at an ineſtimable Rate and Value, both for their huge Prodigiouſneſs, and rich Engravings; a Throne of Gold, richly beſet with Onyx, Topaz, and other rare Precious-ſtones: After theſe Chariots, marcht the King Priſoner on Horſeback, but without a Sword, invironed with a hundred for his Guard, in mourning Caſſocks, and followed with fifteen hundred Priſoners, chained four to four: Immediately after marched Philidaſpes alone, cloathed in Mourning, and his Horſe Furniture ſuitable, with the Baſton of a General in his Hand; The reſt of the Regiments followed, marching in the ſame order as the firſt.

As this Triumph came into the great Plain within 20 Furlongs of Sinope, they of the firſt Rank ſaw a Litter, which croſſing the way about an hundred Paces before them, did ſtay as if it were to let the Souldiers paſs; yet they were no ſooner within compaſs of looking into the Litter, but preſently making a ſtop, they began to run out of order, and cry out, It is Artamenes! it is Artamenes! This word paſſing from the firſt Rank to the ſecond, and from the ſecond to the third, and ſo throughout all, the glorious Name of Artamenes did in an inſtant fill the Mouths of Friends and Enemies; Captains and Souldiers, Conquerors and Conquered : all ſtops, and in a moment, all would advance to be better cer- tified of the matter : Philidaſpes, who was afraid it ſhould be ſome Stratagem of the King of Phrygia, to put his Souldiers in diſorder whilſt he relieved the King of Pontus, commanded every one to his place, and advan- ced to the place where the noiſe began. But O Hea- vens, how was he ſurprized, when looking into the Lit- ter, he ſaw that it was really Artamenes which was withi it, who held his Hand out to the Souldiers, and cheriſhed all them which came near him : This ſight did doubtleſ aſtoniſh Philidaſpes, and perhaps made him ſad : But a he was one of a great Soul, Wit, and Generoſity, ſo he partly hid it, without expreſſing much Joy, or much Sorrow ; he lighted from his Horſe, and came near my Maſter. Artamenes (ſaid he in coming to him, and pre- ſenting him his Generals Staff) could never riſe in a fitte time ; he who died in the day of Victory, revives a- gain in the day of Triumph : In the caſe that I am i (replied Artamenes ſmiling, and moſt civilly ſaluting him) I may more aptly be taken for a vanquiſhed, than Vanquiſher : And to tell you truly, I think that I am ne ther fit to follow a Chariot, nor to go before it. Chario of Triumph (anſwered Philidaſpes) are not difficult to b conducted, for commonly Fortune guides them. Arta- menes had not leaſure to anſwer this nice Complemen for all the Officers, whether Philidaſpes, who comma ed them, would or no, did quit their places, and a knowledg him no more, but came to ſalute their Ge- neral Artamenes : All the Regiments not daring abſolu ly to quit their Ranks, becauſe of the Priſoners whic they guarded, yet they preſſed ſo, that all the Sould ers might at leaſt ſee the Litter where he was. T King of Pontus, impatient to embrace his glorious Co querer, ſent one of them who was appointed for h Guard to ask leave for him to come near : The Sol dier coming near, and preſenting what the King Pontus deſired, my Maſter with an unparelled Modeſ making a ſign to him with his Hand, It is Philida (ſaid he) and not Artamenes, which can grant him t leave, and of whom he muſt ask it, ſince he received the laſt Orders from the King, and commands in Chief. Philidaſpes being even confounded, and half angry at my Maſters ſweet civillity, ſaid unto him, That his power was nothing ſince he was preſent, and therefore the Command was in him. I care not for commanding others (anſwered Artamenes) when I am not in a condition to do that my ſelf which I bid others do: You muſt at this time (anſwered Philidaſpes) endure this inconveniency, for I do not think there is any will take your Office out of your hand. Why you may better take it upon you than I (replied Artaments) Your Souldiers will not conſent, replied Philidaſpes, and I think they have good reaſon for it. In concluſion, Sir, after this modeſt conteſt Artamenes took upon him that Command which belonged unto him, and turning towards the Meſſenger from the King of Pontus: My Friend, ſaid he to him, tell the King of Pontus, that if I were able to go, I would come where he is, and do him that reverence which is his due, and tell him that he may do what ever he pleaſes. This generous Royal Priſoner came then with great Joy to ſalute the Man who had captivated him: I could not but grieve much (ſaid he in coming to him) at your loſs; and I never had any Thought of my Liberty, until that minuit you were believed to be dead. Sir, (anſwered my Maſter with mnch ſweetneſs) if I were not ſo wounded, as I could not ſuſtain my ſelf, Artaments would not receive the King of Pontus after ſuch an uncivil manner; and doubtleſs he would let him know, that he thinks his Victory very unfortunate, that he is not had in more Veneration. Never ſpeak of unfortunate (anſwered the King of Pontus) my Fetters are not baſe, ſince you did put them no; nor have I need of all my Victories to follow Artamenes as my Conqueror: Such as you, who deſerve to conquer (anſwered my Maſter) ought to be but little troubled at being conquered, and it is a greater Argument of your Valour, than mine, that you find ſuch conſolation in your Misfortune. The King of Pontus, drawing back a little, to give room unto thoſe who yet had not ſaluted Artamenes, my Maſter had a deſire to know whether or no the Victory was compleat: he asked of the King and the Princeſs; he enquired particularly of moſt part of all the Officers; and he had the goodneſs to ask where Chriſantes, and where I was: He cheered up thoſe with his Eyes unto whom he could not ſpeak; and aſſured all the Souldiers ſmiling, that he deſired not from them any part of the Plunder, or Booty. Every one deſired to know what had become of him? But he told them all, that this was not a fit place for it, and deſired their Patience. After this joyful Tumult was appeaſed, Artamenes ſent to the King to acquaint him with his being alive, and that he was in the Head of ſix thouſand Men, who brought the King of Pontus unto him, to the end he might acquit himſelf of his former Promiſe, and to tell that he waited for his Orders: Mean time, they marched gently, and came within ſix Furlongs of Sinope. I leave you to imagine, Sir, what different Thoughts came into my Maſter's Mind: 'Tis true that he ſaw he returned to the Court in a moſt glorious manner, having gained two Battels in one day, and brought a King a Priſoner with him: But yet he knew the King of Pontus was his Rival, and that did make him almoſt repent the taking him: The ſight of Philidaſpes alſo did agitate in his Mind, the remembrance of all their ancient differences, and ſtir'd up no ſmall turbulency in his Soul; but of all other Inquietudes, the incertainty whether or no I had delivered the Letter unto the Princeſs did moſt grate in his Mind: Sometimes, he deſired it were: Sometimes he feared it was: Sometimes he was uncertain which he ſhould wiſh, and could not determine what to think. Philidaſpes for his part was not without his Turbulencies; he ſaw the glorious Reſurrection of his Enemy; and looked upon him as more his Conqueror, than the King of Pontus did; and thought it concern'd him as near as the loſs of his Liberty. This Prince, though indeed he was the moſt unfortunate of all at this time, yet he did not think himſelf ſo; for he knew not that Philidaſpes and Artamenes were his Rivals: but on the contrary he was in hope that my Maſter would do good Offices to the King and Princeſs; ſo that he loved him with an extream tenderneſs. Thus did theſe three Illuſtrious Lovers of the Princeſs of Cappadocia reſent the Buſineſs: Mean while, the Meſſenger which my Maſter ſent before to carry news of his happy Reſurrection, arrived at Sinope: you may imagine, Sir, how he was received: The King reſented more joyfully than he could expreſs, and made him which brought the happy Tidings, repeat it a hundred times over: The King ſent preſently to acquaint the Princeſs, who teſtified an unimaginable Satisfaction: The whole Court was raviſh'd: All the People rejoyced: Aribeus himſelf was compell'd to ſeem ſo, becauſe he muſt not be ſingular, and made ſome counterfeit ſigns of Gladneſs as he did before of Sorrow: The Prince Tigranes who had deſigned his departure, deferred it, in hopes to ſee Artamenes, and went not until the fifth day after his return. The King deſirous to honour my Maſter, ſent him word that he would not have him come into the Town in a Tumult, and without Ceremony; and appointed him to encamp his Troops near the Caſtle, about ſix Furlongs from thence; and there he would have him lodg, aſſuring him, that he would come that Night to embrace him: He was obeyed, and all things were as he commanded: The King then went and carried Chyrurgions, and Phyſicians with him unto Artamenes: whom he cheered up, the like was never ſeen: He received Philidaſpes alſo very well, but not comparable to my Maſter, who was conſtrained to go into his Bed: As for the King of Pontus, he appointed unto him the beſt Chamber in the Caſtle; and as a little before Ciaxares came, this Prince ſent unto my Maſter, deſiring him to obtain from the King, that he might not enter into Sinope, amongſt the reſt of the Priſoners: So my Maſter, who thought he could never enough acknowledg the Generoſity of this illuſtrious Priſoner, was ever forward to render him any good Office he could deſire, provided, it did not relate unto his Love: For, as Ciaxares told him, it was not Juſt that he ſhould enter Sinope as if he were not conquered; Arta- menes, did deſire him as a Recompence for all his Services, that the King of Pontus might come into the Town in the night, as well as himſelf. It will be ſufficient, Sir, (ſaid he) that the People ſee the Plunder of the Field, and the other Priſoners, without augmenting the Misfortunes of this great Prince (unto whom I am obliged) by an unprofitable Pomp; and without making me aſhamed of thoſe Honours which I deſerve not. The King could hardly reſolve what to do, but in concluſion, he muſt yield unto him who was ever wont to conquer. Artamenes, beſeeched Ciaxares, that he would be pleaſed to ſee the King of Pontus his Priſoner, which at the requeſt of my Maſter he did. The enterview of theſe two Enemy Princes paſſed with all poſſible Civility between them. Mean while the King burned with an ardent impatience, to know where Artamenes had been; how he eſcaped, and how he came ſo opportunely to meet the Army. He no ſooner knew from the Chyrurgions who had ſearched his Wounds whilſt he went to viſit the King of Pontus, that they were all abſolutely without danger, but he preſſed him extraordinarily to relate it: Artamenes would have had a days Diſpenſation, but the impatiency of Ciaxares would not permit it; he exactly told them, all that which I am now going to tell you, and which I afterwards had from his own Mouth; To let you know then what was become of my Maſter, I muſt return to the place of Battel, and tell you, that when thoſe two Souldiers, of which I ſpoke, did ſee him paſs; it was true, as they believed, that he was wounded in the left Shouldier, and yet he did not ceaſe following the King of Phrygia as far as the River Sangor. As this Prince in his retreat paſſed over a little Wood-bridge, which I already ſpoke of, the Multitude of thoſe which followed, and which would paſs all at a time over with him, cauſed the Bridge to break when he had half his Men on the one ſide, and half on the other ſide of the River; But that which ſeemed to do him an ill Office, did him a good one, beaauſe by this Accident my Maſter was ſtayed, and he could not continue his purſuit; yet thoſe which were on this ſide the broken Bridge, redoubling their Valour out of deſpair to ſave themſelves, did obſtinately defend themſelves: On the other ſide, Artamenes, all in anger that this Prince had eſcaped him, did aſſault them with unimaginable Violence, and ſo there began a freſh Combate: Thoſe which followed the King of Phrygia on the other ſide the River, thinking themſelves ſafe, endeavoured to help their own ſide by ſhooting abundance of Arrows, from the other ſide of the River, and we could not return the like, becauſe Artamenes had then no Archers with him: In concluſion, almoſt all they which fought being dead, and day at an end, one of the Arrows from the other ſide ſhot the Horſe of Artamenes in the Flank; the Horſe perceiving himſelf wounded, began to run with all his ſpeed along the River-ſide, and whether my Maſter would or no carried him from thoſe few of his Men which remained; afterwards falling to Curvet upon a ſudden, and leaping by the Water-ſide, as if he would ſwim the River, he fell dead down, in danger to drown my Maſter, becauſe that ſince he had fought near the Bridge, he had received a Wound in the Thigh, ſo that he had much ado to diſingage himſelf from under his Horſe, and get out of the Water on to Land. Yet notwithſtanding all the Blood which he had loſt, and the heavineſs of his Arms, he recovered himſelf. But as ſoon as he had got out of this danger, he was preſently engaged in another; for he perceived he was much more wounded than he thought to be, it being abſolutely impoſſible to hold himſelf up; beſides, the night came on, and he ſaw not one about him; yet he heard a noiſe of Men which fled and paſſed by not far of that place; but becauſe he knew not whether they were Friends or Enemies, he paus'd a while to deliberate whether he ſhould call them or no; but preſently, he heard no more of them, and there he lay, not knowing what to do or what would become of him, knowing well that he had not ſtrength enough to carry himſelf to the Camp, though in the obſcurity of the Night he ſhould chance to ſtumble upon the Way; Moreover it was ſo dark that he could not ſee, nor had he Strength if he had had Eyes to find his Helmet, and Buckler which he had loſt in fighting, though he ſought them as well as he could; he ſate then down at the Root of a Tree, reſolving to ſtay there until the next day: Certainly if any had ſeen him in that deplorable Condition, it would have been hard for them to believe, that he had gained two Battels in one day; took a King a Priſoner, and chaſed another. But after he had ſate a while in this cold manner, chance would have it, that a Horſe which was left without a Maſter in the fight, wandring along the River-ſide, paſſed by him; as ſoon as the Animal by favour of the Stars eſpied him, he ſtarted back with all ſpeed; but by good fortune his Bridle which hung down did entangle his Feet, and made him ſtumble ſo near my Maſter, that he catching hold of the Bridle, he ſeized upon him and held him: The Horſe being none of the moſt metled, ſtopt preſently; and Artamenes knowing himſelf weak with loſs of Blood, and conſidering he was far from the Camp, with much ado got up, and reſolved to go unto any place, where he could diſcover any Light, or Houſe, thinking it were better to ask help of an Enemy, rather than periſh at the Foot of a Tree, where there was none to help him; he knew that there was one part of Bithynia which was not very affectionate unto the King of Pontus, whoſe Father had uſurped it from thoſe which were the legitimate Owners. Indeed, becauſe he could do nothing elſe, he marched ſtraight to the place where he ſaw light; As he came near it, he ſaw it had been a goodly fair Caſtle, built with Fortifications, and which now had no Towers nor Walls: Artamenes entred it without reſiſtance; but, the Feet of his Horſe made ſuch a noiſe in the Ears of them that were within, that Artamenes heard a great number of Woman cry, as if a thouſand Men were coming to take them; but my Maſter putting them out of fear, by the weakneſs of his Voice, he ſaw appear a Woman well on in years, and of a good deportment upon the Battlement, whom four other Women lighted with Torches: Mean while, Artamenes being lighted from his Horſe, though in great pain, he ſaw this Lady look upon him with extraordinary obſervance, and after ſhe had thus well conſidered him, not giving him time to ſpeak, ſhe cried out upon a ſudden; Ah my Son! ah Spitridates, is it you? ah Spitridates, is it poſſible I ſhould ſee you here? At theſe words, although there were Men in the Houſe, ſhe ran to help Artamenes; thoſe which took him by the Arms ſuſtained him; all the Women came near to look upon him, and this Lady which ſpoke unto him, deſiring to imbrace my Maſter, he fell into a ſound, and remained as dead in her Arms, which troubled her much. In a belief he was her Son, ſhe commanded they ſhould carry him to a Chamber, to diſarm him and get him to bed; for ſince he was all bloody, ſhe knew he was wounded: By good fortune there was a young Chyrurgion, which after the rout of the King of Pontus's Army, came thither. Mean while, though Artamenes had not ſtrength enough to anſwer that Lady, which called him Spitridates, yet he did remember it, at his coming again to himſelf; but he was much aſtoniſhed, when opening his Eyes, he found he was in a fair Chamber, in a ſtately Bed, and many Ladies about him, amongſt which there was one who was admirably fair; he alſo ſaw her which called him Spitridatis, but he ſaw all in Tears for his Wounds, and for the Arms ſhe ſaw him have: My Maſter notwithſtanding his weakneſs, had no ſooner recovered his Sight, and his Reaſon, but he ſaluted the Ladies with much Reverence: He intended to preſent a complement and excuſe his ſurprize, but this aged Lady prevented him, and ſaid unto him ſighing; Alas, is it poſſible I ſhould ſee you again? and that the Gods amongſt all my bitter Misfortunes ſhould afford me this good one? to find you after I have ſo long lamented and bewailed your abſence? but alas, I find you wounded, and in Arms for our Enemies, in which, perhaps you have killed your Father, or your Brother, or both, for we hear no news of them, and they were in the Battel, as it ſeems by your Wounds you were alſo: Ah Spitridates, what cauſe has the King given you, that after five years Travels you ſhould return in Arms againſt him and your Countrey? My Maſter hearing this Lady ſpeak thus, was much ſurprized, and though he could not without trouble to himſelf, yet he would needs undeceive her: If I were he whom you think me to be (anſwered he unto her) I ſhould not diſown my ſelf, but ſince I am not, I ought not to let you go on in your Error, though perhaps it might have been advantageous unto me. What, ſaid the Lady, are you not my Son? No, Madam, anſwered my Maſter, I am ſo far from being your Son, that you have relieved an Enemy, but ſuch an Enemy, as hath done nothing which might in reaſon incite you particularly againſt him, ſince his deſign aims no other, than faithfully to ſerve that King in whoſe ſervice he is engaged. I ſee my Son (ſaid ſhe interrupting him) that you are aſhamed of what you have done, and will not confeſs who you are, ſince we hear no news of thoſe two which are ſo nearly related to you, and who perhaps you have fought withal, and knew not; nor will I (ſaid ſhe, leaving him) diſturb you in that condition you are in. After this, the Lady went out of the Chamber, and left my Maſter in much wonder, ſeeing they would needs take him for one whom he was not; He paſſed over that night quietly, for though he had loſt much Blood, yet no Fever ſeized on him; and his wearineſs cauſing him to ſleep, he was as well the next Morning, as one who had two ſuch great Wounds could poſſibly be hoped for.

This Lady, failed not to viſit him in the Morning, and renewed her Complaints: ſhe then ſaw there was ſome difference between Artamenes and Spitridates, but no more than ſhe thought five Years might alter, it being ſo long ſince ſhe ſaw him: My Son, ſaid ſhe to a Woman who was there, was not ſo big when he left us; he had not the ſame Symmetry of Face, ſo High and ſo Noble; but he was then young, and five Years might make a great change in a Man of his Years. Yet Artamenes, who would by no means lie unto her, ſpoke ſuch things unto her, as ſhe doubted of it: he beſeeched her that he might ſend a Letter unto the Lieutenant General of the Cappadocian Army, but ſhe would not conſent unto it.

No, ſaid ſhe unto him, I cannot be yet reſolved of my Doubts; My eyes tell me you are my Son, but your Words aſſure me you are my Enemy; and which of them ſoever you be, peradventure you have killed my Husband: at theſe words, Tears flowing in her Eyes; If ye be my Son (ſaid ſhe to him) I ought to pardon you, and though ye ſhould be an Enemy unto the King under whoſe Government we are at preſent, yet I ought to be compaſſionate, and pity you, ſince you are ſo unfortunate and generous as not to delude me; and for theſe Reaſons I will aſſiſt you. I know, my Son, that ſince you have forſaken the King of Pontus, I muſt hide you, as one that is delinquent; But, my Son, ſaid ſhe, I am your Mother, and moreover we are aſſured the King of Pontus is taken Priſoner, and you know the Princeſs his Siſter will not entertain you in his abſence; and we do every day receive a hundred ſecret Aſſiſtances, in conſideration of you; ſpeak therefore, I conjure you, and tell me exactly the Truth; Tell me whether you be Spitridates, and what is your true Name and Country.

My Maſter now found himſelf in a Labyrinth; there was no colour of Reaſon to tell he was Artamenes, for that would be to put ſuch a Man as he, perhaps into the hands of his Enemies; he beſeeched her therefore for the preſent, to believe that he was not Spitridates, and not to preſs him any further to tell his Name; he aſſured her, that the King whom he ſerved would not be pleaſed with it, and that for divers other Reaſons, he could not do it. This diſcourſe was long and tedious, and cauſed my Maſter's Wounds to bleed afreſh; a Fever ſeiſed upon him, and he was eight days very ill: During which time, nothing was ſpoke of but curing him, and during all which time, he was marvellous well treated by this Lady, though every day, ſhe ſometimes thought him an Enemy, and ſometimes her Son, but hearing at laſt, that her Husband, and her other Son were eſcaped the Battel and fled with the King of Phrygia, her Soul was more tranquile, and more capable of Reaſon.

The next morning when ſhe underſtood my Maſter was reaſonable well, ſhe would try another way, to diſcover whether he was her Son: She imployed that fair Lady, her daughter, whom my Maſter did principally obſerve at his firſt coming; and ſhe came unto him, with two other Women, and thus put him to a new trial. Brother, (ſaid ſhe to him) Madam, (anſwered he, interrupting her) I ſhould be infinitely honour'd in the Name, but ſince I am not Spitridates, I muſt needs undeceive you, and content my ſelf with the title of your moſt humble Servant. Whatſoever you are, replied this fair Lady, you deſerve more than that phraſe, ſince, conſideriug the ſtate we are in, there is none more unfortunate then we; yet to clear my Doubts, both mine, and others in the Houſe, I deſire you to take ſo much pains, as to open this Box, where perhaps, you may find ſomething which will pleaſe you; in ſaying ſo, ſhe preſented a Box, in which was a very rare Picture, and looked upon him with extream attention. Artamenes, who knew not why ſhe would have him open this Box, obeyed her, and was indeed well pleaſed with the Picture of a Lady admirably fair: but ſince he knew not who it repreſented, and having in his Heart another Picture which darkned the Beauty of this, there appeared no extraordinary ſurprize in his Eyes; he looked upon it as a fair thing indeed, but it moved him neither unto a great Joy, nor any Inquietude. This fair Lady obſerving the calmneſs with which he looked upon this Picture; Ah generous ſtranger (ſaid ſhe) I am now certain that you are not Spitridates, for he was never able to look upon this Picture with ſo much coldneſs; after theſe words ſhe left my Maſter, and went unto her Mother; You need no longer doubt (ſaid ſhe to her) but this Man is not Spitridates; for he beheld this Picture without any joy or turbulency at all; he grew neither pale, nor red at it; his Soul was quiet; his Eyes appeared neither pleaſant nor ſad, therefore it is impoſſible he ſhould be Spitridates: no, Madam (ſaid ſhe to her) he is not my Brother, ſince he is not a Lover of the Princeſs of Pontus; I muſt conclude he is not in Love, ſince he can look upon this Picture with ſo much indifferency;

he I ſay, who never heard her named without a Bluſh; nor ever ſaw her without Aſtoniſhment: Thus ſpoke this young fair Lady, and it was her words which did indeed moſt undeceive the old one. My Maſter came to know all this which I intend to tell you, from a Woman which looked unto him, and who being deſirous to oblige him, told him all ſhe knew.

So, Sir, this Lady being now fully perſwaded, that Artamenes was not Spitridates, did yet reſolve to treat him very well; and his Merit having already gained ſo powerful an influence upon her Heart, ſhe came to him the next morning, and found him in a good ſtate: Generous Stranger (ſaid ſhe to him) ſince you have no mind to be Spitridates, be therefore what you pleaſe; and let me loſe a Son whom I thought I had found: I beſeech you, let not the reſemblance he has unto you offend you, for of what condition ſoever you are, his Name cannot be very diſhonourable unto you, ſince his Anceſtors in loſing the Crown of Bithynia, have not loſt their Nobleneſs of Blood. Madam, ſaid Artamenes then unto her, I moſt humbly deſire your pardon, if I have not rendred unto you that reverence which is your Due, and my Duty. Excuſe not your ſelf (ſaid ſhe) in what you have not failed, ſince (added this Lady, ſighing) Princeſſes which live under the Dominion of an Uſurper, muſt not exact that, which perhaps their condition might another time require: Although, ſaid ſhe, you be not my Son, yet you do much reſemble him, and for that reaſon, I am obliged to render you your Liberty. If you be my Son, you are in no ſecurity within this Houſe; and if you be not my Son, yet you can have no more aſſurance of ſafety; therefore it were better that you depart, and I will cauſe you to be conducted unto what place you pleaſe. My Maſter was raviſhed with joy, at the generoſity of this Lady; he thanked her, and proteſted that he would ſerve her all the days of his Life; and perhaps more effectually than ſhe believed: To which end, he deſired her to lend him a Litter which might carry him to the Camp of Ciaxares. My maſter was yet far from being well; but Love adding new ſtrength unto him, he would depart the next morning, and go thither where he might hear Mandana talked on. He was waited upon with the young Chyrurgion who dreſſed him; and others who had orders, that if they met any of the King of Pontus's party, or the King of Phrygia, to ſay that Artamenes was a Couſin unto their Miſtreſs, whom they carried unto her, and who had been wounded in the laſt Battel. My maſter at departure, did receive a hundered Civilities from all theſe illuſtrious Perſons, which he rendred back unto them afterwards with Intereſt, promiſing them that 'ere long they ſhould hear from him.

As they went the way towards the Camp, he met ſome ſtragling Souldiers, of whom he enquired where the Army was; who anſwered that Philidaſpes the day before, went from the Camp to conduct the King of Pontus unto Sinope; So that changing their Road, they went to meet Philidaſpes, which they doubted not but to do, ſince Coaches and Priſoners marched ſlower than the Litter did: and he did meet them in the Plain, as you have been already informed. See, Sir, what my Maſter's Adventure was, when they thought him dead. Since the paſſage was ſomething extrordinary; Artamenes had ſo much curioſity as to ask the King of Pontus, whether there was a Prince called Spitridates, which reſembled him? The King of Pontus told him, that he had thought himſelf deceived ſeveral times, for that it was not poſſible any two ſhould be more like one another then Spitridates and he, both ſymmetry of Face, compoſure of Parts, and Stature.

But to return unto my diſcourſe where I left: After Ciaxares had heard, from my Maſter's own Mouth, all his Adventure; he admired his good his Fortune, and extreamly rejoyced at it; and after a long Diſcourſe, he left him and returned to Sinope. Yet notwithſtanding, it was reſolved that the next Morning, all the Plunder, and all the Priſoners ſhould enter the Town; and that at Night the King of Pontus, and Artamenes ſhould be conducted thither. Ciaxares was no ſooner departed, by my Maſter ſent to tell the Priſoner, King, he had obtained his deſire, which cauſed him to rejoice very much. Afterwards Artamenes thought of ſending back the Litter which was lent him; and in ſending it, he made choice of the richeſt and faireſt of all his Jewels, and preſented it unto that fair young Lady which ſhewed him the Picture, deſiring her, ſhe would honour him ſo much as to receive that poor teſtimony of his acknowledgment; not daring to ſpeak of any kind of gratuity unto the Princeſs her Mother, conſidering her high Generoſity: he did moſt nobly recompence the Chyrurgion which dreſſed him, and all thoſe of the Houſe which had been ſerviceable unto him: who were all extreamly well ſatisfied, as well with the richneſs of his Preſents, as with the knowledg of the manner how Artamenes was treated both by the King and all the Court: They imagined their Miſtreſs did not know the true quality of her Priſoner. After that my Maſter had given out all neceſſary Orders, and Night being come, he was all alone, and at liberty to entertain his Paſſion: I ſee my ſelf, (ſaid he unto himſelf) eſcaped from abundance of Dangers, and few there are which do not admire my good Fortune; but for all this good Fortune, which perhaps incites others to envy me, I cannot chuſe but eſteem my ſelf the moſt unhappy Man upon Earth; and doubtleſs ſhall ever be ſo until I ſhall obtain ſome teſtimony of my Princeſs Affection; or at leaſt that ſhe does favourably accept of mine. Alas, (ſaid he further,) if Feraulas have preſented that Letter which I commanded him, perhaps ſhe has read it with diſdain, and was ſo far from having any compaſſion, that ſhe was angry: Perhaps alſo (added he) ſhe has pardoned me, and pitty did ſo tender her Heart, that ſhe received my Declaration without hate, But admit ſhe did ſo (ſaid he) and pardoned me when ſhe thought me Dead, who knows whether ſhe will do ſo now I am Living? Perhaps Feraulas has not yet delivered it, and then I ſhall contiuue ſtill innocent in her thoughts, as I was at parting: But then alſo (ſaid this Prince) I ſhall be unhappy that way: for if ſhe do not know I love her, how dare I ever tell it? What would I have? (ſaid he yet) and what can I deſire? I fear that ſhe ſhould know of my Love, and yet I deſire ſhe did. I do entertain both Fears, and Hopes: I deſire to ſee Mandana, and am ſo near either my ſupream Felicity or my ſupream Misfortune, that my Soul muſt needs tremble; and the uncertainty of my good or my bad Deſtiny, that it diſturbs my Reaſon. In ſuch thoughts as theſe Artamenes paſt away a great part of the Night; yet ſleep ſeizing upon his Eyes, againſt his will, he was the next Morning in a very good condition; and the King's Chyrurgion aſſured him, that within a few days he would not only be able to quit his Bed, but his Chamber alſo, and be perfectly recovered.

He received Viſits from the Court all the day long; and ſent to preſent a Complement unto the Princeſs Mandana, who received it with much Civility, and returned him the like again; but it was after ſuch a manner, that though my Maſter did oftentimes repeat, word for word, all that ſhe ſaid unto him, and contemplated upon it, yet he could not pick any thing out of it, which might either fortify his Hopes, or encreaſe his Fears.

The morning was imployed in entering into Sinope with all the Booty and Plunder, and Priſoners, conducted by Philidaſpes after all the Mourning was taken of; And the Princeſs out of a Window in the Caſtle, beheld them all, with a Mind as turbulent as my Maſters. Night being come; the King of Pontus was conducted by Guards into the Town, and put into a place of Safety; but in paſſing under the Window of the Princeſs, he both ſaw her, and was ſeen, by Candle-light: This moved pitty in Mandana, and ſhame in the Priſoner: Artamenes followed the King of Pontus. The Inhabitants of Sinope knowing that he was to enter the Town in the Night, did light Candles in all the Streets hanging Lamps at every Window: ſo that by the ſhouts of Joy, and multitudes of Lights, this Night-Entry was very Triumphant and Magnificent. Artamenes was accompanied by all the Grandees of the Court, who conducted him to the King; my Maſter was in one thing leſs happy than the King of Pontus, for he ſaw not the Princeſs in paſſing under her Window, becauſe ſhe was gone to Bed immediately, and faigned to be ill. Marteſia, who from the firſt minute that her Miſtreſs heard Artamenes was alive, had obſerved much joy in her Eyes, was now much amazed to obſerve the Diſturbances in her Soul; therefore ſeeing none with her, and that ſhe might ſpeak freely: Madam, (ſaid ſhe to her) ſhall I ask whether it be barely ſome indiſpoſition in you which moves you to go to Bed, or is there ſome Misfortune hapned unto you which I am ignorant of, and which diſturbs that ſatisfaction which you might take from one of the happieſt days in all your Life? For indeed, Madam, you ſee the Wars are ended moſt glorioully; you ſee that King which you would not marry, in Priſon, and you ſee that Prince, whom you thought dead, and ſo much lamented, to be living. I confeſs, my dear Marteſia (anſwered the Princeſs) that I am very happy in many things, but not in all; and I am ſo ſenſible of my Misfortune, that I take no joy in all thoſe apparent Felicities, which thoſe who know not the bottom of my Heart, do think I do: Madam (replied Marteſia) what can it be that ſhould trouble you? The King loves you; all Cappadocia adores you: A Halcion Peace invites you unto all the Delights of the Court; and as the King's Phyſicians ſay, Artamenes will be quickly recovered. Artamenes (replied the Princeſs, ſighing) will perhaps be but too ſoon recovered; and though I wiſh him all manner of good Fortune, yet I would he were in ſuch a condition, as not to leave his Chamber until I were fully reſolved how I ſhould live with him. How, Madam (replied Marteſia, in a wonder, and interrupting her) Artamenes whom you wept for ſo bitterly, do you ſay, perhaps he ſhall be too ſoon recovered? Ah, Madam, certainly I did not rightly underſtand you; or elſe you did ill explain your ſelf: No, no, Marteſia, (replied ſhe) the croſſneſs of my Deſtiny is ſuch, as that I deſire not to ſee Artamenes as much as I did deſire his Life: For know (ſaid ſhe, in changing colour) that I do love Honour and Glory, above all other things; but I do not hate Artamenes ſo much as to be deprived of his converſation without out Repugnancy; yet you may well think Marteſia, th after he has let me know that he loves me, I ought no to give him that liberty which heretofore he had, an that I live with him, with more reſtraint, than I did i thoſe times when I had not that tenderneſs for him which I ſenſibly find to be in my Heart, in ſpite of all my Vertue. For indeed Marteſia (ſince I may diſcover th bottom of my Soul unto you) let me tell you, that i Artamenes had been ſo bold as to ſpeak unto me of an Love, I had then treated him but ill. I ſhould then have excluded him from my company, and perhaps I had leſ eſteemed him, becauſe then I ſhould have ſuſpected he had not a true eſteem of me: But this way which he takes to let me know his Love, (Compaſſion having ſofned my Heart) I have underſtood it without anger; and I have believed it without any difficulty; and ſince I ſa he could have no dangerous deſign in his Affection, I did not oppoſe and ſtifle it in the beginning; but I called into my Memory all his Services: and I repeated in my Mind all his Services, his Virtues, and all his rare Qualities a hundred and a hundred times over; al theſe have told me that he loved me in a moſt reſpectful manner: I have given more credit unto it than if he had told it: and I have more acknowledged it, than eve he could hope for: indeed Marteſia, his Death, gave Life unto my Friendſhip (not to give it any other phraſe) which is an Affection unto him moſt pure and innocent: Judg then, if, after I have given up my Soul unto ſuch a harmleſs Paſſion, it will be eaſy for me to reſiſt, and overcome it.

But, Madam, (ſaid Marteſia to her) is Artamenes more in fault now he is living than he was in his Grave? No anſwered the Princeſs, but he is more to be feared: No that I intend abſolutely to withdraw my Affection fro him: All that I can do, will be to reſtrain my ſelf fro giving him any ſigns of it. But, Madam (replied Marteſia) why will you puniſh him, who is not in any fault and why will you torment your ſelf in making him unhappy? Stay, Madam, until he give you ſome cauſe t complain; and if he ſpeak any thing unto you which ſha diſpleaſe you, then it will be time enough to deprive your ſelf of his Sight. But Marteſia (ſaid the Princeſs interrupting her) how do you think I can look upon him without extream Shame? and how can I baniſh out of my Soul, that Affection which I entertained when I thought him dead? For my part, Madam (replied Marteſia) I do confeſs unto you, that I cannot conceive what reaſon you can have to love Artamenes when he is dead, and hate him when he is alive. Ah Marteſia (cried Mandana) how far are my Thoughts from any Hate? And how happy would Artamenes be if I lov'd him a little leſs than I did! for indeed, if I did not diſtruſt my own Heart, I ſhould live with him as I did before: I would ſtay, as you bid me, until he gave me juſt cauſe of complaint, and reſt in quietneſs. But, Madam, (replied Marteſia) I ſee no cauſe why he ſhould ſo diſquiet you, for as he did write unto you, and as Feraulas told you, he is a Prince; neither do I ſee any cauſe why he ſhould be ſo offenſive unto you, in coming to tell you himſelf, what before he did write unto you: Ah my dear Marteſia, (replied the Princeſs) that which you tell me for my Conſolation, is that which moſt torments me; for if Artamenes were not of that Quality he ſaith he is, his boldneſs ſhould not have offended me, and dead as he was, I ſhould only have pitied his Folly and Misfortune: But now I find nothing which can offend me or anger me; upon the whole matter I muſt not chuſe my ſelf a Husband: Moreover, that fatal Cuſtom, which the Aſſyrians when they were Lords of Cappadocia did leave upon it, will not permit me any pretence or colour to juſtify the Affection of Artamenes unto me, and much leſs Mandana's unto him: So that Marteſia he muſt overcome himſelf; he muſt uſe all extream Violences to do it; he muſt render Artamenes unhappy, and me unfortunate: Me-thinks (ſaid ſhe) that I ſee him ſearching in my Eyes for the manner of my receiving his Letter: But alas, what do I ſay? will not Feraulas tell him, that he diſcovered no ſigns of Anger in my Mind? but that he ſaw me weep, and bluſh, and indeed tell him that he is ſure I love him? and perhaps that I loved him, before he had made me know he loved me? Ah Marteſia (ſaid ſhe) this Misfortune is befaln me, and it is in vain to hide my Thoughts from Artamenes; he knows it (ſaid ſhe) he knows it; and perhaps, does imagine it otherwiſe than it is, which cauſeth him to conceive ſome criminal hopes, and to prepare himſelf for offending me: Alas (ſaid ſhe) whoſe Misfortune ever equal'd mine? I muſt paſs away all my days in an unparallell'd retiredneſs: I muſt deprive my ſelf of all innocent Delights, leſt they ſhould render me ſuſpected: I muſt forbid entrance into my Soul any thing that tranſcends not ſevereſt Vertue.

I muſt give reſiſtance unto the Merits, the Services, and all the great Qualities of Artamenes; and my Heart muſt not give it ſelf up unto him, but at his Grave; yet perhaps, at this very hour, when I am ſpeaking of him, Artamenes repents that he ſpoke unto me ſo ſoon; and perhaps he thinks that he had been better entertained if he had ſpoke unto me the firſt minute he ſaw me; and thinks this rigid Vertue whereof I make ſuch ſtrick profeſſion, is but an artificial Cloak. But what ſhall I do? (ſaid ſhe) Certainly I do accuſe him unjuſtly, and he is innocent doubtleſs? No,no; Artamenes will interpret my Tears in another ſence; he will think that compaſſion only cauſed me to drop them; he knows that I do owe unto him the Life of the King my Father; and for that reaſon only I owe unto him my Sighs and my Tears; Let me be therefore more at reſt in my ſelf, (ſaid ſhe) let me be ſatisfied with mine own Innocency; let me only take away from Artamenes all occaſions of ſpeaking with him in private; let me hide from him that tenderneſs towards him, which I have entertained in my Heart, if I cannot overcome my ſelf; and let befal what will, let me reſolve rather to die, than to do, ſay, or think any thing which is not juſt and vertuous, and which does not give full ſatisfaction unto that Love which I have unto Glory. Thus did the glorious Mandana entertain her ſelf with Marteſia, whilſt my Maſter, who knew not whether ſhe had received his Letter or no, was more perplexed. Philidaſpes all this while almoſt never appeared; he ſaw the Princeſs at his entrance into Sinope, but that was all, and whilſt he went to give Orders for thoſe new Levies which he thought to command, and which were muſtered near a Caſtle, about ſixty Furlongs from Sinope, whereof he was Governour. The Princeſs had more Liberty to ruminate upon her Reſolutions: Mean while, my Maſter's hurts healed faſter than the Chyrurgions could hope for. He was in few days not only able to quit his Bed, but his Chamber alſo, and in a condition to go and preſent himſelf unto the King and Mandana: He wiſhed heartily that I were with him, that he might know what I had done; yet he thought it would be a long time before I came, for though he had ſent Orders unto me to come unto him, yet it was ſo far off from Sinope, where we were encamped, that without extraordinary haſte I could not come ſo ſoon: So that being preſſed on by his Paſſion, and in extream impatience to ſee the Princeſs, after he had been with the King, he preſented himſelf unto Mandana, and went with ſuch agitation of Spirit, as the like was never ſeen until now; he was wont to approach with an ordinary reverent Fear: But now, he reſented all manner of Fears that was poſſible to be imagined. The Princeſs for her part, knowing that Artamenes would come unto her Chamber, did often change Colours, and ſometimes would be angry, that ſhe was not abſolute Miſtreſs of her own Heart. As ſhe ſat upon her Bed, it was more eaſy for her to hide the diſorders of her Mind from Artamenes, who, as ill luck to him would have it, did find much company with the Princeſs. He ſaluted her with all befitting Reverence, and ſhe received him with all the Civility that a Princeſs of Cappadocia could pay unto a Man who had obtained for her ſo many glorious Victories, and brought her a King a Priſoner; yet notwithſtanding, my Maſter obſerved, that her Civilities were expreſſed with ſo much Reſervedneſs, as that he ſometimes believed ſhe had ſeen what he had written: Doubtleſs ſhe knows (ſaid he in himſelf) what I deſire ſhe ſhould, and which I fear ſhe does not: Preſently after, when the Princeſs had given him ſome obliging Language or other ; I am deceived (ſaid he) ſhe knows i not, and I dare not tell her of it. The Princeſs on th other ſide, ſhe was very much perplexed ; ſhe conden ned all her Thoughts ; ſhe repented of all ſhe ſaid, wh ſhe commended Artamenes ; ſhe thought he did inter pret all her Commendations to his prejudice ; and th ſhe would be all ſilence, or anſwer coldly : yet ſhe feare to diſoblige him, and againſt her own Inclination di repair that coldneſs with ſome ſlight Civility. This Vi did ſo paſs, and Mandana carried it ſo handſomly, th Artamenes could not diſcover her true Reſentments, an he retired with more Love, and more Inquietude tha before. At his return, there came unto him an old Ca tain of Horſe, who deſiring to ſpeak in private wi him, and told him, that about three or four Hours ſince he met with a Man on Horſeback coming to the Tow as he was. He demanding whither he went? the Ma did anſwer him very ſurlily ; afterwards falling into diſ courſe of diverſe Matters, they quarrelled and fought that there were certain Men came in, and parted them But during this Combat the Man dropt a Letter, which I took up after he was gone, in which there migh perhaps be ſomething worth his notice. Artame thanked the Captain, and taking the Letter, it contain ed theſe words :

DO not fail in any thing which you have promiſed ; be aſſured, that for my part, I will not neglect to what I ought ; make ſure of the Guards, which have engag their faith unto you, as I will of the Souldiers which I ſh bring unto you : Prepare Men which ſhall obſerve reſpect u that Perſon who moſt of all the World deſerves it, and prom them ſuch Recompences, as are worthy of their Services. Mo over, though you have told me, and though I have promiſed y that my Paſſion cannot endure it ſhould be you only that ſho work out all my good Fortune, ſo ſtay for me, before you begin execute your deſign ; for peradventure it may ſo fall out, th when the Princeſs ſhall ſee the Prince of Aſſyria at her Fe ſhe will forgive his Violencies, or at leaſt excuſe them : And ſhe is [illegible] ignorant that [illegible] is in love with and that Philidaſpes is Son to the Queen Nitocris. So it is fit it ſhould be I which ſhould acquaint her with both, as ſoon as we have carried her away, to the end that we may leſſen her diſpleaſure, by acquainting her with my Condition and Quality. He which brings this Letter is faithful: Truſt him freely with your Anſwer; and make haſte, if you will oblige the moſt amorous Prince upon the Earth, and the moſt thankful.

After Artamenes had read this Letter, he was extreamly ſurprized; he commended the Fidelity of the Captain; promiſed him recompence, and that he would make it known unto the King; and after he had cauſed him to ſtay a while, he gave him a very good Horſe, and a fair ſuit of Arms; then he diſmiſſed him, appointing him not to be out of the way, in caſe he ſhould have any need of him. After this Officer was departed, Artamenes did read over the Letter again: O Heavens, ſaid he, Philidaſpes is the Prince of Aſſyria, and Philidaſpes is in love with Mandana; and Philidaſpes would carry her away: I know his Hand, and I know by it, that he is not more happy than my ſelf, the Princeſs is yet ignorant both of his Quality and his Love: Let me gather ſome benefit out of this ignorance; let me be faithful unto my enemy, and not diſcover him, leſt in the diſcovery I ſhould prejudice my ſelf; his Conſpiracy muſt be defeated ſome other way: I muſt put the Princeſs into ſafety by taking away his Life.

He preſently ſent to know where Philidaſpes was; but notwithſtanding all his Care and Diligence, it was not poſſible for him to find him out. Some ſaid he was in that Caſtle of which he had the Command; others aſſured, he was not; ſome ſaid, he was rid out of Town for five days; and moſt ſaid, they knew not where he was.

Mean time, as Artamenes did not know the time when this Conſpiracy ſhould be acted, he found the Matter required quickneſs; yet it was a long while before he could reſolve to acquaint Mandana that Philidaſpes was one day to be the King of Aſſyria: He remembred that when he came to Babylon, this Prince was departed thence two days before; and he alſo remembred that he ſaw him in the Temple of Mars, the firſt day he came to Sinope. What ſhall I do (ſaid he) againſt this dangerous Rival? ſhall I acquaint the King with this Plot, without imparting it to the Princeſs? Or, ſhall I go to the Princeſs before the King? Since the matter relates directly unto her, perhaps ſhe will be offended if I do not make my firſt Addreſſes unto her. Go then Artamenes, and diſcover the whole truth unto her, and diſguiſe it not at all. But what do I ſay? am I certain that I can be as good as my word? No, no, it is impoſſible? Can I tell my Princeſs, that my Rival loves her? and that he is one of the greateſt Princes of the World? and that he wants nothing to compleat his good Fortune, but the conſent of the fair Mandana? I that dare not ſpeak for my ſelf, muſt I ſpeak for my Enemy? Muſt I ſtifle my own Sighs, and conceal my own Tears, and go to acquaint my Princeſs with the Raptures and Paſſions of my Rival? A Rival that is handſom, who has a Heart and a Soul, and whom I have often heard the fair Mandana commend. Ah, No, no; I had far better die.

But on the other ſide, (ſaid he) The Conſpiracy is ready to break out: if I do not ſhew that which Philadaſpes hath written, but content my ſelf only to ſay that there is a dangerous Deſign on foot, and that he is the Contriver; who knows whether I ſhall be believed. Every one knows that we two are not very good Friends and this Conſpiracy has ſo little probability in it, that before I can perſwade them it is true, and endeavour to prevent it, it will be executed, the Town will be ſurprized, the Princeſs carried away, and this happy Rival will carry with her all that can induce me to love my Life. Speak then, Artamenes, ſpeak for thy Rival, to the end thou mayeſt tranſact againſt him: If he were in a place where I could find him, I would acquaint him with my Paſſion, and not diſcover his unto the Princeſs and after that endeavour to leave him in a condition unlikely to carry any one away: Indeed I would do that which I am bound to do; he ſhould die, or I would die, and ſo all our Differences would be terminated. But, alas, he he hides himſelf, he keeps out of my Violence; I know no more of his Enterprize, but as much as cauſes Jealouſies, Fears, Hatred and Deſpair: I am ignorant who are his Accomplices; I know neither when nor how they muſt act, I only know that they are deſigning my Ruin. What ſhall I do, unfortunate Man? I loſe time, whilſt mine Enemy is advancing his Deſign. Go then, go the Princeſs, Tell her that which never any Lover but my ſelf did or would do, to the Party loved: Peradventure (ſaid he) I may draw ſome Advantage out of my Misfortune by it; I may chance to diſcover, in her fair Eyes, the motion of her Soul, and ſee the Secrets of her Heart; and perhaps alſo, that after I have ſpoke for another, I may find opportunity to ſpeak for my ſelf. Go then, unhappy Lover; follow as thy Deſtiny leads thee, and defer it no longer: Hope ſtill, that in declaring the Love of Philidaſpes unto Mandana, thou mayeſt cauſe her to hate him; and make all haſte poſſible leſt he execute his Deſign, and carry her away, elſe he will get her into his Power, and there he'l keep her: perhaps he will win her Heart, obtain his Pardon, and for ever enjoy her.

This laſt Thought moved him to reſolve, not to loſe one Minute more of time, but to go preſently unto Mandana; and he did ſo in all haſte, deſiring ſo much favour as to ſpeak with her in private. The Princeſs did imagine that his drift was to ſpeak unto her concerning his Love, and therefore was offended at him; ſending him word ſhe was buſy, and he could not ſee her. Artamenes even deſperate at this Anſwer, ſent her word the ſecond time, that he deſired to ſpeak but one Minute with her concerning ſomething which related unto the Service of the King and her, and which would not admit of any delay; Mandana wondering at this urgency of Artamenes, did think to deny the ſight of him; but fearing that his Buſineſs might indeed concern the Service of the King, ſhe commanded he ſhould enter, and commanded Marteſia, with another of her Women, not to ſtir out of her Cloſet. My Maſter then entred, and not being able with his own Mouth to relate the Paſſion of Philidaſpes unto the Princeſs, Madam, ſaid he to her (after he had ſaluted her with much Reverence, and preſenting the Letter which Philidaſpes had writ unto her) you will there find the juſtification of my Importunity: Artamenes pronounced theſe words with ſuch a troubled Mind, that Mandana fearing it was ſome new Device to ſpeak unto her concerning his Love, was in a mind to refuſe it; but taking it afterwards, with a trembling Hand, and opening it with a Bluſh, ſhe was cleared of all her Doubts, and ſhe learned that from Artamenes, which ſhe never did think to learn: Immediately there appeared much Anger in her Eyes, and my Maſter received ſo much ſatisfaction, as to know aſſuredly, that Philidaſpes had no deep ſhare in the Heart of Mandana. I am much beholden to you (ſaid ſhe to him) for giving me notice of ſo important a Buſineſs; but tell me, I pray you, all that you know concerning the Deſign. Artamenes then told her how he came by the Letter, and told her further, that if he could have found Philidaſpes, he would have defeated the Conſpiracy, and never acquainted her with it. The Princeſs then thanked him as civilly, as the trouble wherein ſhe was would permit her; and wondering extreamly at this Adventure; what (ſaid ſhe) will Philidaſpes uſurp a Crown by Violence and Treaſon, as I do imagine his Deſign is? But that a Lover ſhould manifeſt his Love by a raping way, is a thing without Example, and above my Patience: Mine, I ſay, (added ſhe, in all diſorder) who could not indure a Declaration of Love from one of the greateſt Princes upon Earth, after ten Years Service, Reſpects, Sighs, and Submiſſions!

Artamenes heard theſe words with much ſorrow; and fearing to find the like, he interrupted her, and asked her what was her pleaſure he ſhould do in this Buſineſs? I would have you (ſaid ſhe) go with me to the King and acquaint him with it, and not to forſake me when I ſhall ſtand in need of your Valour. As long as I live (replied my Maſter) you ſhall not need to fear Philida- pes; and be confident, Madam, if you pleaſe, that I will be no leſs ſolicitous to defeat his wicked Deſign, than you your ſelf are. I am obliged unto you (replied the Princeſs) but let us loſe no time, but preſently go to the King. I know not, Madam (ſaid my Maſter) whether my Zeal to you will not ſeem a neglect of Duty unto him, and whether he will not take it ill, that I have told you the raſh enterprize of Philidaſpes, before I advertiſed him. What you ſay (anſwered the Princeſs) is not without ſome colour, therefore he muſt be told you met with me accidentally, as you were coming with the Letter unto him, and ſo you told it unto me: Soveraign Power (ſaid ſhe) is a thing ſo nice, ſo delicate, and ſenſible, that how good ſoever your Intentions are, yet perhaps the King will not like your proceeding; ſo that it is not amiſs, if you tell him a handſome little innocent Lye, to colour the matter. Then they went to Ciaxares his Chamber, and told him what they knew, and the manner how they came to know it: Artamenes ſent to ſeek the Captain who gave him the Letter, to the end the King might underſtand from the Mouth of that Officer, the whole matter. Ciaxares knowing the Hand of Philidaſpes, did certainly conclude it to be a dangerous Conſpiracy: He himſelf remembred, and knew that the Prince of Aſſyria was not at Babylon, nor had been a long time; therefore that confirmed him in his opinion, that Philidaſpes was he: But ſince the Accomplices were not mentioned in the Letter, they could not gueſs at them. The Princeſs and my Maſter ſuſpected Aribeus to be one; yet ſince they knew the King loved him, they durſt not openly declare their Thoughts: Mean time, Artamenes having Orders to do whatſoever he ſhould think fit for the ſafety of the Princeſs, cauſed all the Guards of the Caſtle and Town to be changed; and having cauſed all the Inhabitants of the Town to take Arms; he placed Courts of Guard in every Street; afterwards he asked leave of the King, that he might go and chaſtiſe Philidaſpes: but Ciaxares would not permit him to go out of the Town; and the Princeſs did ſo ſtrongly oppoſe it, that he thought no more of it, ſince indeed, they knew not very well where he was. The ſix thouſand Men which conducted the King of Pontus, were diſpoſed of unto ſeveral Gates and Avenues about Sinope; for it was not doubted but Philidaſpes would make uſe of thoſe four thouſand Men which were about the Caſtle, whereof he was Governor, to execute his Deſign. Aribeus carried it extream craftily, and after the King told him of it, he ſeemed to be very zealous againſt it, and blamed Philidaſpes very much, and did ſeemingly moſt endeavour to apprehend him; ſince it was not known whether he was lying hid in the Town, or in his Caſtle, they were much confuſed; yet notwithſtanding the next Morning, Artamenes was ſo urgent, that he was permitted to take the ſix thouſand Men, and go to ſummon the Caſtle, to be ſurrendred up unto him, and alſo to fight the four thouſand Men which were there, in caſe he found any oppoſition: But he was mightily amazed when he came thither, and found none in the Caſtle, and not a Man of the four thouſand quartered about it: All he found was, that indeed Philidaſpes had been there, but went out the laſt Night, and that about thirty Furlongs from thence, he disbanded all his Troops, and went with a ſmall Company unto a Forreſt which was not far off: Artamenes went thither, and ſearched all about, ſending many ſmall Parties unto ſeveral Quarters of the Forreſt to hear of News, yet none was to be met with, only ſome Souldiers which fled and knew nothing, but that long ſince Philidaſpes endeavoured to get the love of the Souldiers; and that ere long he did intend to imploy them upon ſome important Deſign. Artamenes then ſeeing he could hear no more of him, returned to Sinope, to render an account to the King and Princeſs of what he had done. Mean while they kept up their Guards, and held an obſervant Eye upon all thoſe who had any Command of Forces in the Town. After all this Tumult and Trouble, Artamenes being alone in his Cloſet, did recall into his Memory, his laſt Adventures, and to grieve at that extream Violence, which he had obſerved in the Princeſs's Mind, when ſhe was told of the love of Philidaſpes; What ſhall I do (ſaid he) and what can I hope for from her, who ſpeaks of the moſt puiſſant Prince of all Aſia, with ſo much pride and diſdain? yet (ſaid he) ſhould I have been more happy if ſhe had ſpoke with leſs Rigour than ſhe did? for as ſhe has expreſt her ſelf, I have no cauſe of jealouſy, and therefore need not to fear the greateſt torment of Love: But alas, although ſhe leſſens my Jealouſy, yet ſhe augments my deſpair; for ſince one of the greateſt Princes of the World, hath declared his Love unto her, and done ten years Services, Reſpects, Sighs, and Submiſſions, yet all this paſs for a Crime in her Mind; what can I hope for, who have not a Crown to preſent unto her? I who perhaps ſhall not be very well entertained by the King my Father, when I ſhall return into Perſia? I (I ſay) who am ſuch a one as I dare not tell her, nor cannot tell her unleſs I incur her Hatred? O Heavens! what will the prevention of this dangerous Conſpiracy avail me? and why ſhould I wiſh my Rival removed, ſince the Heart of Mandana is inflexible, and ſo hard that nothing can move it? As he was thus entertaining himſelf with theſe Thoughts, Chriſantes and I arrived, and told him all our Adventures: After our firſt welcomes, and after Chriſantes who was more weary with the haſte we made, than I was, went to reſt himſelf: My Maſter embracing me with a moſt obliging tenderneſs: What Feraulas (ſaid he to me) is become of the Letter which I gave you? is it yet in your Hands? or did you deliver it the Princeſs, when you came to Sinope, as I was told you did? Sir, (replied I) this demand, does call in queſtion the Fidelity of Feraulas; and you cannot doubt of my exact Obedience, but doubt alſo of my Affection to you: What Feraulas (ſaid he unto me) then you have delivered it? yes, Sir, ſaid I, and ſhe has received it: Ah Feraulas (ſaid he) do not make me deſpair; and if Mandana told you then any thing which diſpleaſed her, I think it were good that you did not acquaint me with it; yet notwithſtanding (ſaid he, not giving me leave to ſpeak) it is better that I knew the whole Truth, that I may no longer trouble my ſelf with an unfortunate Life, and preſerve an unprofitable fitable hope. Sir, ſaid I, you are far more happy than you think you are. No, no, Feraulas, (anſwered he) do not flatter me, and do as I did at firſt bid you. No, Sir, (ſaid I to him) I do not diſguiſe the Matter; and then I exactly told him all that the Princeſs ſaid unto me. I repreſented unto him her Sorrows; I told him of her Sighs, and that I ſaw a deluge of Tears flow from her Eyes; that ſhe ſpoke unto me with extream tenderneſs; that for his ſake ſhe would have me ſerve her; that ſhe was fully informed of his Quality; that I told her nothing but what was his pleaſure ſhe ſhould know; and that if any Judgment were to be given of Eſteem and Friendſhip, by the Sorrows which ſhe teſtified; I aſſured him, he was then at a very high rate in her Fancy. Ah, Feraulas, (ſaid he to me) all that you have told me, relates only unto poor dead Artamenes: But who knows whether Artamenes living, or if Artamenes were changed into Cyrus, he ſhould be ſo happy? He muſt hope well, (ſaid I) and I aſſure you, that I ſee great appearances he will.

My Maſter hearkened unto all I ſaid, as if a God were ſpeaking unto him; and I got my ſelf ſo much Credit in his Opinion by this welcome News which I told him, that from that time he did me ſo much honour as to acquaint me with all his Thoughts: He cauſed me to repeat a hundred tiimes over what I told him before; and he was ſo inquiſitive, as he would almoſt have me tell him what the Princeſs thought, and what ſhe ſaid after I was gone out of her Cloſet, but I could not tell him that; for as yet there was not ſuch Amity betwixt Marteſia and me, although truly it was not long after that I profeſſed my ſelf her Servant, and became her Confident. Artamenes then finding himſelf much more happy than he hoped, could not leave putting further Queſtions unto me: ſometimes concerning Things paſt, and ſometimes what I thought of future Events? Yet notwithſtanding all this Joy which I had brought him, ſometimes his Soul was not ſerene, but feared that Artamenes would not be ſo happy living as he was Dead. And certainly his Fears were not without Foundation; for at that very time when I was thus with him, Marteſia, who accidentally did meet Chriſantes and me, as we arrived, went to advertiſe her Miſtreſs of it. Ah, Marteſia, (ſaid ſhe to her) what do you tell me? and what is Feraulas going to tell Artamenes? I ſuppoſe (ſaid this wiſe Princeſs) that to gain the Love of his Maſter, he will tell a hundred things which I never ſaid unto him. He can tell nothing (replied Marteſia) but that he heard you ſigh often, and that he ſaw you weep, for the death of a Man, who perhaps you would weep for again if he were really dead. I confeſs it (anſwered Mandana) but if he were dead, he could never come to know my Weakneſs. No (replied Marteſia) nor ever acknowledg it by his Services and Reſpects. But (ſaid the Princeſs) Artamenes will now know it by Feraulas, that I have done ſuch things as are never uſed to be done but unto ſuch as we love. 'Tis true, Madam, (ſaid Marteſia) but would you have Artamenes believe you hate him? he who has a thouſand, and a thouſand times expoſed his Life in your Service; who has preſerved the King's, your Father; who has gained ſo many Battels; who has brought a King a Priſoner; and who at this very time prevents a Conſpiracy which aims at your Perſon. No, Marteſia, (anſwered the Princeſs) I would not have Artamenes think I am ſtupid, ungrateful, and inſenſible, as I ſhould be if I ſhould hate him: But as I would not have him think I hate him, ſo I ſhould be very glad if he would not think I love him: I wiſh that he ſhould deſire it without hope, and content himſelf with a great eſteem and much acknowledgement. Theſe Diſtinctions are too delicate and nice, (replied Marteſia) and it is not an eaſy matter to keep within that juſt mediocrity which you propoſe, nor do I think you can do it your ſelf. Mock not at my Weakneſs (anſwered Mandana) but help me to hide it, in not forſaking me when Artamenes is with me; for I do confeſs I ſhould be very ſorry he ſhould urge me to baniſh him. See, Sir, how the Princeſs and my Maſter did both of them reaſon the Matter in private: indeed the Matter was carried, as ſhe reſolved it ſhould, for during fifteen days it was abſolutely impoſſible for Artamenes to ſpeak with the Princeſs privately: ſhe carried ſo handſomly and with ſo much Civility to my Maſter, as he could not except against it. Yet notwithſtanding, he thought himſelf very unhappy, and not daring to complain of Mandana, did yet perpetually complain of his rigorous Deſtiny; he knew very well, that the Princeſs was the true cauſe of his Diſtempers, but he had ever ſo great a reſpect unto her, that he would never accuſe her, but when he could find no Excuſe, nor no other cauſe of his Misfortunes: yet after theſe Fifteen days, though Mandana did very obſtinately avoid all manner of occaſions to be alone with Artamenes; yet Fortune, for all her ſeverity, brought it ſo about, that my Maſter found an opportunity to talk in private with her.

The Princeſs, ſince the Prince of Aſſyria attempted againſt her (for we will no longer call him Philidaſpes) never went out of the Town to take the Air; all her Walks were confined unto Gardens within the Walls, which were of no great Circumference. Thither ſhe ordinarily went when the Sun grew low; ſhe was always waited upon by very many, ſo that it was impoſſible for my Maſter to ſpeak unto her in any Language but that of Eyes; yet it was a Language which ſhe would not underſtand nor anſwer, for ſince the return of Artamenes ſhe was very wary of her Looks. So it happened, that the King would diſcourſe in private with the Princeſs in the Garden; every one, out of reverence, retired to the other ſide; and as this Diſcourſe continued long, ſo thoſe who were not abſolutely to wait upon the King, did by degrees depart: ſo that when the King went out, there were no more Men left in the Garden, than were to wait upon him. My Maſter offering to follow him, and Ciaxares ſeeing the Princeſs alone with her Women; no, Artamenes, (ſaid the King to him) I will leave you to entertain my Daughter, and to divert her from that Solitude which ſhe is apt unto. This Prince was raviſh'd at this Command, and obeyed it with joy; and the Princeſs who was extremly ſurpriſed at the Accident, could not find any pretence to prevent it: ſhe looked all about for Marteſia, but ſaw her not; for ſhe ſeeing all the Court in the Garden, could not imagine the Princeſs would be in any need of her to prevent Artamenes from ſpeaking unto her; ſo that ſhe went to diſpatch other Buſineſs. There were yet four or five other of her Women with her; yet they having received no particular command to keep neer her, as long as Artamenes was with her, my Maſter no ſooner began to lead her in her Walk, but all they ſtaid ſome ten or twelve paces behind: The Princeſs was then in that Arbour which is directly oppoſite to the Garden Door: ſo that though ſhe had a deſire to retire her ſelf, yet ſhe muſt of neceſſity walk that out. She would always begin to diſcourſe, to the end ſhe might prevent my Maſter in his Intention, who being tranſported with Paſſion, and invited unto it by this favourable opportunity, interrupted her, and with much reverence ſaid unto her: If the poor Services which I had the happineſs to do unto the King, have any ways obliged you, (as you have divers times done me ſo much honour as to ſay they have) then I moſt humbly entreat you, Madam, do not go away ſo ſoon, but do me that honour, and give me ſo much liberty, as to diſcourſe one hour in private with me. If it be, (anſwered the Princeſs) to diſcourſe concerning any thing which relates unto the King my Father, I ſhall moſt gladly conſent unto it; but if it be not, I cannot believe you have any ſuch Buſineſs with me as muſt be diſcours'd of in private. The Princeſs bluſh'd as ſhe pronounced theſe laſt words, and my Maſter continued ſpeaking unto her very low; That which I deſire of you (ſaid he) is more eaſy than you imagine, ſince it is abſolutely in your own diſpoſe, without implying the King's Conſent: But, Madam, (ſaid he) why do you fear Artamenes? and why will you not hearken unto him? I fear, (replied ſhe) that he does not know me well; and I fear leſt he ſhould deſire ſuch things as I could not conſent unto; Therefore, if he will take my Counſel, he ſhall not expoſe himſelf to be denied. No, Madam, (replied Artamenes) my Soul cannot be ſatisfied with that; I muſt either abſoutely leave the Court; I muſt fly away for ever; I muſt die in deſpair, or elſe the Illuſtrious Fair Mandana muſt hear me: I deſire but this one only Favour, I ask no more, and if you will be pleaſed to grant it, Artamenes will eſteem himſelf moſt happy. As often as you deſire, (replied the Princeſs) to ſpeak in private, I do always imagine you come to tell me of ſome new Conſpiracy; and that there is ſome other Philidaſpes, whoſe ill Deſign I muſt know, and puniſh, if it be poſſible. 'Tis true (replied my Maſter) that which I have to tell you, is not ſo far unlike that of Philidaſpes, but you may gueſs at it, ſince that ſame Cauſe which moves him to act, moves me to ſpeak: But, Madam, far from my Thoughts be it to do you any Violence: My Thoughts are only to die; and I deſire nothing from you, but that it may be permitted me to hope, from your Goodneſs, for ſome teſtimonies of Compaſſion when you ſhall hear your Rigour has caus'd my Death: ſuch as you were pleaſed to afford me when laſt you thought me dead by the Hands of your Enemies: This, Madam, is all the Favour that I ask, and all that I will preſent unto the illuſtrious and moſt Fair Mandana.

The Princeſs being much ſurpriz'd at this Diſcourſe, would not give any ſuddain or tumultuous Anſwer, but deſigning to ſatisfy her own virtue, without giving a check unto that Amity which ſhe bore unto my Maſter, ſhe took a little longer time for it; therefore ſeeing a green Seat near her, ſhe ſat down, and my Maſter ſtood by hér, bending himſelf down the better to underſtand her, whilſt the Princeſs's Women, leaning againſt a Rail ſome ſeven or eight paces off, did talk together. As the Princeſs did ſit, and Artamenes aſſumed again his Diſcourſe, ſhe prevented him, and told him thus: I ſee, Feraulas, thought my Tears very precious, ſince he would not hide them from you: and the Compaſſion which I had for the dead Artamenes, has made living Artamenes very bold; Therefore ſince I my ſelf did contribute unto your Fault, I will not treat you ſo ſeverely as if you had not this Excuſe: And I think thoſe Obligations which I have to you, do require that I ſhould not baniſh you upon a light Occaſion; but Artamenes, after this tenderneſs which I had towards you, and yet ſtill have, you muſt repent your ſelf of it, and correct your ſelf for it. If I ſhould repent that I loved you (anſwered my Maſter) you have pronounced the Sentence of Death upon me; and I will not defer the execution: but, Madam, this is a thing which I never did, nor ever can do. Repent at leaſt, replied the Princeſs, that you ever told me of it; and reſolve with your ſelf never to ſpeak of it any more. Since I have ſpoke of it once (anſwered my Maſter) if you forbid me to ſpeak of it any more, I doubt I ſhall not obey you, and my Death within a few days will tell you of my Paſſion: But, Madam, I muſt tell you once, I muſt acquaint you with my Love, ſince elſe perhaps you will never know it: I conjure you, Madam, not to refuſe me this Favour: Remember, Madam, that you told me, he who has the honour to ſpeak unto you, had the good Fortune to be lamented by you, after he took upon him the boldneſs to write unto you, that he loved you. 'Tis true (replied the Princeſs, much diſordered) but it was principally becauſe you having never told me of it, I pittied you. Continue then in the ſame bounds and limits wherein you lived before; and I will keep the ſame diſpoſitions which I had. But, Madam, (anſwered Artamenes) I cannot recal what's paſt, and I can do no leſs then I have writ. 'Tis true (replied Mandana) but you may forbear telling me of it any more. Though that were poſſible, Madam, (replied Artamenes) yet my Eyes, and all my Actions would ſpeak it for me, and my Death would preſently after more ſtrongly confirm it unto you, than all my Words can do. Moreover, Madam, do not think that I have rendred my ſelf your Slave without a Combate: I have reſiſted you as much as I could: and perhaps I had ſtronger reaſons then you think I had to do ſo: I ſaw you, Madam, and I loved you, though I uſed the utmoſt of my Endeavours to the contrary; yet for all that, I could not break my Chains, nor ſhake off my Fetters; and I have ever worn them with as much patience as reſpect: More than this, Madam, I have ſerved the King, or rather you, ſince I never thought upon any but you; and ſince the Arms of Cappadocia have been fortunate in my hands, it muſt be attributed unto that ambition which ſwell'd my Soul to render my ſelf worthy of your Love: You know, Madam, how I have lived; you know that I never ſpoke one word unto you which could diſpleaſe you; and I had not ſpoke unto you of my Love, but when I thought I ſhould never ſpeak more: I concealed my Love till death, and certainly if I had not told you of it when I was thought to be in my Grave, I had never told it with my Tongue: But, Madam, ſince your Tears revived me; ſince the Gods did ceaſe thoſe Sorrows which you reſented at my loſs, by giving me Life, why will you ſo cruelly puſh me into my Coffin? and why will you not afford ſome pity upon an unfortunate Prince, ſince you had ſome compaſſion on him when he was thought to be dead? It is becauſe (replied Mandana) that the dead Prince did expiate his Fault in dying, and the Living Prince did revive his Crime with his Reſurrection. Indeed, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe, with a very ſerious look) I do confeſs that I much eſteem you; that I have many Obligations upon me towards you; and that your ſuppoſed Death did much grieve me; but at that very ſame time I alſo declare, that I loved my own Honour and Glory much more then I eſteem Artamenes; though I eſteem him very much; and though I am infinitely tender of you, yet I would reſiſt and overcome it rather than conſent you ſhould entertain me with a Paſſion which will render me ſuſpected. Ah, Madam, (ſaid Artamenes) how ill inſtructed are you with that Love which you have procured in my Heart? and how little do you know with what Zeal I love you? Know, Madam, that the purity of my Paſſion does equal the Purity of your own glorious Soul: yes, Divine Princeſs, I do love you after ſuch a Reverential manner, that I would for ever diſclaim my own Heart, if it ſhould entertain any unjuſt deſire. I love, and prefer the Glory of Mandana before my own; and if I did find in my ſelf the leaſt vitious

Thought, I durſt never be ſo bold as to ſpeak unto her of Love. Moreover, Madam, if my Birth and Quality had rendred me unworthy to carry your Fetters, I ſhould break them, in giving my ſelf a Death; and I ſhould never have ſuffered the fair and illuſtrious Mandana to have a Slave unworthy of her. O I wiſh to the Gods,that Artamenes did merit that glorious Title by his own Vertues, as he merits it by his Quality; yet, Divine Mandana, it is for the love of you that Artamenes is only Artamenes; and is ſo far from being taken for the Son of a Great King, that he paſſes only for a Man whom Fortune favours: But,Madam, in dedicating himſelf unto your Service, he ceaſeth not to be what he is, to wit, one that ever had a great Soul, and always uncapable of any unjuſt Thought. Do not think, I beſeech you, that I have known you ſo ill that my Heart can ſuſpect you of any Weakneſs: No, Madam, I never could think the Princeſs Mandana was ever capable of any violent Paſſion, yet I hoped that ſhe would tolerate me and my Paſſion, ſince it was not oppoſite unto her Vertue; for indeed, Madam, I dare ſue for nothing elſe but only permiſſion to love you, and to tell you ſo. You ask too much by half (anſwered the Princeſs bluſhing) and I ſhould be unworthy of that innocent Paſſion, which you do aſſure me you bear unto me, if I ſhould conſent unto what you deſire, and if I ſuffered you to tell me that more than once, which all others, except you, never told me without being hated.

This Exception is moſt glorious unto me, Madam, (replied Artamenes) but this Prohibition is alſo moſt rigorous. I would gladly know what Crime I have committed ſince my Return? You have told me that (anſwered Mandana) which you ought not to have told me, that's your Crime. Then, Madam, I muſt have loſt my Life, (ſaid Artamenes) for indeed it is come to that paſs as I could not live and not love you, nor love you without telling you, nor be ſilent without dying. The Princeſs then was ſilent a good while; afterwards, beginning to ſpeak, I muſt needs tell you Artamenes (ſaid ſhe to him) that you do extreamly anger me: I do eſteem you, I am much obliged to you, and yet I have much ado to forbear baniſhing you: Apply your ſelf I conjure you to regulate your Thoughts, if it be poſſible; eſteem Mandana as ſhe ought to be, then ſhe will not be offended: but on the contrary, as ſhe is ſatisfied by the ſecret teſtimony of her Soul's Purity, ſo ſhe does ingenuouſly confeſs unto you that ſhe is joyed Artamenes does value her, and perhaps that Artamenes loves her; but ſhe would have this Affection limited, and kept within bounds. Then ſhe would have that which is not poſſible (anſwered my Maſter): but that which is moſt equitable and fit (replied the Princeſs) for indeed Vertue does preſcribe limits unto all things. I have already told you, Madam, (replied Artamenes) that my Paſſion does not contradict Vertue. Time and your Silence will manifeſt that (anſwered Mandana in riſing) and by theſe two, I ſhall know whether the Affection of Artamenes to me be as pure as he ſaith it is. Why, Madam, replied my Maſter, do you forbid me to ſpeak? Yes (anſwered the Princeſs bluſhing) unleſs it be to tell me the true Name of Artamenes. My Maſter ſtood amazed at this Anſwer, yet notwithſtanding after he had been a while ſilent: If I ſhould tell you, replied he, you would not preſerve me in your good Opinion; and if I muſt die by your Severity, it were better that you do blame your ſelf for the death of a poor ſimple Cavalier, than for the death of a great King. This was their Diſcourſe, when a great deal of company came in, and interrupted their Converſation; and ſince the Princeſs was moved in her Mind, ſhe retired, and was no ſooner come into the Caſtle but ſhe went into her Cloſet, and called for Marteſia; ſhe being come, the Princeſs chid her, becauſe contrary to her order ſhe had left her, and afterwards, related unto her what my Maſter had ſaid, and her Anſwers; but with ſo much inquietude, that it was eaſy to judg there was a great combate in her Heart; and that how innocent ſoever the Paſſion of Artamenes was, yet her ſcrupulous Vertue was not ſatisfied with that Diſcourſe ſhe had with him. She ſaid that ſhe ſhould have ſpoke more roughly unto him, and that ſhe ſhould have baniſhed him. My Maſter, for his part, did complain both of Mandana, and himſelf; he found himſelf nothing ſatisfied in his Love; he could not perceive that ſhe did receive his Love very well; and tho ſhe had not baniſhed him, yet he found no great concordance between the relation of Feraulas and what he did find himſelf; and yet he preſerved ſome hopes, and lived at a little more quiet than he did before: he never ſaw the Princeſs but ſhe bluſhed; he never ſpoke unto her, but ſhe received his Diſcourſe; and tho all their Talk was but general, and as it were Interruptions, yet ſhe always gave him ſome light ſatisfaction. But inded (not to keep you too long with my relation) Artamenes behaved himſelf with ſo much reverence towards Mandana, and ſhe did ſo perfectly ſee that he had no Thoughts but ſuch as were full of Innocence and Vertue, that ſhe began not to ſhun his Converſe ſo much as before, but ſometimes to give him the liberty to tell her how much he eſteemed her, yet not to dare openly to profeſs his Paſſion.

One Day when he was in her Chamber, being tranſported with the violence of his Love, and ſeeing none but Marteſia with her, he did beſeech her with Tears in his Eyes, that ſhe would be pleaſed to tell him her true Apprehenſions of him. That which you ask (anſwered ſhe, very obligingly, and with much Spirit) is not perhaps of ſo ſmall importance as you think, and I conceive I am not bound to ſatisfy that Man ſo far, who thinks me not diſcreet enough to be told the true place of his Birth, and his right Name. Ah, Madam (replied my Maſter) what do you ask me? and what would you know? Ah, Artamenes (anſwered ſhe) what do you alſo ask me? and what is it you would know? That which I deſire, Madam (replied he) is but of a ſmall importance, for indeed, I would only know whether you hate me; whether you be indifferent, or whether, by good Fortune, you have any diſpoſition to admit of my Love without repugnancy? That which I would know of you (replied the Princeſs) does not leſs concern me; for indeed, ſince you are not Artamenes, I ought not to conſider you as ſuch an one; and I may tell ſuch things unto a Median which I ought not to tell unto a Scythian: How would you have me ſpeak unto you, ſince I do not know you? Does it not ſuffice, Madam (anſwered he) that you know my Heart, and that you know I adore you? Not at all, anſwered ſhe, and tho I do know theſe things which you tell me of, yet that is not enough to inſtruct me how to regulate my Behaviour with you. So then, Madam (ſaid my Maſter) according to what I am, you will behave your ſelf more or leſs obliging to me. Doubtleſs I ſhall, replied ſhe. But, Madam (ſaid my Maſter) of what Country ſoever I am, I ſhall be the very ſame you ſee me: So that, will it not be ſome Injuſtice in you to hate me, becauſe perhaps I ſhall be of that Countrey which does not pleaſe you? I do not ſay I will, replied the Princeſs, and I do promiſe you that I ſhall always eſteem Artamines in my Heart, of what Country ſoever he be; yet if you be (ſaid ſhe) of that Quality as you ſay,and as I believe you are, how is it poſſible there can be any ſuch great Myſtery in concealing it? Speak then (ſaid ſhe to him) and tell me what you are, if you would have me tell you any thing. My Maſter being extreamly put to it, did not think to reveal himſelf, yet upon ſecond Conſideration he reſolved to diſcover himſelf; for conceiving that what good Thoughts ſoever the Princeſs had of him, ſhe would never manifeſt them until ſhe knew it; therefore he reſolved upon it to tell her the Truth. I know, Madam (ſaid he to her) that in telling you who I am,I do run a hazard to be hated,but I do know alſo that it ought to perſwade you of the greatneſs of my Paſſion, and will do more than all my Words and Services can do, ſince it is moſt certain, that if it had not been extreamly violent, from the very firſt Minute it began, Cyrus would never have loved you. Cyrus? (replied the Princeſs in a mighty amazement) what, Artamenes, was not Cyrus drowned? No, Madam, replied he, I can aſſure you he never was in danger of it. But is it poſſible (ſaid ſhe in wonder) that you are Cyrus? Yes, Divine Princeſs (ſaid he, kneeling to her) you ſee at your Feet the ſame Cyrus whoſe Life has cauſed ſo many Turbulencies in the King of Medes, and whoſe Death cauſed an univerſal Joy thorow all Aſia,when the fair & famous Mandana did then thank the Gods for it,as unkind as ſhe is, and offered a Sacrifice unto them: Yes, Divine Mandana, the firſt time that my Eyes had the honour to ſee you, was in the Temple ple of Mars, and it was there where my Paſſion firſt took reſolution never to riſe up Cyrus until Artamenes had obtained permiſſion from Mandana; it is therefore in you to diſpoſe abſolutely of my Deſtiny: He will ſtay in his Tomb if you pleaſe, and he will come out if you permit him; for indeed, ſince you have done him the Favour and Honour not to hate him, it does not much import whether he be Cyrus or Artamenes, and paſs as a common Knight, or as a great Prince; ſince moſt certainly he has no greater Ambition but to be loved by you. Mandana hearkened unto this Diſcourſe with much attention and aſtoniſhment. At the firſt, ſhe knew not what Thoughts to entertain concerning my Maſter, or whether ſhe ſhould believe him: but that Doubt did quickly vaniſh, and ſhe was ſo well acquainted with his high Generoſity, that ſhe believed every Word he ſpoke, and made no queſtion but that he was really Cyrus: She conſidered with her ſelf, that it was no harder matter than that the World ſhould falſly believe Cyrus to be drown'd, than to believe that Artamenes was killed, as all Cappadocia thought not long ſince; and that it was no more impoſſible that Artamenes ſhould be Cyrus, than that Philidaſpes ſhould be the Prince of Aſſyria: Reaſoning all theſe things in ſecret with her ſelf, ſhe was a long time looking upon my Maſter before ſhe would give any anſwer, which did ſo much trouble my Maſter, as not being able to conceal it; I ſee, Madam (ſaid he to her) you cannot keep your Word with me, not to change Thoughts of Artamenes: I perceive by your ſilence that Cyrus hath diſturbed you. Cyrus (replyed the Princeſs) has indeed a little troubled the calmneſs of my Mind, yet I will aſſure you he has done no ill Office unto Artamenes; but on the contrary (ſaid ſhe ſighing) but as I find Artamenes to be much more unfortunate than I thought him, ſo alſo I find more diſpoſition in my ſelf to lament him. But I pray, ſaid ſhe, tell unto me all your paſt Adventures, and do not conceal any thing from me which concerns the beginning of that Life, whoſe after-Years has rendred him ſo glorious. My Maſter to ſatisfy her, did punctually relate unto her all that had chanced unto him: He told her what Harpagus told him concerning the ill Intentions of Aſtiages towards him; afterwards what Offers Harpagus did propound unto him, how he would cauſe the whole Province of Paratecenes to riſe againſt the King of Medea; he told her alſo how he refuſed his Offers, and how he commanded him to make no more ſuch Propoſitions: He told her alſo how deſires of travel to ſee the Wars had cauſed him to leave Perſia, and change his Name: In few words, he told her of all his Travels; how a Tempeſt drove him into Sinope, and how he was in the Temple of Mars, where he ſaw her thank the Gods for his Death. It is true indeed, ſaid the Princeſs, that I was with the Sacrificers to render thanks unto the Gods for the loſs of Cyrus; but it is as true alſo that I did never rejoyce at his Death: And that it did ever ſeem unto me much raſhneſs in thoſe who dare undertake to explain the Oracles, and the meaning of the Star ſo preciſely. Can I believe, Madam (ſaid my Maſter, interrupting her) that the fair Mandana did not rejoyce at the Death of Cyrus? Cyrus, I ſay, whom Aſtiages would have ſmothered in his Cradle: Cyrus whom all the Magi were certain, ſhould poſſeſs the Throne of the King of Media, and command all Aſia: And Cyrus who from his Infancy has diſturbed the tranquillity of a King, who has ſuch near relation unto you.

It need not ſeem ſtrange unto you (replied the Princeſs) that I ſhould not rejoyce at the Death of a Prince whom I knew not, and who never did me any hurt, ſince you had ſo much generoſity as not to take revenge upon that King who would have put you to Death; and (as you have done) to ſerve that Prince who had his Life from him, who would have taken yours away. But Artamenes (ſaid ſhe unto him) for I dare not yet call you Cyrus, ſince you have told me what you are, I have not leſſened that eſteem which I had of you; and on the contrary, ſeeing I am more obliged unto you than I thought, I think my ſelf engaged to acknowledg it; yet notwithſtanding, I confeſs that I do not well know how I ought to deal with you. If I look upon you as a Prince who would not take revenge of his Enemy, by reaſon of relations in Conſanguinity; As a Prince,

I

I ſay, who in ſpight of all thoſe Reaſons which might have abſolutely diverted him, yet hath not ceaſed to love me: A Prince who hath ſaved the Life of the King my Father; who hath a thouſand and a thouſand times expoſed his own for him; who hath received ſo many Wounds; conquered ſo many Provinces; won ſo many Battels; took a King a Priſoner; prevented a dangerous Conſpiracy; and who has long loved me, without telling me of it, or diſpleaſing me: If I look upon you, in theſe Reſpects, I do confeſs Artamenes, that without any prejudice to Vertue or Decency, I could wiſh, that by the conſent of the King my Father, I might give you ſome Teſtimonies of that extraordinary eſteem which I have of you. But if I alſo look upon you as a Prince whoſe Birth began with ſo many Prodigies, ſo many Eclipſes which dimmed the ſplendor and heat of the Sun, who ſhook the Foundations of the Temple; of whom the Stars have foretold ſo much; and all the Magi aſſures us he will be the overthrow of all Aſia: I confeſs, I ſay, that then I cannot well reſolve my ſelf; for though 'tis true, my Heart tells me that they who did interpret the meaning of thoſe things, have but ill underſtood them; and that if the Stars did foretell your Birth, it was becauſe the Gods did preſage unto Men by them, that you ſhould be a Prince whoſe Vertues ſhould be extraordinary: Though, I ſay, I ſhould reſent it ſo, yet this is not enough: Doubtleſs Aſtiages and Ciaxares will never allow that Mandana ſhould diſpoſe of her Affection unto Cyrus: But Mandana (ſaid Artamenes interrupting her) this ſame Cyrus who is ſo terrible unto all Aſia, is now proſtrate at your Feet, and you may diſpoſe of his Fate as you pleaſe: To what end, Madam (ſaid he) to what end are all his Conqueſts which he hath made? Can it be imagined that he aimed at any univerſal Uſurpation, ſince he hath refuſed all that the King would give him? though I have fought, and vanquiſhed, and conquered, yet doubtleſs he hath enjoyed the fruits of all my Combats, my Victories and my Conqueſts: I am not ſo much as Maſter of my own Sword; but ſince you do reign in the Heart of him whoſe Hand doth guide it, you need not fear I ſhall commence any unjuſt War: It belongs unto you, Divine Princeſs, to order the Deſtinies of People and Kings; and the Life of Artamenes depends wholly upon your Will: yet, Madam (ſaid he in a moſt ſubmiſſive manner) if it be your pleaſure that Cyrus ſhall not revive, he is ready to obey you; yes, adored Princeſs, Cyrus who can diſturb the tranquillity of all Aſia, and has hopes to reign over a great and glorious Kingdom, is ready to renounce all his Rights that he hath unto the Crown of Perſia, and paſs away all the reſt of his days under the cloud of Artamenes, if he find any hopes that Mandana will not leſs eſteem him. And if it be ſo that he muſt wear a Scepter to merit you, chuſe you, Madam, in what place of the World you would have him expoſe his Life to get one, and certainly he will go: Things that are moſt impoſſible would appear unto me moſt eaſy, provided you will not take from me my hopes of your Love; Say then, Divine Princeſs, would you have Cyrus revive? or would you have Artamenes live? or would you have them both die? I give you the choice of theſe three ways: Speak, I beſeech you, and conceal not your true reſentment from me. Firſt, would you have Cyrus come out of his Tomb? I dare not adviſe him to that (replied the Princeſs) fearing if he ſhould, he ſhould enter it for ever. Will you then have Artamenes live, only as Artamenes? That would not be juſt (anſwered the Princeſs) nor advantagious for him. Will you then, Madam (replied he) have them both die together? By no means (anſwered ſhe) for I have had too much Sorrow for the Death of Artamenes, to hope I ſhould find any conſolation in the Death of Cyrus and his both. What then is your pleaſure I ſhall do (replied he?) I know not (anſwered ſhe) but I deſire to take ſome time to reſolve my ſelf. But however, Madam (replied my Maſter) will you be pleaſed that I ſhould hope I am not hated, whether you conſider me either as Artamenes or as Cyrus? I do permit it (ſaid ſhe, and did riſe) ſince it is not juſt I ſhould be leſs generous than you are. Thus, Sir, the Diſcourſe ended, which my Maſter, as ſoon as he was retired, did me the honour to relate exactly unto me. Feraulas (ſaid he unto me) I did foreſee that Artamenes would not be ſo happy living as dead; and it was only Compaſſion which moved the fair Mandana to weep. Sir, (ſaid I to him, after he had told me all that I have told you) I do not ſee that you have any great cauſe of complaint, nor why you ſhould not hope for more indulgence from that ſeverity which the Princeſs hath uſed towards you; for ſhe has not baniſhed you, nor abſolutely forbidden you to ſpeak, ſhe has only took time to reſolve her ſelf: Hope, Sir, hope well, and believe that it is very hard for her, after ſo many great Acts as you have done, not to reſent them well; and certainly they will plead very powerfully for you in the Heart of illuſtrious Mandana. Ah Feraulas (ſaid he) it is not good to be flattered up with hopes, but better to reſent ſome little diſpair: If you knew (ſaid he unto me) how my Heart trembled when I expected the Sentence of Death from the Mouth of Mandana, the firſt time ſhe ſpoke unto me, you would have pittied me. As the ſtate of things is now, I do not know whether I ſhould ſtill continue Artamenes, or whether I may appear as Cyrus; whether I ſhould die, or whether they would have me live: I am abſolutely ignorant whether I ſhould be the moſt unhappy Prince upon Earth, or the moſt happy; this cruel Ambiguity muſt needs put my ſoul into great diſorder; for indeed, it is brought unto that paſs, that I muſt expect nothing elſe but either a moſt inhumane Death, or a Life full of all Felicities. Artamenes added unto theſe, a hundred other Contemplations, which moved me unto much compaſſion, and which did clearly let me ſee that he did love, as much as it was poſſible for any one in the World to love. But whilſt he was thus ſpeaking of it unto me, the Princeſs was in diſcourſe with Marteſia, and told her all her Reſentments: Did ever any ſee the like Adventure unto mine (ſaid ſhe) whilſt I am praying and offering Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods for the Death of Cyrus, that very ſame Cyrus is a Witneſs of all my Sacrifices and Prayers, and yet for all this he loves me, and follows me, and is continually with the King my Father? He hath performed a hundred glorious Acts which I dare not almoſt remember, fearing they ſhould make Cyrus more predominate in my Heart. Alas! O ye juſt Gods (ſaid ſhe) why have you ſuffered Men to explain your Intentions ſo badly? and that they ſhould believe Cyrus would overthrow all Aſia, and ſit in the Throne of the King of the Medes? He, I ſay, who does not imploy his Valour unto any other end, but the advantage of him who muſt one day have the Scepter of Aſtyages? But, Madam, (ſaid Marteſia to her) who knows whether the Gods have not intended that Cyrus ſhall reign in Medea by marrying a Princeſs, who, in all likelihood, if things do not change faces, ſhall be the Queen of it? If the Gods had pleaſed to have had it ſo (replied ſhe) they would not have moved the Heart of Aſtyages to hate Cyrus as he doth: And my dear Marteſia (ſaid ſhe) that which you imagine hath no foundation, or liklihood in it; and I muſt abſolutely forbid it, notwithſtanding all the Merits, the Quality, the Services, and all the Vertues of Artamenes, and not diſpoſe of my ſelf, but according to Reaſon. But yet, Madam (ſaid Marteſia to her) what do you reſolve upon? and what ſhall Artamenes reſolve upon? Shall he be ſtill Artamenes? or ſhall he become Cyrus? I would have him (replied Mandana) ſeek out handſome Expedients to appear as Cyrus; not to be diſtaſtful unto Aſtyages, to be protected by the King my Father, and to obtain their Permiſſions to marry me; which if he can do, I ſhall not be any hindrance of his good fortune, and perhaps (if I durſt ſay it without bluſhing) I would ſhare with him in it: But if he cannot do as I ſay, within a time that I ſhall limit him, and which ſhall not be long; I muſt, my dear Marteſia, baniſh him for ever; and perhaps, deprive my ſelf for ever of all Tranquillity and Delights. Me-thinks, Madam (anſwered Marteſia) that this reſolution is too violent; and knowing the Vertue of Artamenes, and your own Innocency as you do, you ought not to drive that Prince into deſpair, unto whom you are ſo much obliged. Time, Madam, begets alterations every day ; you know that Aſtyages is extreamly old, ſo that this Remora will quickly be removed. No, no, Marteſia, ſaid ſhe to her, I neither can nor ought to ſuffer Artamenes, after he has diſcovered his Paſſion and his Quality, to ſtay any longer amongſt us : If the King ſhould chance to diſcover it, hath he not good reaſon to tax me with a Crime ? and might he not imagine, that I have conſpired with Cyrus to partake with him in the Dominion of all Aſia, which the Magi have foretold ? What better way can you find, Madam (replied Marteſia) to prevent the too ambitious Deſigns of Cyrus, than to keep him always near you? as long as he ſhall be only Artamenes, and as long as he is in love with the Princeſs Mandana, he will never make War upon Aſtyages; he will never aſſault Ciaxares. But who knows, Madam, whether, if you baniſh him, this Great and Heroick Soul will endure your Rigour with Patience? Who can tell whether or no he will bring a War upon all Cappadocia, and upon all Media ? You are acquainted with his good Fortune ; you know his Courage; fear then, fear, I ſay, to incenſe it, and do not you your ſelf contribute unto the deſolation of all Aſia : Take heed, Madam, take heed what you do, and do not too raſhly baniſh Artamenes. Marteſia, replied the Princeſs, all that you ſay is very conſiderable; yet notwithſtanding, that which I think is no leſs, and I had rather expoſe all Aſia unto Danger, than my own Glory : For if this Revolution chance to come, doubtleſs it is the determinate Reſolution of the Gods to have it ſo ; but Mandana neither can nor ought bring her ſelf into ſuſpition of a criminal Intelligence, in ſuffering a diſguiſed Prince to be in the Court : One who is well proportioned, of a great Heart and Soul, and moreover one that is in love with her. Ah Marttſia, this ought not to be ; not but that if I do baniſh Artamenes (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht) I ſhall baniſh him with much Repugnancy and Sorrow ; yet notwithſtanding, in conſideration of my own Glory, it is very requiſite that Artamenes do not ſuſpect me of any weakneſs. I have told him of ſuch obliging things, that I do fear he will think more than I would have him, and indeed I had rather he ſhould ſuffer, and that I my ſelf ſhould ſuffer, than expoſe my ſelf to be leſs eſteemed. But, Madam (replied Marteſia) can you pronounce this ſad Sentence? I know not (anſwered ſhe) and I dare not aſſure you; yet I will ſtrive with my ſelf, as much as poſſible to hide from him that tenderneſs which I have of him. Thus did the illuſtrious Mandana reſolve upon that cruel Sentence which ſhe was to pronounce againſt my dear Maſter; but ſince he did not yet know it, he ſtill lived betwixt hope and fear. Mean time, the King of Pontus, although he was very well treated in his Priſon, yet was he moſt unhappy; for ſince he ſaw the Princeſs out of a Window, at his entrance into Sinope, that ſight did renew in his Heart freſh reſentments of Love, as violent as he was capable of: The remembrance of all thoſe pleaſant days wherein he had formerly ſeen her in that Town, did extreamly torment him. Alas (ſaid he, as afterwards he told) what good fortune can I ever hope for? I, who during the time I was in this Court, and at liberty, never could obtain one favourable look from Mandana? what can I pretend unto, who am vanquiſhed, and clog'd with Fetters as I am? I do acquaint you, Sir, with a few of the King of Pontus's Thoughts, that you may not be ignorant of any thing which paſſed at Sinope. As for Ciaxares, he lived at eaſe and peaceably, enjoyed the pleaſant fruits of Artamenes his Victories. Aribeus for his part, he tranſacted with much ſubtilty, and ſeemed to regard nothing but the managing of State-Affairs, wherein Artamenes would not meddle, limiting his Employments altogether unto Martial Matters. At this time there came news from the Camp, that the King of Phrygia had not yet got any conſiderable Body together ſince his defeat: And there ran a report that Bithynia would riſe, and relieve the King of Pontus; but this laſt news was not certain, nor had the Priſoner King heard it, when he ſent in the Morning to deſire my Maſter that he would come unto him. Artamenes who was naturally moſt civil, and who eſteemed this Prince very much, though he was his Rival, did not fail to do as he deſired him, after he had asked the King's leave to ſee him. When he was come into his Chamber, and the Guards retired, the King of Pontus ſaid unto him: Generous Artamenes, you have ſo nobly obliged me with Arms in your Hand, that I cannot believe you will do it with leſs joy now I am in your Fetters, therefore I took ſo much liberty as to deſire my Conqueror, he would be pleaſed to come unto me, that I my ſelf might deſire him, that he would be pleaſed to be my Friend, my Protector, and my Confident altogether. Since Fortune only (anſwered Artamenes) cauſed you to loſe your Liberty, you have given me a Title which I ought not to abuſe, and you offer unto me three Qualities, which I dare not accept of, ſince I am not worthy to be your Friend, and ſince I have not power enough to be your Protector, and ſince I have not perhaps all thoſe neceſſary Qualities which might deſerve the honour of being your Confident: But, Sir, without any further ſearch what Attributes you ſhould give me, I do ſincerely aſſure you, that any thing which Artamenes can do to ſerve you, he will do it with much gladneſs; for indeed you have obliged me to it, and perhaps over-obliged me. The King of Pontus not apprehending the myſterions Senſe of theſe laſt words, did anſwer nothing unto them, but began to commend him afreſh, and extoll his Generoſity. Then when he thought he had ſaid enough, to prepare his Mind not to refuſe him: Noble Artamenes (ſaid he) doubtleſs you are not ignorant, that the Prince whom you ſee, is fettered with more Chains than one; and thoſe which heretofore he received from the Princeſs Mandana, are yet neither untied nor broken, but much more ſtrong and heavy, than thoſe which your Valour cauſes me to wear. Artamenes was much ſurprized at this diſcourſe; but ſince the King of Pontus's Mind was taken up with what he had to ſay, he did not obſerve it, but continued his Speech: I know very well you are not ignorant, that I having been heretoſore ſent unto Ciaxares as a Hoſtage, during the Treaty of Peace, betwixt the late King my Father and him, I remained in this Court ſix Months; That I fell in love with the Princeſs Mandana; that I durſt not diſcover my Paſſion otherwiſe than my Sighs; that I departed with much Grief: you know alſo, that at my return, I underſtood not only that my Father was dead, but my elder Brother alſo, ſo that as ſoon as my Tears for them were dried up, and being then a King of two Kingdoms, I thought that I might without offence, pretend unto the Princeſs of Cappadocia. I ſent Embaſſadors unto Ciaxares to demand her in Marriage; you have doubtleſs alſo heard, how that Prince did deny her, becauſe I was a Stranger; he, I ſay, who did not need to inſiſt ſo rigorouſly upon that Law of the State, nor obſerved it ſo preciſely upon that occaſion, ſince there was not a Prince in all Cappadocia, who was capable of marrying her. Since you know all theſe, generous Artamenes, I will not trouble you with a more exact relation of them: I will only beſeech, you will be pleaſed to aſſiſt me with your advice, what I ſhall do in this unhappy condition which I am in: But that ye may the better do it, I will open my Heart unto you, and tell you that I do moſt paſſionately love the Princeſs Mandana; and though I am vanquiſhed, yet I cannot chuſe but deſire to reign in her Heart. Tell me then, I beſeech you, what I ſhould do, and what I ſhould hope for; and whether the illuſtrious Artamenes can by his Favour, his Generoſity, and his Addreſſes find any means to mollify Ciaxares, and bend the unflexible Mind of Mandana, and whether he can make me a Conqueror in my Fetters. I do know very well (added he) that I do ſpeak without ground, and without reaſon: But what would you have a paſſionate amorous Man do? who can have no liberty without Mandana; who cares not for his Life without leave to love her; who cannot think of any Peace having ſuch an inveterate War in his Heart; nor ſpeak of any Ranſom unto a Prince, with whom he can have no treaty without Mandana: I do know alſo very well that I am unjuſt to ſpeak thus unto you; But generous Artamenes, if you ever have loved, you will lament me as much as your ſelf, and you will comfort me in my Miſery, though you cannot cure it. My Maſter hearkened unto this Diſcourſe with extream ſadneſs and diſpleaſure: He had a good mind to tell the King of Pontus, that he could never have made choiſe of a more unfit Man than himſelf, to do him this Office; and indeed to have told him the true Cauſe, and by that means denied his Aſſiſtance: yet not knowing whether the Princeſs would think well of it, therefore he would not take that courſe, and therefore againſt his Inclination he was forced to diſſemble the Truth.

The Condition which you are in (anſwered Artamenes unto the King of Pontus, after he had a little thought upon it) doubtleſs is worthy of Compaſſion, and I do pitty you more in reſpect of the Fetters which Mandana hath cauſed, than in reſpect of thoſe which Fortune hath brought upon you by my Hand; yet ſince it is the Princeſs who gave them unto you, it muſt be ſhe only who can comfort you; and you demand that of Artamenes which he neither can or ought to ſerve you in: Think not, Sir, added he, that it is for want of Generoſity which cauſeth me to do this; and believe, that if you did know me well, you would not ſuſpect any ſuch thing, but would acknowledg, that I do but what I ought to do: yet to teſtify, that I have a Deſign to acknowledg thoſe Obligations which I have towards you, I do promiſe that I will endeavour to obtain an advantagious Peace for you from Ciaxares, which ſhall be more advantagious than if you were not a Priſoner: and I will not neglect any thing which may obtain your Liberty. But as for the Princeſs (ſaid he) diſpenſe with me I beſeech you from doing you that Office, or ſpeaking unto her of your Paſſion: ſhe is a Princeſs who makes profeſſion of ſo much auſtere Virtue, and there appears ſo much Majeſty and Modeſty in her looks, that tho I were the greateſt Prince upon Earth, and ſate triumphant upon a Throne, and ſhe before me in Fetters, yet I think that I could not, without trembling, ſpeak unto her concerning Love, either for my ſelf or for another: ſo, Sir, in that condition which Fortune hath put you, I do not think it is a Service which I either can or ought to perform for you.

I know very well, replied the King of Pontus, that I have done you wrong to move it; but Illuſtrious Artamenes, what will become me? ſhall I die in my Fetters without complaint? and can I not at leaſt obtain of you, a permiſſion once to ſee the fair Mandana? Artamenes was then much perplexed; for notwithſtanding the high Vertue of the Princeſs, yet Jealouſy did ſeiſe upon his Soul; he ſaw that the King of Pontus was a Prince, of a good Symetry, and of much Spirit; he imagined that this enterview could not but cauſe him much diſpleaſure. Yet this firſt thought was preſently corrected by a ſecond, which told him there was no fear of that: he told then the King of Pontus, that if he would obtain this Favour, he muſt ſend unto Ciaxares, who perhaps would not deny it. But, Sir, (ſaid he to him) if you would take my Advice, you ſhould not do it; for indeed, what will the ſight of her advantage you? you will ſee her ſo fair, that perhaps you will return more unhappy than before. Ah, Artamenes, (ſaid the King of Pontus) you know not how to love; or to ſay better, you were never in love? for know aſſuredly, that what ill uſage ſoever can be, how much ſeverity ſoever appears in the Eyes of the Party loved, and how much cruelty ſoever ſhe can have in her heart, what courſe Language ſoever ſhe can give, yet the ſight of her has ſome ſuch kind of ſweetneſs in it which moves delight: And I do not know, whether an ill treated Lover, who ſees the Party which ſo treats him, has not ſome more happy minutes, than a beloved Lover who is abſent from the Party beloved. So, generous Artamenes, if I can but obtain ſo much happineſs as only to ſee Mandana, I ſhall be much comforted, although ſhe give me not one obliging Word: endeavour ſo, I conjure you, that Ciaxares do not deny me when I ſend unto him concerning it.

I have told you, Sir, already, replied Artamenes, that I know not how to meddle with any thing which relates unto the Princeſs: all that I can do is to endeavour your Liberty; and that I will ſo ardently ſolicit, as you ſhall know by that how Artamenes would acquit himſelf of that Duty and Service which he owes you; and if he do refuſe thing elſe which you deſire of him, it is becauſe he has invincible Reaſons which prevent him. Do you not conſider, Sir, (ſaid he further unto him) that I am a meer ſtranger in Cappadocia? that I have no more power than what my Sword gives me? and that this which you deſire of me is a Buſineſs which I neither can nor ought to ſerve you in? The King of Pontus, though he was almoſt ignorant of the true Reaſon, which moved Artamenes to deny him, yet did very well receive his Excuſes; and knowing that he deſired ſuch things as were apparently impoſſible, excepting the ſight of the Princeſs which he hoped to obtain; he asked pardon of Artamenes for moving him with unreaſonable Deſires, and, as my Maſter told him, that he ſhould er'e long know by his endeavouring his Liberty, that he would do all which was fit for him to do. This Amorous Prince deſired him not to make ſo much haſte; for (ſaid he to him) I make it a Queſtion, whether it is better to be a Priſoner in Sinope, or to be free upon the Throne of Pontus, and Bithynia?

After this Artamenes left the King of Pontus with much perplexity, and almoſt as much troubled as if Mandana had underſtood all that the King of Pontus had told him, and as if ſhe had ſeemed to be much moved at it: As he went from thence, he went to the King, who bad him very welcome, and held him long in private Diſcourſe: the King told him, that he did owe unto him all the Glory of his Kingdom, and did attribute unto him all the Favours which he received from Heaven. He diſcourſed concerning his own Marriage with the Queen of Cappadocia: of all his intanglings which he ever had with the Princes his Neighbours, and what happy Iſſues he had from them all: of his good Fortune to have the Princeſs his Daughter, ſo rarely accompliſhed as Mandana was. Then he exactly related all that the Magi had ſaid concerning the Birth of the Son to the King of Perſia; the Menaces unto all Aſia; particularly to the King of Medes: How Aſtiages was perplexed: how great was his Joy when he was credibly informed Cyrus was drowned. But Artamenes (ſaid he then unto him) you ought alſo to rejoice at his Loſs, and go into the Temple to offer Sacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods for his Death as well as we; for indeed ſince he had the Stars on his ſide; if he had lived he would have diſputed with you for a ſhare in you Victories, ſince he could not make himſelf Maſter of all Aſia, without being your Conqueror. Artamenes bluſh'd at this Diſcourſe; but Ciaxares believed it was out of modeſty becauſe of the Praiſes which he had given him, therefore went on with his Diſcourſe, and repeated all the Obligations in which he was bound unto him: I leave you to judg, Sir, whether my Maſter had not enough wherewith to entertain his Thoughts withall when he returned from him. He ſaw the King of Pontus was extreamly in Love; but although one cannot love a Rival, yet this Rival moved him to compaſſion, though it was with much vexation. That which did moſt trouble him, was the manner wherewith Ciaxares expreſſed himſelf; and from thence he concluded, that Cyrus was not in a condition, to riſe out of his Tomb, though the Princeſs her ſelf ſhould conſent unto it; ſo that he was extreamly perplexed at it.

The next Morning Ciaxares ſent to ſeek him, and carried him to the Temple, where he ſaw the ſecond time, Thanks given unto the Gods for his Death: But in lieu of giving Thanks (like the reſt) ſo unneceſſary and ill grounded, he rendred Thanks, becauſe that ſame Sacrifice for his Death, was the Original of his Love. Imagine, Sir, if any thing could be more ſtrangely odd, than to ſee true Cyrus under the falſe Name of Artamenes preſent at this Ceremony. He told me afterwards, that he was often moved, to caſt himſelf at the feet of Ciaxares in the middle of the Temple, and to make himſelf known who he was; but fearing the diſpleaſure of the Princeſs, he forbore, and ſtood dumb all the time of the Ceremony; it was ſome Joy unto him, that Mandana feigning her ſelf not well, would not be preſent and aſſiſt, ſhe not having power to hear them ſpeak of a dead Prince, whom ſhe knew was living.

This feigned Excuſe of Mandana's, did furniſh my Maſter with a Pretence to viſit her: he went thither as ſoon as he returned from the Temple; and finding her upon her Bed, having none with her but her Women, who could not hear what he ſaid, they keeping at a reſpective diſtance: I come, Madam, (ſaid he to her in a low voice) to give you Thanks, becauſe you came not to thank the Gods for the Death of Cyrus; and I come alſo to ask you, how long I ſhall be ignorant, whether I muſt Live, or whether I muſt Die? Without all queſtion, (replied the Princeſs) I would have you live, and not alſo live, but I would have you live happily: but to tell you the truth, I do not ſee any appearance of it. Why, Madam, (replied Artamenes) am I worſe in your Favour than I was? No, (replied ſhe) but I do not ſee that you are more in Favour with Fortune: for indeed, the Sacrifice from whence you came, does hint unto you, that the King's Reſentments continue as they were; ſo that you may very well doubt, whether, maugre all your Services, you can without danger diſcover what you are, not that I ever obſerved thoſe violent Motions in the Mind of the King, which they ſay the mind of Aſtiages was poſſeſſed with: But my fears are, leſt if you ſhould diſcover your ſelf, the King of Medes ſhould demand you of his Son; and that Ciaxares ſhould not have power to refuſe you unto a Prince who gave him Life: Let then unhappy Cyrus remain in his Grave (then anſwered my Maſter) and let unhappy Artamenes live with you. The Princeſs hearing him ſpeak ſo, leaned upon her right Arm, and looking upon him, with a moſt obliging Eye, though moſt modeſtly: The Gods are my Witneſs (ſaid ſhe unto him) if I have not a greater eſteem of your Vertue then I have for any other; and if I do not retain in my Heart, ſuch an acknowledgment and tenderneſs of you, as cannot be but it muſt be accompanied with much good Will: But indeed Artamenes, Reaſon muſt be predominant, and we muſt not conſider ſo much thoſe things which do pleaſe us, as thoſe which ought to pleaſe us; and therefore although your Converſation be moſt delighting unto me, and the manner of your loving me does give full ſatisfaction to my Vertue, yet notwithſtanding, I am forced to tell you, that if within the compaſs of three Months, (and I doubt this term is too long) you cannot contrive a courſe which will be apparent unto me, you may revive Cyrus out of his Grave without danger unto him, then you muſt return into Perſia, and live there happily if you can, and ſtrive to forget Mandana, leſt ſhe ſhould diſturb your Tranquillity: But, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe unto him, without giving him leave to interrupt her) to remove all cauſes of Complaint; know, that during this three months time which I allot you, I will contribute unto your good Fortune as much as I can, and as much as ever handſomeneſs will permit me. I will aſiſt you with my beſt advice; I will endeavour to diſcover the King's Mind; I will inform you by what Expedients you may perhaps, gain Aribeus, who hath a great prevalence with him; and I will not neglect any thing which I can poſſibly and reaſonably do for your ſatisfaction; if notwithſtanding all this, the Law of Cappadocia be not an invincible Obſtacle unto your Deſign, and that the Quality of a Stranger be not incompatible with the King's Reſentment: But when all is done, if both your endeavours and mine become fruſtrate, then you muſt (ſaid ſhe, and changed Colour) reſolve your ſelf for an eternal Separation; and Reaſon muſt abſolutely triumph over all which would reſiſt it.

What, Madam, (replied Artamenes) will you baniſh me? and baniſh me for ever? Forbear your Complaints (ſaid ſhe to him) until the time come, that there be cauſe, and think not your ſelf unhappy till you be ſo. To ſee (replied my Maſter) that you can reſolve to make me ſo, is to be ſo already; for indeed, Madam, if I were as much in your mind as I might be, you would have more indulgence towards my Love, and you could not reſolve to deſtroy for ever a Prince who adores you with an unequalled Reverence, and who will infallibly die, as ſoon as he is ſpeparated from you. I deſire you once more (ſaid the Princeſs to him) not to vex your ſelf unprofitably; and do not mollify my Heart until there be ſome need of it: be contented, that I am conſtrained to baniſh you, and that I do it not with much ſorrow; and that I was not more diſpleaſed at the report of your Death, than I ſhall be at your abſence: But however, Artamenes, Glory is to be preferred before all things, and as long as I do not ſtrive againſt you, but rather to give you all ſatisfaction, you have no juſt cauſe to complain of me. Artamenes knew well that he neither could nor ought to hope for any more from ſuch a one as Mandana; and though he ought to prepare his Mind for it, yet he could not chuſe but be very much grieved at it. She knew how to comfort him ſo ſweetly in his Sorrows, by the heavenly Charms of her Converſation; that he preferred the Evils which he ſuffered as a Servant unto Mandana, before all Felicity he could enjoy without her.

He began then to follow Ciaxares more cloſely than before: He courted Aribeus, contrary to his own Inclination, with more diligence, and neglected nothing which might get him a good Eſteem in the Court, ſo that though he ſhould diſcover himſelf, they would not think of deſtroying him: And ſo it was, that he was univerſally beloved, and ſo much, that the extraordinary care he took did not create him any new Servants, nor augment the Zeal of thoſe he had before, ſo great was their Zeal already.

In the mean time, the Man who Artamenes ſent to carry the Jewels unto the daughter of that Lady, who miſtook him for Spitridates, and who had ſo charitably entertained him, returned unto Sinope, who informed Artamenes that there was like to be a new War in Bithynia: he further told him, that he found the Caſtle invironed with many Souldiers; and that when he had ſpoke unto that Lady, ſhe was extreamly ſurprized to ſee the Jewels which he had to preſent unto her Daughter: That at the firſt ſhe doubted whether ſhe ſhould ſuffer her to accept of them; but in concluſion ſhe did permit her; That at his taking leave of her, ſhe beſtowed a very rich preſent upon him, and charged him to tell Artamenes, after ſhe did with aſtoniſhment underſtand it was he, that the King her Husband was endeavouring to put himſelf into ſuch a condition, as that hereafter he might be able to retaliate his Liberality; and to make Spitridates his Son, who had the honour to reſemble him; worthy of that reſemblance. This Man told Artamenes further; that in his return, he ſaw all the Country full of Souldiers, and that ſome of them had ſtaid him for ſome certain daies, which was the reaſon he did return no ſooner.

Two hours after his arrival, there came certain news from Artaxes, that all Bithynia was in rebellion, and Pontus about to be the like; and that the King of Phrygia was compelled to retreat, becauſe that Creſus King of Lydia was entred with an Army into his Dominions, and that a great part of his Forces did change Maſters, and ſided with thoſe who moved the People to revolt, and who in truth had much right unto the Crown of Bithynia. In concluſion, they knew Arſamones, husband unto that Lady, who had treated Artamenes ſo well when he was wounded, and who took him for Spitridates her Son, was in the Head of a very conſiderable Army; and that if the King of Pontus were not ſoon ſet at liberty, and to take ſome courſe to oppoſe his Conqueſts, not only Bithynia, which his Father had uſurped, would be loſt, but Pontus alſo, which was legitimately his, would be in the ſame condition.

It was reported, that the King of Phrygia was about new Levies in his Country; but yet the Reports went alſo that he would have his hands full of War againſt the King of Lydia: Inſomuch as it was apparent that there would fall an infallible Revolution upon the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bithynia, if they were not preſently remedied.

Artamenes, finding a good opportunity to oblige the King of Pontus, and acquit himſelf of his Promiſe to him, and alſo to procure his departure from Sinope, where he was not very glad to ſee him, did beſeech the King, that he would not only give him his Liberty, but alſo that he would lend him ſome Forces wherewith to reduce his Subjects unto their Obedience. He repreſented unto the King, that it would be much more glorious for him, and advantagious alſo to do ſo, than to detain him a Priſoner; ſince if it ſhould ſo fall out, that he ſhould loſe his two Kingdoms, as very likely he was, then he would not be able to pay his Ranſom; but would be either forced to keep him always, or elſe cruelly to deliver him, in a time when it was too late, and when there was no hopes to get into the Throne. Moreover, he told him that the King of Pontus was generous, and that obliging him thus gallantly, he could run no hazard of danger. In concluſion, as Artamenes was always very prevalent with Ciaxares, and could perſwade him unto any thing he pleaſed; ſo, the King condeſcended unto his Deſire, upon condition, notwithſtanding, that the King of Pontus ſhould deliver into his hands, two conſiderable Places, which yet held unto his ſide; and that he ſhould ſolemnly promiſe, never to make any War againſt Cappadocia.

Artamenes having obtained his Suit, went preſently to the King of Pontus, who was already informed of his Misfortunes, but knew no Remedy; He no ſooner ſaw my Maſter, but going to him, with much conſtancy, though with much melancholy; Generous Artamenes (ſaid he to him) if in loſing the Crown of Bithynia, you had conquered it, I ſhould not be ſo ſad as I am; but that my moſt mortal Enemies ſhould triumph over my Misfortunes, I confeſs that I have not patience to endure it without complaint, nor can I chuſe but much deſire that Liberty which I have deſired you to obtain for me. Sir (anſwered Artamenes) as it is my uſe to do what I ought, ſo I have effected your Demands, and perhaps above your deſires, for I do not know whether I have not gone further than you deſired. My Maſter then told him what he had done with Ciaxares, and how by this Article not to make any more War upon Cappadocia, it was to be tacitely underſtood, not to pretend any more unto the Princeſs: As this was reaſonable, ſo he did not murmur; he grieved in ſecret without complaint, and thanked Artamenes very civilly for his Generoſity: he extreamly extolled this great Act, and thanked him who brought it to paſs. If ever I come unto my Throne again, generous Artamenes, (ſaid he to him) I ſhall owe unto you all my Glory, and all my good Fortune; and I do proteſt unto you, that if I can conquer again the Kingdom of Bithynia, it ſhall be your fault only, if you do not as ab-abſolutely command it as my ſelf: you are no more a Cappadocian (ſaid he to him) than you are a Pontian, ſo that without offence unto Ciaxares, I may well hope for the ſame Happineſs and Advantage which he hath: he hath nothing now to do, but to live in Peace, and I am in a way of War, and for this Reaſon, I believe, that my wiſh is not unjuſt, nor will diſpleaſe you. Sir, (anſwered Artamenes) I am much obliged unto you for theſe advantagious Reſentments you have of me: But, Sir, if you knew me more particularly, you would quickly change your Mind; and therefore ſince you know me no better, I will not abuſe you in your Error, nor receive thoſe Favours from you, which doubtleſs you would repent of afterwards: And though, it is true, I am not born a Subject unto Ciaxares, yet I am ſo tied unto his Service by many ſtrong Reaſons and Obligations, that I can never be diſingaged from him.

After the firſt apprehenſions of Joy in the King of Pontus's mind were paſſed over; Joy, I ſay, for the Liberty which he had obtained, and for thoſe Auxiliaries which were offered him, Love then began to take a place in his Heart, and he could not forbear ſome expreſſions and ſigns of his weakneſs, and in the preſence of Artamenes, grieved at thoſe great Neceſſities which oppreſſed him: for (ſaid he) as long as I am in Priſon, I do know very well, that I ought not to pretend unto the Princeſs Mandana; and that if I remain in them, I ſhall be ſtill in the Kingdom, ſo by conſequence, far off from any Pretentions to her. But (generous Artamenes) in caſting off theſe Fetters wherein you have enchained me, I muſt alſo caſt off thoſe which I received from the fair Mandana, at leaſt wear them in ſecret: and, alas, in hiding them, they are not leſs heavy, nor ſhall I be leſs her Slave. Artamenes did not know well how to anſwer this Diſcourſe; all he could do, was handſomly to divert it, and to ſpeak of War in lieu of Love: yet ſince things did very urgently require it, he gave Orders for the King of Pontus's departure within a few Days: and this Prince not being able to depart till he had ſpoke with the Princeſs, and took his leave of her, ſent to beſeech Ciaxares, that he would not deny him that Favour: Artamenes, who was preſent with the King when this Permiſſion was deſired, had a good mind to oppoſe it, yet durſt not: Yet he was much puzzled to reſolve whether he ſhould be preſent at this Enterview ro not; yet notwithſtanding all the Indiſp oſition he had to it, yet he would be a Witneſs of it: He was in much fear that he ſhould not be able to reſtrain himſelf; yet at the laſt could not chuſe but go. The Permiſſion of the Princeſs concerning this Viſit was asked; ſhe had no great fancy to it, yet Ciaxares having promiſed it, there was no remedy; but remembring his gallant Deportment unto Artamenes, ſhe reſolved therefore to treat him civilly.

The Day of this Princes departure being come, all the Ladies, and all the Court, who were appointed ſo to do, did then wait upon the Princeſs: Artamenes was as diligent as any to be there, and doubtleſs as obſervant of all the Paſſages in this Enterview as any. Since this Treaty between the two Kings was ſigned by both Parties, the King of Phrygia, if he pleaſed, being compriſed; and all the Priſoners releaſed, alſo the two Kings ſworn in the Temple to obſerve the Articles, and to live in peace with each other: the King of Pontus did not then addreſs himſelf as a Priſoner unto the Princeſs, but as a free Prince; and waited upon by the Officers of Ciaxares, as he himſelf was: This Prince was one of an admirable Preſence, and then very ſumptuous in Apparel. The Princeſs, who perhaps would not have been ſo indulgent to him but in reſpect of Artamenes, was but very ordinarily dreſſed, nor did ſhe need to be better, for ſhe appeared that Day ſo admirably fair, as that ſhe quite darkened the faireſt and moſt glorious in all the Company; the King of Pontus ſaluted her with much Reverence, and ſhe received him with as much Civility; ſhe would have given him the Precedency, but he would not receive it: He took that place which was next the Princeſs, ſaying with a handſome Grace, that it was not fit a Priſoner of Artamenes (in looking upon my Maſter and ſmiling) to ſit in the place of the Princeſs Mandana. Do not think, Sir (ſaid ſhe to him) that your Conqueror deſires to change either Rank or Condition with you: He is too generous to deſire that the King of Pontus ſhould not enjoy all thoſe Honours which his Birth had conferr'd upon him. I wiſh to the Gods, Madam (replied this Prince ſmiling) that every one whoſe Fetters I wear, would treat me as well as Artamenes doth, for if they did, I ſhould not be in that condition I am, to wit, perpetually a Slave, and unfortunate. I do not wonder (ſaid the Princeſs) that all they which go to War do not take Priſoners, ſince then every one muſt have great Courage, and all be fortunate: But I do confeſs I think it very ſtrange that all they who do take them do not uſe them well; for my part I aſſure you Sir, that by my conſent they ſhould not wear their Fetters long, but ſhould preſently enjoy their Liberty. I doubt not, Madam (replied the King of Pontus) but you are full of pitty; but Madam, there are a ſort of Captives whoſe Liberty does not depend upon the Wills of their Conquerors, and who are ever Priſoners, in a Priſon without any Gates, Grates or Guards. Thoſe who are of that Humour (replied the Princeſs) muſt patiently ſuffer that Misfortune for which there is no Remedy, and complain of none but themſelves. I know ſome, Madam (replied the King of Pontus) which have been uſed to what you ſay, and without accuſing you of thoſe Evils which they endure, and do prepare themſelves to ſuffer them as long as they live. I ſhould be very ſorry, ſaid ſhe, that ſo great a Prince as you ſhould have any juſt cauſe to complain of me, but if my Memory do not much fail me, I behaved my ſelf all the while you were in the Court of Cappadocia with as much Civility as was due unto a Son of the King of Pontus. I do acknowledg it, Madam (replied this Prince) but yet I make a doubt whether you have treated me as well ſince I came unto the Crown as before. I would have you think (replied the Princeſs) that you have ſome cauſe to complain of your ſelf, ſince you have declared War againſt us; but I have much ado to perſwade my ſelf that you had any reaſon for doing ſo. If I did commit a Fault (replied this Prince) I have been ſufficiently puniſhed for it: I have loſt ſeveral Battels; I have loſt my Liberty; and I am in a way to loſe both my Kingdoms: yet, Madam, I ſhould think all theſe but ſmall, if I could but be ſo happy as to gain any room in your Eſteem: I know very well, Madam, that ſince I have loſt theſe Battels, and appear but as a Slave before you, are ſuch things as ſeem not to merit that Honour: But yet conſider, Madam, that the Glory of my Conqueror does leſſen the Shame for my Defeat, and though conquered, and Priſoner as I am, let me not offend the Princeſs Mandana, if I beg a little room in her Eſteem, ſince I muſt never pretend more unto her Affection. Be not, Madam, leſs generous than the King your Father, and the Illuſtrious Artamenes: The laſt of theſe did ask my Liberty, and the other granted it. Refuſe not then the Favour which I beg of you, and do me ſo much Honour to believe, that ever ſince the firſt Minute I ſaw you, I have as much Eſteem and Veneration of you as can be imagined: Indeed, Madam, I adored you before I was a King; I did the ſame when I was Owner of two Kingdoms; and I continued it alſo in declaring War againſt the King of Cappadocia: I did not repent of it when I was all Wounds, and ſwam in my own Blood; and I retained the ſame Thoughts whilſt I was in thoſe Fetters, which the Clemency of the King your Father has freed me from; and I ſhall ever keep them, whether my Sword do win me my Scepter again, or whether it cauſe me to loſe my Crowns: And as long as Life is in me I muſt love you, Madam, with a moſt reſpectful and violent Paſſion. Now you know that, Madam, which I had a moſt earneſt deſire once in my Life to tell you, and which, ſince told, will make me die ſomething leſs unhappy, ſince my Love is well known throughout all Aſia, though I never told it you but in the Language of my Eyes: I do not fear that this ſpeaking thus boldly unto you, and before ſo great a Company, will offend you; and ſince I know that my Protector (ſaid he in looking upon Artamenes) has ſome Credit with you, I ſhall hope that in conſideration of him, and after his Example, you will not inſult over my Miſfortunes, nor ſpeak harſh things unto him concerning me, ſince it is the laſt time that perhaps I ſhall ever have the Honour to ſpeak to you. Artamenes hearkened unto this Diſcourſe with as much Vexation in his Mind as was imaginable; he looked upon the Princeſs; he looked upon his Rival; and tho he could not perfectly know the Thoughts of Mandana, yet he thought them ſomething too favourable to the King of Pontus, and was often in a Mind to mingle Converſe with them, altho the Quality in which he did appear did not permit him ſo to do; yet he was very glad to hear it from the Mouth of his Rival, that he had never ſpoke of his Love unto Mandana; but he was in ſome Diſorder to hear thoſe high Commendations which he gave her, and knew very well that his Love did render their Friendſhip impoſſible. In concluſion, after the King of Pontus had done ſpeaking, the Princeſs, who roſe at the ſame time he did, lifting up her Eyes and bluſhing a little; I do not know (ſaid ſhe) whether it be the Faſhion of all young Princes to colour their Ambition with a more gallant Paſſion, or whether it be only a ſimple deſire of Glory; but I am certain that you do give me a great Subject for my Vanity, and a great cauſe to complain of you: For, Sir, I cannot deny, but that it is very advantagious for me to be eſteemed by a Prince who is accompliſhed with ſo many excellent Qualities; and I muſt alſo tell you, that I have ſome reaſon to accuſe you, and perhaps to puniſh you too, for ſpeaking unto me as you have done: But, Sir (ſaid ſhe to him) I will take all that you have told me as I ought to do, and will be ſo far from uſing you ill, that I do proteſt it ſhall not be long of me if you do not depart from this Court as free in your Mind as in your Body; and if my Prayers would conduce any thing to ſet you in your Throne again (notwithſtanding all that is paſſed) you ſhould not want them. Madam (anſwered the King of Pontus) I had rather you had hearkened unto my Prayers than to employ yours in my behalf, but that is not a thing to be thought upon, further than to puniſh me for my raſhneſs in daring to love the moſt glorious Princeſs upon Earth. After this the Princeſs anſwered, and he replied again; then he took his leave and went out. Artamenes knew not whether he ſhould ſtay with the Princeſs, or follow this Prince; he feared leſt the King of Pontus ſhould obſerve his Vexation, and he was apprehenſive leſt Mandana ſhould perceive his Jealouſy, and be offended at it: So that to expoſe himſelf unto neither of theſe Hazards, he went firſt unto Ciaxares, and preſently after the King of Pontus returned to bid Adieu. This word Adieu, put the Mind of Artamenes into its accuſtomed Tranquillity, out of his apprehenſions of Joy to ſee his Rival packing, ſo that he began to behave himſelf with much Civility towards him: Ciaxares did treat him very well at parting, and gave him an hundred Horſe for his convoy unto the Camp, and ſent Orders unto Artaxes, commanding the Army to obey this Prince, and to put a Garriſon into thoſe two places which the King of Pontus was to deliver up unto the King of Cappadocia. Artamenes, waited upon by all the Court, did conduct the King of Pontus a good way out of the Town; and although he was his Rival, and entertained ſome ſparks of jealouſy of him; yet this Prince did teſtify ſo much Friendſhip unto my Maſter at parting, that he could not forbear being much moved with him: Yet after his departure, Artamenes was in a much happier condition, than he could have believed: For ſince the Princeſs knew his Quality and his Affection, and ſuffered him to ſee her often; ſince he had no Philidaſpes to torment him; ſince the King of Pontus was gone, never to return again, he thought himſelf ſometimes in the height of Happineſs; and ſometimes alſo he was not without his Vexations of Mind: For when all was done, he muſt diſcover himſelf what he was, and expoſe himſelf unto the violent humours of Aſtyages, and perhaps unto the anger of Ciaxares: Yet notwithſtanding, ſince the one of them was far off, and the other ſeemed to love him very well, the hopes of his Heart were above his fears, and he ſeemed never to be ſo well ſatisfied. Now ſince Peace brought Joy thorowout all Cappadocia, there was nothing to be ſeen in all the Court, but Diverſions, and Entertainments; and my Maſter was no leſs frollick and gallant among the Ladies, than he was couragious in War, and prudent in Councels; The King went at that time unto the pleaſant Town of Amaſia, which, as you know, is ſeated upon the River of Iris, and afterwards went unto the ſtately Town of Themiſcira, where he ſtayed, as well becauſe he had ſome buſineſs there, as becauſe indeed the Princeſs did love that place. For as the River Thormodon, which waſhes the Feet of the Walls, is one of the moſt pleaſant Rivers of the World, ſhe took great delight in walking upon the Banks; and my Maſter had the honour oftentimes to wait upon her, and found fit Opportunities to give her an hundred Teſtimonies of his Amours and reſpectful Paſſion.

Thus did he live in much ſweetneſs of mind, during all the three Months which was allotted him; during which time he had gained him ſuch a powerful eſteem in the Heart of Ciaxares, that he was in ſome hopes he might diſcover himſelf without any danger. He asked Counſel of his deareſt Princeſs, who hardly durſt give it unto him, ſince ſhe feared to expoſe him unto any danger that was ſo dear unto her; yet ſhe forced him to take that Reſolution, by her often remembring him, how the time ſhe gave him drew on, and that he muſt either try ſome courſe, or reſolve to depart. There needed no more to move Artamenes to hazard all, rather than leave his Princeſs; Therefore after he had took his leave of her, as if he were going to die (being uncertain how Ciaxares would receive him) he went ſtraight to the King with Intention to tell him he was Cyrus; and alſo to tell him, that the Love which he bore unto the Princeſs, though ſhe did not know it, had forced him to ſtay in this diſguiſe within this Court. As he went unto Ciaxares, one of his Officers told him that the King had received ſome news from Aſtyages which troubled him very much, and that he had Orders to go ſeek the Princeſs, to tell her ſhe muſt come unto the King: Artamenes hearing this, believed that it was ſome People that were in Rebellion, not imagining it could be any thing elſe: But however, he thought that day not a fit time to diſcover himſelf; and that it were more fit the Princeſs were advertized of this, leſt being ſent for by the King, ſhe ſhould be too much ſurprized, and imagine that it was becauſe he had diſcovered himſelf, and ſo ſhe might perhaps ſpeak ſomething which might prejudice themſelves; he turned then preſently, and told the King's Officer, that he ſhould be very glad to conduct the Princeſs unto Ciaxares, ſince ſhe muſt come, and deſired him, that it might be his Commiſſion to bring her. This Man knowing what favour my Maſter was in, conſented unto his deſire, and told him he would ſtay in the outer Chamber, and not ſhew himſelf unto Ciaxares until he brought the Princeſs. Artamenes went then to her Chamber, and told her his buſineſs, letting her underſtand, by the way as they went, that he muſt needs defer the execution of his Deſign until he knew what was the cauſe of the King's Perplexity. When they came into his Cloſet, they found him walking alone; yet he no ſooner ſaw them but ſtopt; and addreſſing his Speech unto the Princeſs: You had reaſon, Daughter, (ſaid he with an altered Countenance) to abſent your ſelf from the laſt Sacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods for the Death of Cyrus, ſince all was unprofitably rendred; and if I had known then, what I know now, I ſhould have changed the intention of the Sacrifice. The Princeſs and Artamenes both, were mightily ſurprized at this diſcourſe, and thought verily that Ciaxares did not only know that Cyrus was in his Court, but alſo in his Cloſet. Mandana repented of thoſe favours ſhe had diſpenſed unto my Maſter, and prepared to juſtify her ſelf unto Ciaxares. Artamenes for his part, he was deſperate to obſerve by the Princeſs's Countenance, how much ſhe was troubled, and out of his exceſs of Love, he took more thought for her Sorrow, than for all the danger whereunto he thought himſelf expoſed. But ſeeing that Mandana had not power to ſpeak, and that the King began to walk again, as if he underſtood that he had told them enough. Sir, (replied my Maſter) have thoſe who have told you that Cyrus is living, told you that he hath any ill deſigns againſt Media, or Cappadocia? There needs no more (replied Ciaxares) but the knowledg of what the Magi (who are the moſt knowing Men of all Aſia) have preſaged and told us concerning Cyrus: We muſt therefore (ſaid he) endeavour to find a Remedy againſt an Evil, which is yet not gone ſo far but it may be prevented; and ſince the good or bad Fate of all Aſia, dedends upon the Life or the Death of one Man, we muſt do all we can, to bring him into ſuch a condition, as that we may be able to diſpoſe of his Life or of his Death without any danger. Cyrus, as I underſtand from the King my Father (added he, in ſtopping, and looking upon the Princeſs) is not at this preſent in the Head of an Army of a hundred thouſand Men; therefore Daughter (ſaid he to her) I am not much troubled at him; and unleſs I be very much miſtaken, he will not do us ſo much hurt as is threatned. At theſe words Artamenes verily believing that Ciaxares knew all the truth of the buſineſs, was upon the point of aſſuring him, that he would anſwer for the Fidelity of Cyrus, when the Princeſs interrupting him; Sir, (ſaid ſhe to the King) let us hope that the Gods, who are the Authors of all goodneſs, will not ſuffer all Aſia to be overthrown; but perhaps they will be ſo indulgent to us, that at a leſs rate than at the Life of Cyrus, they will ſuffer us to enjoy the Felicity of your Reign, in quietneſs. I will believe it Daughter (replied the King) for as long as Cyrus does not appear with Arms in his Hands, he will conquer no Provinces nor Kingdoms; and though we ſhould ſee him in the Head of an Army, yet look upon him here, (ſaid he, and embraced my Maſter) who we will turn looſe unto him, and who I am certain will prevent his Conqueſt of all Aſia. The Princeſs and Artamenes were yet ſurprized at what the King ſaid, as much as they were at the beginning of his diſcourſe, but yet they were much better pleaſed. Mandana who durſt never lift up her Eyes till now, looked upon my Maſter, who to confirm the King in that opinion which he had of him, Yes, Sir, (ſaid he unto Ciaxares) as long as Artamenes is Artamenes you never need to fear Cyrus, although he were in the Head of an Army of a hundred thouſand Men; and I am infinitely obliged unto your Majeſty for that good opinion which you conceive of me. I cannot have too great a one (replied Ciaxares) and if the Gods had not ſent you unto my aſſiſtance, I ſhould be much more than I am troubled at what the King my Father hath ſent unto me. Then he began to tell the Princeſs and Artamenes, how Aſtyages had ſent him word, that Cyrus was ſeen in Perſia, and a little after he paſſed into Media, and that he went towards Bithynia and Pontus: How Aſtyages had again conſulted with the Magi, who aſſured him more confidently than ever, that the ſubverſion of all Aſia would happen moſt infallibly, if they did not ſome way or other appeaſe the Gods: Moreover, Aſtyages had ſent him word, how he had proclaimed a Command in all places within his obedience, to arreſt Cyrus if they could find him, and to bring him unto him either alive or dead; promiſing great Recompences unto any that could either take him or kill him: To effect which, he had cauſed to be publiſhed, the eaſier to know him, that he wore black Arms, that upon his Buckler was repreſented a Slave, who ſeemed to chuſe Chains, and refuſe a Crown; breaking the laſt, and aſſuming the firſt, with theſe words;

Moſt Heavy, but moſt Glorious.

Ciaxares added further, that he had already given order unto Aribeus to publiſh the ſame in Themiſcira, and throughout all Cappadocia and Galatia, and to be very diligent in a Buſineſs of that importance. You may judge, Sir, in what a condition Mandana and Artamenes were in, and what different Thoughts did poſſeſs their Souls. The Princeſs was ſo impatient while the diſcourſe laſted, that ſhe was once in a mind to go out and ſay nothing: She had no mind to diſcover that Artamenes was Cyrus; and it was ſo much againſt her diſpoſition to contribute any thing unto this innocent

Fallacy, wherein, for the ſecurity of my Maſter, they were like to continue, that ſhe was not able to anſwer a word unto any thing the King ſaid unto her: But by good fortune Aribeus coming in to ſpeak with the King upon ſome important Buſineſs: She went out and Artamenes conducted her unto her Cloſet, unto which ſhe entered without any Company but Marteſia: She was no ſooner there, but looking upon my Maſter with a moſt melancholy Aſpect; well Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him) Cyrus need not revive, but it is time that Artamenes were gone. This Prince hearing her ſay ſo, deſired to ſettle her Mind as well as he could, and to make her think that there was not ſo much danger as ſhe apprehended: That according to all likelihood, he which was thus taken for him in Perſia, muſt needs be the ſame Spitridates, for whom he was taken in Bithynia; and therefore ſhe need not be ſo much affrighted at it, becauſe very few Perſians uſe to come into Cappadocia, eſpecially any ſuch as can know him; and it does more apparently ſeem he ſhould not be known, ſince they take another for him. Although all this ſhould be ſo (ſaid the Princeſs) yet this is not enough; for Artamenes, I have thus long ſuffered, in hopes that you would find ſome expedient or other, to diſcover your ſelf without danger; and that I might be aſſured I ſhould not be leſs innocent in permitting the ſociety of Cyrus, than I have been in ſuffering the converſation of Artamenes. But now, ſince I ſee both Cyrus and my own Honour in imminent Danger, I muſt not longer be inldugent unto you: Though I had but one of theſe two Intereſts upon me, yet were I obliged to do ſo; but having both of them at once, Artamenes muſt, he muſt be gone. Tell me rather, Madam, (ſaid Artamenes, and interrupted her) that he muſt go and die; for indeed, I cannot live unleſs I look upon you: Yes, yes, Madam (ſaid he) you have found out an infallible way to deliver all Aſia, from that unhappy Prince, whom the Magi ſay muſt conquer it; and you could never have pitcht upon a more certain courſe, to procure the tranquillity of Aſtyages: But, Madam, I beſeech you, be not you more inhumane, than he is cruel, in pronouncing thus the Sentence of my Death; he, it is true, would have taken away my Life, but it was in an age when I knew not the ſweetneſs of it: Moreover, I had neither ſerved nor loved him; whereas you with your own Hand do thruſt me into my Grave, after you had done me the honour to allow me a little room in your Soul: You know well that I have ſerved you, and have adore you, and do adore you ſtill, and alſo muſt adore you as long as I have any Breath. Does the Menaces of the Magi move me? and do you look upon me as that terrible Prince who muſt make all Aſia deſolate? But if it muſt be ſo, Madam, that I muſt die, I do conſent unto it; I ſhall make no doubt to execute your Will: There needs neither any Irons nor Poiſons to make you obeyed, inſenſible Princeſs; the Reſolution to bid you Adieu, is enough to put a Period unto my ſad days: No, no, my Princeſs, (ſaid he, and kneeled) this fatal word Adieu, can never come out of my Mouth without my Life; and do not, I conjure you, pronounce that diſmal Sentence your ſelf, until you have conſidered upon it. Artamenes ſpoke all this, I am telling you, in ſuch a paſſionate manner, and with ſo much violence and reſpect together, that the Princeſs was ſomething more qualified; Do not think Artamenes (ſaid ſhe to him, in raiſing him up, and cauſing him to ſit down) but that Sorrow which I reſent in baniſhing you, will be a comfort to you in your Misfortunes. What, Madam, (ſaid he, interrupting her) do you think any thing can comfort me, after the loſs of Mandana? No, no, Madam, it is impoſſible. You loſe only the ſight of her, (anſwered ſhe) but do not loſe her eſteem and Friendſhip, unleſs you will render your ſelf unworthy of it, by too obſtinate a diſobedience. But, Madam (ſaid he to her) though I ſhould diſobey you, you could not puniſh me any otherwiſe than to let Cirxares know that I am Cyrus; and though he did know it, they could but put me into Priſon, and perhaps ſacrifice my Life, for the tranquillity of Aſtyages. But, Madam, be not deceived in this, for I had rather be fettered in Cappadocia, than

Crowned in any other place of the World where you are not : And I chuſe rather to die by the Hand of Aſtyages than the Hand of Mandana. Mandana (anſwered the Princeſs) would do none of this you ſpeak of : But perhaps ſhe would withdraw her Affection, if you ſhould ſail in your reſpects of her. Ah, Madam (replied my Maſter) is it a ſailing in reſpect, to deſire the being near you, that I might more adore you? Indeed Artamenes (ſaid ſhe to him, with Looks full of much Sorrow and Majeſty) It concerns my own Honour, and therefore cannot prevent my Reſolution. If it be ſo, Madam (replied he) I confeſs you have reaſon, and the Life of Artamenes is too inconſiderable, in compariſon of ſo precious a Jewel : I will die then, Madam, but be not ſo inhumane as to haſten my Death : Let me expire gently, and refuſe me not the conſolation, to enjoy the ſight of you a while. You know, Madam, that there remains yet fifteen days of the three Months which you allotted me ; and take not the benefit of them from me, unleſs you would have me grow impatient, and perhaps diſobey you. Artamenes pronounced theſe ſad ſyllables ſo feelingly, that it was impoſſible Mandana could refuſe his deſire ; but allowed him all his full time, the better to colour his departure unto Ciaxares. I do not relate all, Sir, that theſe two illuſtrious Perſons did ſpeak, during this diſcourſe, nor what they ſaid afterwards during thoſe days prefixed, for it would be too tedious, nor what my Maſter ſaid when he was in his Chamber by himſelf. But let me tell you thus much, that never was Melancholly comparable unto his ; and perhaps the ſame in Mandana, though ſhe conceal'd it better. Sometimes ſhe would deſire him to promiſe her, that he would never make any War upon either Cappadocia or Media ; and he would always anſwer her, that the moſt infallible way to aſſure her ſelf of that, was to keep him with her. In concluſion, ſhe wiſhed him to love her for her own ſatisfaction, and ſhe wiſhed him to forget her for his tranquillities ſake : But however, ſhe was ſtill reſolved he ſhould depart. The buſineſs depending thus, and whilſt Artamenes was with the Princeſs, Ciaxares ſent to ſeek him. At the firſt, ſhe had ſome fears that the truth of the buſineſs was diſcovered; and that the King's ſending for him was to no other end but to arreſt him; for even that very morning Araſpes arrived at Themiſcira, and came from Aſtyages; but ſhe underſtood preſently after, that the King did ſend for him, to communicate ſome important buſineſs unto him. For, Sir, be pleaſed to know, that Aſtyages ſent Araſpes unto Ciaxares to tell him, That it was abſolutely his determinate deſire, that he ſhould marry again; becauſe (ſaid he) thereupon depends the ſafety of Media. This Prince added further, that he knew very well the Cappadocians did not much care for having a King; and that they loved the Princeſs Mandana ſo very well, as that they were deſirous ſhe ſhould be their Queen: But yet it was not ſo convenient for the Medes; for it was to be doubted that if ever Cyrus ſhould attempt any thing againſt them, and ſhew himſelf unto the People; the Medeans might perhaps ſubmit unto him, and not think themſelves unjuſt in ſo doing, ſince there was only a Woman to reign over them: That he ſhould therefore provide for a Succeſſor; and that it was very conſiderable, that doubtleſs they would never be ſo forward to ſteal away the Princeſs Mandana, but becauſe ſhe is an Heir apparent, to be Queen of many Kingdoms; that therefore he had better loſe one Crown, than be expoſed by ſuch Accidents to loſe two: That the Laws of the Cappadocians and Medeans are different: That the Cappadocians will not admit of a ſtrange Prince; and that on the contrary, the Medeans will never admit a Subject of the Queen of Cappadocia to be their King. Moreover, upon ſerious conſiderations of all his Allies, and with whom he ſhould match, he conceived that Thomiris Queen of Maſſagettes, was ſhe which was moſt convenient for him: That ſhe was a Princeſs of an admirable Beauty, of a great Spirit and Heart: That ſince ſhe had a Son of about fifteen years Old, ſhe muſt ere long inveſt him into the Government of his Dominions; and that it might be ſuppoſed, that this great Queen who had been accuſtomed unto Rule, would be glad to find ſuch an opportunity of ſeating her ſelf in a Throne again: That her age was ſuch, as Children might well be hoped for, and ſuch as might afford him a very happy Life: That there was not amongſt all the Princes his Neighbours, one Princeſs whom he could marry: That ſome of them were his Enemies, and the reſt had no Daughters. Moreover, although Thomiris had a Son which was fifteen years old, yet ſhe her ſelf was not above nine and twenty: That the alliance contracted with that People, would be always very advantagious to him; becauſe, although they be far off his Dominions, yet it may well be ſaid that the Scythians are Neighbours unto all the World, ſince having no Towns nor Houſes, but living always in Tents, they paſs from one Kingdom unto another in an inſtant, as they have ſufficiently demonſtrated, when hertofore they invaded all Aſia. So that to contract alliance with them, would be a way to make himſelf powerful Friends, and rid himſelf from terrible Enemies. That if, notwithſtanding all this, he did not like of it, then he would have him find out ſome other way, that the Scepter and Crowns might not deſcend unto a Daughter.

This, Sir, was the effect of what Araſpes told unto Ciaxares from Aſtyages. Aribeus who was preſent at this diſcourſe, and in whom the King did confide, having ſecret Deſigns in his Thoughts (as afterwards was known) was very much amazed at it: Yet ſeeming to be in a profound ſtudy what he ſhould adviſe Ciaxares unto, being thereunto required, he did approve of all that Ciaxares mentioned; fortified it with freſh Reaſons, and did aggravate thoſe which Araſpes had but ſlightly touched, and did indeed cauſe the King to reſolve of doing as he was before adviſed unto. Not but that his extraordinary tenderneſs over Mandana, did cauſe him to contend with himſelf concerning this Deſign: But ſince two Crowns ſtood in competition, and that if ever he would have the Crown of Media, he muſt do as he was deſired, therefore he conſented unto it. Then ſince Aribeus did for ſeveral reaſons wiſh Artamenes further from Court, he told Ciaxares that Artamenes was the only Man which could tranſact his negotiation of Marriage with the Queen of Maſſagettes, and bring it unto a happy concluſion: That he was furniſhed with all requiſite Qualities for it: That he was one of an excellent Spirit, and great Reputation. So that if he ſent Artamenes unto Thomiris, there was almoſt no queſtion, but he would bring about this Match, which was ſo glorious for him, and important to the State. Ciaxares ſeeing much probability in what Aribeus did ſay, did approve of his Counſel, and preſently after ſent unto my Maſter, as I have formerly told you; and ſeeming more than ordinarily indulgent, ſaid thus unto him; The Gods have not furniſhed you with ſo many different Qualities to employ them one way; and therefore becauſe thoſe excellent Gifts which you have received from Heaven ſhall not be idle, after all thoſe illuſtrious Subjects to make your Valour appear, I will give you one which will try your Prudence. My Maſter, according unto his accuſtomed way, anſwered unto the Civilities of Ciaxares, with as much modeſty as ſubmiſſion, ſeeming very impatient to know wherein he might do him any Service. Ciaxares then told all the Matter wherein Aſtyages had imployed Araſpes, and all that which Aribeus adviſed him unto; and at laſt, what he reſolved upon. Moreover, he further deſired him, that it might be his Buſineſs to acquaint the Princeſs his Daughter with the Buſineſs; and ſo to endeavour with her, as ſhe ſhould not love her Father the worſe for it; for, Artamenes, (ſaid he to him) I know that ſhe eſteems you very much, and would receive the Matter much better from you, than from Aribeus, unto whom ſhe has no great kindneſs.

I leave you to judg, Sir, how much my Maſter was ſurpriz'd at ſuch a Propoſition; he knew not whether he ſhould contradict the King's Deſign, or approve of it; whether he ſhould undertake the Commiſſion of ſpeaking unto the Princeſs, or abſolutely refuſe it; and he was in ſuch fear to offend, either the King or Mandana, to blaſt either his Duty or his Love, in ſo nice a Conjuncture, that he knew not what Auſwer to return. But ſince Ciaxares had done him the Honour to ask his Advice in a Buſineſs which was already reſolved upon, he ſaid thus unto him; That as concerning his Marriage, it did not become him to meddle, or ſpeak, or give any Counſel unto a King which was ſo prudent as he: That as concerning his telling the Princeſs, he would do it, ſince he had ſo commanded him; but as concerning his Voyage age to the Queen of Maſſagettes, that was a Buſineſs which did not ſute with his Genius: If I were to go and conquer her by force of Arms, (ſaid he to him) I ſhould then perhaps be proud of the Employment as ſoon as any other; but ſince I muſt uſe only perſwaſive Arguments, diſpence with me, Sir, I beſeech you, from ſuch a Negotiation as I am leſs fit for than you think I am. Ciaxares hearing this his Anſwer, thought that it did only proceed from his uſual modeſty; therefore, without any more ado, he told him, that he muſt prepare himſelf for it as ſoon as poſſible.

My Maſter not being able abſolutely to reſolve upon it, did not punctually anſwer Ciaxares; but without either refuſing or accepting this Office which was put upon him, he left him, and went immediately to Mandana, with Orders from the King, to prepare her Mind ſo handſomly, as that ſhe ſhould not complain againſt him. As ſoon as the Princeſs ſaw Artamenes, ſhe eaſily found by him, he was come about ſome new and unpleaſing Buſineſs. Well, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him) is Cyrus yet diſcovered? No, Madam, (replied he) but I may on the contrary very well ſay, that he is but too much concealed, ſince they will needs put him upon a Commiſſion which is moſt unfit for him. The Princeſs being more inquiſitive upon this Anſwer, did preſs him to explain the Riddle: Which he exactly did, and told her, word for word, all the Diſcourſe of Ciaxares; he did aggravate the tenderneſs of the King's Diſpoſition unto it, in regard of her: But after he had told her, concerning the Deſign of Marriage with Thomiris, and the Commands he had received to go unto the Queen of Maſſagettes, and tranſact the Buſineſs, he ſet himſelf to obſerve the Princeſs, and to diſcover by her Eyes what ſhe thought of ſuch an extraordinary Accident. But as ſhe perceived his drift; No, no, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him) the loſs of a Crown does not at all diſturb my Mind; and though the King my Father ſhould take from me, both the Crowns of Cappadocia and Gallatia, as well as that of Medea, yet you ſhould not ſee me murmur: I have a Soul more firm and ſettled than you think I have, and they ſhall take more Scepters than one from me, before I would alter Countenance. This, Artamenes, is not that true Glory which I am ſenſible of: I value not thoſe tranſient and vaniſhing Honours, which depend only upon capricious Fortune, and have no relation unto my own peculiar Vertues, ſo that I can aſſure you, I do find nothing in my Father's Deſign which troubles me, or which is not moſt juſt: And I think my ſelf extreamly obliged unto him, that he ſhould ſpeak of any ſuch thing unto me. All that you ſay, Madam, (anſwered my Maſter) is extreamly generous; but though you do carry your ſelf in the matter, as a moſt Heroick Lady ought to do, yet I have great cauſe to complain of my own rigorous Deſtiny. I can ſee no cauſe you have (ſaid the Princeſs) to complain ſo of your Misfortune. Why, Madam, (anſwered he) ſhall they employ Artamenes in taking the Crown of Medea from you, and ſhall he not lament it? he'l ſay, who had rather give you all the Crowns and Scepters in the Univerſe. I have already told you (anſwered ſhe) that my chief Felicity is not inſeparably linked unto a Crown, therefore never fear that you diſpleaſe me by obeying the King. But peradventure, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him, with half a ſmile) we are not both of one Humour; perhaps, I ſay, that Mandana having one Crown fewer than ſhe had before, ſhe will not ſeem the ſame in your Eye as ſhe did before. O, Madam, (cried out my Maſter, and interrupting her) do you know well what you ſay? Is it poſſible that the Princeſs Mandana can ſo innocently deſcant upon ſo nice a Matter? Or, can you ſo eaſily part from a Crown? Yes, Madam, (ſaid he) it ſeems you can; but certainly they can never do it without injuſtice: yet, Madam, ſince you have pronounced thoſe cruel words, I will obey the King, and negotiate with as much care to take the Crown from you, as I ought in all reaſon to endeavour the Conqueſt of it for you: yet, Madam, you have done me wrong in ſaying ſo unto me; to me, I ſay, who have built all my Conſiderations upon your faireſt Face and divineſt Soul, and who never regarded your Crowns, but only as Ornaments much inferior to your Vertue. Yes, divineſt Princeſs (added he further) although you were as far off from a Throne, as you are near it, yet I ſhould be the very ſame unto you: I care not at all for knowing that you are to command Scepters, it ſuffices me to know that you deſerve them, and leave the reſt unto my Valour: If I have ſaid any thing which expreſſeth an unwillingneſs to take the Crown of Medea from you, it is becauſe I cannot tranſact againſt you; my own Reſentments would certainly riſe up againſt me, if I ſhould entertain ſuch a thought: And on the contrary, all the Motions and Faculties of my Heart, with a full conſent of my Reaſon and my Will, are dedicated unto your Service.

The Princeſs ſeeing that Artamenes was ſo apprehenſive of a ſmall Injury, did repent ſhe did it; and to appeaſe him, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him) if it be ſo, as I do believe it is, that the Vertue of Mandana is it which you do love beſt in her, this Voyage which they impoſe upon you, ought rather to Joy than Diſpleaſe you; for indeed, to ſpeak ſincerely unto you, it was rather the hopes of my being Queen of Medea, than of being Queen of Cappadocia, which cauſeth them to deny me unto thoſe who pretend unto me: for although that the Law which they inſiſt ſo much upon to authorize their denial, be really the cuſtom of the Country; yet ſince there is not at this preſent any Prince in all Cappadocia fit to marry me, that Law may perhaps admit of ſome Expoſition to the contrary; and ſo in taking the Crown of Medea from me, they have removed from you one great Remora; and ſince I ſhall, nor can be but only Queen of Cappadocia, it will not be ſo difficult for you to obtain the King's Conſent unto your Deſires, provided he can ſuffer you to be Cyrus. But, Madam, (ſaid my Maſter then) when is it your pleaſure I ſhould put it to the hazard? At your return, (replied ſhe) and I ſuppoſe the Queen of Maſſagettes will not deny you her Aſſiſtance, after you have brought her into the Throne of Medea: Alſo, (ſaid ſhe to him) you have the advantage to depart without my Baniſhment; and I ſhall have that comfort, that in leaving me, you will not grieve for me. O, Madam, (replied he) I ſhall not be the happier, for Abſence is ſo great an Evil unto thoſe who know truly how to love, that what Occaſion ſoever it be which ſeparates them from the Party beloved, they are all one unhappy: And, Madam, how can I be certain that the King of Aſſyria will not attempt any thing againſt you? you know he has ſecret Intelligence in the Court which we cannot diſcover; you know what he has already attempted: How then, Madam, would you have me to expoſe my ſelf againſt this great Danger which may and does threaten my Life? It may be hoped (anſwered he) that the bad Succeſs of his firſt Deſign, will repulſe the Second: I muſt take care to prevent them, if he have any ſuch Deſigns; and I do aſſure you they ſhall be all in vain: And ſince ſtaying or departing is not in your choice nor mine, though this Accident of Abſence had not happened, you muſt be contented; and you know I always told you, that it was my Reſolution you ſhould be gone: Therefore, Artamenes, obey the King, and leave the future ſucceſs unto the Gods.

In concluſion, Sir, Artamenes reſolved to depart: Ciaxares did preſs it, and prepared for him the greateſt and moſt magnificent Equipage that ever was heard of before in Cappadocia: He received Orders not to propound the Buſineſs which he was to negotiate at the firſt Addreſs unto Thomiris, for Ciaxares would not expoſe himſelf unto a denial: But ſince there was ſome Pirats, which had ſeized upon many Merchants Ships which appertained unto Cappadocia, in the Caſpian Sea; and that there was a kind of a little maritine War, betwixt the Cappadocians and theſe Pirates, who belonged unto the Country of Maſſagettes: This was to be the pretence of his Negotiation, though really it was indeed to treat ſecretly of a Marriage between Thomiris and Ciaxares.

I will not ſtand to relate unto you all the Farewels which the King and all the Court did give unto my Maſter. Aribeus himſelf ſeemed to be more a Friend unto him than ordinary; and Artamenes had all outward Incitements to be well ſatisfied with him; yet for all this, Artamenes had ſuch turbulent Vexations in the Secret of his Heart, as did much diſturb him; for ever ſince Philidaſpes (or to ſay better, the King of Aſſyria) vaniſhed, there was no News heard of him: They did underſtand that he was not yet returned unto Babylon, and that the Queen Nitrocris was much perplexed at his long abſence. Sometimes Artamenes could hardly perſwade himſelf that Philidaſpes was the ſame he ſaid he was; and ſometimes again he did not doubt it at all. But at laſt, all his Equipage and Retinue being ready, depart he muſt, and bid adieu unto the Princeſs. I was never more ſtrongly perſwaded than upon this Occaſion, that the Gods do ſometimes impart unto Men, ſuch Reſentments of things which ſhall ſucceed unto them in the Future; for my Maſter was ſo ſunk with Sorrows to leave Mandana; and the Princeſs, though very well verſed in overcoming her own Paſſions, ſeemed to be ſo troubled, that if they had certainly known, they ſhould never have ſeen one another again, they could not have been more ſad.

This Farewel, as you may well think, was taken without any other Witneſſes than the faithful Marteſia, with whom I had already contracted a great League of Friendſhip. The Complement was not long, and their Diſcourſe was rather Silence than Words. That Sorrow which appeared in the Eyes of Artamenes, was all the Eloquence he uſed to deſire the Princeſs not to forget him; and that Grief which he ſaw ſet in the Eyes of Mandana, was almoſt all the Favour that he received from her at parting. Shall I, Madam, (ſaid he to her) believe my own Eyes? will you permit me to think that I have ſome ſhare in that Melancholly which I ſee in yours? Yes, Artamenes, (anſwered ſhe) I do permit it; and I ſhould be ſorry if you do not think that there is more in my Heart than you can ſee in my Face. There needed no more than this to revive my Maſter if he had been dead; and I think alſo, Sir, that there needed no more than his apprehenſion of Sorrow and Joy to make him die.

Theſe two oppoſite Reſentments cauſed ſo much diſorder in his Soul, that he was dumb, and almoſt loſt his Reaſon: He left the Princeſs, and ſpoke not a word unto her, but looking as long as he could after her, he went out and took Horſe, not knowing who was with him, nor what way he took, nor indeed what he did himſelf think upon: Thus did the firſt days Journey paſs on; the ſecond was not leſs melancholly, and all the reſt were like them; and from the Town of Themiſcira, until he came to the Banks of Araxes, (that famous River which borders on the Kingdom of Maſſagettes) I verily believe my Maſter knew not which way he took; he knew not, I ſay, whether we went thorow the Province of Aſpires, or thorow Colchides, or went over the high Mountains. In ſhort, I verily think he knew not whether he was upon Sea or Land, or whether he went over dry Forreſts. or Mariſh Rivers: He was ſo entirely taken up with his Paſſion and Melancholy all the whole Voyage, which was very long, that he obſerved not at all any of theſe pleaſant Objects.

Being at length come to the ſide of the River Araxes, we paſſed over a Bridg of Boats, which were placed there for the conveniency of Paſſengers; and we began (if I may ſo term it) to enter into a new World; for, Sir, we ſaw no more Towns, nor Villages, nor Houſes, nor Temples: And all that vaſt Country, from the Banks of Araxes unto that part which adjoins unto the Iſſedonians, is nothing but a great huge Plain, intermixed with little Hills, which are extreamly delightful. This ſo new an Object did a little expel the Melancholy of Artamenes, and moved him to obſerve, with much delight, that all theſe Plains, and all theſe Hills, were adorned with an hundred thouſand ſeveral Tents, differing in their Forms, in their Bigneſs, and in their Colour: Two or three hundred of them might be ſeen in one place, thirty or forty in another; and ſome ſtanding by themſelves, ſeparated from all the reſt: There alſo might be ſeen abundance of folded-up Pavilions, which the People uſed principally in their Wars. There were alſo Chariots loaded with magnificent Canopies, under which they might ſhield themſelves from violent Rains and Winds, and alſo be an Umbrage unto them, from the over-heat of the Sun: An infinite number of Troops might be ſeen paſſing thorow theſe Plains, and added much delight unto ſo wonderful a Spectacle.

Artamenes, after he had much admired their variety of Cuſtomes, paſſed on towards the Tents-Royal, for ſo in that Country do they uſe to call the place where the Court reſides. Theſe Tents do often change and remove from Ploce to Place, according to the Seaſons of the Year; although they do moſt commonly pitch them near the Banks of Araxes, by reaſon of the Commodities which that great and pleaſant River does bring unto them. When we came thither, we had two whole days Journey through the Country of the Maſſagettes, before we could come unto the Place where the Queen was. But, Sir, to tell you truth, this Voyage did afford us abundance of Diverſions; and the ſight of ſo many uncouth things would not ſuffer us to be weary: Moreover, the People, though mixed with many which were not Native Scythians, were not mean and poor in their Habit; but on the contrary, they are all very rich, ſtately, and magnificent; for their Country does abound in Gold and Copper, and they make great uſe of thoſe two Mettals; but very ſeldom or never any Iron or Silver, becauſe indeed they have them not: So that their Lances, Spears, their Quivers, their Bows, their Arrows, their Suits of Arms, their Belts, their Swords, their Bridles, their Bitts, and all Furniture belonging to Horſes, and a thouſand other things which would be too tedious to relate, are all of pure Gold, or at the leaſt guilt with Gold; ſo that every thing did make a very magnificent ſhew.

We underſtood in our Paſſage, that the Queen's Son, called Spargapiſes, was not then with her, but that he was gone with Ariantus, Brother unto Thomiris, towards thoſe Provinces which lie near the Mountain Imaus; which, as you know, does divide the two Scythia's. Yet notwithſtanding this Abſence, we found the Court extreamly full; for ſince Spargapiſes was but fifteen Years old, and Ariantes was not popular in that Country, all did adhere unto the Queen, who for a long time had the Government of all, and who truly was a Woman of very great Qualities, though ſhe had ſome, which it were to be wiſhed ſhe had not. We alſo underſtood that there were two ſtrange Princes within that Court; one of them was a Prince of the Tauroſcites, called Indatherſis, and Nephew unto a famous Scythian, whoſe Name was Anacharſis, who was then in Travel: The other was called Aripithes, Prince of the Sauromates; ſo that, as we underſtood, theſe two Princes did render the Court more illuſtrious than ordinary.

At laſt, Sir, we diſcovered the Tents-Royal a far off, or to phraſe it more rightly, the goodlieſt Town in the World; beiug moſt certain that never Eye beheld one more magnificent: It was in extent above five and twenty Furlongs ſquare, full of large Streets, of orderly erected Tents in an even proportion: The mixture of colours was judiciouſly obſerved; Purple gilt, white and blew, were mingled in ſuch a confuſion, out of which one might find a rare regularity: Every Tent had upon the top, great boſſes of Gold or Copper, with waving Flags in them. In divers places of the Town (if I may term it ſo) one might ſee ſome Pavilions, much higher than the reſt, which looked like our magnificent Temples and Pallaces in our Towns: In the midſt of all was the Pavilion of Thomiris; very remarkable for its Beauty, prodigious for its Largeneſs, and admirable for the Royal Enſigns which ſpired upon the top of this ſtately Tent. When we were come fifteen or ſixteen furlongs of it, there appeared a great Body of Cavalry, in the Head of which was one of the moſt conſiderable Men of all the Maſſagettes, who came from the Queen to receive my Maſter: for as ſoon as we were paſſed over the River Araxes, ſhe was advertiſed, that an Embaſſador from Ciaxares, called Artamenes was entred into her Dominions: So that at the Name of Ciaxares, and Artamenes, ſhe ſent one of the beſt Quality, waited upon by many others to receive him: The firſt Complements being performed, we continued on our way, and when we came near it, we perceived this great ſquare of Tents, was incloſed with painted and guilded Rails, and guarded by Souldiers of a very handſom Garb: We perceived alſo, that there was a little River, which did divide it ſelf into two Arms; the one whereof paſſed all along the outſide of this moveable Town, and the other ran through the midſt, joining again a little below this Town as before: We perceived that the Queen's Pavilion, was in the midſt of a great Quadrangle, unto which four great Streets did open, with guards on every ſide this Angle. In concluſion, they conducted my Maſter into a very ſtately Tent, which was appointed for the Embaſſadors of all ſtrange Kings. Since the Train, and Equipage of Artamenes was very great and magnificent, the people had no leſs curioſity to guard us, then we had to behold them. For the Medean Habit is much more glorious than any other part of Aſia: And Ciaxares was pleaſed that our Garments ſhould be after the Medean Faſhion, all imbroidered with Gold, and Artamenes with Pearl. We arrived about Noon-time, and reſted our ſelves all the reſt of the day; It was the next morning before Thomiris admitted Audience unto my Maſter.

I had forgot to tell you, that, in ſending to meet Artamenes, Thomiris ſent an Interpreter, who was well verſt in all the Aſiatick Languages: But my Maſter had no need of him, and Thomiris underſtood the Aſſyrian Language, which of all others is the moſt univerſal, and which Artamenes alſo underſtood very well, becauſe it much reſembled that of Cappadocia: So that my Maſter being advertiſed that ſhe underſtood this Language, he prepared to addreſs himſelf to her in it; although he preſented his firſt Complement in the Cappadocian Tongue, becauſe he would obſerve Ceremonies, and render all due Reſpects unto the King who ſent him.

The Hour of Audience being come, many of the Queen's Officers came to wait upon my Maſter, and conduct him unto her, where both the Princes which I named unto you, and all that had any Grandure or Beauty, either in Men or Women, did rendezvous to ſee this Embaſſador, of whom ſuch brave Reports were divulged; though in that place they could not judg of his Handſomeneſs. They carried us through three ſeveral Chambers very richly hanged, before we came unto the place where ſhe was: But when we entred into that, I do confeſs I was a little amazed; and I had much ado to perſwade my ſelf, but that I was rather at Babylon, at Ecbatan, or at Themiſcira, or at Sinope, than in the Camp of the Maſſagettes; ſuch Magnificence and Grandure did I behold. All the Chamber was hanged with Tyrian Purple, richly imbroidered with maſſy Gold, in which was repreſented divers Stories of their preceding Kings: There we beheld, at the top of the Chamber, an hundred Lamps of Gold, beſet with precious Stones: The Queen was upon a Throne which was raiſed three ſteps higher, hung with Cloth of Gold, and a Canopy of the ſame, both of them adorned with maſſy Gold-plate: There was at the foot of the Throne, a little Raill and Baliſter of Gold, which did diſtinguiſh and ſeparate the Queen from all the reſt which waited upon her: All the Ladies richly dreſſed, did ſit on both ſides this Throne upon Cuſhions of Purple, laced with gold, and all the Men ſtood behind them: Thomiris did wear that day a Robe and Mantle after the Egyptian Mode, which ſeemed to be negligently caſt about her, yet was very Majeſtical, both of them were of Gold Tiſſue, ſewed with Silks of divers Colours: For the mourning of widows amongſt the Maſſagettes never laſt above the firſt Year: her Dreſs upon her Head was high behind, from whence hung down a Cypreſs which reached down as low as the Earth, and then turned up again to her Shoulders, and there was faſtned, waving looſly with a great Plume of Feathers on her Head. Her hair was flaxen, and half negligently looſe: her neck was ſmooth and white, half coververed with a tranſparent Tiffiny, which was very ornamental unto the reſt of her habit: I forgot to tell you, that her Gown was tacked up on the right ſide with a Claſp of precious Stones, which cauſed to be ſeen that it was lined with Tigers Fur, much ſpotted and admirably haudſom; her Buskins were of cloth of Gold, lined with the ſame Fur, and tacked up by the Head of a Lion, on, whoſe Eyes were Rubies. Indeed it may well be ſaid that the dreſs of Thomiris was an Ornament unto her Beauty, as her Beauty was an Ornament unto her Dreſs. This Princeſs, who indeed was nine and twenty Years old, ſeemed not to exceed twenty, ſhe was of a good Stature, and a little above the ordinary ſize; her Garb was high, but proud withal; her Eyes fair, but full of Fire; her Colour ſo pure, ſo lively, and ſo freſh, as if ſhe were in the ſpring of Youth: In a word, ſhe had a handſom Mouth, white Teeth, fair Hands, good Arms, and a handſome Plumpneſs. I ſaw Thomiris then to be a fair Princeſs, and my Maſter as prepoſſeſſed as he was, did afterwards confeſs, that except Mandana (who without all queſtion was infinitely more accompliſhed) he had never ſeen a more ſprightly Beauty than her.

This Queen did riſe as ſoon as ſhe ſaw my Maſter, and deſcended unto the firſt ſtep of her Throne: That Rail of Gold which they opened in the midſt, cauſed my Maſter to advance to the foot of the Throne, and ſetting his Foot upon the firſt ſtep, and kiſſing her Robe, he preſented unto her a Box, all covered with Diamonds, in which the Letter from Ciaxares was incloſed: Telling her, in few words, and thoſe in the Cappadocian Language, the Cauſe of his Embaſſy. She anſwered him in the ſame Tongue, but very little; and taking the Box, ſhe gave it unto the Interpreter. After this, ſhe ſat down in her Throne, and my Maſter did ſit in that place which was appointed for him on the right Hand of the Throne without the Rail. You know, Sir, that theſe kind of Diſpatches, are only Letters of Credence, and ſerve only to authorize him who brings them; and that at the firſt Audience they never uſe to ſpeak concerning the depth of their Buſineſs.

After then the Letters of Credence were read and interpreted unto the Queen, and that every one began to ſpeak in the Language of his own Country; Artamenes much wondered to hear Thomiris ſay unto him, in the Aſſyrian Tongue, I am not a little obliged unto the King of Cappadocia for making me acquainted with a Man, whoſe Reputation has begot in me ſo great a Curioſity: Do not think (ſaid ſhe to him) but Fame can fly over Araxes, and tell us of your Acts done in all Places where you came: you muſt know that ſhe travels over the Seas, and believe it ſhe is welcome when ſhe reports your Honour; yes, renouned Artamenes, (added ſhe) we knew you before we ſaw you: your Name came before you, and Our Eſteem of you preceded your Arrival. I fear, Madam, (anſwered my Maſter unto her in the ſame Language which ſhe ſpoke) leſt I my ſelf ſhould deſtroy that glorious Eſteem, and do but an ill Office unto that Renown and Fame which flatters me, ſince perhaps you will believe it no more, and hereafter take all thoſe Truths which ſhe ſhall tell you for Lies: But, Madam, although ſhe has done me this Favour, yet ſometimes ſhe renders Juſtice, therefore I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, to believe her when ſhe tells you, that the Prince whom I ſerve, is one of the greateſt Kings in the World. I know very well, replied Toomiris, that Ciaxares is indeed a great Prince, and that he is owner of excellent Qualities; moreover I know that the Princeſs his Daughter, is as admirable in Beauty as Artamenes is in valour: And I know alſo (added ſhe) that your Hand has made the greateſt part of all Aſia to tremble; and that you have won as many Battels as you have lived Years. My Maſter was ſo much amazed and confounded to hear Toomiris ſpeak after that manner, as he could not chuſe but expreſs his aſtoniſhment. Madam, (ſaid he to her) you do extreamly amaze me, for I do not remember that I ever ſaw any of this Country of Maſſagettes, neither in the Cappadocian Court, and in the Army of Ciaxares: I cannot Imagine which way you ſhould come ſo well acquainted with any of our Paſſages; yet notwithſtanding, it appears that your Majeſty is not very well informed, ſince all that Glory which is attributed unto me, does all of it belong unto the King my Maſter; whoſe Arms, it is true, has been proſperous in my Hands, but they have been ſo in all others as well as mine.

I will not ſtand to relate all this diſcourſe, which was much longer then was accuſtomed at any firſt Audience.

The Queen did aſſure my Maſter, in his taking leave of her, that he ſhould have all the Satisfaction concerning his Voyage which could be hoped for; and that ſhe would pleaſe Ciaxares in all things which Reaſon would admit her. Artamenes retired then, much ſatisfied with Thomiris, and much aſtoniſhed to find ſo neer the Scythians ſuch magnificent People, ſo civilized and full of Spirit. We afterwards came to know, that it was the cuſtom of Thomiris to ſend out ſeveral Men unto all the Courts of ſtrange Princes, who unknown, did from time to time give her an account, of all the Paſſages throughout all Aſia; and moreover, it was the policy, of both the Scythians and of the Maſſagettes, who in that did imitate them, to make Invaſions when they were leaſt thought upon, and to that end, they endeavoured to know exactly all Paſſages in every Nation, that thereby they might prevent themſelves from being ſurpriſed, and ſurpriſe others.

In the mean time, the two ſtrange Princes who were in this Court, the one, as I have already told you, was called Indathirſes, and the other Ariſithes, and who were both of them in love with Thomiris, ſeeing with what extraordinary civility ſhe received my Maſter, came to ſee him the next Morning: He returned them a Viſit, a few days after, and found thoſe two Scithyans to be very compleat Men, principally Indathirſes Prince of Tauroſcithes, and Nephew unto the Famous Anacharſis. Aripithes alſo had Spirit enough, but he was a little too ſuſpicious and violent; whereas Indathirſes had a perfect reſemblance of the Aſiatick ſweetneſs, and not at all Salvage or rude: both of theſe Princes ſpoke the Aſſyrian Language as well as Thomiris, ſo that they could hold Diſcourſe with my Maſter, who did ſo raviſh and charm them, that they looked upon him as a God; ſo much did they admire his Carriage, his manner of ſpeaking, his Sweetneſs, his Handſomneſs, and his Complexion. The Queen for her part, was very well ſatisfied, and uſed ſuch advantagious Terms, that there was no doubt but that my Maſter had by his Preſence, much confirmed her in that good opinion which ſhe formerly had of him; for we knew, that ſhe had given out theſe Words, in ſpeaking of his Handſomneſs and good Deportment, Doubtleſs (ſaid ſhe) that People who adore none but the Sun, are leſs reaſonable than we, who are adviſed to repreſent our Gods in Figures, or do adore Men; and queſtionleſs, they who firſt gave that advice, had ſeen ſome which reſembled Artamenes: For certainly there is ſomething in him ſo Great, and ſo Divine, which begets Admiration and Reſpect. In ſhort, Sir, during the firſt Days we had been in this Court, it may be very well ſaid that every one was very well pleaſed; Thomiris was raviſhed to ſee Artamenes in her Court: the two Princes were extreamly glad of Friendſhip with ſuch an Illuſtrious Man; all the Court in general perceiving that the Preſence of Artamenes did ſo much add unto their Diverſions, rejoyced.

The People who naturally love valiant Men, look'd upon Artamenes with Delight; and my Maſter himſelf, ſeeing the manner of his Treatment, hoped for a good Succeſs in his Deſign, and had no other Vexation of Mind, but that of Abſence and his Paſſion, which to ſpeak truth was very great; yet he was a little comforted with hopes of a ready and happy Return; yet not to loſe time, whilſt he ſeemed to negotiate with the Queen's Councel, concerning thoſe Affairs which were the Colours of his Voyage, to wit, the Pyrates upon the Caſpian Sea, the good Information which had the moſt predominate ſtroke in the Mind of Thomiris, to the end he might diſcover her Thoughts, and ſmell whether ſhe would hearken unto a Marriage with Ciaxares, he learned out, that one called Tires had moſt credit with her, and thereupon endeavoured to engage him as much as he could. But ſince there muſt be a time for that, therefore he was forced unto Patience againſt his Will; mean while, he ſaw the Queen every Day, and almoſt every Hour. She diſcourſed with him concerning all different ways of making War; ſhe enquired at what manner he governed his People; ſhe would know how he lived in his Court during times of Peace; and ſhe diſcovered ſo much Spirit, ſo much Wiſdom, and ſo much Delight in the Company of Artamenes that ſhe could not commend him enough: ſhe did all ſhe could poſſible to keep him with her; for ſhe let him ſee all the Magnifices of the Maſſagettes, and all their Pleaſures; ſhe carried him to Hunt; ſhe cauſed Horſe-Races to be made, wherein he ſhewed his Skill; ſhe ſhewed him Dances after the Scythian manner, where thoſe who danced were habited like native Scythians, with rich Furs of divers ſorts; the Muſick, tho a little Salvage, yet, was very delighting; ſhe ſhewed him Combates and Victories without Blood. In ſhort, ſhe neglected nothing that might divert him: He alſo ſaw one of their Sacrifices; he alſo had the ſatisfaction to ſee that Mitra, the God of the Perſians, tho under another Name, was alſo the God of the Scythians and Maſſagettes, and indeed more particularly than we, for they never offer Sacrifices unto any but the Sun, which we do call ſo; and offer unto him none but Horſes, thinking (ſay they) that it is but juſt to ſacrifice unto the greateſt and moſt ſwift of all the Gods the moſt noble and the moſt ſwift of all Animals. Thomiris treating my Maſter thus, he was courted by all the Court, and in all likelyhood, he would preſently be in a condition to obtain what he could deſire. He obſerved that Thomiris did reſent all imaginable Complacency in his Company, both Chriſantes and I ſaw that ſhe did infinitely eſteem him, but we could not foreſee that it, which in all appearance ſhould have advanced the Deſigns of Artamenes, did retard them; my Maſter ſpeaking with Teres concerning Affairs which related unto the Pyrates on the Caſpian Sea: Teres, by Order from the Queen, told him that he ſhould receive ſatisfaction; but yet he muſt allow her a little Patience, becauſe Thomiris deſired that her Son Spargapiſes ſhould return before ſhe gave him an Anſwer. In concluſion, after that Artamenes had prepared Teres by good conſiderable Gifts, and thereby hoped he would be ſerviceable unto him; and told him that he would gladly know whether a Propoſition of Marriage with Ciaxares would be acceptable to her or no? My Maſter layed open unto this Prime Miniſter of State, the Grandure of that Prince which was to be King of the Medes; the Advantage and Glory which would redound unto all Maſſagettes thereby; and forgot nothing that might induce this Agent to approve of the Motion; ſo that he being throughly perſwaded himſelf, might more effectually move Thomiris to hearken unto it. Teres did hear Artamenes very willingly, and ſeemed to approve of the Propoſition, and promiſed him to preſent it unto the Queen, with all Diligence and Affection poſſible. Mean while, Thomiris, who yet knew nothing of the Deſign, behaved her ſelf as ſhe uſed to do, with abundance of Civility unto my Maſter; which began not to be very pleaſant unto Indathirſes and Aripithes. For my part, I do confeſs that I began to think Thomiris did bear ſo much eſteem unto Artamenes, as would quickly convert it ſelf into Affection: I perceived ſhe did commend him very often, that ſhe changed Colour when he came near her, and that her Eyes always followed him when he went from her: yet I did not tell my Maſter what I thought, for I believed him ſo poſſeſſed with his own Paſſion, as that he would not regard it: Yet, Sir, this light Suſpicion was not without a good Ground, for we knew preſently after that this great Queen, who never had loved any before; who was married extreamly Young; who had continued a Widow fifteen Years; who had refuſed all the Grandees of both Scythiaes; and who guarded her Heart againſt the love of Indathirſes and Aripithes, who were both in love with her, and ſerved her above a Year, yet could ſhe not chuſe but be ſurprized at the Merit of Artamenes: But, Sir, it is worthy of admiration to conſider by what ways the Gods will contrive things, when it is their Pleaſure to bring them to paſs. Altho Thomiris did know of many of the famous Actions which my Maſter had performed, yet ſhe knew not all the Particulars: therefore being very deſirous to know them all, ſhe was pleaſed to caſt her Eyes upon me: So that my Maſter ſending me one Day unto her, to tell her of ſomething, ſhe did command me to relate all I knew concerning the glorious Life of Artamenes. For my part, I did then think that I ſhould rather have done my Maſter ſome ſervice by it, than augment the eſteem which ſhe had of him (for I had then no Suſpicion of what I told you) therefore I related very exactly all his Combates, all his Victories, and all thoſe Paſſages which his Generoſity had prompted him unto. How he ſaved the Life of Ciaxares by expoſing his own: the Combate of the two hundred; The Duel between him and Aritanus. The Siege of Ceracea: The Battel which he won: The remarkable Arms which he had on that Day, when forty Cavaliers conſpired againſt his Life: The common Arms which he took afterwards to conceal himſelf thereby, from thoſe who had Orders to ſpare him: His Combate with Philidaſpes; and in general all his Gallantry during the War; but not concerning his Love, you may well imagine that I ſpoke not a Word. She asked me what his Quality was, and I told her that it was very Noble, but that I had eſpecial Order to diſcover no more. To tell you the Truth, Sir, I think that the Reputation of Artamenes, his Deportment, his Garb, his Handſomeneſs, and his Spirit, had kindled Love in the Heart of Thomiris, and my Diſcourſe did ſerve for Bellows to the Fire, and augmented it: It became ſo predominate that ſhe could not quench nor overcome it. I make no queſtion, Sir, but you deſire to know how I came to dive ſo into the ſecret Thoughts of the Queen; therefore, before that I relate unto you ſuch things as will ſurprize you, I muſt recal into your Memory, how under the Reign of the firſt Ciaxares, Father of Aſtiages, who now lives, the Scythians did invade all Medea, and after they had poſſeſſed it eight and twenty Years, they were expelled: Then, Sir, in their return unto their own Countrey, they carried with them a great number of Priſoners of all Sexes, Ages, and Conditions. There was a Man of Quality amongſt the Maſſagettes, whih followed the Scythians, and who was in love with one who was Aunt unto Aglatidas whom you know, and who indeed is a Man of much Merit: This Man, in his return, carried her away with him, and when he came into his own Countrey, married her. I tell you, Sir, becauſe this Perſon was yet living when we came into this Court; and yet retained ſo great a love unto any thing that related unto Medea, that there was no good office which ſhe was not ready to render unto us; and Chriſantes had contracted ſuch a confidence with Gelonida, (for that was her Name) ſince ſhe came amongſt the Maſſagettes, that ſhe did faithfully advertiſe him of all things which came within the compaſs of her Knowledg: She being much promoted, and knowing a thouſand things which they were ignorant of in that Countrey, ſhe rated at a very high eſteem, eſpecially having married a Man of very good Quality, and one of great eſteem among the the People; ſo that by reaſon of theſe good Qualities, ſhe was choſen to be one that was always with the Queen from her Infancy, and continued ſo ſtill when we came to the Court of Thomiris. Gelonida was doubtleſs a Woman of a good Spirit, and much Vertue, and therefore ſhe was conſtrained to tell ſome things unto Chriſantes (which you ſhall know) to the end he ſhould endeavour to free her from one Miſchief, which without his aſſiſtance ſhe could not prevent. By her we came to know, Sir, that Thomiris no ſooner ſaw Artamenes, but ſhe began to eſteem him, and had ſo great an Inclination to love him, that it may almoſt be ſaid ſhe loved him at the ſame inſtant in which ſhe began to eſteem him. This Princeſs had a great Soul, but naturally very paſſionate; ſhe looked upon nothing with the Golden Mediocrity; her weakeſt Deſires were like determined Reſolutions; and as ſhe was perſuaded that all her Deſires were juſt, ſo ſhe ſubmitted her Reaſon unto her Will, and endeavoured every way to ſatisfy it; ſo that there needs no wonder at thoſe Violences wherewith ſhe tranſacted to compaſs her Deſires: Yet notwithſtanding, when ſhe firſt perceived that her Heart began to engage it ſelf, ſhe began alſo to bid reſiſtance, but it was after ſuch a manner as rather augmented the Malady than cured it: And as the Agitation of the Air does kindle Fire, and makes the Flames more violent; ſo Thomiris, deſiring to quench thoſe Sparks which ſhe perceived in her Soul, did inflame them more, and cauſed that ſmall Spark, which at firſt had neither light nor heat in it, to flame by that Agitation which ſhe gave unto it. She endeavoured to know what it was which tormented her, and plainly found it to be Love. How comes it to paſs (ſaid ſhe to Gelonida, when ſhe could not hide her Grief any longer) that the ſight of this Stranger does procure unto me both Joy and Vexation? To me, I ſay, who have paſſed away thus much of my Life, without the knowledg either of Love or Hatred? nor ever loved any thing but Liberty and Glory. Why am I troubled, ſaid ſhe, both when I ſee him, and when I ſee him not? If he have a pleaſant and delighting Soul, why do I not endure his Company without penſiveneſs? If he have not, why does his abſence trouble me? Do I not know very well that Artamenes is to be but a while here, and that the ſame Fortune which brought him hither will preſently take him away again? But ſuppoſe it ſhould not (added ſhe) what have I to do with Artamenes? Do I not underſtand by one of his Men, that he will not permit the Place of his Birth and his Quality to be known? Moreover, do I not know that though theſe Arguments are very ſtrong, yet there is one moſt invincible one, againſt which there is no Remedy? For, ſaid ſhe, admit Love to be a permitted Paſſion; ſuppoſe Artamenes were a Prince, and a Prince of ſome of the Scythians, ought Thomiris to love him, ſince he loves not her? Oh no, no; Let us not ſubvert the univerſal Cuſtom of the World. The Gods gave not Beauty unto Women to begin Love, and court Men; but on the contrary, It is their Pleaſure that this Ray of Divinity, which in an Inſtant doth what it pleaſes, and as well as the Sun, doth ſhine and heat immediately, ſhould beget Women Adorers whether they will or no. They did not give this rare Priviledg unto our Sex that we ſhould renounce it. And beſides, who knows whether or no the Heart of Artamenes be not already engaged? and who can tell whether he have not an Averſion unto the Maſſagettes, who have ſo often matched with the Scythians! I ſee, ſaid ſhe, that he is very Civil and Complacential: But for all that he is a Stranger; he loves not us, and therefore we ought not to love him. Gelonida, hearing her ſay ſo, would have confirmed her in her Reſolution; But, Thomiris, fearing to be cured of that Diſeaſe which brought her almoſt as much Joy as Sorrow, prevented her: No, no, Mother, ſaid ſhe to her) for ſo ſhe often called her in private) ſpeak not yet, and do not move me to deny you; for though, I ſay, I ought not to love Artamenes, yet I do not ſay that I do not love him: There muſt be ſome excuſable Faults, and innocent Errors. Love paſſeth amongſt us for a dangerous Paſſion, I confeſs, but not for a criminal one: So, when I ſay that I ought not to love Artamenes, it is for my own quiet that I ſay it, and not for my glory; for I do not doubt, but if I ſhould move Artamenes to love me, and marry me, the Maſſagettes would not commend me for it: Native Scythians, who hate all Strangers, would perhaps blame me; But the People over whom my Son is to reign, and the Iſſedonians whoſe Kingdom is mine, they would eſteem me the more for it. Valour amongſt us is valued at a higher rate than a Crown; And if I ſhould make choiſe of the moſt valiant Man in the World, I ſhould merit more Honour than if I had married the greateſt Prince upon Earth: Spargapiſes would be beholden unto me for it; and if this Hero ſhould guide him in his firſt War, I ſhould not doubt of good Succeſs. So that, Gelonida, when I love Artamenes, I am neither unjuſt nor criminal; and ſince my People hath oftentimes ſolicited me to chuſe for a Husband either the Prince of the Tauroſcithes, or the Prince of Sauromates, I may eaſily imagine they will have leſs Averſion unto Artamenes, ſince they do look upon him with ſo much eſteem. But, Gelonida, the main matter is, that Artamenes does not love me, nor knows that I love him; but perhaps his Affection is ſetled ſomewhere elſe. As for the firſt of theſe (ſaid ſhe) he does no Injury unto that mean Beauty with which they flatter me up, for though it ſhould be ſo that it does not wound him, as doubtleſs he does not think that I ought to accept of his Affection, he would eaſily reſiſt ſuch weak Thoughts, and vanquiſh them. But alas! if the ignorance wherein he is, of that which my Heart apprehends of him, does hinder me from making any Progreſs in his Affection, he would perhaps paſs from a light diſpoſition to love me, into a ſtrong inclination to hate and deſpiſe me, if I ſhould make it known unto him: I ſhould perhaps then think, that a wild Paſſion would be Miſtreſs of his Reaſon, and Thomiris who does prefer his Courage, his Mind, and his Vertues before the Charms of his Perſon, would be ſuſpected of a diſhonourable Weakneſs. Alas! (ſaid ſhe) into what a condition am I reduced? If Artamenes do not know that I can love him, or to ſpeak truth, that I do love him, he can never love me; and if he ſhould know it, he will never eſteem me: If it be ſo that his Heart be already engaged, what would I have him do? or what can I deſire of him? No, no (ſaid ſhe upon a ſudden) I muſt cure this Diſeaſe which thus torments me, how bitter ſoever the Remedy be; I muſt diſmiſs this dangerous Embaſſador, whom I deſire might never depart from hence; I muſt, I ought, and I will do ſo; but yet I know not whether I can or not. In concluſion, Sir, after a moſt violent Agitation, and a ſtrong Conteſt with her ſelf, ſhe retired without any power what to reſolve upon: And here admire, I beſeech you, the fantaſtical Humour of Love and Fortune, when they join together to perſecute any one.

My Maſter unto whom the remembrance of Mandana gave reſtleſs Thoughts, and unto whom the impatient deſires to return would not allow a minutes reſt, did preſs on Teres to ſpeak unto the Queen, and to induce the Queen to give him a more favourable Anſwer, he viſited her oftner than ordinary, and ſpoke unto her a long time together; yet he could not ſo abſolutely contain himſelf, but that his melancholy would be predodiminate, and he oftentimes ſighed in ſpeaking to Thomiris, ſeeming as if ſomething did diſturb his Mind; he did ſometimes in thinking upon Mandana, examine the Beauty of Thomiris, and very ſeriouſly fix his Looks upon her Face and Eyes. This Princeſs is fair indeed (would he ſay ſometimes to himſelf when he looked upon her) but my Princeſs is infinitely above her. I do not diſcover in this, that charming modeſty and incomparable ſweetneſs, which is the Soul of Beauty: Indeed Thomiris (ſaid he ſighing) is not Mandana, and I look upon her Beauty with indifferency, but upon the other with Adoration. Mean while, Sir, the Queen of Maſſagettes, who underſtood not this mute Language, nor could rightly interpret the Looks and Sighs of Artamenes, did think, that perhaps he might love her, and durſt not tell it; and this conceit did puff her up into abundance of Joy, and yet it was not a Joy that was full of Tranquillity; for (ſaid ſhe) peradventure venture the cauſe of theſe Sighs is from Themiſcira, though he be here amongſt the Maſſagettes, yet (added ſhe) it may be, that I am the cauſe of his Sorrow, as well as he is of mine, for indeed though I will not believe my Glaſs, leſt it ſhould flatter me, yet the Paſſions of Indatherſes and Aripithes do perſwade me to think, that it is not abſolutely impoſſible to find ſome Beauty in Thomiris: Let us hope then (ſaid ſhe) and endeavour to undeceive our ſelves in the interpretation of a thing which ſo much concerns us. As ſhe was in theſe Thoughts, Teres according to his promiſe unto my Maſter, came to propound unto her a Marriage with Ciaxares; and ſince he did not at the firſt tell her directly the buſineſs, but oftentimes named Artamenes, this Princeſs did not very well underſtand what he did mean, though ſhe knew very well what ſhe deſired he ſhould ſay: But at the laſt he told her, that the buſineſs of Pirats which was ſo much ſpoken of, was only the pretence of Artamenes his Embaſſy, but that his right buſineſs was to move her unto a Marriage with Ciaxares King of Cappadocia, and Galatia, and who hereafter was to be King of the Medes alſo. Thomiris was much ſurprized at this diſcourſe, yet notwithſtanding, ſince ſhe had no mind to diſcover the diſquiets of her Mind unto Teres, although he was in great favour with her; ſhe only told him, that ſhe was much engaged unto Ciaxares, but that this was a buſineſs which could not be haſtily reſolved upon; therefore, that ſhe might have the more time to conſider of her beſt courſe, ſhe bad him tell Artamenes, that he had not yet moved the matter unto her; and deſired Teres to prolong the buſineſs as much as he could. Teres promiſed the Queen, that he would do as ſhe commanded: But the liberality of Artamenes had ſo wrought upon the Spirits of Teres, that he told unto my Maſter the Queen's true Anſwer, giving him much hopes of his Negotiation; becauſe (ſaid he) if ſhe had diſapproved of it, ſhe would have refuſed it at the firſt. This hope gave much ſatisfaction unto Artamenes, ſo that he was more frequent in his Viſits, and obſerved ſome alteration in her Mind: For, Since this Propoſition of Marriage did move in her ſuch cruel Vexations of Soul, as ſhe almoſt loſt her Reaſon. Let us doubt no longer (ſaid ſhe unto Gelonida) of Artamenes his indifferency towards us after ſuch a propoſition as this: We are ſo certain of it, that if he had told us from his own Mouth, he loved us not, we could not have been more ſure. But it may be alſo (ſaid ſhe) that he obeys his Maſter againſt his Will; and this Melancholy which I diſcover in him, may proceed from hence, that he is conſtrained to ſpeak for another, when he would ſpeak for himſelf. This Princeſs continued not long in one Thought, but contradicted her ſelf a hundred times in one day, yet which way ſoever ſhe turned it, ſhe ever loved Artamenes: She fancied, that if ſhe could marry him, ſhe would make the name of Maſſagettes ſound throughout the World; ſo that Ambition joyning it ſelf with Love, would never ſuffer her to be at reſt. Mean while my Maſter, who was ignorant of her true Thoughts, lived at his uſual rate of Melancholy. But that there might want nothing to compleat the ſum of his Misfortunes, it happened that Indatherſes and Aripithes, who were both of them Men of high Souls, and both in Love were very prying into the Aſſiduity of Artamenes with Thomiris. They obſerved alſo, that the Queen was much perplexed more than uſual; and that always when Artamenes came to her, there did appear more Joy in her Countenance, than ſhe uſed to expreſs unto any elſe.

In concluſion, Sir, theſe two Princes, who when we came firſt to this Court, were jealous one of another, although the Queen did treat them both alike with equal indifferency, did now ceaſe their ſuſpicious Thoughts one of another, and converted their Jealouſies, their Animoſities, and Suſpicions which were between them, into Hatred of my Maſter; they contracted between themſelves a kind of Confidence and Friendſhip; and my Maſter cauſed that which perhaps never was ſeen before, two Rivals hold good correſpondency together: They could not ſee any important cauſe why Artamenes ſhould ſtay long there; and the inſenſibility of the Queen towards them, cauſed them to think, that the Inclination which ſhe ſeemed to have unto Artamenes, did not ariſe without his contributing ſomething towards it. At laſt they believed that Artamenes loved Thomiris, and Thomiris did not hate him: They diſcourſed together, as of a thing which did equally concern them both, and ſeemed to be firm Friends. Shall we endure this affront (ſaid Aripithes) from this Stranger? Muſt we ſuffer him in the face of all the Maſſagettes, to obtain that in a few days, which we with all our Cares and Services cannot obtain in a whole year? I know very well ſaid Indatherſes, that he is infinitely handſome, and extreamly amiable; but that which perhaps may excuſe Thomiris, will not juſtify him, who ought not to exceed the quality of an Embaſſador. All this while, Sir, they were agreed concerning my Maſter's Crime, but they could not concur in the way of puniſhment; for they being too Gallant to think upon any baſe way of revenge: And to fight with an Embaſſador, was the way to cauſe Thomiris to baniſh them both, who doubtleſs would not ſuffer the Law of Nations to be violated upon the Perſon of Artamenes; and alſo by that courſe they ſhould expoſe themſelves unto a forraign War: So that they had much ado to reſolve upon it; neither could they agree which of them two ſhould take this Enterprize in hand, which was no leſs difficult than glorious. Indatherſes ſaid it belonged unto him; Aripithes ſaid he had as much right unto it as Indatherſes; and it may very well be ſaid, that they knew not how nor when, nor why they ſhould revenge themſelves upon a Rival whom they could not deſtroy without deſtroying all their hopes of Thomiris. This was therefore their principal Reaſon why they deferred their Revenge, and moved them to obſerve more narrowly the Actions of Artamenes and Thomiris. They conſented to render an account one to another of all they could learn out, and to tranſact jointly, how to rid themſelves of ſuch a dangerous Enemy. Certainly it were very good ſport to ſee Thrmiris, Artamenes, Indatherſes, and Aripithes all together: For Thomiris thought of nothing but how to make Artamenes love her.

menes thought neither of Thomiris, Indatherſes, nor Aripithes, but diſpoſed of all his Thoughts upon Mandana. Indatherſes and Aripithes forgot their Jealouſies one of another, and thought upon nothing but Artamenes and Thomiris. Mean while my Maſter, who thought every minute an Age, did preſs Teres for the Queen's Anſwer: And the Queen ſeeing herſelf importun'd, aſſured Teres that Artamenes ſhould be ſatisfied within theſe three days. To repreſent unto you, Sir, the turbulent Agitations in the Mind of Thomiris, during this time, would be a piece of difficulty. It will be ſufficient that I tell you, that this Princeſs being very glorious, had much ado to permit her proud and lofty Soul, abſolutely to command Gelonida, to ask Chriſantes whom ſhe obſerved often with her, whether Artamenes would be content to accept of that which he demanded for Ciaxares. Gelonida then did endeavour to qualify the Mind of Thomiris; and moved her to prefer the King before the Embaſſador: but Thomiris anſwered her, that ſhe preferred the Vertue of Artamenes before all the Crowns upon Earth: yet Gelonida (ſaid ſhe to her) I would have you carry the buſineſs ſo, that Artamenes ſhould know I love him, and not eſteem me the leſs for it; and order the matter ſo as my Paſſion for Artamenes may be ſatisfied, with directly ſtifling my Paſſion which I have unto Honour. Though Gelonida was much diſpleaſed with this Commiſſion, yet ſhe aſſured the Queen, ſince nothing could change her Mind, to obey her with all Fidelity, and ſhe did promiſe it the more ſeriouſly, becauſe ſhe feared that Thomiris could not truſt this Secret unto any other, who would manage it better than her ſelf. The hopes which Gelonida would have had of returning into her own Country, if the Queen had married Ciaxares, moved her to be very ſorry for that Paſſion which Thomiris bore unto Artamenes. Moreover, ſhe could not imagine that my Maſter could refuſe that Honour which was offered unto him; and ſhe did forſee, that if he accepted of it, it muſt needs produce a War between Thomiris and Ciaxares. Yet ſhe reſolved to ſpeak, and that quickly, for elſe the Queen would never be at reſt;

Having then found Chriſantes, ſhe reſolved to tell him the whole truth, and after that to tell him, that if he loved Artamenes, he would hinder him from accepting this honour which Thomiris offered him; becauſe elſe in all likelihood, he would betray his Maſter unprofitably, and never enjoy any quietneſs. Chriſantes, much amazed at Gelonidas's Diſcourſe, as ſoon as his Wonder was a little over, aſſured her, that ſhe need not to fear it; and that Artamenes would never accept of it: but ſince he would not give her any more direct anſwer until his Maſter knew it, he asked her a little more time before he would abſolutely reſolve her; he went immediately unto him in his Tent, where finding only me with him; Sir, (ſaid he to him) I believe you cannot gueſs what ill Fortune I have to tell you, and to what a proof your Conſtancy is put unto: Fortune Chriſantes (ſaid he to him) is it not very rigorous, when ſhe ſends us only ſuch Evils as we did foreſee, but when her Malice is extream, ſhe will fatally ſurprize, and overload thoſe whom ſhe intends to deſtroy; yet notwithſtanding (ſaid he) I cannot imagine, what it ſhould be that is ſo very averſe in this Court, unleſs by Misfortune it be, that Thomiris has ſome ſecret Averſion to me, which cauſes her not to anſwer Ciaxares more favourably, ſo that I ſhall be compelled to return without doing any thing. Sir, (replied Chriſantes) this laſt thing may perhaps fall out ſo, but it will be by a quite contrary Reaſon to what you ſay: I underſtand you not (replied Artamenes) you will perhaps underſtand me better (ſaid Chriſantes to him) when I ſhall tell you that Thomiris loves you; and loves you ſo much as ſhe offers you that which ſhe refuſes Ciaxares. My Maſter cried out at this report of Chriſantes, and it was a good while before he could believe it: No, no, (ſaid he to him) Gelonida, has either loſt her Reaſon, or elſe yours is not in its right place. Thomiris who has regarded the Paſſions of Indatherſes and Aripithes, with ſuch cold indifferency for above a whole Year, cannot poſſibly love Artamenes: Artamenes (I ſay) who loves not her, nor has neither ſaid nor done any thing which might make her think I did; who on the contrary has moved her to marry the King who ſent him; and who can ſeem no more than a common Embaſſador in her Eyes: So that Chriſantes, you are either not the ſame you uſe to be, or elſe Gelonida has deceived you. Sir, (ſaid Chriſantes to him) there is no alteration in my Mind, nor has Gelonida deceived me; for ſhe ſpoke unto me with great Gravity and Wiſdom; therefore I beſeech you give me your anſwer, for ſhe allowed me but until to morrow to return it unto her. Artamenes ſeemed ſo confounded to hear Chriſantes ſpeak in that manner, that it was eaſy to ſee he had much ado to believe him: yet calling unto his memory many Paſſages which he both ſaw and underſtood, and which he regarded not before, he no longer doubted the truth of what Chriſantes told him. I could have been well contented, if it had been in his power that Chriſantes and I had never known it; and his Soul was in all things ſo generous, that he would have been well pleaſed to bear all the burthen of his cares himſelf, and have concealed them from us if it had been poſſible: But he could not do it, therefore he began to comfort himſelf with us, in multiplying his Misfortunes: Had ever any Man (ſaid he) ſuch fortune as I? when I began to love divine Mandana, was it not to be thought that ſuch a ſweet and bitter Humour might move her to Compaſſion, and to be tenderly ſenſible of it? yet, as many Acts as I have performed; as many Services as I have done her; as much Pains as I have took; as many thouſand unprofitable Sighs as I have breathed; as many Tears as I have ſhed, yet all theſe could not molify her Soul. It may very well be ſaid, that if I were not dead, or at leaſt ſhe thought me ſo; Mandana, the fair Mandana, would never have afforded me the leaſt teſtimony of her Affection. And yet for all this ſhe reſolved to baniſh me, and that for ever, when I came hither. But alas, the Misfortune which perſecuted me in Cappadocia, has not followed me hither amongſt the Maſſagettes in the like manner; but quite contrary, ſince a Queen who ſeems to be fierce, and proud, loves him who cares not for her; offers him a Heart which was never asked, and would conſent unto that of her own motion, which ſhe might without Injuſtice refuſe if it were asked: No, no, ſaid he to us, this perverſe Accident, is neither an effect of my Merit, nor the imbecility of Thomiris: It is only my Misfortune, and my adverſe deſtiny which would puniſh me as well by a refuſal of good things, as by thoſe which they never afforded me. Do not think, divine Mandana, (ſaid he) that the Sorrows which I am ſenſible of, are any effects of my refuſing a great and a fair Queen; No, divine Princeſs, I have no ſuch Thoughts: My Heart does too dearly preſerve the image of your Angelick Beauty, to be ever moved by hers, or any elſe: But I do confeſs this perverſe Accident does much diſpleaſe me: And if it were in my choice, I had rather fight two Battels, than to be put upon ſuch a neceſſity, as to make a glorious and a proud Princeſs bluſh for Shame and Confuſion. Tell then, Gelonida, (ſaid he to Chriſantes) that I would not believe what you told me; but that though you had perſwaded me to believe it, yet it had been to no purpoſe, ſince the Fidelity which I owe unto the King whom I ſerve, will not permit me to accept of ſuch an Honour; yet Chriſantes (ſaid he) forget not to tell Gelonida, that I gave no credit unto your words; and leave an handſom way open for Thomiris to repent her ſelf of her firſt Thoughts; which perhaps ſhe has already condemned in her ſelf. Thus, Sir, did my Maſter ſay unto Chriſantes, who went immediately unto Gelonida; and ſhe as ſoon to give an account of the anſwer unto the Queen: But alas, this Anſwer produced Effects, contrary to the Hopes and Expectation of Artamenes; and Thomiris would not make uſe of this honeſt way to correct her firſt Thoughts by her ſecond: but, on the contrary, it did exaſperate the Mind of this Queen in lieu of appeaſing it, and this lofty Soul thought ſhe was now doubly obliged to overcome him which reſiſted her: No, no, Gelonida (ſaid ſhe unto this Lady, after ſhe had delivered the Anſwer of Chriſantes) Artamenes is not ſo hard to be perſwaded as he ſeems, and perhaps he is but too well perſwaded of my Honour, to compaſs my Deſign: This is not a Buſineſs wherein any falſeneſs can be ſuſpected, for where a Princeſs woes, and is the firſt which ſpeaks of Love, there cannot be any doubt of it. For hence it muſt be concluded, that Artamenes, who ſeems not to credit what is told him, would either be told of it often, or elſe he would never have it ſpoke of again; which of theſe two ſoever it be, Thomiris is not ſatisfied, unleſs it be ſo, that Artamenes thinks it to be a becoming Modeſty, and will not at the firſt, anſwer unto a Propoſition, which is ſo advantagious for him. But however Gelonida, I muſt at the leaſt know the Heart of Artamenes, though I cannot obtain it: And I muſt ſpeak unto him, in ſuch a manner as he cannot diſguiſe himſelf, though he were as ſubtle as any Grecian. Muſt you ſpeak, Madam, replied Gelonida? Alas, I beſeech you be not too haſty in ſuch an unuſual way, leſt you ſhould afterwards repent it: Conſult a little better before you reſolve it, and do not blindly follow a Paſſion which will draw you into too much inconveniency, if you take not heed. No, Gelonida, replied Thomiris, that Paſſion which poſſeſſeth me, ſhall not cauſe me to commit a Fault; but know, that at this time I do prefer the ſincerity of the Scythians my Neighbours, before that handſomneſs of Ecbatan, whereof you ſpeak ſo much: That Vertue which cauſeth us to diſguiſe our Thoughts, and hide that which is in the Soul, is not the cuſtom of the Maſſagettes. Amongſt you it is no matter if a Woman do love, ſo ſhe do not expreſs it; whereas amongſt us we uſe to baniſh the moſt tender Thoughts out of our Hearts, if we do not find them juſt. And ſo I do aſſure you, that if I could think it a Crime to love ſuch an Illuſtrious Man as Artamenes, I would contend with my Paſſion in lieu of concealing it.

But on the contrary, I do not at all hold it diſhonourable or unworthy, to affect that Man whom I think worthy to command all others: I cannot ſee that there is any ſuch great Myſtery in the Matter as you imagine, ſince there is none but Crimes which we ought to cover and conceal. But, Madam, (replied Gelonida) ſuppoſe Artamenes ſhould not give ſuch an Anſwer as you deſire, and as I believe he will not, would you not repent of your ſpeaking to him ? I know not what I may do, (anſwered Thomiris very angrily) but I know for the preſent, that I will be better ſatisfied of Artamenes his true Thoughts. Good Heavens, Madam, (ſaid Gelonida) are you not afraid to ruin that which you would promote ? I do fear every thing, (anſwered Thomiris) But what would you have me do ? I am no more a Miſtreſs of my own Will, and I do no more than what pleaſeth that Paſſion which poſſeſſeth me ; and becauſe I believe it juſt, I have ſubmitted my ſelf unto it. Thomiris ſpoke many other things which diſcovered the diſturbance and irregularity of her paſſionate Mind ; ſhe could not endure the Converſation of Indathyrſes and Arapithes ; ſhe thought upon nothing but Artamenes ; and becauſe it was indeed the Vertue of my Maſter which had ſuch a powerful influence upon her Heart, ſhe believed that all the Effects of ſo noble a Cauſe, and ſo pure, were all Innocent.

Mean while, Artamenes was not a little perplexed with a fear to ſee Thomiris, after this Propoſition which had been made unto him ; and the Queen for her part, ſhe knew not very well how to endure the looks of Artamenes, notwithſtanding her ſeeming Reſolutions. This violent Paſſion which poſſeſſed her, being more predominate than her Modeſty, cauſed her not to ſtay long without the ſight of the Object of her Affection. My Maſter not daring to omit any part of his Duty, went unto her at the uſual hour ; and as ill Luck would have it, found none with her but her Woman, who were no hindrance unto private Diſcourſe, becauſe they ſtood far off at the other end of the Room. Artamenes then ſaluting her with a moſt humble Reverence, and not daring almoſt to look upon her, leſt he ſhould put her to the bluſh, did ſpeak unto her concerning things far off that Buſineſs. But as Thomiris retained nothing in her Mind but it, ſo ſhe turned all unto her own Deſign ; and were the Diſcourſe never ſo far off the Matter, yet ſhe did handſomly draw the ſenſe of it unto her own Ends, After ſhe had rendred the like ſalute unto Artamenes, with as much confuſion as he; and after the firſt Complements, he began to diſcourſe of the Beauty of the Country of Maſſagettes, and its Vaſtneſs. It is true, (anſwered ſhe unto him) our Country is not very contemptible; yet I cannot be perſwaded but you prefer Cappadocia before it; and perhaps (ſaid ſhe, bluſhing) you had rather Obey there, than Command here. Doubtleſs (replied Artamenes) it is but juſt ſo to do; for, Madam, neceſſity does impoſe it upon me to obey in Cappadocia, although I am not born a Subject unto Ciaxares; nor can I ever have any right to Command among the Maſſagettes, unleſs (ſaid he, ſmiling) the King my Maſter do ſend me to make War upon them, which your Majeſty knows very well how to prevent. You know, ſaid ſhe to him, that Crowns are obtained more ways than one: There are Kings Elective, as well as there are Kings by Conqueſt; and who told you, that without fighting you could not reign here, or at leaſt over the Iſſedonians? Reaſon, Madam, told me, (replied Artamenes) knowing very well, that the Crown of the Iſſedonians is not Elective: and alſo knowing moſt certainly, that your People are ſo well contented with your Government, that they will never change you. No, Madam, I am not ſo meanly verſed in the ſeveral Cuſtoms of People, but that I know that the Spartan Cuſtoms and the Maſſagettes are not alike, and that it is not here as where the Kings are Elective: But it is you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and would not give her time to anſwer) who may get ſeveral Crowns without fighting: And your Vertue hath procured you ſo many Royal Adorers, as I may well ſay, you may chuſe Scepters and Crowns, when, and where you pleaſe: And although thoſe which you have of your own already be very Illuſtrious, yet, believe it Madam, there are others alſo which are not unworthy of you. For my part, (replied the Queen) I am partly of your Mind in one thing, for as you had rather Obey in Cappadocia than Reign here, ſo had I rather Obey here than Reign in Cappadocia.

Perhaps, Madam, replied my Maſter, you would not ſay ſo of Media if you were there; and the ſtately Pallaces of Ecbatan, are, if I be not deceived, to be preferred before your magnificent Tents. No, Artamenes, replied ſhe, all the Magnificence of Ecbatan moves not my Mind; I ſeek for ſolid Vertues, and not ſplendid Thrones; and I know you are too full of Reaſon not to be of my Opinion. Alſo I am perſwaded, that although we have no Palaces nor Towns, yet if you did find amongſt us a Princeſs which were moſt Illuſtrious in every thing, you would prefer her before her that ſits upon the Throne of Aſſyria. Doubtleſs, I know, Madam, anſwered Artamenes, that I ſhould more eſteem ſuch an one in a Priſon, than many others which wore Crowns: But, Madam, when I ſpeak unto you of the Throne of Media, I am not put to that trouble, ſince the Prince who muſt ſit upon it, is one that is owner of all great Vertues and good Qualities. He knew better how to make his choice, (anſwered Thomiris) when he committed the Command of his Arms unto you: But I doubt whether he was ſo judicious in employing an Illuſtrious Conqueror to be an Embaſſadour, ſince in my Opinion they are different Qualities. If Fidelity (anſwered Artamenes, much non-pluſt) be one of the moſt eſſential Parts of this kind of Employment: I can aſſure your Majeſty, that I have as much of it as I have of Courage; and if I prove not ſo happy in this my Negotiation, as I have been in War, it ſhall be becauſe, Madam, your Majeſty would not have it ſo, but not my fault. No, Madam, I will omit no Endeavours which may conduce to the ſatisfaction of that King who ſent me; and if I cannot obtain it, then I muſt return back with much Sorrow, but I will carry nothing with me which may tax, either my Fidelity, or my Diligence. You have not yet told me (replied Thomiris, in much turbulency) the true Negotiation about which you came unto this Court; and had not Teres acquainted me, I had not known it. That which you impute unto me as a Crime, (anſwered my Maſter) is indeed, out of my reſpect, and if I ſay as much as the handſomeſt Expedient; for, Madam, I did not think it fit to expoſe the Honour of that Prince whom I ſerve unto any Diſgrace, grace, nor expoſe your Majeſty unto the open refuſal of a great King, if the Propoſition did not pleaſe you; yet notwithſtanding I hope for better Succeſs; and notwithſtanding all that hath been told me, to be as happy in my Negotiation as I have been in War. No, Artamenes, deceive not your ſelf, (anſwered the Queen) that which you have propoſed unto me, will not take effect, and you your ſelf are an invincible hindrance unto it. I, Madam, (anſwered my Maſter). Yes, you, (anſwered Thomiris) and therefore complain not if Ciaxares receive no ſatisfaction from me. I do confeſs, Madam, (anſwered Artamenes) I do not underſtand you. You underſtand me well enough, Artamenes, (anſwered ſhe, with a faint Voice, and dejecting her Eyes) but it's I that does not underſtand you. You may underſtand me, Madam, when you pleaſe, replied my Maſter; and if I have been ill interpreted, I ſhall be moſt ready to clear all your Doubts, and juſtify my ſelf. Your Crime (anſwered Thomiris) is of ſuch a Quality, as I cannot accuſe you, but I muſt accuſe my ſelf, which is not an eaſy matter for me to do. As I am very confident of my own Innocency, (replied Artamenes,) ſo I do not doubt of yours; nor can I ſuſpect a great Queen of the leaſt Error. No, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe, and covering her Eyes with her Hand) I do not err, when I think you worthy of a Crown. Alas, Madam, (cried out my Maſter) doubtleſs I am not rightly underſtood; and leſt I ſhould neglect that Reverence which I do owe you, I think it is my beſt not to anſwer you. You ſhall anſwer me enough, in not anſwering me at all, replied the Queen, and I ſhall not need any long diſcourſe to underſtand you. But, Madam, (ſaid Artamenes then) ſince what your Majeſty tells me is true, I have no other Buſineſs, but to take my leave of you and return to Themiſcira, that I may no longer keep one of the greateſt Kings upon Earth in a fruitleſs Hope.

This laſt Diſcourſe which my Maſter had premeditated to puzzle the Queen, did much ſurprize her, and put her unto ſuch a non-plus, that ſhe knew not what to anſwer; for ſhe thought, that by leaving no hopes in Artamenes menes to promote the Intereſt of Ciaxares, ſhe ſhould perſwade him that ſhe loved him: But perceiving this courſe did produce ſo bad an effect, and that this reſolute Anſwer took from her all pretence of ſtaying him, ſhe repented of what ſhe had ſaid, though ſhe knew not how to remedy it: She was upon the very point of more openly diſcovering her Paſſion unto him; Love and Modeſty did much contend which ſhould open, which ſhould ſhut her Mouth; ſhe would ſpeak, and ſhe would be ſilent; ſhe would oftentimes change Colour and look upon my Maſter, then upon a ſudden withdraw her Looks, and deject her Eyes; and all this with ſuch violent agitation, and turbulent irreſolution, as cauſed abundance of perplexity in my Maſter, whom this croſs Adventure made even deſperate.

But in concluſion, Thomiris not being able to ſpeak down-right of her Paſſion unto Artamenes, and not being willing that he ſhould depart, did turn the Matter another way; ſo that beginning to ſpeak again, It is not now, Artamenes, (ſaid ſhe to him) that you ſhall receive your Anſwer; but ſince you ſpoke unto me by Teres, it is by him I will return you an Anſwer: Mean while we will not yet reſolve upon any thing; a minute cannot make us alter our firmeſt Reſolves. Perhaps you will deſire nothing to morrow but what you deſire now; and perhaps, I my ſelf alſo, ſhall not wiſh for any thing but what I wiſh at preſent, though I am fully perſwaded, that what I ſhall deſire is equally innocent and glorious. As they were upon theſe Terms, Indatherſes and Aripithes, who ſince their jealouſy of my Maſter, became inſeparable Companions, came in and interrupted the Diſcourſe. Theſe two Princes did very eaſily obſerve a great agitation in the Mind of Thomiris, and ſaw ſome ſign of diſorder in the Face of Artamenes, which they imagined was cauſed by their Anger to be interrupted in their pleaſing Diſcourſe, but which indeed was quite contrary. Theſe jealous Princes ſpoke little; Artamenes for his part ſaid not much. Thomiris was reſtleſs in her Mind, that not being able to endure the preſence of theſe two Princes who loved her, and could not love them; and the delighting, and therefore cruel ſight of Artamenes whom ſhe loved, but who loved not her, troubling her, ſhe took leave of them all, and at the ſame time quitted her ſelf of the Objects of her Indifferency, and of her Love.

After the Queen was gone, Artamenes went out alſo with the two Princes; and ſince he was much pleaſed with Indatherſes, whom he ſuſpected not of any ſuch Thoughts as he brought with him, he left them not ſo ſoon: They whoſe Minds were only to diſcover his Intentions, and being glad of this Opportunity, propounded it unto him to walk out together. During this walk, they put an hundred odd froward Queſtions unto him concerning the Time he was to ſtay in this Court; unto which he anſwered very innocently: So that ſometimes he did confirm their Jealouſies, ſometimes he would leſſen them, but yet commonly they rather augmented than diminiſhed. Doubtleſs (ſaid Indatherſes to him) it is a Buſineſs of ſome great Importance, which detains you thus long in this Court, and which moved the King of Cappadocia to employ a Man of your Quality unto the Queen.

My Maſter, thinking to do them a pleaſure in ſpeaking advantagiouſly concerning Thomiris, did anſwer Indatherſes in ſuch a manner as moved Reſentment quite oppoſite to Joy. The Queen (replied he) is a Princeſs ſo illuſtrious, that though the Negotiation were not of any great Importance, yet the King, whom I ſerve, would ſend none unto her but a Perſon of great Quality, and if he failed in any thing, it was in that he did not make choice of one more worthy then my ſelf to treat with ſo great a Princeſs. I do believe (anſwered Aripithes) that he could not have found out one who had been more welcom to her; But that which moſt wonders me, added he, is to ſee the Queen treat you as ſhe does, and yet diſpatch you no ſooner. Affairs are never diſpatched in ſuch haſte, replied my Maſter, unleſs they be ſuch as concern open Wars. Thoſe which you negotiate, anſwered Indatherſes, I do believe are not of that Nature, I ſhould rather think them Matters of Love; ſince the King whom you ſerve is not married, having only one Daughter unmarried alſo, and this Queen a Widow; and the young King her Son being alſo a great Prince, it is not impoſſible but Love may be the ſubject of this ſo ſecret Employment. No Aripithes (replied he, interrupting him) it cannot be as you ſay, for the Marriages of Kings and their Loves are never concealed; I rather ſuſpect ſomething elſe: you may very well think (ſaid Artamenes, half ſmiling) that if I had any ſuch ſecret Orders, I ought not to tell you, nor ſhew you my Inſtructions, but I muſt leave you the liberty of your own Thoughts, and give you leave to divert your ſelves in reaſoning upon ſuch a Buſineſs as I muſt never tell you. I do not think (ſaid Indatherſes then) that your Buſineſs is Matters of War, for the moſt ſecret things of that nature would quickly be divulged: But if I be not much deceived, our impatience to know your Buſineſs is not greater than yours, to know the end of your Negotiation: For the Court of Thomiris, though it be very glorious to us Scythians who are declared Enemies to all Magnificence, yet it is not ſo to you, who has ſeen the Court of Media, and live in that of Cappadocia, which is not inferiour in all gallantry and pomp.

My Maſter thinking he had done them a great piece of Civility, did augment their Jealouſy, when he told them thus: I do confeſs that Cappadocia has moſt attractive Charms in it; and I do confeſs alſo, that any free and reaſonable Soul muſt needs find very great Ones in this Court of Thomiris: and though in lieu of being in a pleaſant, ſuch as hers is, ſhe ſhould reign over that People who live under the Mountain Imaus, amongſt the Rocks and Precipices, yet ſhe alone were enough to make the Place moſt pleaſant where e're ſhe were; and would doubtleſs ſo charm Embaſſadors to wait long upon her, that they would make no haſte away from her. Since we are ſtrangers as well as you are, replied Indatherſes, it is not fit for us to comment upon thoſe Commendations which you beſtow upon the Country of the Maſſagettes; and as for the Queen (added ed Aripithes) it belongs not to us to tell her what you ſay advantagiouſly of her, it being very probable that you being facetious as you are, you have found out ways to acquaint her with your good Opinion of her. She is one, replied Artamenes, who muſt not be commended to her Face; it is no leſs injurious to take too much liberty in commending a great Queen, than it is ſcandal unto one of a mean Condition: But as for Thomiris (ſaid he to them) there is no need to tell her ſhe is infinitely deſerving, and by conſequence infinitely eſteemed, ſince it is not poſſible ſhe can be ignorant of thoſe admirable Qualities wherein ſhe is ſo tranſcendent. You may imagine, Sir, how theſe two Rivals were ſtung at what my Maſter ſaid; Sometimes they would whiſper together, and ſometimes they would look upon Artamenes, and ſeek for that in his Eyes, which they plainly ſaw in his Words: As for his part, his Spirits were ſo poſſeſſed with Paſſion, and angered at this vexatious Adventure wherein he was entangled, that he minded neither the Diſcourſe nor Actions of theſe two Princes, as we underſtood by him which waited upon them, who told it afterwards unto Chriſantes.

But in concluſion, Sir, Artamenes being impatient to be alone, that he might have liberty to digeſt his Thoughts, did end the Walk, and parted from theſe two Princes who left him with a colder Complement than they accoſted him. We underſtood afterwards, that as ſoon as my Maſter was parted from them, they began to deſcant upon that turbulency which they obſerved in the Queen's Face: upon the penſiveneſs which appeared in the Eyes of their ſuppoſed Rival, when they came firſt in, and upon every word he had ſpoke unto them whilſt they were walking: But the reſult of all their Arguments was, that they concluded he loved Thomiris, and Thomiris did not hate him; and in concluſion, did both think and ſpeak, as much as moſt violent Jealouſy could prompt them unto. My Maſter, for his part, had not too much tranquillity, and the Queen was moſt of all perplexed: Inſomuch as ſhe was ſorry to ſee her ſelf in a manner exceed the Modeſty of her Sex; that which moſt vexed her was, to ſee her Folly did not thrive; it grieved her to the Heart, that neither her Beauty, nor her Quality, could move the Heart of Artamenes: This moved her abſolutely to command Gelonida, to ſpeak her ſelf unto my Maſter; and pump his Thoughts to the bottom of his Heart: Gelonida denied a Command that had ſo little reaſon in it, but Thomiris would without more contradiction be punctually obeyed: Gelonida, ſince there was no remedy, ſpoke her ſelf unto Artamenes, after ſhe had prepared his Mind a little, by the aſſiſtance of Chriſantes: But the truth was, Buſineſs was rather to help him out with a handſom Pretence to refuſe the Queen, than any perſwaſion of him to her; for ſince this Lady was ſo affectionately tied unto the Intereſt of Ciaxares, and conceiving that the Queen made a Choice below her Quality in thinking upon Artamenes; ſhe carried the Buſineſs after ſuch a manner, as did little leſs intangle my Maſter, than if ſhe had driven on the Deſign which Thomiris deſired her: Certainly he never met with a more peeviſh piece of Buſineſs: He prayed Gelonida a hundred times over, to perſwade the Queen that he eſteemed her as much as a mortal Man could do: But although he were extreamly in love with her, yet would he never falſify that Fidelity and Reverence which he owed the King of Cappadocia.

Indeed, Sir, he ſaid as much unto her, as any Man of the ſweeteſt and nobleſt Mind could do, to conceal the Shame and Confuſion of ſo great and fair a Queen. Gelonida and he, then being agreed upon an anſwer, ſhe returned to Thomiris, who did moſt impatienly expect her; ſhe no ſooner ſaw her, but cauſing all to go out of her Chamber; Well, Gelonida, (ſaid ſhe to her) let me from your Mouth hear, whether it be Thomiris or her Crown which Artamenes thinks unworthy of himſelf? It is rather he, Madam, replied Gelonida, who thinks imſelf unworthy of both: But, Madam, he ſaid furher, that though he might without injuſtice aſpire unto hat Honour which your Majeſty is pleaſed to offer him, nd notwithſtanding that eſteem which he owes you, yet he reſolves rather to die than fail in Duty to his Maſter. What, (replied Thomiris) would he do ſo, though he loved me? Certainly, Madam, (ſaid Gelonida to her) it cannot be thought that Love will ever corrupt his Duty. He told me, Madam, that he adored you in his Heart; but though his Life was deſtined to be unhappy, yet he would not be wicked. His Vertue indeed would be great (replied the Queen) but his Love would be ſmall if he could do ſo; and doubtleſs, he expreſſed his Paſſion unto you as an indifferent imaginary thing which never diſturbed his Reaſon, by any experience he had of it. I could have ſpoke as he does the day before he came hither; but now, ſince I have altered my Thoughts, I am perſwaded that if he loved me, he would change alſo with me; and his Generoſity would be perhaps a little diſpenſed with, principally in ſuch a Buſineſs as does not directly injure his Vertue. But, Gelonida, (added ſhe further) it is not I that can perſwade him; that which my Merit cannot do, my Reaſons will not. Your Merit, Madam, replied Gelonida, has (as he aſſures) wrought upon his Soul, as much as you can reaſonably deſire: He doth acknowledg that he both eſteems and admires you; but he adds withal, that it is in ſuch a manner, as thoſe who are Native Subjects unto their Queen, although he be not one of yours. For my part, replied Thomiris, I cannot tell what to think of Artamenes; for certain I am, there is no vitious Thought in my Heart, for if there were the leaſt tincture of any ſuch, very deſpite and repentance ſhould quickly cure of that Malady which troubles me; yet although that kind of imbecility does not diſturb me, my Soul is not at quiet: Artamenes has induced me almoſt to hate Indathirſes, and Aripithes; I cannot indure the Name of Ciaxares, which by others he has moved in, but not himſelf: every thing which might divert me, annoys me; my own Thoughts vex me; and not well knowing whether I love, or ought to love, I am only certain that I hate my own Tranquility, and that it will be hard for me ever to find it, unleſs he will permit me to give him a Crown, and confer that on him which in-

ted his Vertue deſerves, and Quality denies him. For y part, Madam, (replied Gelonida) I think that Armenes prefers his Duty before his Ambition. But, Genida, (replied Thomiris, very angerly) if you do imagine ſuch an impoſſibility in my Deſign, why do you not tell me that Artamenes ſlights me? that Artamenes ſpeaks of me but with a faint Reſpect, and that Artamenes is unworthy of my Affection? Perhaps, if you carry it thus, very Spleen will work that in my Heart, which Reaſon could not. But you ſeem to tell me, that Artamenes ſpoke unto you with ſo much reſpect, and ſo much Wiſdom, that I can hardly either complain or deſpair; For if Artamenes do eſteem me, he may chance to love me; and if he love me, then that which he calls Duty unto Ciaxares, will quickly ſubmit unto the Duty which he owes unto Thomiris; therefore I muſt only keep Artamenes in this Court as long as poſſible I can, and ſubmit the reſt unto Fortune. I do believe, Madam, replied Gelonida, that it will be very difficult to keep him long, for if I be not deceived, he will preſently ask leave to depart. He may ask it, (anſwered this violent Princeſs) but he ſhall not obtain it: The Orders which I ſhall give will ſtop his Paſſage over Araxes. This was the diſcourſe of Thomiris and Gelonida: But to the end that Tirez ſhould not underſtand her Intentious, ſhe gave him order to tell my Maſter that if he would have a little patience, ſhe would within a few days, give him a peremptory Anſwer. Artamenes was then very much perplexed, for Gelonida did let him know by Chriſantes, that the Queen's Paſſion was every day more and more violent: Teres on the contrary, told him that there was great hopes in his Traſanction: Indeed, he neither knew well what to think, nor what to reſolve upon; He did ſtill urge Teres to preſs on the Buſineſs, and told him plainly, that if he received not an Anſwer within a ſhort time, he would be gone without it.

Mean time, this bad Succeſs did much torment him; not only becauſe he was ſorry that he diſturbed the Tranquillity of Thomiris; not becauſe Ciaxares would be perhaps diſpleaſed with him, but becauſe he apprehended ed Mandana might imagine that he did not uſe his beſt endeavour in the Buſineſs, ſince the Succeſs of it might deprive that Princeſs of a Crown. He was forced therefore unto Patience, and to wait upon the Iſſue of that Buſineſs, which in all appearance would not ſucceed handſomly. Thomiris, ſince ſhe had ſpoken unto Artamenes in ſuch plain Terms, was two days and would not be ſeen by any, under colour of being not well: During which time, Artamenes, the better to entertain himſelf with his melancholly Contemplations, went out to walk upon the Banks of that Rivolet, which, as I told you, did run along the Tents-Royal, and went which very little company; He would ſometimes leave us among ſome certain Trees which grew there, and there command us to ſtay; he would walk alone by himſelf, and go ſo far ſometimes that he would be out of our ſight.

Two days after that Gelonida had ſpoke unto him, Indatherſes and Aripithes, who had obſerved a great ſecrecy between Chriſantes and her, and conceived things much otherwiſe than they were, were extreamly tormented with their Jealouſies, and without any further reſolution, would clear all their Doubts of being revenged upon Artamenes. But yet the difficulty was to agree, which of them it ſhould be which ſhould execute it; for ſaid Aripithes unto Indatherſes, if you ſhould call Artdmenes in queſtion, and he give you no ſatiſfaction, you muſt then fight with him, and then perhaps you would pretend a new right unto Thomiris by this Combat. No, anſwered Indatherſes, I promiſe you never to pretend any thing unto her without her free Conſent: So that you may eaſily imagine, that my Quarrel with Artamenes is not the way to procure her Favour if ſhe love him, but it will put you into leſs danger of her hatred than my ſelf. But ſo it was, Sir, that they could not agree upon the Matter; they were rather ready to fall upon one another, for it is imaginable, that union which was grounded upon Jealouſy was not indiſſolvable, and ſo they parted very ill ſatiſfied with one another; and Indatherſes ſeeing my Maſter go out of the Tent to walk, followed only by two or three of his Men, he went after with an equal number, to ſeek him by the River ſide where he often walked: As ſoon as Artamenes ſaw him, he went towards him, and accoſting him with much civility; I am happier than I thought (ſaid he to him) ſince I expected nothing in my Walk but ſolitude, and find ſuch good Company. Indatherſes anſwered my Maſter civilly enough before the Company; and beginning to go on, Indatherſes propounded to walk on Foot; and my Maſter conſenting unto it, they gave their horſes to their Men, and walked alone along the River ſide: As ſoon as they were at a reaſonable diſtance, and out of ſight of their Men; Indatherſes looking upon Artamenes, I know not (ſaid he to him) whether the Buſineſs I have to tell you, will ſurprize you; but I do know very well it can never trouble you ſo much as it has me. I know not (replied Artamenes) whether or no it will ſurprize me until I do know it; yet I can aſſure you, that I uſe not to be ſo at any perverſe events; but always prepare my ſelf to receive the worſt Malice of Fortune with a quiet Mind. My Buſineſs with you now (replied Indatherſes) is not of that quality: but before I explain my ſelf any further, tell me, I beſeech you, whether ſince you came amongſt the Maſſagettes, you ever heard of the Cauſe which brought me into this Court of Thomiris? Since I do uſe be ſincere (replied my Maſter) I muſt confeſs they tell me it is becauſe you are in love with Thomiris: and that both you and the Prince of Sauromates are poſſeſſed with the ſame Paſſion. Knew you as much before you ſaw Thomiris? I did ſo, anſwered my Maſter; Why then did you not defend your Heart (added Indatherſes) againſt her Charms? and ſince you make ſuch publick profeſſion of Generoſity, why would you diſingage two Princes, who have received you with all poſſible Civility? for I am certain that the Queen loves you, and I conceive that you love her; for this Princeſs would for a whole Year together obſtinately deny her Affection unto me, to place it upon a Man who never asked it, or does not love her. I do confeſs (anſwered Artamenes coldly) that what you tell me does more ſurpriſe me than I thought it would: But ſince I do not uſe to give any Explanations of this nature, unto any who complain of me, and ſpeak unto me in ſuch an Air as you do, I can ſay nothing to you, but that I reverence the Queen more than to ſuſpect her of any ſuch Imbecility as you accuſe her of: And for my particular, if I have been any Obſtacle, unto your Affection, I have done nothing but what I ought. But yet (replied Indatherſes) you do not directly tell me, whether or no you love the Qeen, and whether the Queen loves you, and whether your Buſineſs at Court will quickly be diſpatched? I will give you no other Anſwer (replied my Maſter) but as I did before, that I have done nothing but what I ought to do; and if you be not contented with it, then you muſt look out a way to get better ſatisfaction, for I will not refuſe you any that I can. I do know very well, (replied Indatherſes) that to aſſault an Embaſſador, is in ſome degree a violation of the Law of Nations, which all the People in the World think Sacred; but ſince I am a Stranger as well as you, I do not think my ſelf obliged by the Laws of this Country, nor that I am any thing injurious unto Honour, if I demand reparation for the Affront which you have offered, in cauſing Thomiris to hate me. Moſt Juſt (anſwered my Maſter, without any dorr at it) and if you pleaſe to walk ſome two hundred Paces further out of their ſight which follow us, you having a Sword as well as I, we may there end all Differences, and ſee whether the Love you bear unto the Queen, will make you Conqueror without any Danger.

Artamenes told us afterwards, that his anger to ſee himſelf perſecuted by a Man unto whom he was not any Rival, did ſo tranſport him, that he was not leſs incenſed than if he had been in love with the Queen. Indatherſes then accepting the Offer, they began to walk until they were out of any ſight of their Men, who never minded them: Indatherſes, and Artamenes drawing their Swords, began the Combat, the particulars whereof I cannot well relate, ſince all we know was from the Mouth of the Combatants, whoſe Modeſty would not permit them to ſet out their own Valours. Artamenes told us that Indatherſes ſhewed himſelf a Man of great Courage, and much Valour, in this dangerous Attempt. They made ſeveral paſſes at one another without a touch: but at laſt, ſince it was my Maſters deſtiny ever to vanquiſh, his Sword was ſanguin'd with the Blood of Indatherſes: The hurt was but ſlight, yet ſince it was in his right Arm, it much troubled him; ſo that fearing he ſhould not be long able to manage his Sword, he reſolved to come up very cloſe unto my Maſter, who received him as gallantly. Indatherſes was as tall as my Maſter; but there was ever ſuch a ſtrange vigour in the Heart of Artamenes, as it always doubled his ſtrength in any Dangers, and which ever made him victorious; ſo that after a little time of diſpute, Artamenes catch'd hold of Indatherſes Sword, and preſenting his own Sword unto his Breſt, cauſed him to confeſs himſelf vauquiſhed. My Maſter having both Swords in his hands; you will now acknowledg (ſaid he) that Artamenes is not altogether unworthy of the Affection of Thomiris? I will confeſs (replied Indatherſes) that you have valour enough to vanquiſh me, and that my Fortune is not good enough to diſpute with you for her. And I do confeſs, replied my Maſter, reſtoring him his Sword, and imbracing him, that I am not in love with Thomiris, that I never was nor ever will be. How, replied Indatherſes, are not you a lover of Thomiris? No, (replied Artamenes) and by my good will, ſhall never be any hinderance unto your Felicity with her. Since it is ſo (replied Indatherſes) why would you fight? Becauſe I would better perſwade you of the Truth, (anſwered my Maſter) and not ſuffer you to ſuſpect my Valour. Indatherſes was ſo much ſurpriſed and charmed with the generoſity of Artamenes, that he could not chuſe but deſire him to explain this Riddle, and uſed ſuch preſſing terms, and ſo full of ſubmiſſion, that my Maſter promiſed him he would; yet ſince he was hurt in the Arm, he perſwaded him to return unto his Tent to be dreſſed. The difficulty was how to get thither unperceived, and ſince it was not poſſible, Artamenes deſired him not to be troubled at it, leſt that Thomiris ſhould be offended with him and baniſh him, that he would take it upon himſelf, and ſay that it was he who firſt aſſaulted him. You are then it ſeems ſo much in her Favour (anſwered Indatherſes) that you fear not her Anger? Rather ſay, (replied Artamenes, ſmiling) that her Anger is ſo little terrible to me, that I fear not to expoſe my ſelf unto it.

Mean while, Sir, you may Imagine how much they were amazed which held their Horſes, when at their return they knew, by the Blood of Indatherſes, they had been fighting: that which moſt wondred them, was to ſee them ſeem as good Friends, as when they went out. And indeed Indatherſes and Artamenes, did ever after that love dearly. My Maſter becauſe he would keep his Word, after he had brought Indatherſes to his Pavillon, ſent Chriſantes to the Queen, to ask pardon for the Combat which he had fought with Indatherſes; that he confeſſed he was to blame in it, therefore he begged Pardon for Indatherſes as well as himſelf.

Thomiris much wondred at this Combat, and could not gueſs the Cauſe: Aripithes who was quite out with Indatherſes, was angry with himſelf that he could not go unto him to ask what Artamenes had told him. Yet the Queen, who could not be angry with Artamenes, reflected all againſt Indatherſes, ſaying, he had extreamly offended her, by affronting an Ambaſſador in her Court. Artamenes knowing it by the return of Chriſantes, went himſelf to beſeech her, in the behalf of Indatherſes; or if ſhe would puniſh him, yet not to make that the Ground of it. She urged my Maſter to tell her the Cauſe of the Combat, but he would not be induced to tell her; yet in concluſion procured a Pardon both for himſelf and Indatherſes. Aripithes angry to be thus prevented by Indatherſes, but much more to ſee my Maſter eſcape the danger of the Combat, and be victorious, reſolved, notwithſtanding his Pretentions unto the Queen, to quarrel with him alſo, and to ſeek out for an Opportunity.

Mean while the Prince of Tauroſcithes, who was all impatient until he was better informed from the Mouth of Artamenes, of all which he ſaid unto him, did ſend civilly unto him; [illegible] the next day performed: He went unto his Tent, and acknowledged unto him, that his Negotiation at this Court was, to propound a Marriage between the Queen and Ciaxares; but not being able to give the Reaſon, he found her very averſe in the Motion; and that he began infallibly to ſee he ſhould return without effecting any thing, but the Buſineſs which related unto Pirats upon the Caſpian Sea, which was only the ſpecious Pretence of his Voyage. So, Sir, (ſaid he to him) you may well judg that I am in no Fault, nor ſhall not be, although I do continue my Tranſaction of the King's Intereſt whom I ſerve: But trouble not your ſelf at it, for I do aſſure you, that I am not able to effect it. And that I may the more quiet your Mind in regard of my ſelf: I do confeſs unto you, that I am in love with one whoſe Manacles I would not quit for all the Crowns of the World. Indatherſes gave my Maſter many thanks for his Generoſity and Freedom: And after he had promiſed unto him perpetual Affection, how comes it to paſs (ſaid he to him) that you cannot promote your Negotiation, ſince the Queen beſtows ſo many Marks of her Eſteem and Affection upon you? Artamenes deſiring to conceal from Indatherſes the Imbecility of Thomiris, told him, that it was oft-times the Cuſtom of Kings, to ſweeten the bad Succeſs of a Buſineſs, by their way and manner of tranſacting it. Yet Indatherſes was too much intereſted in the Buſineſs to be ſo eaſily deceived, and not to diſcern the difference between the Effects of common Civility, and the Effects of a violent Paſſion: But do what he could, he could not move Artamenes to tell what he knew concerning the Love of Thomiris; my Maſter always telling him, that he may very well content himſelf with knowing that he had no Affection unto the Queen.

This Diſcourſe being ended, Artamenes left him, and Chriſantes came to advertiſe him, that the Queen had given ſecret Orders to obſerve his Actions very carefully, leſt he ſhould eſcape away. You may imagine, Sir, how and ſeemed as if he [illegible] him ; yet he diſſembled it, times made Viſits to the Queen, who did not He divers him but after an ordinary manner ; ſometimes ſhe would be melancholy ; ſometimes ſhe would paſs from melancholy unto vexation, and ſhew ſome ſigns of Anger and Fury ; ſometimes ſhe would aſſume her civil and obliging Humour, ſo that it was eaſy to judg, that one and the ſame cauſe produced different Effects. My Maſter did once more preſs upon Teres, who made anſwer, that he was almoſt in deſpair of doing him that Service he would, but yet he could not give him any abſolute Anſwer. Afterwards he let my Maſter know, that the Queen commanded me to tell him, ſhe would have him ſtay until the return of Spargapiſes and Aritanus ; that ſhe could neither conclude of any thing, nor ſend him away until the King her Son came back : But withal he told him, how ſhe had ſent her Son ſecret Orders not to return over-ſoon, and beſeeched him to pardon him if he were not able to perform thoſe good Offices which he promiſed. After this, we obſerved that upon the matter Artamenes was not at liberty, and that there were always many Men which obſerved him ; he could never walk, but he was accompanied with a great number, and had ſcarce the freedom to be in his Tent without a Guard. The Ordinary Guards were not only doubled, but there were Courts of Guard placed in ſeveral Diſtances round about the Railes of the Camp.

We underſtood by Gelonida, that to colour the Buſineſs, it was given out, the Queen had received Intelligence, how Artamenes had ſecret Deſigns upon the Country ; and therefore, without offering any violence unto him, unleſs her Doubts were better cleared, ſhe would have him carefully looked unto.

Artamenes ſeeing himſelf brought unto this Extremity, did not know what to reſolve upon : He ſaw ſufficiently that the Marriage of Ciaxares could not be brought about ; he knew that if he ſhould move for new Leave to depart, it would rather more reſtrain his Liberty, than do any good. He perceived, by thoſe Orders which were given unto the Guards about the Tent-Royal, and by them which obſerved his Actions, that there was no poſſibility to eſcape; nor could he deviſe how to get himſelf out of this Labyrinth. Alas, (ſaid he ſometimes unto us) what can I do? what ſhall I ſay to Ciaxares? how can I ſpeak unto Mandana? Shall I tell them that Thomiris is in love with me? Is it poſſible for me to entertain them with any ſuch Diſcourſe? But if I do not tell them, what will the King and the Princeſs think of my flight? what will they ſay of ſuch ſtrange Proceedings? May they not well ſay I have loſt my Senſes? Yet as the ſtate of things does ſtand, this is the beſt which can happen unto me:My hopes of ſeeing Mandana will comfort me, and my Innocence will not long lie hid. Thus was Artamenes deſcanting upon the Buſineſs when Gelonida came to tell him, that ſhe would adviſe him to be gone as ſoon as he could; but ſince he did not very well know how to do it, he thought good to colour it, and therefore he deſired leave once more to depart: But ſhe anſwered that it could not be with conveniency, and therefore he muſt abſolutely wait the return of Spargapiſes.

Artamenes then ſeeing himſelf denied, and a Priſoner, was extreamly melancholy; not but that Gelonida did contrive all the ways ſhe could for his eſcape, but there was no means poſſible to bring it about. This did more diſquiet my Maſter than any thing elſe; for if he had been permitted but a Sword in his Hand, I do verily think he would have hoped to eſcape by forcing the Guards, and killing all that oppoſed his Paſſage, for ſuch wonderful and incredible things have I ſeen him bring to paſs. But when he began to conſider that the Queen was not thus violent and unjuſt, but becauſe ſhe loved him, he could not reſolve to diſhonour her by ſuch an Action; nor kill the Subjects of that Princeſs, whoſe Crime was an error of Love to him. Sorrow did ſit ſo heavy upon his Soul, that Indatherſes, now healed of his Hurt, and coming to viſit him, did perceive it, and did ſo urge him to acknowledg that Thomiris loved him, and that her Love was the cauſe of his Sorrows, as he could interpret it no otherwiſe; and at laſt told him how the Queen expreſſed ſuch things unto him as did induce him to believe it: And further told Indatherſes, that he ſhould infinitely oblige him if he would deviſe ſome way whereby he might eſcape. Now you may plainly ſee, generous Indatherſes (ſaid he to him) that I am not your Rival, ſince I do deſire your furtherance to rid me away from Thomiris. I do indeed, (anſwered Indatherſes) and plainly ſee you are in no fault; but that on the contrary, I am much obliged to you: But for all that (ſaid he) you do cauſe abundance of trouble in my Soul; for, truly, to diſcover the bottom of my Heart unto you, I ſhould be leſs troubled than I am, if Thomiris loved one who loved her: But that this Princeſs, who is ſo admirably fair and amiable, who has a Soul ſo great, and ſo unalterably ſetled, as to reſiſt the Love of Aripithes and my ſelf ſo long, ſhould, after all this, fall in love with a Man who loves not her; I do really confeſs to you, that I cannot reſent it but with abundance of extraordinary Sorrow: 'Tis true, I ſhould be more jealous if you loved her, but not half ſo much grieved. But in that ſtate wherein I do find my ſelf, pardon me (ſaid he to him) if your admirable Merits can juſtify Thomiris in my Thoughts. No, generous Artamenes, I will love her no longer; I will either pull that Paſſion out of my Soul, or elſe I'le die: And the more to facilitate your eſcape, I will determine upon my own; to that end I will tell the Queen, I have received Orders from the King of the Tauroſcithes my Father, to come unto him, and deſire her Leave to be gone: Since I am not Artamenes (ſaid he, ſighing) ſhe will permit it; and the better to further our Deſign, you ſhall feign your ſelf ſick: In the Night you ſhall come into my Tent, and I will convey you away with me; your Servants may alſo paſs amongſt my Train, and we will go out ſo early in the Morning, that the Guards cannot know you: You may appoint ſome Servants to ſtay behind, who may tell it, that their Maſter is not well, they dare not go into his Chamber until it be late; this Device will afford you more time, and you will be further off before your flight be diſcovered:

Thoſe who watch and obſerve you in the day-time, commit all the care of you in the night to the Night-guards, who watch both within and without the Camp, ſo that the Project will apparently take effect; and I ſhall ſet you in ſuch a way, where, unleſs I be much deceived, they will never ſeek you. In ſhort, Indatherſes told him, I will be both your Guide and your Convoy; but (ſaid he) do not think that this Office which I do you, is out of any Intereſt or End; for let me tell you once more, I will love Thomiris no longer; Abſence, which uſes to cure ſuch Maladies, ſhall perfect that which Anger has begun.

In a word, Sir, to make my Diſcourſe the ſhorter; though Artamenes was extreamly unwilling to take from Thomiris ſuch an illuſtrious Lover; yet Indatherſes did preſs it ſo upon him, that he accepted of his Offer: The Buſineſs was done with more eaſe than we could expect. Indatherſes asked leave, and obtained it; my Maſter counterfeited being Sick; we went out of our Tent unto that of Indatherſes (which was very near) in the Night: We appointed one of thoſe who was to ſtay behind at the Chamber Door, to conceal our flight as long as he could.

At the firſt break of Day, we went out of the Tents-Royal unperceived by any, becauſe we were mingled amongſt the Train of Indatherſes. The Guards, who had Orders from the Queen to let this Prince paſs, did not oppoſe our paſs; ſo that we were got out of the Camp, and out of their furtheſt Courts of Guards undiſcovered by any: But I forgot to tell you, Sir, how much it troubled my Maſter thus to leave his Men; ſo that if Gelonida, who was privy to our departure, had not aſſured him, that ſhe had prevalency enough with the Queen to prevent any ill uſage unto them, I do believe he would not have gone; but this vertuous Woman did ſo faithfully promiſe to protect them, that he did believe it, and took her Counſel; leaving a Letter for Thomiris, whereby he endeavoured to colour and excuſe his departure.

Mean time, our March proved ſo proſperous, that we were not found by them who queſtionleſs did ſeek for us; for Indatherſes did lead us ſuch a way, as none would ever ſuſpect us to take. My Maſter would have quitted this Prince from being his Guide any longer; yet Indatherſes would needs continue his Office; for, Sir, ſince he imagined, that as ſoon as the flight of Artamenes was diſcovered, the Queen would cauſe all the Paſſages over Araxes to be ſtopped; therefore he conducted him unto a place higher up the River, where it parted into three Diviſions, and where they might ford it over: It was juſt to the ſide of Araxes that Indatherſes conducted Artamenes, whom he loved exceedingly, altho he had been a cauſe of much Sorrow unto him. My Maſter did then ask pardon, for being in ſome ſort a cauſe of his Griefs, and both of them embracing one another with equal tenderneſs of Affection, they parted with reciprocal Promiſes to love one another eternally. Indatherſes looked upon Artamenes as he paſſed the River; who being landed on the other ſide, ſaluted the Prince of Tauroſcithes, and he him again. Afterwards Indatherſes took the way unto his Country, though now he was a good way out of it, and we took that which conducted unto Cappadocia. But, Sir, that which made the firſt day's Journey moſt unpleaſant, was, becauſe Artamenes had much ado to reſolve with himſelf what he ſhould ſay unto Ciaxares; yet after he had well bethought himſelf, he reſolved to tell him only, that he did not find things in ſo good a ſtate, as to move Thomiris openly concerning his Marriage; and that this Princeſs being perſwaded unto it by ſome ill-diſpoſed Perſons, cauſed a Rumour to be raiſed, that he had ſome bad Deſigns in agitation; that he being advertiſed how they were jealous of his Actions, demanded leave to depart: Which being denied, and ſeeing they reſolved to arreſt him, he thought it his Duty to prevent it, leſt any Diſgrace ſhould reflect upon the King.

In concluſion, after he had fancied what to ſay, the hopes of ſeeing Mandana again, did revive ſome Joy in his Soul; and after this, we travelled not a day wherein we did not diſcover ſome new ſatisfaction in the Countenance tenance of Artamenes : Every ſtep he took towards Mandana, was a freſh delight ; and his own Thoughts did ſo pleaſantly entertain him, that he did not need either the Company of Chriſantes or me to divert him : Commonly he went either ſome thirty Paces before, or thirty Paces behind the reſt of the Company, that he might ſtudy out his Thoughts with more freedom. One day then, when we were not above five hundred Furlongs from Themiſcira ; and becauſe our Journey was great, we we were gone out before day did appear : After we had rode above an hour, we came into a Foreſt, when the Sun from the Eaſt did firſt gild the Clouds : There was one of my Maſter's Men, named Ortalques, riding upon a white Horſe, and being the firſt which rode, that the reſt might follow him in the dark ; Artamenes followed him, Chriſantes and my ſelf, with ſome others, followed Artamenes.

Marching in this Order, and this approaching Light beginning to pierce through the thick Foreſt, permitting us to diſcern Objects which were not far diſtant : my Maſter diſcovered upon his right Hand, a great and rich Pavillion erected under ſome Trees, and guarded by many Souldiers, and ſeemed as if they would forbid entrance unto any which ſhould come there. This Sight ſo extraordinary, begot a little Curioſity in my Maſter ; but his Mind was taken up with the Idea of his Princeſs, that it ſtopped his Curioſity to ask what it was. When he was gone a little further, he could not chuſe but turn his Head aſide ; and he ſaw, through the Boughs and Trees, a Woman, who lifting up the hanging of the Tent, ſeemed to look whether or no it were day. About ten or twelve Paces further, he who went firſt, and was called Ortalques, being then ſome twenty Paces from Artamenes, he ſaw a Man in Arms, who getting upon his Horſe which his Page did hold, came up to him, and asked him, whether he was that Country-man? and whether he could tell him which way he ſhould croſs the Foreſt, and never enter into the Plains? No, Sir, (anſwered Ortalques) but perhaps thoſe that come after me may better inform you. Then Artamenes came up and asked him what this Cavalier did ſay? But whilſt he was relating it, my Maſter ſaw a dozen Horſe-men coming, who after they had looked upon this Stranger, cried out, it's he my Companions, it's he; ſend preſently to inform our Captain; then one of them ſpur'd his Horſe, and rode in all haſte to the place from whence they came: Mean while, the eleven which remained, fell upon this unknown Cavalier, who being retreated ſome certain Paces, commanded his Page aloud, to go in all haſte, and cauſe them to depart; for (ſaid he, ſpeaking of Artamenes and the reſt, who ſeeing the inequality of the Combate, had their Swords drawn ready to defend him) this relief which the Gods have ſent me, is ſufficient to make my Party good with them; after which I ſhall be with you.

Indeed this Stranger was not deceived; and the Generoſity of Artamenes not permitting him to ſee one ſingle Man in his Preſence, aſſaulted by eleven; never ſtood conſidering what he had to do, but as ſoon as he ſaw theſe Cavaliers aſſaulted a ſingle Man, drew his Sword, and commanded us to do the like; ſo that advancing towards theſe Blades, he gave time unto him whom they would have deſtroyed, to ſpeak what I already told you unto his Page: Artamenes underſtood not what it was he ſaid, although I did very diſtinctly hear it; as ſoon as he had given that Order, this unknown Cavalier came in to diſingage my Maſter from his Enemies, but he perceived that he had done it himſelf, by killing three of them with his own Hands, and we, the reſt of his Company ſeconding his Valour, as well as it was poſſible for us; ſo that this unknown Partner joyning with us, it was an eaſy matter to vanquiſh the remainder of our Enemies, it being moſt certain, that he was as valiant as any Man in the World; he fought then as a Man that would teſtiſy unto his Liberator, he was not unworthy of that Protection which was given him: But as the laſt of his Enemies fell dead by the Hand of Artamenes, and as he came unto him to render him Thanks, the day being full light enough, he knew him (as we imagined afterwards;) ſo that immediately altering his Deſign, he recoiled back, and went towards Ortalques, who was looking round about to ſpy whether there were any more Enemies to fight withal; and being come near him, Tell your Maſter (ſaid he in great haſte) that I am very ſorry to be ſo uncivil, and ſeem ſo ungrateful: But ſince my Deſtinies compel me to it, I hope he will excuſe me. After he had ſpoken theſe words in great haſte, he rode preſently through the Trees, and followed the ſame way which the Ladies and thoſe which were with them took: Ortalques told my Maſter what the Stranger ſaid: This paſſage, you may well ſuppoſe did much ſurprize Artamenes, ſince he could not imagine why he ſhould ſo haſtily ſend this Complement by his Man, and how preſſing ſoever his occaſions were, it would not have retarded him more to have ſpoke it unto himſelf, as well as unto his Servants: He thought that in fighting he heard the tone of a Voice which was not altogether unknown unto him; yet he could not recal who it ſhould be; ſo that longing exceedingly to know more of this Adventure, he went to look amongſt the dead, if there were none amongſt them which had been known unto him; and viewing them, he found one, who by reaſon of a great Wound received in his right Hand, and another in his Throat which made him Speechleſs, ſo that he was not to be underſtood by any thing but Signs: This wounded Cavalier no ſooner ſaw my Maſter, but as we might conjecture by his ſigns he knew him, although none of us could remember him, or ever ſaw him; and to ſay truth it was not ſtrange at all, ſince it is very ordinary for thouſands to know the General of an Army, whom he knows not again. This Man, as ſoon as he ſaw my Maſter near him, ſeemed to be very joyful, and exceedingly deſirous to make him underſtand the Adventure; but the more he endeavoured to explain himſelf, the more he puzled Artamenes, for he could not pronounce a word or a ſyllable, nor was there any way to draw any conjecture from him: Sometimes he would point towards that way which the unknown Cavalier had taken, as if he wiſhed us to go after him: Sometimes times he would point towards that place from whence they came, as if he expected ſome relief from thence; afterwards, he would look about, and make us view that Pavilion, which the Men belonging unto that unknown Cavalier had left, and carried away the Ladies which were in it: In ſhort, all his Signs and Actions did but augment the diſquiet of Artamenes; who to ſee if he could find any thing in that Pavilion which might better inform him, lighted from his Horſe and went in; but though he could not meet with any thing which could add any thing unto his Knowledg; yet notwithſtanding he could not leave it: Sometimes he was in a mind, though he knew not why, to go after him whom he had ſo opportunely relieved: other-times he reſolved to tarry there in hopes that ſome would come and give him better intelligence of the Accident; and ſometimes he would chide himſelf for loſing ſo much time which was ſo precious; what ſhall I do here (ſaid he) and intereſt my ſelf in other Mens Buſineſs, when I may be drawing nearer my Princeſs? and as if he were aſhamed of that fault, he went out of the Pavilion, got on Horſeback, and commanded one of his Men to take up the wounded Man behind him, until he came unto the next Houſe, where he might be dreſſed, and from whence he might ſend to bury the dead, who by their Arms ſeemed to be Cappadocians: That which was moſt advantagious unto us upon this occaſion was, that there was none of us wounded, except Chriſantes, who received a ſlight ſcratch in his left Arm. Artamenes remembring that there was one of theſe twelve Cavaliers, which turned back as if he went to fetch relief, would needs ſtay a while to ſee if any came, notwithſtanding the counſel of Chriſantes to the contrary; for indeed he ſuppoſed if there came any Men, they would be numerous, and that Artamenes was not in a condition to reſiſt them, yet it was not that reaſon which hindred him from ſtaying longer: But ſeeing that the wounded Man was in much danger; and that his Throat with ſtriving to ſpeak was ſo ſwelled that the Man almoſt loſt his Senſes, and fearing it might choak him, he marched in all haſte unto the next Houſe or Town; as ſoon as he came there, he ſent for a Chyrurgion to ſearch the Wound in his Neck, and to try if there were any poſſibility to recover his Voice. For three days together this wounded Man could not ſpeak a ſyllable, nor was there yet any likelihood: Artamenes ſeeing that, commanded the Chyrurgion to have a great care of him: He gave his Recompence before-hand; and continued on his Journey: He did enquire of all thoſe whom he met with in the Houſe where we were, whether there were any Men ſeen lately in Arms; but we found none, neither there, nor any where upon the Road, who could inform us any thing: Artamenes was ſo poſſeſſed with a profound muſing that we marched all that day, and the next within ſix hours of Night without pronouncing one ſyllable: But when we came to the Banks of Thormodon, and within ſight of Themiſcira where the King told him he would ſtay till his return, Joy did then a little move his Heart, and turning himſelf towards me (who was next him) with a pleaſant Countenance. At the laſt, Feraulas (ſaid he to me) I ſee the place where my Princeſs is, and by conſequence, I hope to ſee her preſently: But, O Heavens, ſhall I find her the ſame I left her? Shall I obtain from the ſincerity of her Vertue, ſo much happineſs, as to hear her ſay ſhe thought upon me in my Abſence? Sir, (ſaid I to him) although the Princeſs do not tell it you, yet you may well believe it, for I am moſt certain, it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould do otherwiſe. Indeed I had good reaſon for what I ſaid; for a few days before we parted from Themiſcira, Marteſia had ſo much goodneſs in her,as to truſt me with all the advantagious Thoughts which the Princeſs entertained concerning my Maſter: But ſhe did ſo expreſly forbid me to ſpeak of it to Artamenes, that I never durſt reveal them; giving him only ſome hopes in general of being beloved, without particularizing any thing: And to tell you the truth, I ſaw him ſo grieved at his abſence from the Princeſs, that I made no queſtion, but if he had known all theſe ſmall Circumſtances which I have told you, he would not have died for Grief: But in concluſion, Sir, after much ſuch like diſcourſe between my Maſter and me, in coming near Themiſcira; and after much rejoycing in hopes of ſeeing his Mandana, we came within a hundred Paces of the Gates, where we met one that was a Servant unto the Princeſs: Artamenes no ſooner ſaw him, but rode towards him in all haſte, and asked him very earneſtly concerning the King, and the Princeſs. Ah, Sir, ſaid the Servant, would you had come four days ſooner! At theſe words my Maſter began to look pale, and preſently to convert his Hopes into Tears, and his Joy into Sorrow, he looked in the Eyes of the Servant, for the cauſe of his diſcourſe, but not being able to divine it; what (ſaid he) is there any diſaſterous Accident chanced unto the King or the Princeſs? Yes, Sir, (replied the Servant) and doubtleſs the greateſt that could chance, for the King has loſt the Princeſs his Daughter; How, (replied my Maſter deſperately confounded) is the Princeſs dead? No, Sir, (anſwered he) but ſhe is carried away: I do think it very happy, Sir, that the Mind of Artamenes was taken up with the worſt Reſentment firſt: For indeed I am fully perſwaded, if the thought of her Death had not inſtantly preceded his thought of her being taken away, he would have ſunk down dead upon the place. How (cried he out) is Mandana taken away? Who is the Man that durſt attempt ſo raſh and unjuſt Deſign? Philidaſpes (anſwered the Servant) whom they ſay, was the Prince of Aſſyria: Philidaſpes, replied Artamenes; yes, Sir, replied he, and the ſame Misfortune would have it ſo, that a Party which was ſent after her, were killed by ſome which reſcued her, of which the King is aſſured. Ah my Friends (cried out Artamenes in turning towards us) we need not queſtion but that it was we, who have killed the Protectors of Mandana; who have relieved her Raviſher, and who are acceſſary to her carrying away. Sir, ſaid Chriſantes unto him, is it not better to go into the Town, where we may be better informed of all the Circumſtances in this great Misfortune? Artamenes, notwithſtanding his deſpair, finding Chriſantes ſpeak Reaſon, ſet forward; But Heavens knows, how altered from what he was before, and what a prodigious Change, Sorrow made immediately in him; he had ſo ſad and ſo terrible an Aſpect all at once, as one might eaſily ſee Anger mingled with his Melancholy; and that now Jealouſy was more in his Heart than Love. He preſſed the Princeſs's Servant, to tell him how the Miſfortune happened: He underſtood then, that three days before this Accident, Aribeus moved the King to hunt ſome thirty Furlongs from Themiſcira, and during his abſence the Deſign was executed. But, ſaid my Maſter to him, how could they excute it? It was no difficult matter (replied Mandan's Servant) for the Guards were corrupted, and it was they who carried her away: Alſo, it is thought one of her Women betrayed her, out of a ſecret Jealouſy ſhe had, that the Princeſs preferred Marteſia before her: You know, Sir, (added he) that the River Thormodon runs under the Windows of the Princeſs Mandana, and that thoſe Windows are ſo low, that there needs no Stairs to deſcend them. Then, Sir, one of the Guards obſerving the hour in which the Princeſs was uſed to retire, went and knockt at the Door of the outer Chamber, as ſhe was ready to undreſs her ſelf; that Woman which was of the Conſpiracy, opening the Door, went and told the Princeſs there was one of the Guard who had ſome important matter to acquaint her with. The Princeſs wondering at it a little, did for all that command him to enter: Madam, ſaid he to her, I come to advertiſe you, that there is a deſign in agitation to carry you away this next Night. The Princeſs knowing that heretofore ſhe heard of ſuch a thing, was much aſtoniſhed; yet notwithſtanding after ſhe had thanked the Man, ſhe asked him how he came to know it, and how it might be prevented? To give more credit unto my words (ſaid he to her) you need only to ſtep unto the Window, where I will ſhew you the Bars half looſe. This wiſe Princeſs being deſirous to be ſatisfied of the truth, went unto the Window: That Woman who was of the Plot, taking a Candle to light her: But, Oh Heavens, ſhe was no ſooner there, but the Guard breaking out the Bars of the Window carried her away, for they were filed looſe before-hand. I leave you to judge how the Princeſs was amazed at it: She commanded him to hold off; but much more was ſhe aſtoniſhed, when ſhe ſaw ſix more of the Guards enter, and taking her by Violence, committed her into the Hands of her Raviſher, who was in a Boat under the Window with many armed Men. Mandana at the firſt did obſtinately reſiſt him; but was forced to ſubmit: One of her Women reported, that when ſhe knew him to be Philidaſpes by his Voice (for he was diſguiſed) ſhe cried out, Ah Philidaſpes, if Artamenes were here thou durſt not attempt this: But in concluſion, Sir, Philidaſpes carried her away, and all her Women cried lamentably out, but all in vain; for thoſe of the Guard which were not of the Plot, deſiring to enter, could not, for they which betrayed, barred the Doors behind: The confuſion was ſo great that theſe Women belonging to the Princeſs Mandana, cried out on every ſide, that they had taken away their Princeſs, and did not open the Doors unto thoſe which could not enter but by breaking them. I forgot to tell you, that theſe Raviſhers did alſo take away with them that Woman which was of the Conſpiracy; but as for Marteſia, they would not take her; but yet notwithſtanding, this generous Woman would not forſake her Miſtreſs, but held her ſo hard and faſt by the Clothes, that they were conſtrained to take her alſo: although they doubtleſs heard the Princeſs cry out, Ah Marteſia, do not forſake me! At the laſt, Sir, the Boat going with the current of the River, went at ſuch a rate as they were quickly a Furlong off on the other ſide of the Water, where there was as many Horſes waiting for them as there was Men, ſo that it was not poſſible to be remedied; for before the Governour of Themiſcira could be advertiſed of the Accident, or could know what courſe to take, they were got ſo far as there was no hopes of recovery: Yet notwithſtanding, the Captain of the Guard taking Horſe with two hundred Men only, divided them into ſeveral Parties: One of them was the twelve which met Philidaſpes, and knew him rather by the Arms he wore, than by his Face; for having been ſo long concealed in the Country, he ſo changed his Habit and Countenance, as he was not knowable: Thoſe twelve Men then knowing him, as I told you, and ſeeing a great Pavilion erected, wherein doubtleſs was the Princeſs, and it being probable, he would pitch his Tent as ſoon as he was a good diſtance off, one of them returned in all haſte to advertiſe their Captain, that he might ſpeedily come and relieve his Men, who ſince ſome Strangers had took part with Philidaſpes might be in danger to be defeated; but he was ſo unfortunate, that he could not meet with him. Deſperate as not to find him, he returned in full haſte to the place where he left his Companions engaged with Philidaſpes, and with thoſe Men who accidentally met him in that place: But O Heavens! he found there ten of his Companions dead, and found not the eleventh at all; he ſaw the Pavilion ſtanding, but none in it, and he could not diſcover any ſign that one of Philidaſpes his Men were killed: So, Sir, this Man came to acquaint the King, who came hither in all haſte as ſoon as he heard of the Accident. He hath ſent unto all the Ports, to prevent the paſſage of Philidaſpes, in caſe he intend to take Sea: But to tell you truth, there is no great likelihood of catching him that way, ſince they have failed in their firſt diſcovery. Moreover, yeſterday (added the Servant) there run a Manifeſto throughout Themiſcira, by which it appears that Philidaſpes, ſays he is Labinet, Son unto Queen Nitocris, and ſole Heir unto the Kingdom of Aſſyria. Moreover he ſays;

THat Cappadocia by right belongs unto the Crown of Aſſyria, and therefore he could not think of any milder way to conquer it, than by making Mandana Queen of Aſſyria; That the Law which forbids any Stranger to marry the Princeſs, ought not to be objected againſt him, ſince by right the Cappadocians are his Subjects: That the Reaſon why he did not ask the Permiſſion of Ciaxares, was, becauſe he certainly knew that all the Medians hating the Aſſyrians, both Aſtyages and Ciaxares would not conſent he ſhould marry the Princeſs. That as he is not a Stranger unto the Princeſs of Cappadocia, no more is ſhe a Stranger unto him: So that he hopes the Queen Nitocris will approve of his Deſign, and receive the Princeſs Mandana with much Joy.

There are many other things in the Manifeſto, Sir (added he) which would be too tedious to rehearſe. During all this Diſcourſe Artamenes ſaid not a Word, not that he hearkened unto it with any Serenity of Soul; but on the contrary, one might diſcover in his Face ſuch viſible Marks of turbulent Paſſions, that he would make all that looked upon him to pity him: but the Reaſon was, becauſe he perceived that he could not ſpeak without diſcovering too much exceſſive Sorrow unto a Man in whom he had no Confidence, and therefore he thought it better to keep cloſe the vaſtneſs of Grief unto himſelf. Chriſantes eaſily obſerving his Diſquiet, went away in all haſte as ſoon as the Servant had ended his Relation. Yet Artamenes, not knowing well how he ſhould endure the ſight of Ciaxares without too open a diſcovery of his Deſpair, ſent Chriſantes to ſee how the King did, to the end he might have more time to prepare himſelf for ſo difficult a Tranſaction. My Maſter, ſeeing only me with him, looked upon me in ſuch lamentable manner as would have infuſed pity into the hardeſt Heart of Stone. Feraulas (ſaid he to me) Mandana is carried away, and carried away by Philidaſpes; Philidaſpes, I ſay, who I could have killed ſeveral times: But O Heavens (cried he out) is it poſſible the great Antipathy between him and me, whilſt I took him to be my Rival, ſhould ever let me miſtake the Raviſher of Mandana, and let my own Arm aſſiſt my moſt mortal Enemy? What, my moſt Divine Mandana (ſaid he all in Fury) were you in that Pavilion which I ſaw? and was that unknown Stranger Philidaſpes? Perhaps it was you I ſaw lift up the Hanging of the Tent? have I both deſtroyed you and my ſelf? have I ſlain thoſe which would have relieved you? Did I hinder them from killing Philidaſpes? Was I in a Condition to deliver you, and did not? Did I help him to carry you away? And could that Traitor Philidaſpes, who queſtionleſs knew me, accept of the aſſiſtance of his Enemy? Alas! Mandana, are not you in Themiſcira? Are you in the power of Philidaſpes? But O Heavens! was it not too much you ſhould do all this by Violence,but I muſt contribute unto it? And muſt the injurious Philidaſpes carry you away by the aſſiſtance of my Hand, and my Valour? But never think, Philidaſpes (added he) quietly to enjoy ſuch an Illuſtrious Conqueſt in what part of the Earth ſoever thou art, it ſhall coſt thee thy Life. Yes, though thou ſhouldſt be in Babylon, the greateſt and ſtrongeſt City of the World, in the midſt of all thy Guards, ſitting upon the Throne of thy Fathers, yet will I puniſh thee for this moſt injurious Act. Nothing but thy Blood can waſh it out of my Memory, and nothing but thy Death ſhall be the Penalty of thy Crime: O Heavens (ſaid he) unto what dire Misfortunes am I deſtined? Ah Thomiris! that your unjuſt Paſſion ſhould coſt me ſo dear, and that I ſhould be ſo rigorouſly puniſhed for troubling your Tranquillity. But, Divine Princeſs, ſaid he, who was pleaſed (as they aſſure me) to pronounce my Name when they took you away; will you remember me in Aſſyria? ſhall not the Tears of Philidaſpes charm you? will you not pardon his Crime? will not the Magnificence of Babylon blind your Eyes? and that great Court invite your Mind? will you not praiſe the Violence of Philidaſpes, to be exceſs of Love? will you not be the ſame upon the Banks of Euphrates which you were wont to be upon the Banks of Iris and Thermodon? O Divineſt Princeſs, ſhall not Artamenes be preferred before Philidaſpes? and Cyrus before the King of Aſſyria? Alas! ſaid he further, did the Gods the firſt Minute that I ſaw Philidaſpes move me to hate him, that I ſhould ſerve him in ſuch an unjuſt occaſion as this? How was it poſſible my Rival could ſo diſguiſe himſelf? I knew him when I ought not to have known him, and I did not know him at that critical time when it was moſt important for me to know it was Philidaſpes, and who Philidaſpes was. Imagine Feraulas (ſaid he to me) how great would have been my Joy, if the Gods had permitted me to have known the Truth, when after I had fought and vanquiſhed Philidaſpes, pes, I ſhould have gone unto the Pavilion, where I ſhould have found my Princeſs, and delivered her, and brought her back unto Themiſcira: But you may imagine how extream is my Sorrows and my Deſpair, ſince it is I only who am the only cauſe of her loſs; It is I who put her into the Hands of Philidaſpes, and am Acceſſory to the taking her away; I might have joined with theſe who aſſaulted him, but alas! I aſſaulted them; I might have ſaved Mandana, but alas! I have loſt her; yet I muſt repair the loſs, if it be poſſible, or at leaſt be revenged of him who was the cauſe of it. Aſſiſt me, O ye moſt juſt Gods, with Conſtancy enough to ſupport this diſmal Accident and not die. I know that Death is a Remedy againſt all Misfortunes, and that this Remedy would cure me of all mine: But, Divine Mandana, you have at this time done that in me which the moſt affrighting Dangers never could; Yes, my Princeſs, that Heart which never apprehended Death amidſt the moſt bloody Battels, has now ſome fears of it under the heavy Load of his Diſcontents: I do fear, my Princeſs, I do indeed, but I think it is not a baſe and feeble fear, but ſince I fear not Death for any cauſe but to expoſe my Life to gain your Liberty, doubtleſs you will pardon me: But alas! who can tell whether ever you ſhall ſpeak again unto Artamenes, or Artamenes ever ſpeak unto Mandana? However (ſaid he) I am ſure I ſhall look Philidaſpes in the Face, though he be King of Aſſyria, and it ſhall not be long before I diſturb his Felicity.

As Artamenes was thus reſenting his Fate, Chryſantes returned, and told him that he might ſee the King; but ſince his Return was divulged, more than half the Court was aſſembled about Ciaxares, which News not much pleaſed him, fearing nothing more than to have too many Spectators of his Sorrow: The ſight of the Caſtle where he ſaw the Princeſs laſt, redoubled his Sadneſs; the preſence of the King did ſo damp his Soul, and made his Sorrows ſo apparent in the ſight of all that great Aſſembly, that though Ciaxares was much ſadded, yet was he much more. This Prince no ſooner ſaw my Maſter, but never remembring the buſineſs of his Voyage, he reflected upon on that loſs which he had. Alas! Artamenes (ſaid he to him) Philidaſpes has not been ſo happily diſcovered in his ſecond Enterpriſe as he was in his firſt; The Gods have inſpired him to force away my Daughter. I wiſh, Sir, (replied my Maſter) that I could either by my Valour or my good Fortune regain her, and that I could prevent the unjuſt Philidaſpes from long enjoying that Treaſure which I might eaſily have taken from him. The King, not well underſtanding theſe Words, deſired the Explanation of them; and Artamenes could not hold from relating that buſineſs, which moſt of any thing in the World did ſenſibly trouble him: He told the King how he had met with Philidaſpes; and how he ſaw the Pavillion ſet up in the Forreſt; how he had killed them which aſſaulted the Raviſher of Mandana; and how he had contributed to the carrying away of Mandana. This ſtrange Event did much ſurprize the King, and augmented his Sorrows in ſuch a manner as he could not heed Artamenes and his Grief, which appeared exceeding much when he had ended his Relation: But by good Fortue, all they which ſaw him, did believe that this exceſſive Sorrow which ſo much appeared in his Face and Words, was only an effect of that odd croſs Adventure which he had met withal. Inſomuch as all the Court were ſo ſad at the Misfortune of the Princeſs, as that there was none ſo little intereſted in it as could preciſely obſerve his Actions. After this fatal Relation was ended, and every one ſpoke of it with Wonder as well as Wo, Sir, (ſaid my Maſter, ſpeaking to Ciaxares) will you permit me to go after and ſeek Philidaſpes? I cannot call him the Prince of Aſſyria, ſince I can hardly believe that a Son of the Queen Nitocris, who is one of the greateſt and wiſeſt Princeſſes in the World, ſhould attempt ſo unjuſt a Deſign. True it is (added he) that it is hardly to be believed that any Man who is not of Royal Extract, durſt elſe undertake an Enterprize ſo bold as to force away the Princeſs of Cappadocia. Ah Artamenes (ſaid Ciaxares) the Averſion which you ever had unto Philidaſpes was better grounded than you thought, and I doubt not but you will infinitely intereſt your ſelf in this Buſineſs. Doubt it not, Sir (replied my Maſter) for I promiſe you either to deliver her, or die by the Hand of her Raviſher. After this the King went into his Cloſet, and called Artamenes after him, to the end he might ask him whether it was true that he came back without any Train or Equipage as he had been told. Artamenes then told him what I have told you: But ſince the King's Soul was ſo ſadded with the loſs of the Princeſs, he cared not much for the bad ſucceſs of his Voyage, and having ſuch need of my Maſter's Valour in ſuch a dire conjuncture of Affairs, he never examined whether what he had ſaid unto him were likely or no. Artamenes urged him again to give him leave to follow Philidaſpes, though there was ſmall hopes of finding him: And ſince it might ſo hap that the Princeſs might fall ſick by the way and retard his March, Ciaxares conſented unto his deſire, and gave order for three hundred Horſe to follow him: The next Morning my Maſter asked the King if any thing of the Conſpiracy were diſcovered,and whether he ſuſpected any as Aſſiſtants unto Philidaſpes? But the King told him, that Aribeus had uſed all poſſible means to enquire into the buſineſs, yet unto this hour could never have any Conjecture. My Maſter had a great deſire to tell the King that Aribeus was not a fit Man to be imployed in that Inquiſition, by reaſon of the great Friendſhip between him and Philidaſpes; but he ſtayed until his Jealouſies were grounded upon a better Bottom than Surmiſes, and until he had more plain and convincing Arguments againſt him. Then he left the King, and without the cloſing of an Eye all that Night waited impatiently for break of Day. Mean while, Sir, not to hold you with relation of all the Agitations of his reſtleſs Mind, and the wearineſs this laſt Voyage had cauſed in him, give me leave only to tell you, that in fifteen days which were imployed in queſt of the Princeſs, we met with no news that could afford any hopes unto my Maſter; but on the contrary, we were advertiſed, how after many croſs and blind ways which they took purpoſely to deceive Followers, Philidaſpes was arrived with the Princeſs at a Town within his own Kingdom, which is towards the Frontiers of Media, and in ſuch a place where he might raiſe an Army too conſiderable for us to attempt the reſcue of the Princeſs; we learned alſo for certain, that Philidaſpes was really Son unto the Queen Nitocris, and ſo we returned again unto Themiſcira, without effecting any thing, but knowing that Mandana was in the Hands of ſuch a Prince as might (if the Queen his Mother would conſent) bring an Army of two hundred thouſand Men into the Field. The thought of this, though it dejected the Spirits of all others, yet did it elevate the Soul of Artamenes in lieu of driving it into deſpair; and the Quality of his Rival did in ſome ſort comfort him in his Diſgrace. All the reſt which before went after the Raviſher of Mandana, did fruitleſly return: They only told us, that the wounded Man whom we left by the way, did recover of his Wounds. Mean while Aribeus, (who as you ſhall know by the ſequel of my Diſcourſe) was not innocent from this Conſpiracy, conceiving that though perhaps my Maſter would not find Philidaſpes, yet he might perchance meet with ſome of the Guards which he had corrupted and ſuborned; did pretend a Journey unto Pteria, whereof he was the Governour, under colour that ſome ancient Greek inhabitants of Sinope, did attempt ſomething againſt the Service of the King; for, Sir, I think you know how this Town was built by the Mileſiens, and how that Grecian Colony has often changed Maſters. Indeed it would be a difficult thing to define exactly which is true Sinope, it is ſo filled with Inhabitants of ſeveral Nations; having been one while poſſeſſed by the Græcians, another by the Galatians; ſometimes again by the Paphlagonians, and at this day by the King of Cappadocia. Aribeus therefore raiſed this falſe ſeditious report, that under pretence of it, he might be gone from Themiſcira before Artamenes returned, and ſo came unto Sinope, as I ſaid before: So that my Maſter being rid of him, was in abſolute and quiet Poſſeſſion of the King's Mind: But as the ſtate of things ſtood, there was nothing to be thought upon but War. Ciaxares ſent firſt to the Queen Nitocris to ask her whether ſhe allowed of her Son's Act, and to demand the Princeſs his Daughter? He ſent alſo unto Aſtyages to acquaint him with the Misfortune, and require Aid. Mean while, he levied as many Souldiers as ever both theſe two Kings were able to ſet out: Though thoſe Orders which he ſent unto Aribeus to raiſe Men in his Government, was invalid unto him, for that Traitor had diſpoſed them for other Deſigns. He made a ſhew as if he would execute the King's Commands; and feigning to be ſick, would not come at Themiſcira.

Mean while, we underſtood by the return of him who was ſent unto Queen Nitocris, that ſhe diſclaimed the Action of the Aſſyrian Prince; and that he was not yet come unto Babylon. At the ſame time, thoſe who were left among the Maſſagettes returned, and told us how Gelonida ſaved them, about fifteen days after our departure: They brought a Letter from that vertuous Woman unto Artamenes; by which ſhe ſaid in general, that his abſence cauſed abundance of trouble in the Court of Thomiris: That ſhe had much ado to obtain pardon for his Men; yet at laſt ſhe told her, nothing but the return of Artamenes could give her ſatisfaction; and that he muſt either return, or ſhe muſt die, and revenge her ſelf that way. Yet we had no ſooner rejoyced at the return of our Men, but we underſtood that Aſtyages falling ſick upon the news of the Princeſs being taken away by the Prince of Aſſyria; was ſo exceſſively moved at it, in conſideration of the King his Son's Intereſt, and in conſideration of his Hatred unto the Aſſyrians, that a Fever ſeized upon him and he died within four days: declaring by his Will, that all his Subjects ſhould take up Arms for the Liberty of the Princeſs Mandana. The news of his Death almoſt moved my Maſter to tell Ciaxares whom he was; but when he remembred all the Expreſſions which he uſed, when Cyrus was diſcourſed on, his fears to be deprived of that Honour to deliver his Princeſs prevented him; for, ſaid he, if by chance he ſhould not change his Thoughts, who knows whether or no he will baniſh me? and whether in lieu of delivering my Princeſs, I procure my own Death? perhaps he will preſently clog me with Fetters, and ſo this

Army which ought to be imployed for Mandana's Liberty, will be diſabled. Mean while Ciaxares muſt prepare himſelf to take poſſeſſion of Media's Throne, and go to Ecbatan, but before his arrival, he cauſed Troops to be raiſed, becauſe he would loſe no time. The Cappadocians were much troubled to ſee themſelves both with a King, and without a Queen at once, eſpecially ſince their Princeſs was in the Aſſyrian Power, foreſeeing that if they ſhould return under their Government, then their Kingdom would be no more than a Province; yet this fear was not univerſal, for there were many which ſtill retained a ſecret Affection unto the Aſſyrian Nation. Aribeus, as every one thought, was of that mind, even at that very time when he was ſo loved by Ciaxares; ſome alſo ſaid that the original of his Houſe was extracted from Aſſyria. How ever it was, when the King was ready, not yet ſuſpecting any Treaſon in Aribeus, he commanded him to come unto him, intending to declare him Regent of the Realm; but he not daring to truſt him, and fearing leſt this ſeeming honour was but a trap to ſecure him, he ſent word back unto Ciaxares that he was ſick; and if he were pleaſed to honour him with the Government of the Cappadocians, he beſeeched him to ſend ſuch Orders unto him; yet the King being informed that Aribeus was not ſo ſick as he fained, began to be jealous of him, and committed all the Authority unto a Man of great Quality, called Ariobantes, which ſo incenſed Aribeus, as he reſolved to act as afterwards he did. Artamenes ſent Ortalques unto Artaxes, Brother of Aribeus, to command him in the name of Ciaxares, to continue in the King of Pontus his Service: Ciaxares went then to Ecbatan, and my Maſter accompanied him. The King of Perſia at the ſame time ſent an Embaſſador to the King of Medes (for henceforward we will call Ciaxares ſo) to condole with him the Death of Aſtyages, and the taking away of his Daughter the Princeſs Mandana; and alſo within a few days after, he ſent another, to congratulate his happy coming unto that Crown, and to offer him Aſſiſtance in his Wars againſt the Prince of Aſſyria. Now, Sir, was Chriſantes very much entangled; yet he feared not that my Maſter would be known, for queſtionleſs he was very much altered as well as I, who was almoſt of the ſame Age, yet he was ſure that himſelf, being much elder than we, would be diſcovered; ſo that againſt his Will, he reſolved to tell a handſom Lye; he told then the Perſian Embaſſadors in equivocal Terms, that he being in utter deſpair ever to bring into Perſia that Prince whom he carried out, he reſolved to wander from Court to Court, and from Country to Country: he further told them, that in a Voyage unto Greece, there he met with Artamenes, and has indiſſolvably tied himſelf unto his Fortunes; Aduſius whom you ſee here, and was then one of the Embaſſadors, moved him to relate all the particulars in the ſhipwrack of Cyrus, and to tell him whether his Body was ever found. But Chriſantes demeaned himſelf very handſomly in the diſcourſe, telling him, that they which eſcaped from the ſhipwrack never knew what became of them which periſhed: Moreover, he beſeeched both him and the other Embaſſador, not to tell Ciaxares that ever he had the honour to be with young Cyrus, leſt the hatred which he bore unto that unfortunate young Prince ſhould reflect upon him: Chriſantes alſo asked him whether the loſs of Cyrus did not extraordinarily perplex the King and the Queen of Perſia? Aduſius did anſwer him, that they had been much troubled at it, and ſtill were; but as they were both of them very wiſe, ſo they knew how to qualify their Sorrows; and could not chuſe but aſſiſt that Prince which rejoyced at their loſs: This they will do, both out of Generoſity, and Policy, ſince upon the whole matter, Ciaxares was not blameable for what he did; for the reſentments of Aſtyages, the Predictions of the Magi, whom the Medeans much reverence, and the Manies of the Stars did induce him thereunto. But preſently after, Sir, we were informed that the Queen Nitocris was dead, and that the Prince her Son was come unto Babylon, and brought the Princeſs Mandana thither in Triumph. This intelligence did much trouble Artamenes, for as long as ſhe lived, it had been much more eaſy for him to deliver the Princeſs than now, it being to be ſuppoſed, that vertuous Queen would never protect any Injuſtice, though committed by her own Son: But ſeeing that he could not reſcue Mandana, until he had taken the prime Town in the World, and ſubverted all Aſia, this did infinitely perplex him; not that the greatneſs of the Enterprize did at all aſtoniſh him, but becauſe he apprehended that it would take a long time to execute ſo great a Deſign, and would move the King of Aſſyria to take ſome violent Reſolutions againſt the Princeſs. Mean while Ciaxares having accepted the King of Perſia's Offer; Aducius returned in all haſte to inform the King his Maſter, and all ſides thought upon nothing but preparations for War: The King of Aſſyria, who was not ignorant of the Median preparations, began to acts his part. Mazares the Prince of Saces, who, as you know, was his Vaſſal, and who then was in Babylon, promiſed him his Aſſiſtance: And you are not ignorant, Sir, how the King of Arabia did as you did, that is, he took part with the King of Aſſyria: Alſo it is rather unto the generous Thraſibulus, whom I now ſpeak unto, than unto this illuſtrious Company, ſince there is none of them, only he, which is ignorant of what I ſhall hereafter tell you.

Then the King of Hircania interrupting Feraulas, told him, that it was true indeed, it was only unto Thraſibulus unto whom he was to addreſs his Speech; yet notwithſtanding, although he did know a good part of what he had to relate, yet he ſhould be very glad to have it revived in his Memory: Thraſibulus thanked the King of Hircania for it, and Feraulas continued his diſcourſe as followeth.

The King of Aſſyria then preparing for War as well as we, was not only aſſured of help from the King of Lydia, from the King of Hircania, and from the King of Arabia, but alſo from the Prince of Saces, from the Prince of the Paphlagonians, and from the Indians. As for the King of Phrygia, he was alſo preſſingly ſolicited to take the King of Aſſyria's part, following the Treaty of Peace which was made with Queen Nitocris. But ſince he had Wars with Cræſus, and that this Prince was to aſſiſt the King of Aſſyria as well as he; he told this Raviſher of Mandana, that he was willing to aſſiſt him, provided his Troops might not mingle with the Lydians his Enemies; which was promiſed him, but was not performed. This Prince had a good mind not to engage himſelf on the King of Aſſyria's ſide: But having not ratified that Treaty of Peace which was confirmed between the King of Pontus and Ciaxares, he reſolved upon that which he could not help. As for the King of Pontus, he was not in a condition to take either part, for he was mbroilede with Civil Wars in his own Kingdom, which did extreamly preſs him, and which doubtleſs would have deſtroyed him, if they have not already done it. Obſerve, Sir, how many Kings, and how many Princes had engaged themſelves on the unjuſt Side. Moreover, Aribeus ſeeing the King of Aſſyria in poſſeſſion of the Throne of his Father, did declare and publiſh, throughout all the Province of which he was Governour, that the Princeſs conſented to go with the King of Aſſyria: He leavied Troops; called back Artaxes his Brother, who was ſent to help the King of Pontus, notwithſtanding the King's laſt Orders, and perhaps conduced to the deſtruction of that Prince thereby.

Having then got a conſiderable Body together, he ſent it unto Babylon: Moreover, the King of Aſſyria diſpatched an Embaſſador unto Cræſus, as I have told you, to ſolicite him that he would join with his Army; repreſenting unto him, that the Perſians and Medians were two ſuch Nations, as if they were joined together, they might well aſpire unto the univerſal Dominion of all Aſia. Moreover he urged, that there was ever an Alliance between the Kings of Lydia, and the Kings of Aſſyria; ſo that in demanding Aſſiſtance upon this Occaſion, which concerned the Common Good, though in appearance it ſeemed only for the taking away of the Princeſs Mandana, he ought not to be denied. Moreover, yet the conſideration of Conſanguinity ought to be no Impediment in the Buſineſs; ſince if he had made War againſt Ciaxares, he did it in behalf of Mandana; and that he would never have taken her away, but with intention to put the Crown of Aſſyria upon her Head. Indeed, all the World knows that Cræſus was perſwaded by him; ſo that his Enemy had on his ſide, the Saces, the Hircanians, the Arabians, the higher and lower Phrygians, the Indians, part of the Cappadocians, the Lydians, the Paphlagonians, the Syrians, and the Aſſyrians: We underſtood how he endeavoured to engage the Carians in his Quarrel, but they refuſed.

Mean while the King of Perſia, being ſtrongly ſolicited by the Queen his Wife, Siſter unto Ciaxares, made choice of two hundred Homotimes, (theſe are the nobleſt Perſons of all Perſia); unto every one of theſe two hundred Men, he gave leave to chuſe four others of the ſame Quality; ſo that by this means they made up a thouſand Men. Afterwards he appointed every one of this thouſand to leavy, amongſt the People, ten Men with Bucklers, ten Archers, and ten Slingers, ſo that this compleated the number of thirty thouſand Men beſides the Homotimes. This thirty thouſand choice Men, were better than fifty thouſand others: Hidaſpes, whom you ſee there, had the command of this Potent Aid, and Aduſias was his Lieutenant-General. Ciaxares, you may well imagine, received them with much joy, and Artamenes was ſo ſenſible of it, that I know not how to expreſs his Extaſy. Mean time, he was ever ſending out for Intelligence, and was credibly informed, that Cræſus brought in ten thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot, Bucklers and Archers. That the King of Phrygia had 6000 Horſe, and 20000 Pikes and Bucklers. That Aribeus ſent out of Cappadocia 4000 Horſe, and 10000 Foot. That Maragdus, King of Arabia, pretended to have five thouſand Horſe, ten thouſand Foot, and an hundred Armed Chariots. The Hircanians were to have alſo an hundred Chariots, and four thouſand Slingers. The Caduſians eight thouſand Foot, The Indians as many: Alſo the Paphlagonians. Beſides all theſe, the King of Aſſyria had twenty thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot. All theſe compleated up the number to be forty-five thouſand Horſe, and near an hundred and fifty thouſand Infantry, beſides the Chariots.

On our ſide, we had ten thouſand Horſe, and fifty thouſand Foot, all natural Subjects of Ciaxares; beſides the Auxiliaries from the Provinces of the Ariſantines, of the Struchaltes, and others; all which amounted unto ten thouſand Horſe, and fifteen thouſand Foot. So that when all were joined together, with the thirty thouſand Perſians, the thouſand Homotimes, the five thouſand Horſe, and ten thouſand Foot, for that part of Cappadocia which was not revolted: We found that our Army was in a gallant Condition, though it was not ſo numerous as the King of Aſſyria's, ſince it conſiſted only of five and twenty thouſand Horſe, and one hundred thouſand Foot, without any Armed Chariots; and though it was very advantagious to have thirty thouſand Perſian Infantry, and ten thouſand Median Cavalry, yet the Number was much inferior: But my Maſter ſeemed not to be at all aſtoniſhed at the inequality, nor at the great number of Kings againſt whom he was to fight. But on the contrary, aſſuming freſh Courage in ſo important an Occaſion, which might render him ſo glorious, although the Captivity of the Princeſs did infinitely trouble him; yet notwithſtanding, hoping to relieve her, or elſe die for her, cauſed him to become Maſter of his Melancholy. And though he was not yet known amongſt the Medes, yet his Reputation, his gallant Deportment, his Sweetneſs, his Courteſy and Liberality, had procured him already great credit amongſt them, ſo that he was abſolutely adored. It was at this time when he took a love unto Araſpes, and when Aglatidas took a love to him. But I had forgot to tell you, that Harpagus, who had all this while ſtaid in Perſia, ſince the departure of Cyrus from thence, being deſirous to return into his Country, made uſe of this Occaſion, after the Death of Aſtyages who had baniſhed him, and came into Media with Hidaſpes, who by the Commendum of the Queen of Perſia, made his Peace with Ciaxares, although he knew Cyrus no more than the Perſians did.

In concluſion, to abbreviate my Relation, which otherwiſe would be too unpleaſant unto ſo many illuſtrious Perſons who were Eye-witneſſes of what I am to tell.

The Army of Ciaxares began to march, Artamenes being his Lieutenant-General, and commanding the Van-guard. When we were ready to enter the Enemy's Country, Artamenes ſaw upon his right Hand a great Eagle, which flying with impetuous haſte, ſeemed to make towards Babylon, as if he would ſhew him the way he was to follow. The flight of this Bird was looked upon as a fortunate Omen; and Ciaxares making a Halt, offered Sacrifices, not only unto the Gods of the Medes and Perſians, but alſo unto the Aſſyrian Deities, deſiring them to be propitious unto him. I will not ſtand to tell you how this great Army marched, nor how prudently Artamenes ordered this vaſt Body; I will only relate how impatient my Maſter was to be taking Priſoners, that he might enquire ſome News of Mandana. And ſeeing that ſome of the Enemies Scouts appeared, he offered to go unto them, but they took their Heels and would not fight; ſo that he bethought himſelf of a Stratagem, which was this; he cauſed in the Night-time, a great number of Fires to be made, behind the place where our Army encamped, and none in the place where we were: ſo that theſe Scouts coming in the Night to ſpy, or take ſome of our Men, they were extreamly amazed when they found us near them, whom by the Fires they thought further off. Some Priſoners then being taken, we knew by them that the King of Aſſyria would within a few days leave the Princeſs at Babylon, under the guard of Marſares, and that he would e're long be in the Head of his Army, accompanied with the Kings of Hircania, Lydia, Phrygia, and Arabia: But as impatient as Artamenes was to be doing with the King of Aſſyria, whom we will now no longer call Philidaſpes, he could not be at him ſo ſoon as he thought; for he found, that they who had divers times fled before him, went back over the River Gnides; which deſcending from the Mantian Mountains, paſſes thorow the Country of the Dardinians, and diſchargeth it ſelf into the Red-Sea. Then, Sir, this River is ſo violent a Current, and the Aſſyrian Troops having broken the Bridg, that it ſtopped him: Artamenes coming to the River ſide, beyond which ho ſaw Men in Arms, was even deſperate to ſee it was impoſſible to get over: He could not be perſwaded of the Danger, until he had found it by ſuch Experience as might prove fatal to him; for being exaſperated by the fury of his Soul, and the violence of his Love, he ſpurred his Horſe into the midſt of the River, where the rapid Fury of the Water had like to have engulfed him: But being come back, by good Fortune, unto the ſide again, there was one of thoſe white Horſes, ſuch as amongſt us are uſed to be ſacrificed unto the Sun, who of himſelf leaping furiouſly into the River to paſs over, was preſently whirled into the bottom of the River and never ſeen again: So that Artamenes not knowing what courſe to take for a paſſage, bethought himſelf of a ſtrange extraordinary way, which was, to divide the River by Channels. In concluſion, he propounded this Device, and put it in execution: He took ſuch monſtrous pains for eight days together, that all Ages may hereafter ſpeak of it for a Wonder: For amuzing the Enemy always by his preſence on the ſide of the River, he cauſed a great Rampire of Earth to be caſt up, to blind the Aſſyrians from ſight of the Pioneers, that they might not ſee what they did; and having digged an hundred and ſixty Channels, which took their beginnings from the River, he made ſo many little Rivelets out of that great One, by dilating it into ſo many ſeveral Channels, and paſſed over without any trouble with his whole Army.

This Prodigy did ſo amaze the Aſſyrian Troops on the other ſide the Water, that they would abide no Combat, but haſted in diſorder to the Body of their Army, thinking that none but Gods could turn the courſe of that River; and concluding afterwards that nothing was impoſſible unto Artamenes. Indeed, I am fully perſwaded, that there are few things which can reſiſt the Courage of ſuch a Man as he, whom Love had inſpired with a moſt heroick Heat. As ſoon as Artamenes was got on the other ſide the River, he was infinitely joyed; imagining that ſince there was no more to do but to fight, and then enter into Babylon, nothing could debar his entrance. We marched then ſtraight unto the Enemy, who with all diligence was marching towards us: We were yet two days march from them, when we ſaw an old Man, of a handſome and comely Deportment, coming towards us, and followed by three hundred Horſe, deſired to ſpeak with Artamenes, and having in few words told the juſt cauſe of his Complaints againſt the King of Aſſyria, ſaid he was come to ask Protection from Ciaxares, and offer unto him all the ſtrength he had. Indeed Gobrias who was at this preſent in Sinope, offered unto Artamenes to put his Eſtate into his Power, as indeed a few days after he did: And the Princeſs Arpaſca his Daughter, who is one of the faireſt Ladies in the World, did receive Artamenes moſt magnificently into a place of ſtrength, which belonged unto him, and which ſhe did by his command, and whom Artamenes left in Poſſeſſion of it. But, Sir, I muſt not dwell upon this, though there be many brave things dependant upon it: It was at this time the wiſe Gobrias engaged Gadates unto Ciaxares his Party; yet not to ſtay upon any thing which does not directly relate unto Artamenes, I will only tell you, how the King of Aſſyria hath given juſt cauſe unto the valiant King of Hircania, and to the Prince of the Caducians, to quit his Party; theſe two Princes came and ranked themſelves on Ciaxares his ſide, or rather on Artamenes, ſince certainly the reputation of my Maſter was the moſt convincing reaſon which obliged theſe two great Princes to truſt his Word: I will not ſtay to tell you how the King of Cyprus ſent alſo ſome Troops unto him, under the command of Thimocrates and Philocles: But let me tell you, that the two Armies being now in view of each other, and the day of Battel being come; Artamenes was buſy in ordering his Troops into ſuch a poſture as they might vanquiſh: He commended them, and commanded them with ſuch an imperious and obliging Air, as there was not a Souldier in all the Army which was not eager to obey him. When theſe two mighty Armies were come out of their Trenches; and that the armed Chariots, the Archers, the Slingers, the Launciers and Pikes, and thoſe which uſed Swords, on both ſides were ranged into Battalia, Artamenes in lieu of a long Oration, ſaid nothing but this unto them.

☞ ‘Which is he amongſt you, my fellow Souldiers, who will be before me? who will kill the firſt Enemy? Which of you is it, whoſe Valour will exceed Artamenes? Come on, my Companions (ſaid he to them) I do proteſt that I ſhould not be leſs joyed to ſee you ſurmount me in Valour, than if I had overcome the Aſſyrians.

Theſe few words pronounced by ſuch a Man as Artamenes, had ſo excellent an operation on the Hearts of the Souldiers, and wrought ſuch great effects, that their Voices made the Air ring ſuch a Peal, as reſembled a ſong of Victory and Triumph: Ciaxares by the advice of Artamenes, would have the word of Battel that day to be Jupiter our Protector; ſo that the Combate beginning, the noiſe of both ſides was hideous, what by the confuſion of Cries, the claſhing of Arms and Arrows, and the neighing of Horſes, than which nothing is more aſtoniſhing. But, Sirs, all you (except Thraſibulas) do know it, therefore without particularizing this days great buſineſs, I will only tell you that Artamenes ſeeking for the King of Aſſyria with much diligence, at laſt found him, being informed by one who was taken Priſoner, in what quarter he would fight; and meeting with him in the throng, Let us ſee (ſaid he to him) let us ſee, whether the King of Aſſyria be more valiant than Philidaſpes, and whether I can now take away his Life as eaſily, as I did preſerve it in the Forreſt where I met him? That Prince hearing theſe words, turned fiercely towards him, and knowing my Maſter by his Voice, Artamenes (ſaid he to him) the King of Aſſyria perhaps is not more valiant than Philidaſpes, but he is more civil, ſince though he be now a King, he will not refuſe meaſuring his Sword with you, who paſs but for a common Cavalier, and no more: Advance then (ſaid my Maſter to him, when he ſaw him ſtudying what to do) and be aſſured that the Raviſher of Mandana is more diſhonoured in taking her away, than he is in fighting with Artamenes: I ought not to fight with you (anſwered that Prince) ſince I owe my Life unto you; but what ſhall I do? there is a ſecret thought in me, which moves me to hate you, and is more prevalent than my Generoſity: after thoſe words they came together and fought: The Sword of Artamenes was died with the Blood of that Prince; and if the throng and confuſion of the general Combate had not ſeparated them, I believe the Death of the King of Aſſyria had put an end to the War. But at the laſt a report being divulged among all the Troops, that he was either dead or a Priſoner, it made ſo great a diſorder as the like was never ſeen: Some fought, others fled: The King's Allies thinking the King of Aſſyria to be dead, retired: Crœſus cauſed all his Men to be drawn off and be gone, and taking the mountainous Way, ſaved the reſt of his Troops from the general Rout. The King of Phrygia, who had cauſe of diſcontent given unto him, becauſe one part of his Men were ranked in the ſame body with the King of Lydia's, contrary to what was promiſed; and he being ever in love with the Glory of Artamenes, did retire, and entrenched himſelf in an advantagious place, and waited the ſucceſs of our Victory. The Prince of Paphlagonia was taken Priſoner, and almoſt all the conſiderable Perſons in the Aſſyrian Army, either periſhed or changed ſides. The truth is, Sir, (ſaid Feraulas, always addreſſing his diſcourſe unto Thraſibulus) it may very well be ſaid, that the Gods did fight for Artamenes; for it is moſt certain that there never was ſeen ſo many great Princes altogether which did ſo weakly diſpute the Victory; not but that there was great difficulty in obtaining it, becauſe though they did not fight it well, yet their inequality of number made it no eaſy matter. Certainly, and without flattering the Perſians, the Homotimes did Miracles that day; alſo the Median Cavalry as well as the Hircanian wrought wonderful Effects. Yet in this great diſorder, the King of Aſſyria, who in all other Adventures would rather perhaps have been killed, than given ground, did now retire; when he ſaw that there was no hopes of Victory, and that Maragdus King of Arabia was killed cloſe by him: Fearing without doubt, that if the noiſe of the defeat ſhould come unto Babylon before his return, there might riſe ſome ſuch diſorder as might let the Princeſs eſcape: The ſudden retreat which he made did certainly confirm the report of his Death. The Cappadocian Troops, fearing to be under the power of Ciaxares, as a Maſter which was juſtly incenſed, joyned unto that Party of the Aſſyrians which were the King of Aſſyria's Convoy: And I do very well remember, that my Maſter ſeeing theſe Cappadocians fly, purſued, and cried out unto them, Why do you fly with them that are vanquiſhed? Is it not better to ſtay and triumph with Conquerors? But his words were in vain; for Shame and Fear ſtifled their Repentance. To relate unto you the number of the dead, the abundance of Priſoners, the vaſt multitude of Arms and Horſes, the great number of Chariots and Tents, and the infinite rich Plunder, would not be much to the purpoſe: But let me tell you, that Artamenes moved Ciaxares to give all the Plunder of the field to the Souldiers; and for his own part he reſerved no more than the liberty to divide and beſtow it more or leſs according to the deſerts of the Captains: None of the Homotimes or Perſians would load themſelves with any of it; but he would have the chief of them which were accuſtomed to fight on foot, to take the beſt of the Enemies Horſe; ſo that he made the firſt Perſian Cavalry which ever was ſeen in Aſia. But although this defeat of ſo many Kings, and the Friendſhip which he had contracted with ſo many Princes, who in reſpect of him had taken the King of Media's part, might well have ſatisfied him, yet the King of Aſſyria being neither dead nor a Priſoner, and the Princeſs being ſtill in Babylon, all ſeemed unto him as if he had done nothing; ſo that he was not long at reſt, but two days after the Battel, marched toward Babylon. In going thither, we underſtood that the King of Lydia was abſolutely retired; and that the King of Phrygia, though diſcontented with the Aſſyrian, yet waited as I told you, to ſee the ſucceſs of things. But my Maſter deſired to remove ſuch a puiſſant Reſerve from his Enemy, he ſet out a conſiderable Body of Horſe under the command of Hidaſpes to go and fight him; and indeed the deſign did thrive ſo happily under Hidaſpes, that after ſeveral Skirmiſhes they enforced the King of Phrygia's Trenches, and took him Priſoner: But ſince Artamenes had been obliged unto him during the Bithynian Wars, he moved Ciaxares to uſe him very well; he left unto him the command of thoſe his Troops which remained after his defeat, upon condition they ſhould not be imployed againſt him, at the Siege of Babylon: for, ſaid he, the King of Phrygia will never fight againſt that Prince whom he came to aid: Artamenes ſent him with as many Median Troops only to ſecure a Paſs, which was equally advantagious unto the King of Phrygia, if he would return, and to Ciaxares from being ſet upon from that ſide: He alſo gave liberty unto the Prince of Paphlagonia, who afterwards did not forſake him.

At the laſt, Sir, we came within ſight of ſtately Babylon, and although my Maſter found it very ſtrong when he was there, yet he found it much ſtronger this ſecond time, as well becauſe he now obſerved it better, as becauſe the King of Aſſyria had now a greater intereſt in it. As ſoon as he eſpied the magnificent Palace which elevates it ſelf in the midſt of Babylon: There it is, Feraulas (ſaid he to me) whither we muſt go and deliver Mandana: He did preſently begirt the Town round about with his Troops, to ſtop the paſſages of any out, and to diſcover in what place and part it was beſt aſſaultable: But to ſay truly, we found the Walls ſo high, ſo thick and ſo ſtrong, that our Battering Rams could work no execution; alſo the huge deep Ditches full of Water hindered our approches to make any uſe of our Engines: Moreover, it ſeemed abſolutely impoſſible to aſſault it from the River, by reaſon of that prodigious work which Queen Nitocris had made, whereby the River Euphrates was brought almoſt round the Town, as well to dilate the impetuoſity of the River, as to make the acceſs unto the Town more difficult; for the River by that means winding and crinkling as it did, it was impoſſible that they in the Town ſhould be ſurprized by Boats, theſe turnings being ſo long, that it would be a long Days work to come by them into Babylon, from the place where they muſt begin. I will not inſiſt upon an exact relation of this Siege, or the prodigious Pains which was taken in circling about ſo vaſt a Town; nor how many Towers Artamenes built up from diſtance to diſtance anſwerable, as well to ſecure his Entrenchments and fortify his Lines, as to diſcover what the Enemies did within their Walls; nor how theſe Towers were placed upon Wooden Piles of Palm, of a moſt prodigious height; nor all the Engins which he prepared for this Siege; nor will I tell you, how the Valour of Mazares did appear in divers Sallies which the Beſieged made, nor how my Maſter repulſed them: But I muſt tell you in few words, that all their Attempts, and all they could do againſt ſo ſtrong a Town, were all ineffectual, and vain. Artamenes deſpairing of gaining it, ſeeing that Winter drew on, and that ſooner than ordinary, the Fields were covered with Snow, he knew not what to reſolve upon: For although there were an infinite number of Men within the Town, yet were they victualled for a long time, ſo that he had no hopes to take it either by Force or Famine, unleſs he ſhould tarry ſo long a time as the thought of it did affright him: At laſt he bethought himſelf of a way which yielded him ſome hopes of ſucceſs; he did not think the River Euphrates could reſiſt him, more than the River Gnides, ſo that with the conſent and approbation of the King, he cauſed two great Trenches to be made, which joyned to the River, and took the Water from the River above the Town and let it into the Channel again beneath; but before he had finiſhed theſe Trenches or given paſſage for the Water into them, he placed twenty thouſand Men near the Paſſage where the River runs into the Town, himſelf being in the Head of them, and ſent as many unto that place where the River iſſues out of the Town: Things being thus ordered, he gave the ſignal to open the Trenches a little before night; ſo that in leſs than two Hours this River being made fordable, he marched himſelf the firſt up to the Knees in Water (in ſpite of the coldneſs of the Weather, and Horſe being unfit for taking Towns) and did ſo encourage the reſt by his Example, that all which had order for it followed, and thus they did moſt couragiouſly, and with fierce impetuoſity enter into proud Babylon. The aſſault was made at both ends of the Town in an inſtant, Hidaſpes not being leſs diligent than Artamenes. My Maſter, to make ſure work, went preſently unto the Palace, where (as we were informed by Priſoners which we took) the Princeſs uſed to lodg, and took with him the Prince Gadates, and one of the Officers of Gobrias, to conduct him thither.

I will not relate unto you, the Amazement of the Inhabitants; the hideous diſorder of the Night; the Combats which he was forced unto in ſome Streets, and the Facilities he met with in others, nor how a great Sedition which was in the Town did help forward their Deſtruction; nor will I ſpeak of the confuſed Eccho of the noiſe, the deſolation of the Women, and the general Aſtoniſhment of the People. But I will tell you how Artamenes thought upon nothing but Mandana, and went in all haſte unto the Palace: At firſt the Guards made ſome reſiſtance, but as ſoon as one of them cried out that the King was eſcaped, they left the Gates, threw down their Arms; and left Artamenes Maſter of the place: But O Heavens! it was in vain to look for Mandana, for he could not find either the King or the Princeſs, nor could meet with any which could inform what was become of them. As for Hidaſpes, according to Orders from Artamenes, he ſecured all the publick Places, and placed Courts of Guard in ſeveral Streets, and kept in Arms all the night, ſo that at break of day, more than half the Army of Ciaxares was got into the Town: and Artamenes was abſolute Maſter of Babylon excepting two Caſtles, which rendred themſelves the next day: But neither in the King's Palace, nor in the Caſtles, nor in the Temples,nor in any of the Houſes, (for Artamenes cauſed all to be ſearched) could the King of Aſſyria, or Mandana be found; only one of the Aſſyrian Women which they had placed about the Princeſs, and who followed her not ſaid that at the beginning of the night, the King being accompanied with many of his Men, came into her Chamber, and took her and her two Cappadocian Women away with him, and went down a pair of Stairs which leads into the Garden, but whither they went afterwards ſhe could not tell. To repreſent unto you my Maſter's deſpair is a thing impoſſible: Why do the Gods, (ſaid he) load me thus with inſupportable Misfortunes? why will they not permit me to deliver my Princeſs, and puniſh my Rival? Ah Feraulas! I ſee it is impoſſible. It was very happy that Ciaxares, and ſo many Grandees accompanied him, and gave out neceſſary Orders to calm this huge Town; for as for my Maſter, Mandana was the only thought that he could entertain. A whole Month paſſed without any Intelligence either of the King of Aſſyria or the Princeſs, during which time he ſuffered as much torment as Man could do: Alas, ſaid he ſometimes unto me, what am I better for winning Battels, taking of Towns, or ſubverting of Kingdoms, if I can neither relieve my Princeſs, nor puniſh my Rival? If it were not my own Hand that put her into the power of her Raviſher, I ſhould be leſs troubled; but ſince it was by my own Valour that the King of Aſſyria carried her away; and that ſame Valour cannot make me kill him, this is a thing which is above my Patience: For to ſave the Life of her Enemy, when he was ſet upon by eleven Cavaliers, and not to be able to take it from him, at that time when ſo many others as valiant as himſelf felt the weight of my Blows: This is it Feraulas, that the Gods are reſolved upon my Deſtruction, and that I muſt prepare my ſelf for it. I forgot to tell you, Sir, that we found in Babylon a great number of Ladies of very great Quality, who having been uſed with much reſpect (for Artamenes before he entered the Town did give expreſs command that none ſhould offer any violence unto any Women) came to give him thanks, and aſſured him that the Princeſs Mandana would thank him alſo for the Civility which they had received from him. At the very name of Mandana, my Maſter did double his Civilities towards them; and he received this ſatisfaction however, to hear Mandana well ſpoken of, as well in Babylon as Themiſcira, it being moſt certain that this Princeſs had cauſed her ſelf to be adored amongſt them. Artamenes underſtood by theſe Ladies that his Rival did treat her with abundance of Reſpect, at leaſt in their ſight. But they told my Maſter, that ſince the beginning of the Siege, none were permitted to come near the Princeſs; nor any Lady to come within the Palace: I will not tell you, Sir, the ſeveral Reflections which my Maſter made upon all theſe things, for it would too much lengthen my Story; only this, that ſometimes he knew not well whether he ſhould grieve more to underſtand that his Rival was more rigorous unto her, ſince the ſiege of Babylon, than to uſe her as he did before. To ſpeak truth, I do believe, that what theſe Ladies had ſaid unto him, as thinking to tell good news, did not much pleaſe him, ſo much did Jealouſy diſturb his Reaſon, and ſo difficult a thing it is to prevent that humour from poſſeſſing thoſe that are moſt reaſonable. But, Sir, at the laſt there was ſuch great care taken to be informed concerning the King of Aſſyria, that they had intelligence he was retreated unto Pteria, whereof Aribeus was Governor: that Mazares conducted him thither, and that Aribeus his old Friend had received him into the Town; and that the Princeſs was very ſtrictly guarded in that place; yet we neither could know then, nor at this day how they could get out of Babylon. This news did at firſt afford much Joy unto Artamenes, who moved Ciaxares to diſencamp his Army which lay in and about this ſtately Town; and after he had left a ſtrong Garriſon in it, and given all requiſite Orders for keeping it, we marched with all ſpeed towards Pteria; and although this March was very long, yet ſuch was the prudent Proviſion of Artamenes, as our Troops wanted nothing, nor were they worſe for it: But, Sir, when we came within three days march of this Town; that Joy which my Maſter had to know where his Princeſs and his Rival were, was much leſſened; for we had intelligence that the King of Aſſyria, the Prince Mazares and, and Aribeus had conveyed away the Princeſs and themſelves to Sinope. When Artamenes conſidered how that Town was ſeated upon the Sea, and without a naval Army it was impoſſible to beſiege it, his Sorrows were mightily multiplied: For indeed Ciaxares had no Ships, neither could he get them ſo ſoon as to be ſerviceable, and yet 'twas all in vain to beleaguer Sinope without them, ſince if they ſtormed the Town from the Landſide, then the King of Aſſyria had the Sea open to ſave himſelf, and carry away the Princeſs; this was the thing which moſt of all Artamenes feared: This diſaſterous Circumſtance which was a reaſon, why he durſt not beſiege Sinope with an Army of a hundred thouſand Men, cauſed ſuch a ſadneſs in him as cannot be expreſſed.

Deſperate then as he was, he propounded unto Ciaxares, to ſend me into Sinope diſguiſed, to the end I might ſuborn ſome or other, and try whether the Town could be taken by Conſpiracy. When Ciaxares could not think of a better way, he conſented unto this, and I obtained that which I my ſelf deſired; for indeed, Sir, it was I who firſt made the Motion unto my Maſter. I went then after I had moulded my ſelf into the Habit of a Country Peſant; and ſince we had heretofore ſtayed a long time in Sinope, I had got my ſelf many Friends: Amongſt the reſt Artucas was one, who is a Kinſman unto Marteſia, and now here with us; he always loved me, though he was ſomething obliged unto the ſervice of Aribeus: when I had got into the Town, and had concealed my ſelf with one who was very faithful unto me; I perceived that it was a thing impoſſible to ſpeak with the Princeſs as I deſigned: And I underſtood that they always kept Gallies with Oares, and Ships ready for Sail in caſe of any need, eſpecially ſince the King of Aſſyria underſtood that our Army was ſo near him. I ſmelt alſo, that though Artucas was a Captain of one of the Gates in the Town, yet he did not approve of the revolt in Aribeus; but thought it very ſtrange that the Princeſs ſhould be a Priſoner in a Town which was her own: I underſtood alſo that the Prince Mazares had all poſſible care of her, and did as much as he could qualify the violent Humours in the King of Aſſyria. In concluſion, after I had well conſulted with my ſelf what I had to do, I went one night unto Artucas, who was not a little amuſed to ſee me: After the firſt Complements were paſt, I began to ſpeak of things in particular: I made him underſtand that he was engaged on the worſt ſide, not only becauſe it was unjuſt, but alſo becauſe it would ruin him: In few words, I told him ſo many things, and ſo handſomly prepared him, that he ſtaggered, and at laſt I made him reſolve to deceive Aribeus, and become faithful unto his King. We agreed then that he ſhould deliver up the Gate, on that ſide the Town towards the Temple of Mars, preciſely upon that day and hour, that I ſhould appoint him: So then when I got out of Sinope, and was returned to the Camp, I brought ſuch Joy unto my Maſter, as is inconceivable; you know, Sir, (purſued Feraulas ſpeaking unto the King of Hircania) that this Reſolution was fixed upon, That Artamenes ſhould come with four thouſand Men only to ſurprize Sinope; that Ciaxares ſhould follow the next day with the whole Army. But my Maſter being advanced to execute this great Buſineſs; he ſaw as he came out of a Valley, that the Town which he came to ſurprize was all in a Flame, and believed that the Princeſs would periſh in it: You alſo know that in lieu of deſtroying Sinope, we ſaved that little which remains; how we quenched the Fire; how Aribeus fought; how he was overwhelmed, and how he being come unto the Foot of the Tower in the Caſtle, the generous Thraſibulas, whom you ſee there, opened the Gate, and told my Maſter, that there was in that place an illuſtrious Perſon who had need of help: Neither are you ignorant, how Artamenes running haſtily up to the top of the Tower, thinking to find the Princeſs there, he only found his Corrival: And doubtleſs you alſo know how my Maſter did ſee a Galley, in which the King of Aſſyria told him that the Prince Mazares had taken away Mandana.

In concluſion, Feraulas deſired chiefly to acquaint theſe Princes that his Maſter held no baſe intelligence with the King of Aſſyria; after he had told them all the turbulent Agitations in the Minds of theſe two Rivals, whilſt they looked from the top of the Tower upon the Galley during the Tempeſt; then he moſt exactly related all the diſcourſe between the King of Aſſyria and Artamenes; making them to underſtand the promiſe which Artamenes had made, how that it was not prejudicial to the King's Service; and that the intereſt of his Love was the only thing which made him conceal the King of Aſſyria's Letter. Afterwards he ſlightly rehearſed the flight of this King; the Death of Aribeus; the retreat of this Prince unto Pteria; how he had written unto Artamenes, and the reaſon why Artamenes did hide his Letter from Ciaxares; by what accident his Anſwer came unto the King's hands; how Artamenes believed, and almoſt ſtill believes, that the Princeſs periſhed; how he found Mazares half drowned, and indeed all that happened until the arrival of Ciaxares, and impriſonment of Artamenes. In purſuance whereof, he conjured them all to conſider what was beſt to be done for the preſervation of ſuch an illuſtrious Man: For, (ſaid he to them) Sirs, all this that Chriſantes and my ſelf have related unto you, is only to give you ſome light touch of his Vertue, it being moſt certain that it is infinitely above all that can be ſaid or thought.

Feraulus having ended his Relation, left all thoſe illuſtrious Auditors in ſo much admiration of the miraculous Life of Artamenes, and in ſo much joy that they were not miſtaken in that opinion which they ever had of his Innocency, that they could not chuſe but give ſome Teſtimonies of it. I ever believed (ſaid the King of Hircania) that it was impoſſible Artamenes ſhould be in any fault: And I never doubted (added Perſodes) but that he was ever abſolutely innocent. The worſt is (replied Hidaſpes) that one cannot juſtify him before Ciaxares of that Crime whereof he is accuſed, but by accuſing him of another which will not leſs incenſe him: And I doubt (ſaid Chriſantes, interrupting him) that Ciaxares would be as well pleaſed with his holding ſecret correſpondency with the King of Aſſyria, as with Mandana. If the Princeſs ſhould be dead (anſwered A- duſius) there would be no difficulty to juſtify Artamenes in diſcovering his Love; but if by happy Fortune ſhe be alive (replied Feraulas) my Maſter will never forgive Chriſantes and me, for diſcovering his Paſſion unto Ciaxares. For my part (added Thraſibulus) I conceive it requiſite to uſe much prudence in the matter, and not to diſcover the Love of Artamenes, until ſuch time as it be thought fit to diſcover his Quality. But the knowledg of his Quality (replied Chriſantes) is a thing altogethet as dangerous to acquaint the King with: I am of this opinion (ſaid the King of Hircania) not to do any thing ſlightly, but to bring things unto ſuch a paſs, as to hazard nothing; and to that end, before any thing be diſcovered unto Ciaxares, it is expedient to gain the Hearts of the Captains and Souldiers in ſuch a manner, that there may be neither any fear nor danger in ſpeaking unto him for Artamenes. All the Princes concurring with the King of Hircania, and approving of what he ſaid, did aſſure Hidaſpes, Aduſius, Chriſantes, and Feraulas, that they themſelves would rather periſh than ſuffer their Maſter to be in danger of it; and that they would neglect no manner of expedient which may conduce unto his Safety. Thraſibulus was in deſpair of any power to ſerve him any way than in his Perſon and Courage, which he would pawn for him. As they were thus debating, Gobrias, Gadates, Thimocrates, and Philocles came in: They were not preſent at the Relations of Chriſantes and Feraulas, becauſe as ſoon as Ciaxares came to Sinope, they returned to the Camp, and lodged not in the Town. But ſince they were no leſs affectionated unto their Maſter than the reſt of the Princes; Feraulas ſaid unto the King of Hircania, that he muſt needs engage them in behalf of Artamenes. At the name of Artamenes, Gobrias asked what he ſhould do to ſerve him? Gadates all impatient, that if it were only to die for him, he was and ever would be ready. Thimocrates and Philocles appeared to be as ready as any to ſerve him: So that the King of Hircania beginning to ſpeak, let them all underſtand that there was nothing elſe to be done, but for every one to be ready to ſave Artamenes, if there were any attempt to deſtroy him. Upon theſe words, all the Princes did ſolemnly ſwear to unite themſelves, and take up Arms for his ſafety whenſoever there ſhould be any need. They were all upon theſe terms, when Artamenes came unto Hidaſpes, and told him that he came to aſſure him, Artamenes had ſent a Note unto the King which made him very glad, but none could tell him what it was; and ſince he knew him to be a Lover of Artamenes, he would adviſe him to go into the Caſtle. Hidaſpes after he had given thanks unto Artucas for his counſel, acquainted all the illuſtrious Aſſembly with it; who out of impatience to know what it was, went preſently unto the King, but with ſo much eſteem, and ſo much affection unto Artamenes, and did ſo intereſt themſelves in his Fortune, that any would have ſaid, that they were all of them his Kindred or Subjects.

ARTAMENES,

OR, THE

GRAND CYRUS.

Part II. Book II.

IT was not without good cauſe, that Artucas told Hidaſpes, how the King of Media was very glad and joyful, at a Letter which he received from Artamenes: And the joy of Artamenes did exceed the Kings, if it be permitted me to put a difference between things that are both of them Extreams; but to diſcover the true cauſe of the Satisfaction to theſe two Perſons, whoſe preſent Conditions ſeemed to be ſo unlike, You muſt know, that the ſame day about Noon, a Man which heretofore had ſerved Andramias, and ſince ſerved Artamenes in the Scythian Voyage, and was ſent by him to Artaxes, who commanded thoſe Troops which were left the King of Pontus; upon his return unto the Caſtle of Sinope, he deſired to ſpeak with his ancient Maſter. Aglatidas was then with Andramias, who commanded the Man to enter, and whom at firſt he knew not; yet he no ſooner heard him ſpeak, but he knew him by his Voice. Andramias gave him his Hand, and asked him if he could do any thing for him? Yes, Sir, (anſwered he) for I doubt not but if you will do me the ſavour to let me ſpeak with Renowned Artamenes, I doubt not, I ſay, but I ſhall help him unto ſuch News to tell the King, as may obtain him his Liberty.

Andramas not imagining what this Man could tell of any ſuch Importance, urged the Man to tell his Buſineſs unto him; and to tell him alſo, why he was ſo affectionate unto Artamenes? for Andramias had ſome kind of Fear to be ſurprized, and thought this to be ſome Device of the King's to try his Fidelity. Then Ortalques (for that was the Man's Name) told him, that he ſerved Artamenes in the Maſſagettan Voyage; and preſented him a piece of a torn Letter, upon which he ſaw theſe words written,not knowing to whom they were directed, nor from whom they came.

☞ " Tell it, that I am living: That they carry me " into one of the two Armenia's; but I know " not unto whom I ſhall go: and that the " King of———

After that Andramias had read this which was writ upon a looſe piece of Paper, he looked upon Ortalques, and asked who it was which gave it him? But the Man, without more ado; Indeed, Sir, (ſaid he) the Princeſs Mandana is living. How, (cried out Andramias and Aglatidas, both together) is the Princeſs Mandana living? Yes, Sir, anſwered Ortalques, and this which you ſee writ there, is, as I think, her own Hand. Andramias and Aglatidas having not fully ſatisfied their Curioſity, urged him to tell them all he knew concerning the Princeſs: And the Man told them, that when he was engaged in the Pontean and Bithynian War, he being ſent thither, it was his hap to be much wounded, and ſtaid there a long time ſick, not being able to follow Artaxes, whom Aribeus had called away: That afterwards being deſirous to return home, he came unto a place which is near the Euxine Bridg, in that place where the River Halis empties it ſelf. That being there, and going out one Morning to walk, he ſaw a Ship on the Sea ſome three or four Leagues off the Land; cloſe by which, there was one of theſe great wodden Boats of Pine-tree, which can very well endure the Waves when the Winds are high, and which are uſed to carry Merchandize; into which he ſaw many Perſons deſcend, and diſtinguiſhed ſome Women. After this, the Ship ſailed into the open Sea, and the Boat came ſtrait unto the Mouth of the River; but ſince the Stream in that place was very impetuous, it was a long while before the Rowers could get out of the Sea into the River: During which time I came unto the River's ſide, and I took notice that there was a Woman in the Boat, which did very attentively look upon me; that afterwards, hiding her ſelf behind another Woman, ſhe did ſomething, and I ſuppoſe it was to write that which you ſee upon that piece of Paper. Then another of the Women coming to the Prow of the Boat, which touched the Land, and came within three paces of me, and having lapped up this piece of Paper in a Hood, which ſhe took from her Head, ſhe threw it unto me, ſeeming as if the Wind had waſted it from her, for it was ſomething high, and blew it where I was: I thought that I knew the Party; and within an hour after I recalled my ſelf, and knew certainly that it was one of the Princeſs's Women, called Marteſia. The Men who were in the Boat, were ſo buſy in rowing, and ſtriving to get up the River, that I think they did not mind the Action of this Woman: For my part, I haſtily took up what was thrown unto me; and going a little aſide, I ſaw that which I now give you, and I was ſo ſurprized at it, that I knew not what to think.

Mean while, the Boat being paſſed the Mouth of the River, it made away much more readily, and was ſoon ſo far from me, that I knew not what to reſolve upon: I had a better mind to follow this Boat, than to come to Sinope, whither I underſtood the King's Army was marched; for indeed, ſince I knew nothing what paſſed here, I could not well tell what they deſired me to do: yet after I had well examined the Matter, I did conclude, that my beſt way was to come hither; ſo that I embarked in the firſt Ship I did meet with, and ſo hither I came. As I went down to the Port, the burning of this Town making me very inquiſitive, I heard of all the Paſſages of Sinope, and I made no more doubt but that it was the Princeſs of Mandana who ſent me hither; for I verily think I ſaw her in the Boat: To tell you who carried her away, is more than I can do; all I know is, that certainly ſhe is living. Andramias and Aglatidas, after they heard this Man's Relation, doubted no more than he but that the Princeſs was living. But to make it more clear, Aglatidas told his Couſin, that ſince Artamenes had been ſo long in the Cappadocian Court, it was impoſſible but he ſhould know Mandana's Hand, therefore the beſt way would be to ſhew him what Ortalques had brought, and not to go unto the King, and acquaint him with any thing which might move in him a falſe Joy. Andramias approved of the Propoſition, and with Ortalques entred into the Chamber of Artamenes, who then was profoundly plunged into cruel thoughts of the Princeſs's Death, or at leaſt at the apprehenſion of it. Aglatidas coming to him, and after he had ſaluted him, Sir, ſaid he to him, here is a Man, whoſe Name is Ortalques, who deſires to ſee you; and has brought a piece of Paper unto Andramias, which Hand perhaps you know. If I know the Hand, as well as I know the Name of Ortalques, (replied Artamenes, in much ſadneſs) I ſhall eaſily tell you who writ it; for the Man ſo called, ſerved me in my Voyage to the Maſſagettes; and as I went out of Cappadocia to Ecbatan, I ſent him unto Artaxes, who then aided the King of Pontus, and ſince that until now I heard nothing of him. In ſaying ſo, Artamenes conſidered the Character of the Paper, yet he no ſooner looked upon it but he bluſh'd; and looking upon Aglatidas and Andramias, with ſuch extream turbulency more than uſual: Doubtleſs, cried he out, the Princeſs Mandana did write this Paper which you ſhew unto me; and I have ſeen her Letters unto the King too often to be miſtaken. Alſo I my ſelf had the Honour, when I came firſt into Cappadocia, to preſent one unto him from her, wherein ſhe was pleaſed to ſpeak too advantagiouſly of me to loſe the memory of it: But I beſeech you, ſaid he unto Andramias, if you can do it without danger to your ſelf; let me ſee, Ortalques, for I do confeſs the Vertue of the Princeſs has much intereſted me in any thing which concerns her; and I ſhould be very glad to underſtand what he knows of her. Andramias, who much deſired to oblige Artamenes, cauſed the Man to enter, unſeen by any of the Guards: but during that time, Aglatidas eaſily perceived, that the Joy and Agitation of Artamenes his Mind, had a more powerful Cauſe than bare Compaſſion; he beheld the Paper, as if he were afraid to be miſtaken: He lifted his Eyes up to Heaven, as if he rendered Thanks for ſo great a Happineſs; he walked up and down the Room, and never regarded Aglatidas, nor ſpoke to him afterwards; coming ſuddenly to himſelf, and fearing he had been too much tranſported, If you did but know (ſaid he to him) the Merit of the Princeſs Mandana, you would leſs wonder at my exceſs of Joy; for although ſhe ought to be your Queen, I aſſure you I ſhall intereſt my ſelf as much in her Service, as any Subject ſhe ſhall one day have in all Media. It were to be wiſhed (anſwered Aglatidas) the King were acquainted with your Zeal unto any thing which concerns her, and that he would have the ſame thoughts of you which I have. Mean while Andramias brought in Ortalques, whom Artamenes embraced with exceeding tenderneſs, ſeeming as if the more News he told him concerning the Princeſs Mandana, the more welcome ſhould he be: Yet notwithſtanding he asked him ſo many things together, that Ortalques could not anſwer him; but at the laſt he told him as much as he knew, and as much as did not yet fully ſatisfy Artamenes. But yet notwithſtanding the certainty of the Princeſs her Life, that did afford him an unexpreſſable joy, inſomuch as no other Conſideration could diminiſh his delight: It is your Duties (ſaid he unto Aglatidas and Andramias) to rejoice at the Reſurrection of your Princeſs. But (ſaid Aglatidas unto him, interrupting him) Ortalques, out of Zeal which he bears unto you, has ſome thoughts which ſeem to me very reaſonable, for indeed he deſired to ſee you, with intention that it might be from your Hand the King ſhould be acquainted with the Life of the Princeſs his Daughter; imagining, with ſome probability, that the Joy which you ſhould give him, wonld in ſome ſort diſpoſe his Mind to hearken more favourably unto what I ſhould ſpeak to him in your behalf. Alas, (added Andramias) it may be thought, that ſince perhaps he will be neceſſitated unto a freſh War for the delivery of the Princeſs, he will ſooner ſet you at liberty. That Reaſon would be but weak, (replied Artamenes modeſtly) ſince he has ſo many other gallant Men about him, were it not for the Zeal which I have unto his Service, and which may be accounted ſomething extraordinary. But if I ſhould ſend this Note unto the King, would it not reflect too much upon you, Andramias? and would it not accuſe you for giving me too much Liberty? No, replied Aglatidas, not at all; for ſince Ortalques did once ſerve Andramias, and afterwards ſerved you, it is nothing ſtrange that he ſhould be received into a Place where he had two Maſters; and that you knowing the Hand, deſired to acquaint the King with this welcome News, which Andramias may carry from you. Artamenes, who did indeed deſire to be perſwaded, did conſent unto the Motion which Aglatidas made; and calling for Ink and Paper, he writ as followeth.

ARTAMENES unto the King his Soveraign Lord.

AS long as I thought my ſelf uſeleſs unto your Majeſty, I endured the weight of my Chains without impatience: But the happy News of the Princeſs's being alive, perſwades me, that perhaps I may be ſerviceable in her Delivery. And I now dare moſt humbly beſeech you, not to deprive me of that Honour to render you that Service; ſolemnly proteſting unto your Majeſty, to come into your Priſon and put on my Fetters, the very next day that the Princeſs is at Liberty.

Artamenes.

Andramias taking the Letter which Artamenes writ, alſo the Note from the Princeſs Mandana, went with Ortalques unto the King, where Aglatidas would alſo be preſent, in hopes to perform ſome good Office unto ſuch an illuſtrious Priſoner; and becauſe the Actions of my Maſter had begot ſome ſuſpitions in him of his Love, he thought that he would be very glad of Liberty; and indeed, though he loved Aglatidas very well, yet he did ſtrive to conceal his Joy in his own Heart. They were no ſooner gone out, but being able to hold no longer, What, my Princeſs, (ſaid he) are you living! need I no more fear your Death? muſt all thoſe gaſtly Images of Tombs and Coffins no longer terrify my Fancy? No, no, I can now believe you breath and live, and perhaps think upon me. Ah, whoſoever it be, either Gods or Men which have ſaved my Princeſs from the Waves, and from ſuch an almoſt inevitable Danger, What does not Artamenes owe unto them? If it was a Divinity, it merits my Vows; if it be a mortal Wight, it is worthy of all my Services: But whatſoever it be, ſince Mandana, Divine Mandana does live, I will permit my Soul to take full delight, as ſhe did before all ſorrow. But, alas, (ſaid he, after he had been a while ſilent) I am not ſo happy as I thought my ſelf: For though 'tis true Mandana lives, yet ſhe is a Captive; and that which is moſt cruel, I am in Fetters alſo, and by conſequence not in a condition to relieve her. What King would ſhe ſpeak unto? to whom may it be imagined is ſhe a Priſoner? what would ſhe expreſs by her Note? what a moſt cruel Accident is this, that I cannot taſte in quiet the greateſt Joy that ever amorous Mind was capable of? Yet am I not to blame (ſaid he) to deſcant thus upon the preſent condition of my Life, at a time when I ſee my Princeſs lives, and when I may hope to ſee her again? For ſince it is the pleaſure of the Gods to bring her from the deep Abyſs of the Sea, they may alſo perhaps bring me out of Priſon to deliver her, and ſet her upon her Throne. But, my faireſt Princeſs, after all theſe Misfortunes which I have endured, I dare not make any Prayers for my ſelf; I fear leſt my own Intereſts ſhould be contagious and infect yours; and for the love of you I will ſeparate them, and ask of the Gods no more than what directly relates unto you: Therefore, O ye Omnipotent Divinities, which govern all the Earth, cauſe them to deliver me, that I may deliver my Princeſs; that I may have power to puniſh all her Raviſhers; to bring her back unto her Father, and let her poſſeſs all thoſe Crowns which you have enabled me to defend, fight for, and conquer for the King of the Medes: O ye moſt juſt Gods, do only as I ſay, and afterwards let me die at the Feet of Mandana; and that ſhe may never have any other Sorrows but for the loſs of Artamenes.

Thus did the moſt amorous Prince in the World entertain himſelf, whilſt Andramias with Ortalques was with the King; and whilſt all his illuſtrious Friends were with Hidaſpes, where they received the Advice from Artucas, which made them all impatient, and moved them to go preſently unto the Caſtle, as I already told you. But to make you underſtand how Artucas came ſo ſoon to the knowledg of it; you muſt know, that when Andramias gave the Letter unto the King from Artamenes, this Prince was in a rapure of Joy, which cannot be expreſſed, ſo that ſome of thoſe who were then in the Chamber, without diving any further into the Matter, or ſtaying for any more, did in all haſte divulge, that Artamenes was in favour with the King; and it was from them which Artucas had that which he told unto Hidaſpes, as knowing him moſt affectionate unto Artamenes. The King of Phrygia, who was with Ciaxares when he received this Letter, being deſirous to take hold of that Occaſion, told him, that ſuch good News as that, well deſerved Liberty unto him who ſent it: And Ciaxares, in his firſt apprehenſions of Joy, did partly forget his Anger againſt Artamenes, and was glad to receive from his Hand this News as a ſign of his Affection unto his Service. He then did exactly inform form himſelf from Ortalques of all he knew, and all he had ſeen; and bad Andramias that he ſhould aſſure Artamenes, it ſhould be long of himſelf if he did not ſuddenly come out of Priſon to relieve the Princeſs his Daughter; and that he ſhould no ſooner acknowledg the Correſpondency which he held with the King of Aſſyria, nor ſhould no ſooner ask pardon for it, than he ſhould forget what was paſt, and reſtore him unto his former Condition. O, Sir, (ſaid the King of Phrygia then unto him) let not your Majeſty ſtand upon ſuch an uſeleſs piece of Formality; for I do almoſt certainly know that Artamenes is Innocent; and if there were any ſecret Intelligence between the King of Aſſyria and him, it was not at all prejudicial unto your Majeſty's Service.

As they were thus in Diſcourſe, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caducians, Gobrias, Gadates, Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, Aduſias, Thimocrates, Philocles, Artucas, Feraulas and Chriſantes came in; and immediately after Aglatidas entred, with a multitude of Strangers of Quality, whom this ſtrange News did draw unto the King, every one being deſirous to rejoice with him in the happy News, which did indeed deſerve a Publick Thankſgiving. The Name of Mandana was in every one's Mouth; thoſe who knew her, told it unto thoſe who knew her not, and diſcourſed of all her admirable Qualities; ſo that as the Souls of all were dejected at the News of her loſs, ſo now they were elevated at the News of her being Alive.

After the firſt reſentments of Satisfaction, Ciaxares much diſpleaſed that he could not preciſely know what was the Adventure of the Princeſs, nor who carried her away, nor why they carried her unto Armenia. He knew very well that the King of that Country was his Tributary; that the Prince Tigranes his Son was Gallant and Generous, and one that loved Artamenes: But he knew alſo that the old King was capritious and humorous, and that he ſent no Troops to his Army as he was obliged to do; Ciaxares therefore did not fully reliſh his Joys, but would ſometimes make his Unquietneſs apparent. Sir, ſaid the King of Hircania unto him, let not the Captivity of the Princeſs Mandana diſquiet you, for if you would have her Priſon Doors fly open whereſoever they be, you need do no more but ſet open the Priſon Doors of Artamenes; and ſet him before ſo many Kings and Princes as now hear me; and you may be aſſured, Sir, that if he be our Guide, we will follow him unto Armenia, and make Victory follow us. When we have rendred Thanks unto the Gods, (replied the King of the Medes) we ſhall then ſee how they will inſpire us: But for my part, I do not think, that in thanking them for their Equity in ſaving an Innocent Princeſs, I ought to pardon a Delinquent, and ſuch an one as will neither ask Pardon, nor repent; no nor ſo much as acknowledg his Fault, altho it be moſt apparent. Ah, Sir, (cried they all with one Voice, both the Kings, the Princes, the Homotimes, and all the Cavaliers) Artamenes indeed is Unfortunate, but never was Culpable. There is not one of us but will enter into his Priſon, and remain an Hoſtage for him, until he has made proof of his Innocency by his new Services, or (to ſay better) new Miracles. Ciaxares was much moved to find ſuch violent Affection in the Minds of all theſe illuſtrious Perſons, and could not anſwer them but with a Congy; yet ſuch an one as left them in ſome hopes, inſomuch as they redoubled their Reaſons and Requeſts. Aglatidas was not leſs zealous than any; And Migabiſes (mauger their old Quarrels) was amongſt them in the King's Chamber, and begged Liberty for Artamenes, as well as his old Enemy. The King of Phrygia did extreamly preſs Ciaxares unto it; the King of Hircania ſpoke wonderful boldly; Thimocrates and Philocles uſed as much Power, as there was in Greece Eloquence; Thraſibulus did no leſs; Hidaſpes and Aduſius ſpoke with extream violence, as well as Perſodes, Gadates, and an hundred others, who ſeemed all to be linked unto the Intereſts of Artamenes.

Ciaxares then ſeeing himſelf thus urgently preſſed; Know, (ſaid he unto the King of Phrygia, and Hircania, and all the reſt) I wiſh as well as any that Artamenes were Innocent, or at leaſt that he would acknowledg his Crime with Repentance, upon condition I gave one of my Kingdoms; and to let you ſee that I will do all I can, I do permit you (at our return from the Temple) to go one after another unto him, to the end you may perſwade him unto obedience, and not to keep that ſecret from me, which I both will, and I ought to know. After he had ſaid ſo, Ciaxares without giving them time to anſwer, went out of the Chamber, and went unto the Temple to thank the Gods, for the favour he received from them, and that they would be pleaſed to compleat the Bleſſing, in rendring unto him the Princeſs his Daughter: All the People followed unto this Ceremony; and the happy News being divulged both in Town and Camp, cauſed a general rejoycing every where: At their return from the Temple, he had not forgot what Ciaxares ſaid, and therefore intreated him to give order unto Andramias, that any of his Friends might go unto Artamenes, and endeavour to diſcover (as he ſaid) what the King would know.

The King of Media, ſince he ſaw the ſtate of things to be as they were, would have been very glad if Artamenes would ask pardon, that he might give it unto him; ſuffered moſt of thoſe Princes and Perſons of Quality to ſee Artamenes in little Companies; ſo that at that time when Permiſſion was given, and Orders ſent unto Andramias to that purpoſe; the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania went to viſit him, accompanied with Chriſantes and Feraulas; leaving all the reſt in great impatience to enjoy the ſame happineſs. In going thither, they reſolved to acquaint Artamenes, that they knew he was Cyrus, and that they were not ignorant of all the reſt of his Adventures, to the end, they might afterwards adviſe upon the beſt Expedients to procure his Liberty. Not but that Chriſantes and Feraulas did apprehend he would be angry with them, but yet they ſaw ſuch a neceſſity of it, that they would run that hazard, and rather expoſe themſelves unto Diſgrace, than to hide from him a Truth which was requiſite he ſhould know. As ſoon as theſe two Kings entred, Artamenes was much amazed as well at the ſight of them, as of Chriſantes and Feraulas, for although Aglatidas had ſeen him, during his Impriſonment, for Andramias did ſo much favour his Couſin, yet none elſe of his Domeſticks ever ſaw him. This famous Priſoner received theſe Princes with all the Civility and Reſpect, which Artamenes as Artamenes did owe unto Perſons of that Quality; but after they had ſaluted him, and moved him to embrace Chriſantes and Feraulas, they told him, ſmiling, that they came to receive Orders from him, and to know what he would have them do, to deliver Artamenes out of Priſon, and to put him into ſuch a condition, as he might appear to be Cyrus. At theſe words, Artamenes looked upon Chriſantes and Feraulas; but the King of Phrygia beginning to ſpeak, No (ſaid he to him) do not blame theſe two Men whom you ought to love better than any Men in the World; and be not ſorry that we know the Secrets of your Life: They were not told us, but when there was a great neceſſity, therefore murmur not, but be aſſured that what we know ſhall never hurt you. I know very well, Sirs, (anſwered Artamenes) that Chriſantes and Feraulas had always good Intentions towards me, and that queſtionleſs they could never have made a better choice than of you, and the King of Hircania; for all that, Sirs, there are ſome paſſages in my Adventures which I wiſh had been never known, and which I ſhould never have told whilſt I had Life. Had we not ſeen you in eminent danger, (ſaid Chriſantes with much reverence) we would have kept in an invincible Secret; but we conceived, that ſince we could tell nothing which was not glorious unto you, we thought it better to acquaint theſe Kings which hear, me with your Innocency, than ſuffer you to periſh. Artamenes although he was very ſorry that they knew what he would have concealed, yet forced himſelf not to ſeem ſo openly, leſt he ſhould diſoblige theſe two Princes who were thus intereſted in his Fortune. Then they acquainted him with the Alteration which appeared in the King's Mind, and with his obſtinate deſire to know exactly what that Intelligence was which he had with the King of Aſſyria. Since that you know all, replied Artamenes, you may underſtand that I ought not to tell him; not that I care for expoſing my Life by incenſing the King againſt Cyrus: But when I think how I ſhould diſpleaſe the Princeſs Mandana by it, and ſhould expoſe her perhaps unto the Anger of the King her Father; Ah Sirs, I do confeſs I cannot think on it but I tremble, and therefore it is a thing which I can never do, I had much rather that Ciaxares ſhould think me perfidious, than that Mandana ſhould ſuſpect me of indiſcretion: Indeed, Sirs, ſhall I tell you truly? If I have any Sorrows for your knowing the truth of my Life, it is meerly in reſpect of the intereſt of this moſt illuſtrious Princeſs; not but that ſhe is purely Innocent,nor that her Vertue can be ſtained by any Calumnies, yet for all that, I wiſh you thought me to be as faulty as Ciaxares doth, and were ignorant of that which might juſtify me. Theſe Princes hearing him ſpeak ſo, could not chuſe but ſmile, and afterwards admire the power of his reſpectful Paſſion, which moved him to prefer the intereſt of the Princeſs, not only before his own Life, but alſo before his own Glory. In concluſion, after a long diſcourſe, which yet would not afford them a way to reſolve upon, they deſigned to protract the buſineſs as long as they could, and obtain for certain days permiſſion to viſit him. That in the mean time, they adviſed him to ſpeak concerning Ciaxares as he was wont, which was with much Reverence and Affection; that on their ſides, they would tell the King of Medes, how they were in ſome hopes to come unto the knowledg of ſomething which he deſired to be informed of, yet he muſt have patience for a while: That in the interim, they would incite all the Captains and Souldiers, to ask his Liberty; and in concluſion, they would act further according as Ciaxares did appear more or leſs incenſed againſt him. Artamenes thanked them moſt civilly for their good Intentions towards him: And did that which two days before he could not think he ſhould, which was to ſolicite them earneſtly to break his Fetters; for ſince he knew the Princeſs living, and that ſhe was in Captivity, his Priſon became intolerable unto him. Chriſantes and Feraulas, ſtaying after theſe Princes, told him the Names of all thoſe who were acquainted with his Story; and he did a little blame them for making ſo many private unto it: But, Sir, (ſaid they unto him) by what other ways can you hope to break your Chains, to deliver your Princeſs, if ſo many illuſtrious Friends as you have, ſhould be all ignorant of your Innocency? Ah (ſaid he unto them) if all you have told them will procure me my Liberty, you had good reaſon to do it, and I have great cauſe to thank you. Afterwards he told of his Joy to hear the Princeſs was not periſhed, and of his diſquiet in being abſolutely ignorant in whoſe Hands Fortune had diſpoſed her; for, ſaid he, you know as well as I, that the King of Aſſyria is now at Pteria; and they aſſure you that Mazares is dead. Thus diſcourſing of one thing or other, yet all relating unto his Love, he kept Chriſantes and Feraulas a long time with him. They were no ſooner gone out, but Perſodes, Hidaſpes, and Aduſius came in; after them followed Gobrias, Gadates, and Megabiſes: and after them again, Thraſibulas, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Aglatidas: Indeed of all thoſe who had permiſſion to ſee him, there was not one but earneſtly deſired it: Artamenes tranſacted with thoſe who had been told his Hiſtory, as he did with the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania; and with thoſe who knew it not, according as it was agreed upon between the Princes and him. Mean while Ciaxares diſpatched one unto the King of Armenia, and made choice of Megabiſes for that imployment; appointing him to acquaint that King, how ſince he underſtood the Princeſs his Daughter was within his Dominions, he deſired ſhe might be ſent back unto him, in an Equipage proportionable unto her Quality; and in caſe he refuſed, then to declare War againſt him. That which incenſed Ciaxares more againſt him, was, that this King refuſed the payment of that Tribute which he ought to do, and produced ſome weak-bottom'd Reaſons for his Exemption; he never thought upon any new War which was likely, but he was ſorry for Artamenes, and hearkened very favourably unto thoſe who returned from the Priſon, who told him, that Artamenes did always ſpeak of him with very great Reverence and Affection, and that according to all Appearances, he was moſt certainly innocent: But after all, he would needs know ~~this impenetrable~~ Secret, which they put him in ſome hopes to diſcover, yet the opinion of every one was, that ſince they fore-ſaw a neceſſity of a War with Armenia, it would move Ciaxares to paſs over his firſt Reſolutions. Mean time, Artamenes remembred himſelf of his promiſe unto the King of Aſſyria, which was to advertiſe him exactly of every thing, to the end they might tranſact together for the Liberty of the Princeſs: Oh ye Deſtinies, (ſaid he to himſelf, in calling to memory his Promiſes) unto what intricate Adventures do you expoſe me? It ſeems I came into this World only to do good Offices unto the King of Aſſyria: I found out his firſt Conſpiracy to no other end but to acquaint Mandana with his Love, which himſelf durſt not diſcover: I went unto the Maſſagettes for nothing elſe but to facilitate his ſecond Enterprize: And I returned back purpoſely to ſave his Life, and to help him in the carrying away of Mandana: I came now to Sinope to ſave him from the fury of the Flames; and now at this time I do not underſtand of my Princeſs being alive: But to give him ſo much ſatisfaction as to know by what means, and to make the way eaſy unto him to deliver her: For indeed, ſince I have promiſed, I muſt and will keep it: But alas, how can I inform him, that ſhe is in Armenia whilſt I am a cloſe Priſoner? All his Kingdom is not yet ſo abſolutely deſtroyed, but he has ſome diſperſed Troops which he can rally together: There is one part of Aſſyria which does acknowledg his Authority: The one half of Cappadocia is for him; and he may perhaps as ſoon deliver her as Ciaxares, what ſhall I do then? and what ſhall I reſolve upon? But alas, what am I doing, (ſaid he reprehending himſelf) do I conſider and doubt upon a thing which I have promiſed? No, no, waver no longer upon it; and if I deſire that Men ſhould perform their Promiſes with me, let me be ſtedfaſt unto my Word: And alſo, ſince the King of Aſſyria is ſo gallant, let us not give him any cauſe to ſuſpect it, or to ſay the truth, we do but inform him of that which he cannot chuſe but know ere long, it not being poſſible, that the Life and the Priſon of the Princeſs Mandana can be long concealed. Artamenes alſo conſidered that ſince Ciaxares did accuſe him for having intelligence with the King of Aſſyria, he expoſed himſelf unto abſolute deſtruction if ever it were diſcovered; but the fear of any danger was not any reaſon at all to hinder Artamenes for performing what he had promiſed, and therefore he did deſcant no longer upon it. This generous Prince reſolving then to ſend unto Pteria, did look upon Ortalques as upon one whom he knew to be full of Fidelity, and ſince at that time almoſt any one had liberty to viſit him, he loſt not that opportunity; ſo that it was an eaſy matter for him to excuſe his deſign. He ſent then Ortalques unto the King of Aſſyria, after he rewarded him very nobly for the good News he brought unto him, and appointed him to tell that Prince from him, that he advertiſed him, how Mandana was living; that ſhe was in Armenia, not knowing who carried her thither: He deſired him alſo to keep his Word with a Man who is ſo punctual with him in ſo nice a Buſineſs. Ortalques did acquit himſelf of this Commiſſion with as much fidelity as haſte; and going out of the Town under pretence of ſome particular Buſineſs of his own, he went unto Pteria, which is not above a hundred and ſeventy Furlongs from Sinope, where he found the King of Aſſyria ready to depart from thence. This Prince was raviſhed with the Generoſity of Artamenes, and was unexpreſſibly joyful at the certainty of Mandana's Life, for by his Spies which he had in Sinope, by the means of Artaxes, Brother to Aribeus, who always had ſome powerful Friend or other near Ciaxares, he knew of the Shipwrack of Mazares, and the Fears which every one apprehended of the Princeſs being periſhed: He received Ortalques therefore very well, and after he had magnificently rewarded him, Tell Artamenes (ſaid he to him) that the King of Aſſyria cannot promiſe to be his Friend, ſince Fate will have us ever Enemies, but let him aſſure himſelf that the King of Aſſyria will not neglect the rules of Generoſity, and therefore will always keep his Word exactly. But whilſt Ortalques was at Pteria, and came back to Sinope, to give an account of his Voyage unto his Maſter, and acquainted him with the generous Anſwer of the King of Aſſyria: All the Kings and Princes were buſied in obſerving the reſentments of Ciaxares, and contriving which way they could be ſerviceable unto Artamenes: And all the Officers and Souldiers in the Army moved by their own Inclinations, and incited by their chief Commanders, did nothing elſe but ask aloud for Artamenes, that he might be rendred unto them again, elſe they reſolved never to ſtir a Foot again unto any War: Whilſt, I ſay, Ciaxares was yet very irreſolute what to do, though he ſeemed to incline towards ſome indulgency, Chriſantes and Feraulas were very reſtleſs in their Tranſactions; for ſometimes they went to viſit their Maſter; ſometimes they courted all the Princes which had intereſted themſelves in his Fortune: ſometimes they went into the King's Preſence, and very often unto Hidaſpes and Aduſius; ſo that continually beſtirring themſelves, and living between Hopes and Fears, their Souls were never in any Tranquillity. They had a deſign to ſend into Perſia, and advertiſe Cambyſes of the Life of the Prince his Son, and the danger wherein he was, but the diſtance of the place prevented them? Artamenes alſo ſuppoſing ſuch a buſineſs, did expreſly forbid it, telling them, that he would never have the King his Father know he was living, until he might be informed of it without Sorrow: Moreover, he told them that courſe would be abſolutely in vain, and the readieſt way to let Ciaxares know he was Cyrus. Upon an Evening then, when Chriſantes and Feraulas were both together, walking by the Port of Sinope, Artucas came unto them, and deſired them to go along with him unto a place where he would freely entertain them: They knew very well the Affection which Artucas bore unto Artamenes, and remembred how he left Aribeus to become faithful unto his Prince, and were contented to go with him: His Houſe was far off the Port, and therefore leſs conſumed by fire, but was ſtill habitable. As ſoon as they came there, Artucas carried them into a Chamber, and through that into another, where they did find one who at firſt they knew not, for it was dark, and Candles were not yet lighted; they ſaw well ſhe was a Woman of a good Faſhion, and ſeemed to be fair, but yet they could not perceive her Face ſo plainly as to know her: This uncertainty laſted not long, for this Woman no ſooner ſaw them, but leaving the Daughter of Artucas who was with her, and coming towards them, ſhe began to ſpeak, and call them by their Names, to ſignify her Joy ſhe had to ſee them; ſo that the Tone of her Voice no ſooner ſounded in the Ears of Feraulas, but running haſtily to her, Ah Marteſia (cried he out) is it you that ſpeaks? Can I believe that what I think is true? Yes, anſwered ſhe, I am Marteſia, and the very ſame you left me at Themiſcira with the Princeſs Mandana: At theſe words Feraulas tranſported with exceſs of Joy, did again ſalute the Lady which had ſo great a ſhare in his Heart, and had ſo great a confidence in him. Chriſantes for his part, ſo much eſteemed the Vertue of this Woman, that he behaved himſelf towards her with all poſſible Civility But as his Soul was not ſo tender over her, as the Soul of Feraulas was, ſo he was the firſt which asked Marteſia whether or no the Princeſs were at liberty? Alas, wiſe Chriſantes, ſaid ſhe, and ſighed, I would to the Gods ſhe were, or at the leaſt, that your illuſtrious Maſter were not a Priſoner, as I underſtand he is, but that he were in a condition to relieve her. What Joy ſoever Feraulas had to ſee Marteſia, this Tale did leſſen it. But ſince all he thought was not to be ſpoken of before Artucas, or his Daughter, who knew nothing of Artamenes Love unto the Princeſs, Chriſantes and Feraulas did burn with deſire to ask a hundred Queſtions, which they then could not enquire of; and ſhe for her part did anſwer unto many things as ſhe would not have anſwered if they had been by themſelves; However (ſaid Chriſantes) you can aſſure us that the Princeſs is alive? for although Ortalques told us ſo, yet we ſhall be far better ſatisfied to hear you confirm it. Feraulas asked her how they eſcaped the ſhipwrack? Chriſantes would needs tell her how they grieved for the ſuppoſed Death of the Princeſs, and both of them together did make the Diſcourſe ſo interrupted and full of confuſion, that it did but augment their Curioſity: Marteſia deſired Chriſantes and Feraulas to ſalute a very compleat Man who came with her, and was called Orſanes, telling them how he had been both her Guide and Protector. This firſt Diſcourſe was not long, becauſe the Night was late. But Marteſia deſired them to come again to morrow Morning, for ſhe ſhould be very glad to ſpeak with them before ſhe ſaw the King, who yet knew nothing of her return, thinking it fit to inform her ſelf of ſome things before ſhe appeared at Court, or ſhewed her ſelf unto him; and this was the reaſon ſhe came late into Sinope, and deſired to lodg in her Kinſman's Houſe, where ſhe might be welcome, and he having a Daughter which was very fair and vertuous; therefore ſhe conjured them not to ſpeak a word of her return unto any. Chriſantes and Feraulas then left her, and failed not to come the next Morning as Marteſia had appointed them; and would not acquaint Artamenes with her arrival until they knew more Certainties of Mandana, whereby to ſatisfy his Curioſity, his Impatience, and his Love. Marteſia was a Woman of moſt excellent Qualities, and one whoſe Aunt Artucas had married, and therefore ſhe made choice of his Houſe in Sinope. As ſhe had ever been about Mandana, and that Princeſs did always very tenderly love her, ſo ſhe did love her again moſt paſſionately, and could not at all reliſh her liberty, unleſs her Princeſs enjoyed hers alſo; and though perhaps there were ſome in Sinope to whom ſhe had no Averſion, yet ſhe had rather have been captive with her Miſtreſs, than free without her: She ſeemed alſo very melancholy unto Chriſantes and Feraulas, when they came to her in the Morning; and as ſhe knew how to carry things handſomly, ſhe let Artucas underſtand, that ſhe had ſome Buſineſs to impart unto Chriſantes which concerned the Liberty of the Princeſs, and which ſhe had Orders not to reveal unto any but him and Feraulas: So that without ſuſpicion of any thing, ſhe received them privately into her Chamber, without any other Witneſſes but one Woman which waited upon her, who was ſo far off the place where ſhe cauſed Chriſantes and Feraulas to ſit down, that ſhe could not underſtand any thing of their diſcourſe: When then they were come unto her, and the firſt Complements were paſſed, and they ſeated in their places: Alas (ſaid ſhe to them) what ſtrange Alterations do we find ſince the day you parted from Themiſcira to go unto the Maſſagettes? and how ignorant am I of all you have done ſince? only I know that the famous Artamenes has gained ſome Battels, and ſubverted Kingdoms. But O Heavens, when I came hither, and was told that he was in Priſon, how was I ſurprized and ſorrowful? and how ſad the Princeſs would be if ſhe ſhould know of this terrible Alteration? Truely, ſaid ſhe, when I call to memory all that has hapned unto us, and that after all theſe Hurryings away; ſo many Perſecutions; ſo many Wars; ſo many Shipwracks, and ſo many Misfortunes, that Mandana ſhould be a Priſoner in Armenia, and Artamenes a Priſoner in Sinope, I do confeſs unto you, that my Spirits are confounded.

I have learned to deſpair of nothing, ſince after all this I am living, and at Sinope, and with ſome whom I am not ſorry to ſee: You are very good, Marteſia (ſaid Feraulas, interrupting her) to ſay ſo. And you would continue that Goodneſs (ſaid Chriſantes) if you would relate all your Adventures ſince our departure from Themiſcira, and by what ways Philidaſpes brought about his Deſign; why he, being Prince of Aſſyria, appeared only as Philidaſpes; how he treated the Princeſs after he took her away: How Mazares fell in love; how that Prince deceived the other and took her away; how you did during the Shipwrack; how you eſcaped it; and how it comes to paſs the Princeſs is not free; for I do confeſs, this laſt Event is incomprehenſible, and puts all the Court into Amazement. None can imagine who it ſhould be, who has thus ſaved the Princeſs to deſtroy her; nor can any conceive who is that King whereof ſhe ſpeaks, and why ſhe named him not in that Note which we received from her: Therefore, ſweet Marteſia, I do conjure you by the illuſtrious Name of the Princeſs Mandana, and alſo by the name of Artamenes, to tell us exactly all that you know concerning the King of Aſſyria, concerning the Prince of Saces, and concerning the King whom we cannot gueſs. You require ſo many things, ſaid ſhe, in requiring this, that I know not whether I can in a whole day give you that ſatisfaction: I will therefore abbreviate my diſcourſe as much as I can. We do not deſire you ſhould do ſo (replied Feraulas) but on the contrary, we do beſeech you, not to deprive us of one of the Princeſs's Thoughts, for truly Artamenes has need of all the Comforts we can afford him; and we cannot bring him a greater, than to let him know what is become of that Princeſs whom he adores: Therefore I do conjure you, to give us this ſatisfaction, for we are gladly diſpoſed to give you hearing as long as you ſhall pleaſe. But, ſaid Marteſia, do you not think it fit that I ſhould know alſo what has chanced unto you? I will engage my ſelf to tell you all (anſwered he) before we part from hhence, ſo you will firſt ſatisfy our extreamly longing Deſires, to underſtand your Adventures; for as Artamenes has no intereſt which is not mine, ſo I am certain Mandana has none which is not yours. Marteſia ſeeing her ſelf ſo urged, did recollect her Memory, to order the Diſcourſe ſhe intended, into the better Method; and after a little ſilence, ſhe began thus.

The

The Hiſtory of Mandana.

TO make all our Adventures more clear unto you; alſo the Reaſons why the King of Aſſyria did appear in the Cappadocian Court under the Name of Philidaſpes, although his right Name is Labinet ; It is requiſite that I do begin my Story far off, and that I relate the Hiſtory of the Queen Nitocris, and of the Princeſs Iſtrina, Daughter of Gadates, as well as that of Mandana. I doubt not but you wonder to hear me ſpeak ſo preciſely of the Aſſyrian Affairs, and of the particular Relations of two Princes who have the greateſt ſhare in this Hiſtory: But at the end of my Story I ſhall acquaint you by what ways I came to know what I am now going to tell you. Doubtleſs you know that it was the Queen Nitocris, unto whom the Kingdom of Aſſyria did belong; and it was upon this Reaſon, that the Prince her Son had not the Quality of a King, although the King his Father was dead. This great Princeſs was lineally deſcended from the firſt Kings of Aſſyria ; and there never was a Princeſs, ever ſince the great King Ninus and the famous Semiramis, more illuſtrious than ſhe. The King her Father died when ſhe was very young ; and ſhe wore the Crown at an Age, when any other but ſhe had not ſtrength enough to ſupport it ; yet all the Aſſyrians did confeſs that they never knew more Wiſdom and Prudence in any, than ſhe did manifeſt in all her Actions. Yet notwithſtanding, although her own Reaſon was very ripe, ſhe had a Council which was compoſed of the moſt excellent Men of the whole Monarchy, who ſteered Affairs. But ſince, by the Fundamental Law of the State ſhe could not marry any Stranger Prince, ſo all the Aſſyrian Princes were then at Babylon ; and I have heard reported, that this Court was at that time the moſt magnificent of all the World.

As this Princeſs was very Fair, and was Owner of the prime Crown in all Aſia, ſo ſhe moved Paſſions in the Souls of all the Princes which ever ſaw her ; and I have been aſſured, that of all this great number of her Servants, there was not one of them which were not more Amorous than Ambitious. I will not ſtay to tell you with what Wiſdom and Vertue ſhe behaved her ſelf amongſt them; only this I muſt relate, that amongſt the reſt, there were two which ſeemed to be in greateſt hopes to effect their Deſign, more likely than any of the reſt. The firſt was a Prince called Labinet, as he who is now King of Aſſyria is called. The other named Gadates, who at that very time was a Miracle in Beauty, in Handſomneſs, in Valour, in Spirit, in Gallantry, and in Vertue; his Quality was alſo very high, and allied unto the Royal Family. But as for Labinet, although he was nothing ſo accompliſhed, and his good Qualities were more dim, yet he had this Advantage, that he ſtiled himſelf to be deſcended from one of the Children of Sardanapalus, (if it may be called an Advantage to deſcend from ſo bad a Prince) and by Conſequence he pretended to have ſome Right unto the Crown, although he did not at that time openly declare his Pretentions. As the Queen was then very young, ſo ſhe did not conſider this Reaſon of State, and her Soul preferring him which was more accompliſhed, before him that was leſs; therefore her Inclination leaned towards Gadates, who doubtleſs was moſt worthy, both for his rare Qualities, and in reſpect of his Paſſion, ſince they ſay he adored the Queen Nitocris, with as much Purity as Men adore the Gods.

This innocent Paſſion having took root in the Heart of this young Princeſs, who thought ſhe could do nothing more advantagious for her People, than to give them a King whom ſhe knew moſt vertuous; ſhe began to receive the Services of Gadates in ſuch a manner, as this Precedency, above all the reſt of them which were Intereſted, was made known unto them. There needed no more to trouble all the Court, principally by Labinet, who, by reaſon of his Pretentions unto the Crown, was moſt dangerous. Queſtionleſs this Prince had no great Faults in him, although he was not owner of thoſe Heroick Vertues which prefer Men above their own Qualities; ties; yet notwithſtanding, Ambition, and Love together, enflaming his Heart, he talked of nothing but Civil Wars, of Revolt, and Sedition: And truly the Matter was ſo forward, that every one began to bandy Parties. All the diſcontented Lovers made one Faction; Labinet made another by himſelf, followed by ſome ſtirring Spirits; and Gadates had only the Queen on his Side. The young Princeſs ſeeing the Condition of Affairs ſtand ſo, ſhe was extreamly troubled; and after ſhe had well conſulted with her ſelf, that perhaps it might coſt her a great Kingdom, ſhe took a Reſolution which made the greatneſs of her Soul and Vertue to appear: For calling Gadates unto her, who doubtleſs ſhe loved very well, and more than ſhe had ſignified unto him; calling him, I ſay, unto her, to give him a Teſtimony of her Affection, after a new and ſurpriſing manner; Gadates, (ſaid ſhe unto him) I have a deſire to tell you, that which doubtleſs you are ignorant of; at the leaſt I am certain, that I have had ſome care to conceal it from you: Know then (purſued ſhe) that I have thought you worthy to wear the Crown of Aſſyria. Madam, (ſaid he) it becomes the Queen Nitocris too well to take it from her; and he whom ſhe ſhall chuſe for that Honour were unworthy of it, if he ſhould not content himſelf with being only the firſt of her Subjects. Reſerve your Thanks, Gadates, (ſaid ſhe unto him) until the end of my Diſcourſe; for after I have given you this great Teſtimony of my Eſteem, I muſt require another Teſtimony from you of your Affection. If it be to die at your Feet, Madam, (replied he) I am moſt ready to obey you; and I do not know any thing in the World which I would not conſent unto. Obſerve me, I conjure you, to the end; I ask nothing impoſſible. Gadates, who never durſt ſpeak of his Love unto the Queen, was a little ſurprized; yet after this which ſhe ſpoke unto him, he quickly recollected himſelf, and looking upon her with as much Reſpect as Love, Provided, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that your Majeſty do not forbid me to adore you, I ſhall never diſobey you. No, (ſaid ſhe, ſighing) I do not intend that my Authority ſhall extend it ſelf over the Thoughts of the Heart; and though, may be, my Dominion would reach ſo far, yet would I not deſtroy thoſe Thoughts which your Soul has of me: But that which I would tell you is this, That the neceſſity of State-Affairs, and the Good of my People, will not permit me to make my own choice of a Husband; I would have you know, I am reſolved to aſſemble the States-General of my Kingdom, and to receive a Husband by the univerſal Allowance of my Subjects: If they be reaſonable, you may perhaps obtain their Voices, as I would have given you mine, if they would have given me the liberty. But if you cannot procure your ſelf to be choſen by them, then reſolve with your ſelf, Gadates, never to ſee me again as long as you live, but to retire unto that Province which belongs unto you, and never come at this Court.

I will not ſtand, wiſe Chriſantes, to tell you all the Diſcourſe between Gadates, and the Queen Nitocris, nor many other Paſſages which depend upon this Diſcourſe, though they be well worth obſervation, and of much concern; I ſhall only tell you, (to the end I may come unto the more eſſential part of my Diſcourſe) that do what Gadates could, he could obtain no more from her, but liberty to ſollicite the Judges of the Matter.

Then the Queen aſſembled the States-General of her Kingdom, declaring unto them, that ſhe thought upon the Good and Satisfaction of her People, and therefore left them the liberty to chuſe themſelves a King. When all the incenſed Lovers heard of this, they were ſurpriſed at the Declaration; they were raviſhed with the Wiſdom and Vertue of the Queen, and came unto Babylon to ſollicite their Intereſts.

But in concluſion, this powerful Reaſon of State, which would have all Cauſes and Pretences of Civil Wars removed, induced the States-General to beſeech the Queen that ſhe would be pleaſed to marry Labinet; which ſhe accordingly did, without the leaſt ſhew of Repugnancy; and was all her Life extreamly well-pleaſed with her Marriage, and lived very well with her Husband; yet it was her pleaſure that Gadates ſhould obey her, ſhould retire unto his Province, and never return to the Court.

The King, who knew the Buſineſs, and alſo was acquainted with the Vertue of this Princeſs, did much ſollicite her that Gadates might return to Babylon; but ſhe would never conſent unto it.

A while after her Marriage, ſhe ſent Commands unto Gadates, that he mould marry a Princeſs deſcended from the Ancient Kings of Bithynia, who was extreamly Rich, and infinitely Vertuous; which he did, although certainly he did ever preſerve his violent Paſſion to the Queen: He lived as well with the Princeſs his Wiſe, as the Queen did with her Husband.

Mean while Nitocris had a Son, which was he whom you knew ſometimes by the Name of Philidaſpes, ſometimes by the Title of the King of Aſſyria. Gadates had alſo a Son and a Daughter: and as ſoon as they were crept out of their firſt Infancy, the Queen, who was then a Widow, and ſtill forbad Gadates from coming to Court, commanded him to ſend his Children unto her, that his Son who was called Intaphernes, might be brought up with the Prince of Aſſyria; and the young Princeſs his Daughter, called Iſtrina, lived in that Place where there might Love grow between her and her Son, unto whom ſhe had a deſign to marry him, as well to ſatisfy the Law in marrying a Princeſs who was not a Stranger, as to teſtify the Eſteem ſhe had unto Gadates, thinking ſhe could not better, nor more innocently acknowledg thoſe Services which he had done her, than by preferring his Daughter unto the Throne of Aſſyria. It ſeems alſo, that ſhe took not this Reſolution out of Choice only, but out of a Neceſſity alſo; for all of the Princes which had been Pretenders unto the Queen Nitocris, the greateſt part of them were reſolved not to match with him, and the reſt had no Daughters: So that the Princeſs Iſtrina was the only Lady whom the King of Aſſyria could marry.

But here you may well admire how humane Prudence is limited, and how this great Queen, who by ſuch Publick Works is rendred Famous throughout all the World, and ever ſhall be to all Poſterity, was deceived in her Reaſons; and how that which ſhe thought would have cauſed Love, did aſpire the Heart of the young King of Aſſyria with Averſion. The Princeſs Iſtrina was ten Years of Age when ſhe came to Babylon; Intaphernes her Brother fifteen, and the Prince of Aſſyria fourteen: But from that very time the imperious Humour which we ſaw in Philidaſpes began to take beginning and growth. He lived with Intaphernes after ſuch a manner, as made all believe, he would not look upon him hereafter as a Brother-in-Law: He regarded the Princeſs Iſtrina with ſo much indifferency, that every one believed, were it not for fear to diſpleaſe the Queen, the Averſion he had towards her would have appeared more apparently. As for Intaphernes, as he was a Prince very well born, ſo he behaved himſelf with the Prince of Aſſyria, in all ſuch Reſpects as was due, although he had much ado to endure his lofty Humour: yet Ambition, and the Advice of ſuch as had a care over him, cauſed him to be very complacential towards him. The young Princeſs Iſtrina, for her part, ſhe carried it with all the ſweetneſs and civility towards Labinet that can be expreſſed; for though ſhe was very young, yet the Crown of Aſſyria, unto which ſhe hoped ſhe was deſtined, did ſhine ſo bright in her Eyes, that ſhe neglected nothing which might win upon the Heart of that Prince whom ſhe hoped to marry. The Queen for her part contributed all her Endeavours to plant a liking in theſe two young Hearts which ſhe deſired to unite; and to that end ſhe cauſed them to ſee one another very oft; and at all Feaſts and publick Rejoicings, they expoſed themſelves to the People both together; who by their Acclamations and Applauſes, did approve of the Queen's Choice; for I have heard ſay, it was impoſſible for any Eye to behold any fairer Object than the Princeſs Iſtrina. As for the Prince of Aſſyria, we know that he is as well made as a Man can be; Intaphernes alſo, was handſom, and of a good Garb. But do what the Queen could, the Averſion of the Prince her Son did grow with his Age. Some ill-minded Spirits, perſwaded him that Iſtrina was ambitious, and was only complacential towards him, becauſe ſhe would be a Queen, and therefore he accepted of all her Civilities in a rejecting manner: He hated Intaphernes for no other Reaſon, but becauſe he was her Brother; in whom notwithſtanding no fault could be found, for certaiuly ſhe was of a fine Spirit, and her Complexion as lovely a Brown as was in the World.

Mean while, the Prince of Aſſyria having attained unto his eighteenth Year, and the Princeſs Iſtrina Fourteen, the Queen did motion her Son to marry her; but he beſeeched her not to preſs him yet to marry, and told her, that a Prince who never yet was in any War, ought not to think of Marriage. The Queen knowing the violent Humour of the Prince, thought beſt to give a little longer time, and the rather, becauſe in all appearance there was like to be War with the King of Phrygia, who had made ſome Eruptions upon the Frontiers of Aſſyria.

Since this Propoſition, the Prince, who before ſeemed only indifferent, did now change his courſe of Life, and as much as he could poſſible, ſhunned meeting with the Princeſs Iſtrina; and therefore, he uſed to go every day almoſt to hunt, to the end he might not go ſo often unto the Queen: But by ſhunning the company of the Siſter, he could not ſhake off the Brother, for Indaphernes followed him always, which did a little diſpleaſe him: It often chanced, that Intaphernes thinking to get his Eſteem, he encreaſed his Hatred: for as he did not love to be ſurmounted in any thing, ſo the extraordinary expertneſs which Intaphernes had in darting the Javelin, ſhooting in the Bow, and ſuch Activities, did always anger him: One time above the reſt, the Prince ſhot at a Bear, and miſſed, preſently after Intaphernes ſhot, and killed him dead: and the ſame day alſo, the Prince ſhot at a Lion, and miſſed; but Intaphernes killed him immediately: The Prince was ſo much angred at this Adventure, that he could not commend him for it, but gave out ſome bitter Expreſſions againſt the Action: for as ſome could not forbear commending him, Stay, (ſaid he to the Man) and keep your exceſs of Commendations until we have been both together in the Wars of Phrygia: for in my Opinion there is more honour in killing of a Man who can defend himſelf, than in killing a Beaſt which runs away. Intaphernes did not hear what the Prince ſaid, although he was very near; but ſome or other having told him afterwards, his Spirit was a little exaſperated; and upon this Paſſage did riſe a Report, which ſpread among ſtrange Nations, that the Prince of Aſſyria killed him at that hunting. The ſame Report, with as little truth in it, took the Son of Gadates for the Son of Gobrias; though the Truth was only as I tell you.

Mean while, the Queen, ſeeing the Phrygian Affairs were protracted, did again preſs the Prince to marry Iſtrina, and imployed Mazares, Prince of Saces, who was then in Court, to perſwade him unto it, for the Prince of Aſſyria loved him very dearly. Mazares, according to his Inſtructions and Commiſſion, asked him from whence this Averſion unto that Marriage which was propounded unto him did proceed? for, truly, ſaid he to him, the Princeſs Iſtrina is very fair. 'Tis true, (anſwered he) but ſhe is not ſuch a one as can reach my Heart. Why, ſaid Mazares, ſhe is of a ſweet and complacential Diſpoſition as you can deſire. If ſhe were a little more fierce, (replied the Prince of Aſſyria) ſhe would pleaſe me more. But do you not confeſs, (replied Mazares) that ſhe is one of an excellent Spirit, and much Virtue? I believe the latter, (anſwered he) but for the other, ſince ſhe knows not how to move my Heart, I think I may be permitted to leave it diſputable. But after all this, added Mazares, you are not at liberty to chuſe, for the Princeſs Iſtrina is the only Lady whom by the Laws of this State you can marry throughout your whole Kingdom: for my part I know not why you ſhould not like her, and why you ſhould not eſteem your ſelf happy in ſuch a Wife, ſince ſhe is Fair, Sweet, Sprightly, and Vertuous. Ah, Mazares, ſaid the Prince of Aſſyria, this fatal Neceſſity is the cauſe why I cannot endure the Princeſs Iſtrina. Yes, Mazares, I do confeſs, ſince you will know it, that this Princeſs has much Beauty, Sweetneſs, Spirit, and Vertue; But for all that, although I confeſs ſhe is very Amiable, yet I cannot love her, nor ever ſhall. No, Mazares, Kings which are above the Liberty of other Men, ought not to be deprived of the Liberty to chuſe a Wife: It is a Law which my predeceſſors have eſtabliſhed, but which I cannot obſerve, eſpecially in ſuch a juncture of Time, where there is none to chuſe, or where there is ſuch a Neceſſity, that if I will marry an Aſſyrian Princeſs, I muſt marry Iſtrina. For although that Gobrias have a Daughter, yet the Aſſyrians make a difference between his Countrey and Ours; and moreover he is rather my Vaſſal than my Subject: and I am moſt certain, (added this violent Prince) that if the Law of the State, and the Queen's Commands would not force me to love the Princeſs Iſtrina againſt my Will, I ſhould never love her. And I do confeſs unto you, that ſince I muſt not chuſe, I cannot love her, and the Prince of Aſſyria ſhall never be captivated with any thing in the World, ſince he ought to be free. But (ſaid Mazares unto him) Kings do not uſe to marry as other Men do, and it does not much import whether they love or not love thoſe they marry. The Aſſyrians demand a Queen from you; ſatisfy them in their Demands, and beſtow your Heart upon none but whom you pleaſe. My Heart (replied the Prince, ſmiling) is a thing which I eſteem more precious than to beſtow it upon any but a Queen: ſo that Mazares, if I ſhould chance to love one who is not a Queen, I will reſerve unto my ſelf, the liberty to give her a Crown, therefore let us ſpeak no more of it; and if you love me, act ſo in my behalf, that the Queen may not be offended at my Diſobedience. The Prince Mazares indeed, did uſe his beſt endeavours to perſwade Nitocris, but there was no way to make her think well of her Son's Diſobedience; She whom all the World did look upon with high eſteem, and who would leave unto her Son the moſt flouriſhing State in all Aſia. Then ſhe thought good to take from her Son this pretence of War with the King of Phrygia. When the Prince knew that, and not being able to hinder it, he did think that Peace would be no ſooner publiſhed, but they would preſs Marriage upon him; So that not knowing what Pretence to find out, did bethink himſelf, to do what he could, in cauſing ſome other young Prince to be in love with the Princeſs Iſtrina; amongſt the reſt he pitched upon Mazares, and extreamly preſſed him unto it: My dear Mazares, (ſaid I to him) let me intreat you to love Iſtrina for the love of me; doubtleſs you have much diſpoſition unto it already; for you have told me ſhe is Fair, of an excellent Spirit, and great Vertue: Why then do you not love her? Becauſe (anſwered Mazares) that fatal Minute wherein my Deſtinies will have me begin to love is not yet come; and becauſe the Queen will not ſuffer it; and becauſe the Princeſs Iſtrina will not favourably look upon me. After he had, and all in vain, tormented Mazares, he went unto another, whom they ſaid was really in love with her, and durſt not tell it, and who durſt not ſo much as acknowledg it unto the Prince, nor accept of thoſe Aſſiſtances which he offered him, out of his reſpect unto the Queen Nitocris, and Princeſs whom he loved; for indeed the Prince of Aſſyria, offered then no leſs than to take her away from them, and reſiſt them in the moſt violent and unjuſt Courſes.

Seeing then that this Invention would not take, he took a perverſe reſolution to cauſe the Princeſs Iſtrina to hate him; and ſince he knew ſhe loved her Brother very dearly, he carried himſelf very coldly towards him: One evening then, when they had nothing to do but ſtay for him who went to ſign the Articles of Peace with the King of Phrygia, the King of Aſſyria being gone out to walk upon the Banks of the River Euphrates, Intaphernes followed, with many others, and as they were of that Age which is moſt pleaſant for the Converſation of Ladies, Mazares ſaid, that thoſe Beauties which were inclined to flaxen Hair, did moſt move his Heart; and Intaphernes aſſured him, that the Brown had greateſt influence in his Phancy. For my part, ſaid the Prince of Aſſyria, I yet neither loved Flaxen nor Brown, but if ever I love any, I do not think it will be that which Intaphernes loves. Love, Sir, (replied this Prince) will not give us leave to chuſe, and perhaps you may find his Tyranny in concluſion. Love (replied this Imperious Prince) may perhaps, as you ſay, become my Conqueror; but I am very much deceived, if I be overcome by Aſſyrian Beauties: And I can tell you there are very Glorious ones in Babylon (replied Intaphernes when he was alone with him, ſome twelve paces from the Company.) Yes, (anſwered he with a malicious Smile) but ſince the Princeſs Iſtrina cannot vanquiſh me, I fear none elſe, and I am well aſſured of my Liberty in Babylon. My Siſter (anſwered Intaphernes, with much reſpect) has not ſo good an Opinion of her Beauty, as to pretend unto ſuch an Illuſtrious Conqueſt. But, Sir, that which her Charms cannot do, it is not impoſſible but others may, who have more attractive Power than ſhe, and who beſide their Merit, may perhaps have better Fortune. It is very true (replied the Prince of Aſſyria, very fiercely) ſhe is not very fortunate in her Deſigns, and ſhe has reaſon to complain of her Fate, that ſhe has not gotten a Crown, which, as ſhe thinks, ſhe deſerves. I know not, Sir, (anſwered Intaphernes, a little ſharply) why you ſhould ſpeak thus unto me; but I know very well that the Houſe from whence I am deſcended, has more times than once given Queens unto the Aſſyrian Kings: and therefore when my Siſter, by the Queen's Command, hoped for the like Honour, ſhe did no more than what was reaſonable. Fortune, Intaphernes, (replied this violent Prince) is not always blind in her Gifts; ſometimes ſhe gives them with choice; and I am certain, that ſhe ſhall never by my hand humorouſly beſtow any Crown, nor ſhall ever by me, ſet ſuch upon the Throne, who ought not to look upon it but with a trembling eye. In other Kingdoms (anſwered Intaphernes) they ſay, the Prince is above the Laws; but in Aſſyria, the Laws are uſed to be above the Prince, whoſe Glory it is to be ſubject unto them: and upon this Reaſon, Subjects as my Siſter, need not to tremble in looking upon that Throne whereon they may ſit. When Subjects, as your Siſter, ſhall live under the Reign of ſuch a Prince as I, (replied he) they will better learn what they ought to do than yet ſhe knows; and they will then ſee that Reaſon is ſtronger than the Laws, and that without Injuſtice they may be broken, when the Law is found unjuſt. Learn Intaphernes (purſued he) not to truſt too much unto the Law, and renounce all thoſe Priviledges which you think it gives you, and content your ſelf with that Alliance which you have had heretofore with the Kings of Aſſyria, and believe that if ever I reign, you ſhall never have any new Alliance. May be (replied Interphernes) that before the Queen Nitocris has left you the Crown, you may change your Mind. I underſtand you very well (anſwered the Prince of Aſſyria) you think becauſe I reign not yet, that you are almoſt my equal. But Intaphernes, undeceive your ſelf, and I'll begin to let you know there is ſome difference betwixt you and me, I command you to retire, and to ſee me no more; if you will not, you will expoſe your ſelf to find but courſe Entertainment. O Sir, replied Intaphernes, Perſons of my Quality ought not to be thus uſed. I know not whether they ought to be (anſwered the Prince of Aſſyria) but I know very well, that if Intaphernes do not obey me, and that without murmuring, I ſhall give an Example unto Princes which ſucceed me. Yes, Sir (replied Intaphernes in retiring himſelf) I will obey you, but it ſhall be more out of the Reſpect I bear unto the Son of the Queen Nitocris, then out of fear to be ill entertained, ſince Princes that have the Heart of Intaphernes, are confident that none ſhall do them Wrong unpuniſhed. The Prince of Aſſyria by good fortune did not hear theſe laſt words, and there was none but Mazares which heard them.

At his depatnre from thence, Intaphernes went to take his leave of the Queen, who would not give it. The Princeſs Iſtrina, for her part, being infinitely offended for the ill Treatment of her Brother, ſince it was in her behalf, did beſeech Nitocris to ſend him to her Father, but the Queen denied her, as well as Intaphernes; always telling them, that her Son would change his Mind with his Years, and that ſhe would order him ſo to do: mean while ſhe was extream angry at him, and could not chuſe but ſhew it; ſo that the Prince coming to know of it, and he which went into Phrygia, reporting the Articles of Peace to be ſigned, he took a Reſolution to leave the Court of Aſſyria, and that way deliver himſelf from the Perſecution which he ſuffered, and to travel unknown, until the Queen his Mother had altered her Mind, or that the Princeſs Iſtrina was married. He departed then the next Morning, which was a publick day of rejoycing for the Peace of Phrygia, and carried with him only three of his Servants, amongſt which, there was one of them a Man of Quality, and of the ſame Houſe from which, they ſay, Aribeus is deſcended, at that time when Cappadocia was under the Power of the Aſſyrians. I will hold you no longer to tell you the Voyages of that Prince, who, upon his going from Babylon, took upon him the Name of Philidaſpes; only this I muſt tell you, that after he had been in many Courts of Aſia, he came at the laſt unknown unto Sinope, upon that day wherein a Sacrifice was offered in the Temple of Mars, for the Death of young Cyrus, a little before the Pontean and Bithynian War.

But (ſaid Chriſantes, then interrupting her) was the day of that Sacrifice, the firſt day that the Prince of Aſſyria, under the Name of Philidaſpes, did ſee the Princeſs Mandana?

It was ſo, replied Marteſia, and it was that day alſo on which he fell in love, as well as the illuſtrious Artamenes. You may ſuppoſe, that after this unto his firſt deſign of taking away the Princeſs Mandana, the execution whereof Artamenes endeavoured to hinder, I have little to tell you concerning him, ſince you have been Witneſſes of the ſecret Jealouſy which moved them to hate one another; therefore I will not inſiſt upon the violent Paſſion of Philidaſpes, nor his Jealouſy, nor any thing which his Love produced in his Heart; yet I muſt tell you of ſome things which you could not know. How that this Man who accompanied Philidaſpes, and was deſcended from the ſame Houſe of Aribeus, made himſelf known unto him, and alſo preſented Philidaſpes unto him as a Man of Quality, who deſired to travel unknown, deſiring him to be favourable unto him; and preſent him unto the King of Cappadocia. This was the chief reaſon which moved Aribeus to protect Philidaſpes, and to preſent him unto Ciaxares and Mandana a few days before the King went from Sinope to the Wars: Mean while, Love being chief Commander in the Heart of the Prince of Aſſyria, and he finding an opportunity of a War in Cappadocia, he reſolved to ſtay in that Court, and live in ſuch a manner as you know very well.

But I would gladly know (amiable Marteſia, ſaid Feraulas) why the Prince of Aſſyria did not make his Love known unto the Princeſs Mandana, ſince he had not the ſame Reaſons to conceal it which Cyrus had?

He had partly the ſame Reaſons (replied ſhe); for indeed the auſtere Vertue of the Princeſs reſtrained him alſo, as well as it did Artamenes; alſo he was not ignorant that Ciaxares would never conſent that his Daughter, who was to be Queen of Media, ſhould marry him: for doubtleſs you are not ignorant, how ſince the illuſtrious Deioces did ſet his Country at liberty, and delivered it from the Tyranny of the Aſſyrian Kings, there has been an irreconcileable Hatred betwixt thoſe two People; and that all the People would revolt from Aſtyages if he ſhould ever give his Conſent unto this Alliance. The Prince of Aſſyria then durſt not ſpeak of his Love, unleſs he made himſelf known; and he durſt not make himſelf known, for fear he ſhould be hated and denied, as well for the Reaſons aforeſaid, as becauſe the Laws, both of Aſſyria and Cappadocia, did forbid the Banes. He thought then that his only courſe was, to get ſo good an Opinion in the Mind of the Princeſs, as might obtain his Pardon when he ſhould take her away, as he deſigned; but to execute this, he imagined that his abſolute beſt way was to make Aribeus for him and his Deſign: and ſince he had obſerved in ſeveral private Diſcourſes, that Aribeus was very paſſionately affected unto the Aſſyrian Nation, and that he could almoſt wiſh the Cappadocians were under their ancient Lords; he diſcovered himſelf unto him, and made him apprehend, that he could never find out a more innocent way to bring the Cappadocians under the Aſſyrian Power, than by favouring his Enterprize: You may well imagine, by conſidering the Actions of Aribæus ſince this time, that he hearkened unto the Propoſition, and conſented unto it, and alſo promiſed Philidaſpes to ſerve him in all things. This Prince diſcovered himſelf unto him a little after the taking of Ceſarea; and they reſolved that Philidaſpes ſhould make ſure of ſome ſtrong Place in Aſſyria for his Retreat, when he ſhould carry away the Princeſs Mandana; and not daring to think of carrying her unto the Court of Queen Nitocris, conſidering the manner how he parted from her: But ſince the buſineſs required ſome time, he reſolved upon Patience, and for a while to defer the execution of his Deſign; yet he was in hopes of happy ſucceſs, for he did believe, that when he had took the Princeſs Mandana away, then the Queen Nitocris would authoriſe his Enterprize, ſince it would add three Kingdoms unto Aſſyria; and as for the Law, he thought that it might well admit of a favourable Conſtruction, by ſaying the Princeſs of Cappadocia was no Stranger, ſince the Kingdom where ſhe was born, did legally belong to him. He ſent then unto the Governour of a Town which is ſome eight days Journey from Babylon, called Is, and which is ſcituated upon a River of the ſame Name, to the end he might ſuborn him, and oblige him to be faithful unto him. But whilſt theſe things were in contriving, you were a witneſs of all the Paſſages both in Court and Army, between theſe two Illuſtrious Rivals; and I have nothing to tell you, until after the two Battels which Artamenes gained in one day; by one of which, you know, he took the King of Pontus Priſoner, and afterwards all the World believed him dead: But now in this place I muſt tell you, that Feraulas (before whom I ſpeak) did perhaps haſten the execution of this firſt Plot to take away the Princeſs Mandana, some Months ſooner than otherwiſe it would.

Yea, amiable Marteſia, ſaid he, and interrupted her!

Yes, you did, anſwered ſhe; for when you thought your Maſter was dead, in the violence of your Sorrows you could not forbear crying out in the preſence of Philidaſpes, Alas, poor Prince! muſt ſo glorious a Life laſt no longer? he told me afterwards at Babylon, that then he ſtopp'd you, and asked you whether your Maſter was in that Condition? that you feigned the exceſs of your Sorrows made you ſpeak one word for another, but yet that did not hinder him from ſuſpecting that the matter was as you had ſaid.

It is very true (replied Feraulas) I remember that I committed this Error, and that in my extream Sorrow wherein then I was, in the extream Joy I was in afterwards for the Reſurrection of my dear Maſter, I had abſolutely loſt my Memory. Feraulas, having done ſpeaking, and Chriſantes deſiring him to interrupt Marteſia no more; ſhe purſued her Diſcourſe.

At the return of Artamenes and Philidaſpes unto Sinope, the Jealouſy of the laſt did increaſe, and he being aſſured from the Governour of the Town of Is, that he ſhould be received when he pleaſed, he thought upon nothing but ripening and acting his Deſign: he ſaw alſo that he could never have a more favourable opportunity; for there being now a likelihood of Peace, he conceived that he ſhould need no more Troops than he already had, ſince he had four thouſand Men about the Town, which were under his Command, and a Caſtle to retire unto, to give a colour for his not being at Sinope, whilſt Aribeus was tranſacting his Plot. I believe you have not forgot how a Letter which this Prince writ, fell into the hands of Artamenes, and both diſcovered and prevented this Conſpiracy; but you do not know how he which loſt this Letter, coming unto Aribeus, and not finding it about him, was extreamly ſurpriſed, and confeſſed that he feared the Man with whom he had fought had found it; neither do you know how Aribeus, knowing that Artamenes had been with the Princeſs and the King, went afterwards and changed the Guards, and ſent to advertiſe Philidaſpes, who after he had in the night-time diſperſed his four thouſand Men, which he had under the Caſtle, in lieu of flying, as all the World believed he did, went unto Pteria, where Aribeus was Governour, and there did lie concealed, reſolving to wait there for a more favourable opportunity. It was for the love of him that Aribeus was ſo deſirous to remove Artamenes from the Court, ſince he was ſo great an Obſtacle unto his Deſign, and therefore he propounded unto Ciaxares, to ſend him unto the Queen of the Maſſagettes, to the end he might more eaſily execute his Deſign during his abſence. There happened one Chance which much croſſed him, and which made him almoſt deſpair, and made him loſe much time: it was this, As ſoon as Artamenes was gone his Voyage, Philidaſpes underſtood that the Governour of that Town of Is, unto which he was to retreat, was dead, ſo that he muſt ſeek out another Sanctuary before he could attempt any thing, which took up ſo much time, that he could not act his Deſign until Artamenes was expected back again, of whom they heard no News ſince his Departure. The Governour of the Town of Opis, which ſtands upon the River Tygris, being then ſuborned, and Aribeus alſo having corrupted one of my Companions named Arianta, and made for him almoſt all the Guards of the Princeſs, he did execute his Deſign at Themiſcira, where Philidaſpes was come without any danger, for he ſtirred not but in the Night, and was ſo much diſguiſed for this purpoſe, that he was not knowable. Now Chriſantes, I am come unto that part of my Relation which is altogether unknown unto you; but I beſeech you imagine how the Princeſs was ſurprized when ſhe ſaw Philidaſpes take her away, you have heard, I ſuppoſe, how I followed my dear Miſtreſs, in ſpite of thoſe which took her away. I will not ſtay you ſo long, as to relate how we left the Boat into which they put us, nor how we found Horſes ready on the other ſide of the River, nor which Road we took, nor who was the Guide; I will only tell you that juſt at break of Day, we encamped within a Wood, under a Tent which was ſet up, and neither the Princeſs nor I had ſpoke one ſyllable, nor were capable of underſtanding one ſyllable of all that Philidaſpes ſaid unto us, ſo much was her Soul and Mind ſunk with Sorrow; and I think that ſince the Princeſs in the firſt rapture of her Sorrow, cried out unto Philidaſpes, that, If Artamenes were at Themiſcira, he durſt not have attempted this Enterprize, ſhe ſpoke not one word at all: But after we were in the Tent, and the Princeſs, half dead, did ſit down on a Cuſhion, which was laid upon a Foot-cloth that covered all the ground of the Tent; and as I ſtood by her as well as Arianta, who did counterfeit her Sorrow admirably well. Philidaſpes, after he had placed his Guards and Sentinels for moſt Security, came and caſt himſelf at her Feet, and looking upon her with as much Submiſſion as he had Audacity in taking her away; I know very well, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that Philidaſpes is not only raſh, but the Prince of Aſſyria alſo is moſt bold, and deſerves to be puniſhed for thus offering you one of the moſt illuſtrious Crowns in the World; Yes, Divine Princeſs, I do ſo much prize your Vertue above you Quality, that I do confeſs the greateſt King in the World cannot pretend unto the Honour of your Love, without too great a Preſumption. But, Madam, ſince the Gods have ſet you above all the Kings upon the Earth; and that none can preſume to enjoy you without an Injury; I thought that I might as well as any other, aſpire unto this happy Boldneſs which the Gods have deſtined you unto; I am perhaps leſs worthy of it than ſome others in conſideration of my ſelf; but I am, it may be, as much deſerving as others in reſpect of that Crown I am to wear, and more than any other in reſpect of my Paſſion to you; ſo that, Madam, how unjuſt ſoever I am, I may perhaps merit ſome Compaſſion, eſpecially if you will but be pleaſed to know, that I have done nothing, but what I could not hinder my ſelf from. For truly, if there had been any other way to advance my hopes unto the Honour which I pretend to, I ſhould never have taken this: but you know, Madam, that tho I ſhould have been ſo happy as not to be deſpiſed in your Eſteem, yet Ciaxares nor Aſtyages would ever have conſented unto that Propoſition which I ſhould have made; what then would you have a Prince do who lov'd and adored you? and who muſt either have Mandana or Death? Death (replied the Princeſs in much Anger) had been a choice more juſt and fit for you; for if you love Mandana, ſhe will render your Life more cruel unto you than your Death would be. Perhaps, Madam, (replied he) that when you ſee me continually at your Feet, with unequalled ſubmiſſion, my Tears and my Sighs may move you to compaſſion. No, no, (ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him) never expect any thing, either from Time, or Tears, or Sighs, or Submiſſions, or any thing elſe, the Heart of Mandana ſhall never be won that way; your Crime is ſo far from being waſhed away by your Tears, that your Blood can never do it: Therefore, Philidaſpes, (for ſo bad an Action, deſerves no better Title) expect from henceforward, that my hate of you which began at Sinope, ſhall encreaſe every minute: This ſhall be the progreſs of my Soul, and believe it, I will not ſtop it as long as I am a Captive: Therefore, if there be yet any Spark remaining in your Mind, which your unjuſt Paſſion has not extinguiſhed; know, that it will be much more advantagious for you to repent of your Crime, and ſet me at Liberty, than thus to continue me your Priſoner: We are not yet ſo far off Themiſcira, but you may eaſily do it, and I will engage my Word to move the King my Father not to reſent this Affront: I will promiſe you, that the Hatred which began to grow in my Heart, ſince the firſt time you deſigned to take me away, ſhall vaniſh, and I ſhall think my ſelf obliged unto you; if for the love of me you will ſurmount your ſelf, I ſhall then believe you love me really; whereas, if you will not be perſwaded by my Reaſons, I ſhall believe that your own Intereſt, not mine, does prompt you to this Action; and that ſince you have no Subject of your own who is owner of any Crowns, you refuſe them, and marry rather out of Ambition than Love. Moreover, do not ground any Hopes, becauſe I do not rail againſt you for the Injury, my Mouth, Philidaſpes, is not accuſtomed unto it: Neither do I know in what Terms to ſpeak unto thoſe which injure me, ſince till now I never was wronged: But I am moſt certain, that I apprehend the Injury you do me, as a Princeſs of a great Soul ought to do; and without ſuffering my ſelf to be tranſported by any unprofitable Violence, I can extreamly hate you; alſo I can unalterably reſolve never to be moved, neither with your Reſpects, your Services, your Tears, your Sighs, your Menaces, nor by Death it ſelf, if you put me to it.

Once more, Philidaſpes, bethink your ſelf, if you can repair your Fault, and conſider, that nothing can be more unreaſonable, than to commit an unprofitable Crime: Think into what a Condition you are putting all Cappadocia, all Media, and all Aſſyria; or indeed to ſay truly, all Aſia, into what an affrighting diſorder it will be brought; for aſſuredly Aſtyages and Ciaxares, will not endure this Wrong without Revenge, and all the Kings their Allies will be engaged in the Quarrel: Fear, Philidaſpes, tremble, leſt you ſhould be drowned in that River of Blood which you ſhall cauſe to be ſpilt: For there are Gods, and Gods that are juſt, and will revenge: Gods, I ſay, that will defend oppreſſed Innocents, and are declared Enemies unto unjuſt Princes: But is it poſſible Philidaſpes, that the Queen Nitocris, who is a moſt illuſtrious Princeſs, does know of this unjuſt Deſign? Can it be poſſible to find one in the World that would adviſe you to it? No, Madam, (replied Philidaſpes) none gave me any Counſel in it, I did not ſo much as conſult with my own Reaſon; it was Love only which was my Adviſer in the Enterpriſe: But, Madam, it is now too late to adviſe Philidaſpes unto Repentance: your glorious Eyes, incenſed though they be, does command me not to hearken unto your Words, but confirms me in my Deſigns. Ah, alas, if it be ſo, ſaid the Princeſs, I forbid you to look upon me, and I for my part will never look upon you again. Go, Philidaſpes, go, go out of the Tent, and enter no more, unleſs you will augment your Crime. Go out and walk in the Woods, I ſay, and conſult with your Reaſon, if you have any: Call unto your Aſſiſtance your Generoſity, and dim not that Honour and Glory whereof you ſeem ſo amorous and jealous. The Glory, Madam, which I did and ever ſhall aim at, is to ſet you upon the Throne of Aſſyria, and to ſee you command in the moſt ſtately Town in the World: Therefore, Madam, I think it but juſt to put all Aſia in Arms, ſince Mandana is of higher Merit than to be obtained without leſs trouble. Perhaps, when you ſee me in the Head of two hundred thouſand Men, you will change your Mind, and be upon better Terms with me than you are with Philidaſpes, whom you thought to be no more than a common Cavalier, and who paſſed in your Conceit for a Man much inferior to your Quality: But, Madam, upon all Occaſions wherein Fortune ſhall ſmile upon me, and when I have conquered all thoſe Kings who you ſay will engage themſelves in your Quarrel; I ſhall then deſcend out of my Chair of Triumph, to proſtrate at your Feet, my Self, and all thoſe Palms wherewith they ſhall crown me. Ah, Philidaſpes, (ſaid the Princeſs) I had rather ſee you in your Grave, than in your Chair of Triumph, after you have vanquiſhed my Father. Madam, (replied he) you may if you will prevent the War; and thoſe Eyes, thoſe fair Eyes which you ſo conceal from me, or elſe inſenſibly glance them, make my Arms fall out of my Hands, if they but look ſmilingly upon me.

I ſhall never end, if I ſhould tell you that which Philidaſpes ſpoke (wiſe Chriſantes); But in concluſion, the Princeſs being out of all patience, and ſeeing all ſhe had ſaid was in vain, did then command him to go out of the Tent, by ſuch an abſolute Authority, that he obeyed her. I muſt needs ſay thus much for Philidaſpes, that although he was very haſty, and did many things very violently, yet he never failed in his reſpects unto the Princeſs: After he was gone out, we remained by our ſelves. Philidaſpes cauſed ſomething to be preſented unto Mandana for her to eat, but ſhe would not touch a Bit: Yet we were not all this while he was out of the Tent, at handſom freedom; for though we did not yet know that Arianta had betrayed her, yet the Princeſs had never any confidence in her, and for my part ſhe was never any of my Friends; yet the Princeſs, in this deplorable ſtate, did make me know, ſhe remembred Artamenes. She ſpent all that Day, which was Night unto us, in lamenting her Misfortune, and praying unto the Gods to avert it. When Night was come, they told us we muſt be gone; and it was with much ado that I moved the Princeſs to eat ſomething. Madam, (ſaid I to her, in a low Voice) Artamenes can perhaps fetch you out of the Hands of a Prince, who is accuſtomed to vanquiſh, but he cannot fetch you out of your Grave if you be once there. 'Tis true, Marteſia, (ſaid ſhe to me) but how can I live in ſuch a miſerable condition? It becomes the greateſt Souls (ſaid I unto her) to endure the greateſt Misfortunes with moſt conſtancy. Ah, Marteſia, (cried ſhe) that Conſtancy ſhould be ſuch a difficult Vertue? It is a deceitful Vertue alſo, which commonly never calms my Eyes and Face, but it leaves my Heart full of cruel Agitations. Indeed, Sir, I ſpoke ſo earneſtly unto her, that I conſtrain'd her to eat, and preſently after they conſtrained us to depart: We marched in this manner three Nights, before Mandana would permit Philidaſpes to ſpeak a word unto her; but in the end of the third Night, as we were in the Tent, and I, according to the direction of Mandana, looking whether Philidaſpes was out of the reach of hearing what ſhe ſaid, we heard a great Noiſe, and preſently a Servant of Philidaſpes came unto us, and cauſed us immediately to depart, not giving us any time at all. Since we heard a great Noiſe, ſome thirty or forty Paces off us, and did not ſee Philidaſpes, the Princeſs did imagine, that perhaps it was ſome Relief was coming to them; and by reaſon of that Imagination, we uſed all means poſſible, both by Prayers and Promiſes, and alſo ſtriving not to go ſo faſt away as they cauſed us to go; but all would not do, for a part of them which guarded us, were ſuch as never could hope for Pardon, if thoſe Orders which they received were not exactly obeyed. So they carried us to a place where we found a Coach which ſtaid for us, and with a Convoy of fifty Horſes; we ſtaid there for Philidaſpes, who came preſently after unto us.

Here Chriſantes could not forbear telling Marteſia, what Obſtacle Philidaſpes did then meet with; and how Artamenes ſaw her at the entry of the Tent, but knew her not; how he relieved Philidaſpes; how he killed thoſe which ſet upon him; and how he contributed to the carrying away of Mandana. At this Diſcourſe, Marteſia cried mainly out with wonder; and after ſhe had ſufficiently teſtified her aſtoniſhment at ſuch an extraordinary Paſſage, ſhe continued her Relation.

I will not ſtay, (ſaid ſhe) ſince I have related unto you this ſtrange Combat; and which doubtleſs the King of Aſſyria would not have kept from Mandana, but becauſe he would not thereby occaſion the memory of Artamenes in Mandana's Mind: I will not ſtay, I ſay, to repeat all our Complaints during our ſad Voyage; nor with what obſtinateneſs Mandana denied ſpeaking with Philidaſpes; only this, that at laſt we came to the Town of Opis, where we were lodged in a very magnificent Chamber; and where Philidaſpes neglected nothing which might render our Impriſonment leaſt offenſive: But to tell you truly, all his care was in vain, and the Princeſs's Sorrow was ſo violent,that nothing could moderate it.

Mean while Philidaſpes thought, that if he could move the Queen his Mother to favour the Matter, and that ſhe would receive the Princeſs Mandana unto her, then things would go according to his Hearts deſire; for he made no queſtion but if the Queen Nitocris would take her in hand, ſhe would gain him the Heart of the Princeſs. He alſo believed, that if ſhe did but once ſee Mandana, ſhe would preſently alter her Deſign of his Marriage with Iſtrina, for the Princeſs of Cappadocia; and indeed, he ſent one of his Men ſecretly to Babylon unto the Prince of Saces who was yet in that Court; the Queen Nitocris having ſtaid him there ever ſince the abſence of her Son. For beſides the good eſteem which ſhe had of him, he was Nephew unto her, the Queen Iarinas his Mother (an Excellent and Vertuous Princeſs) being Siſter unto the late King of Aſſyria her Huſband. He writ then unto Mazares, to the end he might preſent what he writ uno his Mother the Queen, and forward his Deſires. This Prince, by his Letter which he writ unto this Princeſs, did ask her pardon for departing from the Court without her leave; he deſired her to forget it, and that ſhe would be pleaſed to think well of his bringing the Princeſs of Cappadocia unto her, and that by her good Conſent he might marry her.

Then he laid open unto her all the Reaſons which might induce her to approve of it, and forgot nothing that might win her Approbation. But the return of the Meſſenger did not bring him all the ſatisfaction he expected; for he underſtood, that the ſame day he arrived at Babylon, there alſo arrived an Embaſſador from Ciaxares, to demand of the Queen Nitocris the Princeſs of Cappadocia; and that the Queen did diſallow of the Act, and that ſhe her ſelf would be the firſt which would take up Arms to reſtore him the Princeſs his Daughter; that when ſhe read the Letter which the Prince of Aſſyria had writ unto her, ſhe could not forbear expreſſing her ſelf, that ſhe was willing he ſhould bring Mandana unto Babylon, but it ſhould only be to reſtore her unto Ciaxares. Yet Mazares uſed his beſt endeavours to procure the Queen's Conſent unto it, but all were in vain: and he ſent unto the Prince of Aſſyria, to adviſe him, not to bring the Princeſs, whom he had taken away, unto Babylon, becauſe he underſtood the Queen had promiſed Ciaxares, by the Ambaſſador who was returned, never to conſent unto the Marriage, but to uſe all poſſible means to ſend her unto the King of Media her Father. And indeed, if Mazares had not put her into ſome hopes, that it were more eaſy to get her out of the Hands of her Son by Policy than Power, ſhe had armed all Aſſyria againſt him.

Mean while we were in the City of Opis, treated with all poſſible Civility; although Mandana uſed all imaginable Averſion and Severity againſt the Prince of Aſſyria; for ſhe did not only forbear ſpeaking any thing which might pleaſe him, but ſhe would not ſpeak at all unto him, and ſometimes ſhe would not ſo much as ſuffer the ſight of him; yet Philidaſpes did as much as poſſibly he could deviſe to qualify her Averſion; and ſince he ſaw ſhe did me the honour to love me, what did he not do and ſay to move me unto his Aſſiſtance? But ſay or do what he could, I could not promiſe any thing, and told him that all the Grandure upon Earth ſhould not move me to fail in my Duty unto the Princeſs. Yet ſince I feared the extream Rigour of Mandana might exaſperate the Mind of this Prince, and put him upon ſome unjuſt Deſign, I did permit him ſometimes to ſpeak unto me of his Love, and of his Deſpair. Indeed, I do think it was not amiſs, to prevent any deſperate Reſolutions in him, conſidering the violence of his Love and Humour. Sometimes he would ſpeak unto me concerning his Love of Mandana, with as much Reverence as is conceivable: and ſometimes again, he would be ſo violent, and ſpeak ſo, as made me fear he was capable of ſome deſperate Deſtiny. But when I diſcovered his Mind ſo inclin'd, Sir, ſaid I unto him, take heed what you ſay, for the Princeſs yet does only hate you; but if ſhe once ſee you have any thoughts of neglecting that Reſpect which is her due, ſhe will then exchange her Hatred for Scorn. Ah, Marteſia, (ſaid he) miſtake not my Crimes and my Raptures: Sorrow indeed is able to make me do the moſt unjuſt Thing, but the Reverence I have of Mandana prevents me; therefore, Marteſia, pity I beſeech you my Weakneſs; and though you will not advantage, yet do me no prejudice I conjure you. Sir, (ſaid I unto him) I neither can help nor hurt you, for I dare never ſo much as ſpeak of you unto Mandana. But, wiſe Chriſantes, whatſoever I ſaid unto the Prince of Aſſyria upon that Subject, I think he did not believe me, but imagined, that I related all he ſaid unto the Princeſs, though he was much deceived; for as long as Arianta was with us, we diſcourſed of nothing but our Sorrows in general; and when we were alone, Artamenes was the only Subject of our Diſcourſe. Alas, (ſaid Mandana ſometimes, when for a little liberty, we asked leave to walk by the River Tigris) in what deſpair will Artamenes be, when he returns unto Themiſcira and finds not us there? and when he ſhall know that Philidaſpes, that ſame Philidaſpes whom he ſo much hated, has carried me away? But, O Heavens! will he not ſuſpect my Vertue? Can he think that Philidaſpes durſt execute ſuch a Deſign without my Conſent? But on the other ſide, can he think that Mandana is capable of any ſuch thing? Ah, no, no, he will believe me to be innocent though unfortunate. Artamenes, the illuſtrious Artamenes, will never conceive that one who has been ſo ſevere unto him, can be ſo pliable unto his Enemy: Thus did we ſpend our tedious time when we had any liberty, but that was ſeldom; for beſides Arianta, who always kept cloſe about the Princeſs, there was a great ſort of other Women which Philidaſpes appointed to wait upon the Princeſs, who almoſt never left her.

But it is admirable to conſider how Vertue will ſhine in thoſe who are in Adverſity, although it be extream, for the Princeſs had not been among them above fifteen days, but every one of them who were about her did adore her; but we could not for all that ſee an end of our Miſery, nor Philidaſpes of his. Still he continued writing unto Mazares, that he ſhould ſtill ſolicite the Queen: he writ alſo ſecretly unto Aribeus for relief, if he ſhould ſtand in any need of it: He ſent alſo unto the King of Lydia, to deſire Aſiſtance, knowing him to be no Friend neither unto Aſtyages or Ciaxares, though there was an Alliance between them: Truly, he neglected nothing that might advance his Deſign; either in inviting Princes unto his Party, or in putting the Town of Opis into a condition to abide a Siege, in caſe it ſhould be beleagured: For our parts, we neither knew what we ſhould do, or what to hope for; for we knew not that Artamenes was returned unto Themiſcira. Therefore the Princeſs, who could not endure to be ſo in the power of a violent and amorous Prince, did one day reſolve to ſpeak with him, intending to ask a favour at his hand, which preſently I ſhall relate unto you. You may imagine how joyful Philidaſpas was, when Arianta told him the Princeſs would ſpeak with him, and doubtleſs, you believe he diligently obeyed the Command. When he was entred into the Princeſs Chamber, Is it poſſible, Madam, (ſaid he to her) that the Princeſs Mandana will ſpeak with the unfortunate Philidaſpes, unleſs it be to pronounce the Sentence of his Death? But though you ſhould do ſo, (Divine Princeſs) I would upon my Knee receive the Doom with Joy, ſo much does this Honour, in commanding me to come unto you, dilightfully diſturb my reaſon. Sir, ſaid ſhe to him, (for through my advice, ſhe reſolved to treat him as ſhe did) ſince I have ſo often in vain deſired you to ſend me either to Themiſcira, or Sinope, or Ancyra, or Amaſia, I intend to ask you a thing which you ought not to deny me; for ſince it is ſo far from asking you to go out of your Dominions, as I only conjure you to conduct me unto Babylon, to the Queen Nitocris, where I ſhall be in a handſomer Condition than I can be here in this place: If you conſent unto this favour, I ſhall promiſe you to diminiſh a little of that juſt Hatred which is growing in my Soul; for I cannot endure that all Aſia ſhould know I am in your Power, and that I ſhould have no other Witneſſes of my Vertue, but my greateſt Enemy. Madam (replied Philidaſpes, being a little ſurprized) if you will do me the honour to go unto Babylon, with intention to be one day the Queen of it, and to take from the hands of Nitocris, that Scepter which ſhe has moſt glorioully ſwayed, doubtleſs I ſhall conſent unto your Propoſition: But if in going to Babylon, your deſign be to go thereby the ſooner unto Themiſcira, pardon me,Madam,if I be conſtrained to diſobey you: And to tell you the truth, ſquares go not ſo handſomly there, becauſe for ſome certain Reaſons I am in ſome diſguſt with the Queen, yet more for the love of you, than for any other cauſe; therefore in deſiring that, Madam, you would have me carry you unto a place that will be rather my Puniſhment, than my Sanctuary: It is not out of any fear that I refuſe you, but Love only forceth it. You told me once, Madam, that nothing was more unreaſonable then to commit a great Crime, to no end: Think not ill then, if I endeavour to prevent falling into the like fault. The Crime is already committed, Madam: I was ſo preſumptuous as to take you away; and it behoves me to endeavour for ſo much happineſs as to obtain my Pardon, and your Love. The way you take (replied the Princeſs very ſharply) makes it a hard matter to obtain either your Pardon or my Love. Do you know, Madam, what may be hereafter, (replied this Prince?) I know very well (replied ſhe) that the time will never come in which Mandana will love you. Yet, Madam (anſwered he) I hope there is no abſolute impoſſibility in it. Whoſoever ſhould have told me, the firſt day I came unto the Temple of Mars in Sinope, that I ſhould fall deſperately in love with you, I ſhould not have believed it; and whoſoever ſhould have told me the firſt time that I ſaw Artamenes in that ſame place, and on that ſame day, that I ſhould mortally hate him, I could not have believed it; for truly I ſaw no Women in that Temple which could enamour me: And I found Artamenes, very handſome, well proportioned, of a good deportment, and very civil; yet I am in extream Love with you, and in extream Hate of him. The Princeſs bluſh'd at the name of Artamenes, and the Prince who always looked upon her, obſerved it; yet notwithſtanding, he durſt not then ſpeak of it; and it was at Babylon where he told me of it. The Princeſs, ſeeing her Diſcourſe was to no purpoſe, broke it off, and went away whether he would or no. A few days after, we heard of the Death of Aſtyages, though Philidaſpes kept it from the Princeſs as much as he could; but when he underſtood ſhe knew of it, he put himſelf in Mourning and came to viſit her. And not long after that, we heard how the Queen Nitocris died, after ſhe had finiſhed her magnificent Tomb, which is in the prime Port of Babylon, and that the diſobedience and bad Action of her Son, was the cauſe of her Death. Theſe two Accidents did both of them extreamly trouble the Princeſs: The firſt, becauſe he was ſo near in Kinred: The ſecond, becauſe ſhe relied much upon the Vertue of the Queen Nitocris. We underſtood by one of thoſe Women which they had placed about the Princeſs, that Mazares did the Prince of Aſſyria very good ſervice at this time, and that but for him the Queen had diſpoſed of her Crown from him: We underſtood alſo by her, that the Princeſs Iſtrina, according unto the laſt Will of the Queen, went from Babylon the next day after her Death into Bithynia where her Brother Intaphernes then was, who went thither to aſſiſt Arſamones in recovering his Eſtate from the King of Pontus, who (as was reported) was likely to loſe both his Kingdoms.

Mean while we were not perſecuted with any Viſits from the new King of Aſſyria for ſome certain days, becauſe as indeed he had ſome Generoſity in him, he was very ſad at the Death of the Queen Nitocris: Yet, as Love was the predominate Paſſion in his Soul, and the firſt days of mourning being over, he hoped that the magnificence of Babylon might perhaps work upon the Heart of the Princeſs, which cauſed him a little ſooner to cheer himſelf up from his Sorrows for the Queen his Mother, who put Mourning into the Hearts of all her Subjects.

Mean while, Mazares writ unto the King, that it was very requiſite he came preſently as ſoon as he could to ſhew himſelf unto the People, and that a Throne was ſuch a place as ought not to be long empty, leſt ſome ſhould be tempted to fill it up: Yet for all that, there was no reaſon of State ſo ſtrong as could move him to leave Mandana to go unto Babylon: But he writ unto Mazares, that he ſhould prepare all things in the moſt pompous manner againſt his entrance; and that he ſhould ſend thither unto him all things neceſſary to conduct the Princeſs of Media thither, for ſince the Death of Aſtyages, we will no more call her the Princeſs of Cappadocia. I forgot to tell you (wiſe Chriſantes) how after the Death of the Queen Nitocris, the Princeſs by my advice ſent unto the new King, to tell him ſhe was very ſorry for the Death of the Queen his Mother, and how afterwards, he came to thank her for that Complement which with much ado I obtained from her. But to return unto my Story; The King of Aſſyria came one day unto Mandana's Chamber, after he had civilly ſent to ask leave; and after he had with much Reverence ſaluted her; Madam (ſaid he unto her) the River Euphrates is jealous of that Honour, which the River Tygris hath received from you, and it is but juſt that the prime Town in the World ſhould be honoured with the preſence of the moſt fair, and illuſtrious Mandana. When I asked you, to go unto Babylon (replied Mandana) the Queen Nitocris was living: And when I would wait upon you thither (replied this Prince) the Throne of Aſſyria is ready to receive you, and all the People willing to ſalute you by the Title of Queen. No, Sir, (ſaid ſhe to him) never hope that change of place can change my Soul, nor that the ſight of ſtately Babylon can move my Heart. I had rather ſpin away my Life in a Shepherds Cottage, than ſit on the Throne of a King that is offenſive unto me: No, Sir, once for all, I will neither command nor obey you: I will never ſit in the Seat of that Queen whoſe Vertues I cannot parallel; and I had much rather be in your Priſon, than on the Throne of Aſſyria. If I were able to reſiſt, I would not I warrant you be hurried whither you would have me, nor would I willingly draw the War unto that Town which paſſeth for one of the Wonders of the World: I would if I could, ſave the Blood of ſo many innocent Perſons wherewith it is filled: But ſince I cannot reſiſt your Deſign, let me tell you, that I ſhall be the ſame at Babylon, I am at Opis; and that the King of Aſſyria with all his great Magnificence, ſhall move no Heart of mine, more than he could when he ſeemed only Philidaſpes. Time, Madam, replied he, (becauſe for all her Severity, he was in ſome hopes) will ſhew whether your rigorous Reſolution be more ſtrong than my Perſeverance: At leaſt, if you do reſolve upon my Death, I ſhall have a more illuſtrious Tomb at Babylon, than I can have here; and you will have more Witneſſes of that Cruelty wherein you glory. So it was Chriſantes, that three days after, we muſt reſolve upon departure; and to report what our Equipage was, is ſo unneceſſary it would but abuſe your patience; unleſs you be of their humour who ſay, that Liberality is the tried meaſure of Love; for if ſo, then I cannot make you underſtand the greatneſs of the King of Aſſyria's Paſſion, better than by relating the prodigious Expences at the entrance of the Princeſs into Babylon. That Morning when we went from Opis, we ſaw in a great Court under the Window of the Princeſs, twelve magnificent Chariots, for the Ladies which were to accompany her, and another, moſt incomparably above the reſt for her ſelf. We ſaw alſo two hundred Camels for the Baggage, with Sumpter-Clothes of Tyrian Purple embroidered with Gold; and when we were at the Gates of the Town, we ſaw in a great Plain fifteen thouſand Men in Arms, all having gilt Morrions, and Croſlets of the ſame, with Bows of Ebony, and Arrows piled with Gold, who dividing themſelves into two Bodies, one part marched before, the other behind, and the Chariots in the middle: As for the Camels they went ſome two hundred Paces before the Souldiers: And as for the King, he went on Horſe-back next after the Chariot in which was the Princeſs, which went laſt of all the Chariots, he and a thouſand Horſe did follow him: thus went we to Babylon, until we were within one days Journey, and the King of Aſſyria deſired the Princeſs ſhould reſt her ſelf a day in a Caſtle where we lodged: Mean while, all neceſſary Preparations were making for our Entrance; queſtionleſs you will think it ſtrange to hear talk of all this magnificence ſo preſently after the Death of the Queen Nitocris; but it is the Aſſyrian faſhion as well as of Cappadocia, who was once in ſubjection unto them, that the People never are in Mourning above three days after the Death of their Kings; becauſe, ſay they, there is more cauſe to rejoyce than mourn, that they have ſo gloriouſly finiſhed their Raign.

So that the Babylonians had no ſooner ended their pomp of mourning for their Queen, but they were in another pomp of rejoycing for the Arrival of Mandana; yet you may be aſſured that ſhe her ſelf was no participant at the Feaſt: Mean time, although ſhe was reſolved to be ſeen that day as careleſly dreſt as poſſibly ſhe could, yet ſhe could not bring it to paſs: For ſince all the Women which waited upon her, and waited upon Arianta and me, were of the King of Aſſyria's placing, and ſince Arianta herſelf was of conſpiracy with him; there was no Cloaths that Morning to be found, but ſuch as were moſt rich, and full of Pearls and Diamonds: For my part, I do confeſs, that this device did not anger me ſo much as it did the Princeſs, who was ready to chide me for it; Madam (ſaid I unto her to excuſe my ſelf, and becauſe indeed, it did concur with my opinion) the King of Aſſyria does think queſtionleſs to juſtify his Action unto the People by your admirable Beauty, and therefore deſires you ſhould appear in moſt Glory; but, never thinks, that unleſs he look very well about him, you will make all his Subjects Rebels; and if you will follow my counſel, you ſhall appear in all your Charms; for then, if this Prince ſhould ever attempt any thing againſt you; the People in favour of you would revolt from him. You are very ingenious (ſaid ſhe to me) to excuſe your own fault, or to ſay better, your Simplicity: But Marteſia, as flattering as you are, you wrong me much to be moved no more than you are at my diſlike of this, and to counſel me unto it, as you have done; for I beſeech you tell me, what will the unhappy Artamenes think, if he ſhould chance to know, by the report of thoſe Spies which the King my Father has in Babylon, that I ſhew my ſelf in ſuch a Dreſs, as ſpeaks joyful, and well pleaſed? All the reſt of the Magnificence cannot be imputed unto me; but it may be thought I conſented unto this. Madam, (ſaid I unto her) if you might do as you pleaſed, and had your choice, I ſhould not then adviſe you as I do; but ſince it is not, it is a good Expedient, to draw a Good out of an Evill; and to endeavour if it be poſſible that the ſame Beauty which cauſed you to be taken away, may alſo procure you Protectors if you ſhall need them: And as for what you ſay concerning Artamenes, believe it, Madam, that if the King your Father have any Spies in Babylon, who will report faithfully what they have ſeen, they will ſpeak more of your Melancholy than your Dreſs, you need not fear it. So indeed, Chriſantes, when the Princeſs could do no other, ſhe ſuffered her ſelf to be ſo dreſſed, yet without any Art or Care at all: But as you know very well, her Hair is ſo admirable fair, that her neglective Comlineſs, was extreamly becoming. All the Cloaths they brought us were made after the Median and Cappadocian Faſhion, to wit, of freſh, lively, and glorious Colours: As for the Women of Quality in Babylon, they never wear any Colour, but White; yet notwithſtanding very magnificently and gallantly dreſſed, having no Colours about them but Diamonds, Emralds, and Rubies, which gave a glorious Luſtre: And after that day, we came to know as much, for though the Princeſs had much unwillingneſs to be ſeen, yet more than two hundred Women of Quality came to do their Reverence unto her: She received them very civilly, but in ſo deep a Melancholy, that ſhe begot as much pitty as admiration.

In concluſion, we muſt depart, and in lieu of twelve Chariots full of Ladies, which we had the day before, there was now a hundred times as many: As for the Princeſs, ſhe was compelled to go into a ſtately magnificent Chair of Triumph, all the Ornaments whereof were pure Gold: It was drawn by four Tigers, harneſſed the moſt ornamentally that could be adviſed: Four Men of prime Quality carried a ſtately Canopy over the Chair, imbroidered with Gold, Pearls, and Diamonds, and ſuch as the Sidonians only know how to do: I will not inſiſt upon a particular Deſcription of this Pomp; only tell you that all that great Plain as we came to Babylon, and which you know very well is ſet with Palm-Trees of a prodigious height, was full of Troops, but ſuch Troops as were all armed in a moſt ſtrange magnificence. At every hundred Paces diſtance, we ſaw Arches of Triumph erected, upon which were very glorious Inſcriptions: They were all very ſtately; and we ſaw nothing which ſpoke not Joy and Grandure: About two Furlongs from the Town, the Prince of Saces, who was a Man very faſhionable and handſom, alſo rich in Clothes, and upon a Horſe of Iſabella colour with a black Mane, came in the Head of two thouſand Horſe, to preſent unto the Princeſs from the King, great Keys of Gold in a Box of the ſame mettal, Topazes and Amethiſts: Madam, (ſaid he in preſenting them unto her) the King has commanded me to obey you, and from him to offer, that which he only can give you.

Sir, anſwered the Princeſs, (for they had informed her of the Quality of Mazares) If in preſenting unto me the Keys of Babylon, you will aſſure me, that I may be permitted in the Morning to open the Gates, to return unto Themiſcira, or go unto Ecbatan, I ſhould accept of them, and be eternally obliged unto you for the offer; but if that liberty will not be allowed me, (purſued ſhe with a charming Melancholy which eclipſed nothing of her Beauty) it ſeems unto me to be a piece of Injuſtice, and ſomething Inhumane, that I my ſelf ſhould keep the Keys of my Priſon. So, Sir, untill the King of Aſſyria be reſolved to grant me that, I pray you keep what you offer me, ſince I think they cannot be in better Hands than yours. Mazares, charmed with the Beauty, Spirit, and Civility of the Princeſs, told her, that he would not keep what ſhe was pleaſed to do him ſo much honour as to truſt him with, but that ſhe might uſe them at her own diſpoſition when ſhe came unto the Town; and ſtaying no longer, he joined his Troop, which was very magnificent, with the Kings. This Prince marched by himſelf, next immediately after the Princeſs her triumphant Chair, but ſo glorious, ſo handſom, and ſo glittering with Gold and Jewels, that except Artamenes, I never ſaw a Man of a better Garb than he. At the entry into the Town, the Princeſs was preſented with a Speech, or to ſay better, an Elogy: All the Houſes were hung with rich Tapeſtry, every Street ſtrewed with Flowers: All the Windows were full of Women, handſomly dreſſed: Trumpets and Flutes made the Air eccho: All the People were raviſhed at the Beauty of the Princeſs; and expreſſed their Wonder with ſuch loud Acclamations as joyed the King of Aſſyria beyond all Expreſſions; at the laſt, Chriſantes, we were brought unto the Palace of the Queen Nitocris: The King of Aſſyria preſented his Hand unto the Princeſs as ſhe deſcended from her Chair, to conduct her unto her Chamber: She had a good diſpoſition to refuſe it, but ſhe thought that it would appear phantaſtical, and to no purpoſe. And therefore without any incivility ſhe gave him her Hand; but it was after ſuch a manner, as ſhe let him ſee, it was not the Quality of the King of Aſſyria did move her unto that Complacency, inſomuch as he was nothing ſatisfied with it; we paſſed through ſome Chambers all upon a Floor one within another, all were magnificently furniſhed; in the laſt of theſe, he made her a very low Congee, and told her, that from hence-forward it was in her power to command all Aſſyria; and that he was but the firſt of her Subjects: At the laſt, after an hour was ſpent, in accepting the Complements of all the Babylonian Grandees, they left us at a little liberty; and we had ſo much conſolation, as to know, that all thoſe Women which waited upon the Queen Nitocris, were appointed to wait upon the Princeſs Mandana, ſo that none came about her, but ſuch as were Perſons of very vertuous Minds: A little while after we were left alone, and Arianta being gone into another Chamber; the Princeſs looked upon me with extream Melancholy: Ah Marteſia (ſaid ſhe) where are we now? and how ſhall we ever get out? did you not obſerve, ſaid ſhe to me, the monſtrous Walls of Babylon which are ſo thick and ſtrong, that ſeveral Chariots may paſs one by another upon them? did you not obſerve the high Towers all about them; and did you not mark how the River Euphrates ſo incloſes it, as makes the acceſs unto it very difficult if any ſhould attempt to beſiege it? Were you not aſtoniſhed at the innumerable Company of People wherewith it is filled? and the Gates of Braſs, which ſhuts them in? Is it not to be feared, that if all Aſia ſhould arm themſelves in my behalf, they could never get me out of it? and as valiant as Artamenes is, he can never vanquiſh the King of Aſſyria, as long as he is within the Walls of this Town: Theſe are the Thoughts, my dear Marteſia, which took up my Mind, all the time of this diſguſtive Ceremony; and thus much did all their Magnificence at my entry work upon me. Madam (ſaid I unto her) the Gods can do what they pleaſe, and that which to all humane Prudence is impoſſible, to them is eaſy. You ſay well, ſaid ſhe, and I have no other hopes but what are grounded upon their Aſſiſtance. And indeed, the next Morning, the Princeſs would go unto the Temple, and they conducted her unto that of Jupiter Belus, which is one of the faireſt in the World. Mean while the King of Aſſyria endeavoured to win her by Sweetneſs, and feared to diſpleaſe her.

He viſited her but one hour in a day, and that was before many people, ſo that the Princeſs was leſs troubled at it: The Prince Mazares, by order from the King, did often viſit her; the King deſired him to ſpeak unto her in his behalf, knowing that there was not any Man in the World had more charming Eloquence in his Converſation than he. Indeed this Prince did negotiate ſo admirably well to get unto himſelf the Princeſs Eſteem, and gain her Love, that it was not a little conſolation unto himſelf: He was full of Sweetneſs, Civility, and Reſpect; and although he did ſpeak to the King of Aſſyria's Advantage, when any Occaſion was offered, yet notwithſtanding, we diſcovered in his Eyes an obliging Melancholy; and becauſe we thought that it was only an effect of his Compaſſion towards us and our Misfortunes, the Princeſs could not forbear ſometimes commending him. But, Chriſantes, that you may the better underſtand the reſt of my Diſcourſe, I muſt in this part of it, diſcover a thing unto you which we knew not a long time after, nor which we did ſo much as ſuſpect at all. It is very true, that the unfortunate Mazares did admirably well diſguiſe his thoughts. But I muſt tell you, Chriſantes, how this Prince in preſenting the Keys of Babylon unto the Princeſs, the firſt day we came thither, did then abſolutely loſe his Liberty, and was captivated with the Beauty of Mandana, as well as the King of Aſſyria. Since he was never in love before, he was not at firſt acquainted with the Paſſion. He imagined (as I ſince knew by the generous Orſantes, who is now come with me, and who diſcovered unto me all the Secrets of his Maſter's Thoughts) that admiration, only joined with pity, to ſee ſo fair a Lady in miſery, was it which troubled his Mind: Yet within eight days after, he perceived that it was more than ſo; He accepted therefore of the King of Aſſyria's Commiſſion, to ſee her often, and to ſpeak unto her in his behalf: for what Reaſon had he to refuſe it? Yet notwithſtanding, he ſeemed at the firſt to ſcruple it; but afterwards, whether he wanted a lawful Excuſe, or whether his ſecret Paſſion would not ſuffer him to refuſe the ſight of her whom he loved in ſpite of his Teeth, he promiſed the King, that he would viſit her, and do him the beſt Service he could. And indeed, he did viſit her, and endeavoured to do him Service; for it muſt be acknowledged, that Mazares was naturally Generous, and that Love only cauſed him to do things contrary to Generoſity. Orſanes did aſſure me, that he had diſcovered his Heart unto him; and that there was no courſe which he did not uſe to regulate his Paſſion, and to keep it within the limits of Eſteem and Friendſhip. What unhappy Deſtiny is mine? (would he ſay unto Orſanes) I lived all my life in a Court, amidſt an infinite number of Beauties, and never was in love with any, but I no ſooner look'd upon Mandana, but I am deſperately captivated. Ah, Orſana, ſaid he, how thoſe who ſay, that Hope begins with Love, are deceived? For, what is it I can hope for? I find a Paſſion in my ſelf, which I ought, and which I will reſiſt; and though I cannot perhaps abſolutely vanquiſh it, yet I will eternally conceal it at the leaſt; for truly I have promiſed a friendly Office unto the King of Aſſyria; I am his Vaſſal; I have the honour to be his Kinſman; and he has made choice of me for a Confident of his Paſſion: How can I ever overcome all theſe Objections? But ſuppoſe my Generoſity ſhould ſubmit unto my Love? and that I ſhould reſolve to betray a Prince unto whom I owe much reſpect? I ſhould not be the better, ſince it is to be believed, that a Princeſs who treats the King of Aſſyria ſo courſely, will never receive the Prince of Saces into Favour; Therefore, Orſanes, (ſaid he to him) there is no hopes for me, though I do love, and that ſo deſperately, as I have loſt my Reaſon; But, ſaid he, ſince there is Hope in my Paſſion, I will hope it will continue long; or rather think, that ſince my Deſpair will not cauſe my Paſſion to die, it will continue for ever: Love then, ſaid he, love on, ſince it is my Deſtiny; Love, and make no ſcruple at it; for indeed we cannot be Maſters of our Affections, it is well if we can hide them, and if I can content my ſelf with the Eſteem and Friendſhip of Mandana.

In ſhort, Chriſantes, when Mazares could not root his Love of Mandana out of his Heart, he reſolved to keep it ſecret, and not to give over doing a good Office for the King of Aſſyria; but yet Chriſantes he ſpoke not one word in his behalf, which did not yield him a thouſand ſecret Vexations; nor did the Princeſs give him a word unto his Diſadvantage, which joyed him not ſo much, as he had much adoe to hide it; ſo that he was both faithful and unfaithful at once; his Mouth ſpoke for the King of Aſſyria, but his Heart betrayed him, and whatſoever he either ſaid or did, one might always ſee his Soul was infinitely afraid to diſpleaſe the Princeſs Mandana: nor did I ever ſee in any more reſpect than in him to her. Mean while, we ſuſpected nothing of his Paſſion; he ſeemed ſometimes very melancholy indeed, but his Addreſſes, without any Words, did tell us the Misfortunes of the Princeſs did trouble him; and that he could wiſh the King of Aſſyria would give over his Deſign.

Thus was the ſtate of things, when a piece of croſs Misfortune happened unto us, which did exceedingly trouble us: for when the King of Aſſyria, found no alteration in the Mind of Mandana, notwithſtanding all his Reſpects and Submiſſions, and all the Endeavours of Mazares, he began to think that the Heart of the Princeſs was already diſpoſed of; and when he called to mind all the Jealouſies he entertained that Artamenes was in love with Mandana, and when he remembred what he heard from the Mouth of Feraulas concerning the Quality of Artamenes, all thought of the Princeſs bluſhing at Opis, when Artamenes was named: Then he ſaid unto Mazares (after he had related unto him all the Paſſages in the Cappadocian Court) it is no more to be queſtioned, but that Artamenes is not only a Prince, nor a Prince only that loves Mandana, but Mandana alſo loves Artamenes. You may very well imagine, how this conceit tormented the Mind of this young Prince; and how it diſquieted the Thoughts of Mazares; he was ſo Planet-ſtruck at it, that the King of Aſſyria, ſuppoſing it was in conſideration of his Intereſt, did heartily thank him for it.

Mean while, to clear all his Doubts, he found an opportunity to ſpeak in piivate with Arianta, who unknown to us unluckily underſtood our Diſcourſe the Night before, and where the Princeſs and I had repeated almoſt all the Paſſage of his Life, excepting the Name of Cyrus, which happily we pronounced not. But though ſhe underſtood not all we ſaid, yet ſhe heard enough to clear all Doubts, that there was a correſpondency between Artamenes and Mandana: So that when the King of Aſſyria had ſpoken with this malicious Wench, he underſtood more from her than he deſired to know: Yet notwithſtanding, ſince ſhe did make but a confuſed relation of things, he reſolved to clear his Doubts a little more fully, and ſpeak unto the Princeſs her ſelf: And as Jealouſy is a much more turbulent Paſſion than Love; ſo the King of Aſſyria, when he entered into Mandana's Chamber, ſeemed unto me much altered: There was then none with her but Arianta and my ſelf: he ſaluted her with all due reverence, and began to diſcourſe of things indifferent; yet notwithſtanding all this, there appeared ſo much diſtemper in his Mind, as we could eaſily perceive it: Madam (ſaid he to her, after much interrupted diſcourſe) I would gladly know one thing from you, which is of infinite importance, both to me and you alſo. If I may conveniently tell it (replied the Princeſs) and if I know it, perhaps I may ſatisfy your curioſity. Yes, Madam, (anſwered he) you do know it, and to conceal it no longer, I wiſh you would do me the honour to tell me who is that great Enemy who ſurmounts me, and keeps ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion in your Heart; for ſuch a one there is, elſe I know not why all my Cares, my Reſpects, and my Submiſſions ſhould beget ſuch an Averſion in you to me. Sir, (ſaid the Princeſs unto him, not thinking he knew any thing relating unto Artamenes) trouble not your ſelf to find out the ſecret Reaſons of my proceedings with you; and know that though I loved you, and that extream dearly, if you would take me thus away without my conſent, I ſhould never love you after it; for I have a ſtrong averſion againſt all thoſe who once only in their lives do fail in that Duty which they owe unto me. How, Madam, (replied this violent Prince, almoſt againſt his intention) if Artamenes had done what Philidaſpes did, would you have uſed him as you uſe me? Artamenes, (anſwered the Princeſs bluſhing) is too wiſe for me to think he would ever commit ſuch a Crime: But, Sir, why do you ſpeak of Artamenes upon this Occaſion? I ſpeak of him, Madam, replied he, as of a Man who has overcome me more than once, but much more cruelly in your Heart, than with Arms in his Hands; Yes, Madam, this Artamenes whom I ever hated, and whom you have heretofore commanded me to love, is queſtionleſs the Man who oppoſes my Glory, and my good Fortunes. As I have no unjuſt Thoughts, (replied the Princeſs, calmly) ſo I will not deny, but I have had, and ſtill have a great eſteem of Artamenes: and you your ſelf know, I am obliged not to hate him. Thoſe Obligations, (replied this turbulent Prince) would never have moved the Princeſs Mandana, to entertain a ſecret Affection unto a ſimple common Cavalier, if her Heart had not been prompted unto it by ſome more potent Inclination. This ſimple Cavalier whom you ſpeak of (replied the Princeſs very angerly) appeared to be as much as Philidaſpes did at that time, and may perhaps be one day more than he, although he be King of Aſſyria. He ſhall not need to ſtay long for that, anſwered he; for ſince Artamenes is poſſeſſor of your Affection, I value him above all Princes upon Earth; though he be no more than he ſeems to be. You expreſs much Pride, and much Humility together, (replied the Princeſs): but, Sir, after all this, I would wiſh you to unaccuſtom your ſelf to ſpeak ſo imperiouſly unto me, for I cannot bear it.

The King of Aſſyria, ſeeing he had extreamly incenſed the Princeſs, and paſſing out of his Extream Violence into extream Submiſſion; Alas, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) would you have me retain my Reaſon, when I underſtand that the ſame Heart, which I did think all the Earth could not move, is not ſo inſenſible of Artamenes? Was it not enough to know you hate me, but that I muſt know you love another, and that other whom I moſt hate? As long as I believed you to be inſenſible, the Gods do know that I did juſtify you with my whole Heart, as much as ever I could; and ſhould have confeſſed, that you had good cauſe to ſcorn all the the Kings upon Earth, becauſe there was none worthy of you: I ſhould have acknowledged that my proceedings thus with you, did deſerve to make me wait a long time for a pardon of my Fault: But, Madam, ſince I certainly perceive, that the only Man upon the face of the Earth whom I hate (though I once eſteemed him) is the only Man you love; Ah, Madam, I cannot keep within thoſe limits I preſcribed; I have complained, I have accuſed you, I have loſt my Reſpect in loſing my Reaſon; if I could have pull'd my Soul out of this violent Paſſion, I ſhould have done it with abundance of joy; I have done all I can to hate you, but the Gods do know all my endeavours are in vain; for I love you more than I did: My Hate of Artamenes augments, and my Love to Mandana multiplies; I find freſh ſparks of Love in me: and, Madam, I muſt, indeed I muſt chaſe Artamenes out of your Heart; my Reſpects, my Solicitations, my Tears and Sighs muſt deſtroy him: The truth is, I muſt either die, or he muſt live no longer in your memory.

The Princeſs hearing the King of Aſſyria ſpeak ſo, did no longer doubt but that he knew ſome paſſage of her affection unto Artamenes, and therefore ſhe did not think it convenient to make a ſubtilty of her innocent Friendſhip; and conſidering in what diſorder this diſcourſe had driven her Soul, ſhe thought that perhaps when he ſaw that there was no hopes of ever being beloved, he would then let her alone in quiet; therefore, being to ſpeak, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) the Gods do know whether I uſe any criminous diſſimulation; the ingenuity I uſe unto you may make you know it. Ah, Madam, (ſaid the King of Aſſyria then) be not ſo ſincere, as to tell me all your advantagious thoughts of Artamenes; hide, rather from me, ſome part of his Glory, and put not my patience unto ſuch a rigorous Teſt. I cannot tell you any thing more then your ſelf knows, (anſwered the Princeſs) for indeed, all the Court of Cappadocia knows how I muſt eſteemed Artamenes; and I told you as much at that time when you were Philidaſpes; But all the Court of Cappadocia is ignorant of what I ſee you know, and what I will confeſs unto you; which is, that Artamenes is of a quality equal unto yours; and that if the King my Father would conſent unto it, then the Affection which Artamenes bears unto me, ſhould find from me all the recompence he deſerves. Thus, Sir, you ſee upon what Terms the Buſineſs is, and perhaps you know more now than yet Artamenes himſelf knows; and thus I have told you that important Truth which you ſo earneſtly deſired to know: And now it is your part to regulate your Deſigns and your Affection to me; you have a high Soul, which is full of Generoſity; therefore I need ſay no more upon this ſubject: You may yet take ſuch a courſe as may oblige me to eſteem you, and which may yet retain the friendſhip of Artamenes. Ah, Madam, (ſaid this Prince) although your Eſteem be very glorious, yet I will have none of it without your Affection: nor care I for the friendſhip of that Man who enjoys your Affection, and who is the only Obſtacle which hinders me from it: No, no, Madam, Artamenes and I muſt take more rough courſes to decide our Differences; his Death muſt either give you ſatisfaction for your Cruelty, or mine ſhall aſſure his good Fortune and yours together. In ſaying ſo, he went out, and left the Princeſs extreamly troubled. He went to Mazares, and related unto him all that Mandana ſaid: This unfortunate Prince did lend a moſt unquiet ear unto him; ſometimes he would be ſorry for the King of Aſſyria; and ſometimes he would be glad, there was ſuch an Obſtacle in the Heart of the Princeſs, as would prevent the King from being loved; and ſometimes he would hope, that between a Lover hated, and a Lover abſent, he might perhaps thrive the better in his Deſign; ſo that he reſolved to endeavour all ways whereby he might gain the Eſteem and Favour of the Princeſs. Yet he did not intend to act againſt the Rules of generoſity; for, ſaid he, it ſhall not be I who will hinder the King of Aſſyria, it ſhall be Artamenes who ſhall be the obſtacle. But, O Heavens, (ſaid he preſently to himſelf!) This Artamenes, who oppoſes the Deſigns of the King of Aſſyria, will alſo oppoſe Mazares; yet (added he) Mazares ſhall not vanquiſh him by open Force, nor declared War; Policy ſhall held out where Force is unavailable; and ſince there is no other way to be happy, I muſt have recourſe unto Subtilty.

Mean while, ſince he perceived the King of Aſſyria was much incenſed, and in ſuch a condition as might perhaps move him to undertake ſome deſperate Reſolution, he reſtrained him with all imaginable Art, and cauſed him to rely much upon his Solicitations. Indeed, he went to viſit the Princeſs, and as ſhe had much confidence in him, and was not ignorant how the King of Aſſyria told him every thing, ſhe ſpoke unto him with ſo much Spirit, ſo much Vertue, ſo much Sweetneſs, and in ſuch an obliging manner, that Mazares did almoſt reſolve, to entertain no more than a friendſhip with her; but, O Heavens, how weak a Foundation had thoſe thoughts in him? when he hearkened to the Princeſs his Heart melted, compaſſion on her cauſed him almoſt to ſhed Tears; but when he lifted up his Eyes, and ſaw Mandana, freſh Flames dried up his Tears, and choaked his firſt Deſign, by enflaming his Soul. The Princeſs notwithſtanding was very well ſatisfied with him; for as ſhe ſeemed to take ſome notice of the King of Aſſyria's violent humour: No, Madam, (ſaid he to her, after ſuch a manner as might perſwade her that he expreſſed his real thoughts) fear not the violence of the King of Aſſyria; I will engage my Word unto you, to imploy all my diligence in preventing all vitious thoughts in him: But, if I cannot diſſwade him from any ſuch Deſigns, I do proteſt unto you, that from a Vaſſal I ſhall become an Enemy unto him; and that as long as Mazares lives, the Princeſs Mandana ſhall find no other violence from the King of Aſſyria, than his Prayers, Tears, and Sighs.

You may imagine, Chriſantes, how many Thanks and Commendations the Princeſs gave him: Truth is, Mazares got ſo much into her eſteem, that ſhe loved him like a Brother, and this Prince for a while, was ſo happy, that he neither thought of Artamenes, nor any thing which might vex him. But preſently after, when the King of Aſſyria was informed of the return of Artamenes unto Themiſcira; and of his arrival at Ecbatan with Ciaxares; alſo of all the Military Preparations againſt him, he then haſted the execution of thoſe Orders which he had formerly given: for ſince that Morning we came unto Babylon, he had ſent into Lydia, into Phrygia, Hircania, Arabia, Paphlagonia, and alſo unto one of the Indian Princes: The Prince of Saces alſo ſent to entreat his Father that he would haſten all thoſe Levies which he was to ſend out of his Country. Yet we had but a confuſed notion of all theſe Warlike Preparations; For Mazares who would not ſpeak a word of Artamenes unto Mandana, told her always, that he knew no more but that he was returned from the Maſſagettes, and that there were Warlike Preparations in hand.

The King of Aſſyria, in the mean while, did often viſit the Princeſs, and was ſometimes all Violence, ſometimes all Submiſſion; ſometimes looking upon her with a deep ſilent Melancholy, and ſometimes ſpeaking with extream Anger, not daring to fix his eyes upon hers: But truly, I wondered an hundred times at the goodneſs of the Gods, that a Prince ſo imperious as this, and of ſo proud a Diſpoſition, ſhould ever obſerve and keep within limits of reſpect: At firſt when we came to Babylon, all Ladies were permitted to ſee the Princeſs, and ſhe was ſo infinitely loved amongſt them, that they were willing to do any thing to deliver her, were it not for their Deſires they had that ſhe ſhould be their Queen; and therefore every Lady of Quality, in relation to her own ſatisfaction, was ready to do a good Office for the King of Aſſyria; yet ſince this Prince was informed by his Spies, that they came very often unto her, they were debarred of that liberty, and the Princeſs was ſo ſtrictly guarded, that none, unleſs Mazares, muſt ſee her; and the principal Reaſon of it was, becauſe the common People began to grumble, that all Aſſyria ſhould be engaged in an unjuſt War: Thus did we live in extream Melancholy, and without any Comfort, but the company of Mazares.

The Women which waited upon the Princeſs, told us, that there came every day a great number of Strangers unto Babylon, and none knew what they were, for theſe Women had more liberty than we, but not much: 'Tis very true, that we were in a very fine Priſon (if any can be ſo); for certainly the King of Aſſyria's Palace is the moſt ſtately thing in the World: The Princeſs's Chamber was on that ſide which looks towards the great Plain, along the River Euphrates, and has a proſpect of above fifty Furlongs from Babylon; and you know very well how this Proſpect is full of variety and delightful, either in reſpect of the River which there winds and turns it ſelf very pleaſantly, or in reſpect of many ſtately Houſes which are obvious to the Eye, and which are inviron'd round with Palm-trees; in that quarter was the Princeſs's Lodging, out of which a Balcony jetted out, in which ſhe uſed to ſit when the Weather was fair. I remember that one night ſhe was ſitting there very late, and as the King her Father, and Artamenes took up much of her Thoughts; Imagine, Marteſia (ſaid ſhe to me) how glad and ſorry both I ſhould be, if in the Morning when I open this Window, I ſhould ſpy a Median and Capadocian Army; really, ſaid ſhe, I think that I ſhould not be able to contain my ſelf; delight to ſee Relief, and fear leſt it ſhould prove in vain for me, and fatal to them who bring it, would ſo diſturb my Soul, that I ſhould never have Strength, or Conſtancy enough to live out the Event: But alas, Marteſia, I am not likely to be either glad or ſad, upon ſuch an occaſion; Solitude and Silence, that raigns in all this vaſt Plain, which we dimly diſcover through the Obſcurity of the Night, does tell me that my Defenders are not there; and we ſee nothing by the gloomy Light of Stars and Moon, but only Trees, and this great River. It was then two days ſince we ſaw the Prince Mazares, and he being the greateſt part of our Converſation, the Princeſs was very ſorry that ſhe did not ſee her Protector, for ſo ſhe often called him. But after the Princeſs had ſufficiently entertained her Contemplations, ſhe retired into a Chamber which joyned unto that where we were, and where commonly ſhe paſſed away the day. The next Morning, as ſoon as ſhe was dreſt, one came to tell her that the King of Aſſyria deſired admittance; and as ſoon as he was entered, Madam (ſaid he her, after he had ſaluted her with all due Reverence) will you be pleaſed to do me the ſavour, as to go into that Chamber, where commonly you uſe to be? Sir (ſaid ſhe to him, making ſigns unto Arianta and me to follow her) Captives muſt not chuſe the places of their Priſons, and in ſaying ſo ſhe followed him, who preſented her his Hand, and we all followed them. When we were come into that Chamber, the King of Aſſyria went unto the Balcony, and drawing a great Curtain which ran upon Hoops of Gold, to open and ſhut as one pleaſed, we diſcovered all that great Plain, which the night before we ſaw ſo ſolitary, full of Souldiers in Arms, and as they were drawn up into multitudes of Squadrons, Battalia's, and Enſigns, they ſeemed to be four hundred thouſand Men: You may imagine, wiſe Chriſantes, what Effect ſuch a terrible Object did work in the Heart of Mandana, and at the firſt ſhe did imagine it to be the Army of Ciaxares, but ſhe continued not in that delighting Error; for the King of Aſſyria turning towards her; You ſee, Madam (ſaid he to her) that my deſign to conquer and deſerve you, is not judged by the Gods ſo criminal as you think, ſince they thus proſper it; and ſince ſo many Kings and Princes as there is in this Army do take my part, and ſince two hundred thouſand Men are ready to expoſe their Lives for the love of me. The Princeſs, ſeeing her hopes deceived, did caſt her Eyes upon the Army; and tho, by reaſon of the remoteneſs, ſhe could not diſcern the Enſigns, yet it ſeemed they were not Medians: Then haſtily turning aſide, as not enduring ſo terrible an Object; Oh, Sir (cried ſhe out) what do you let me ſee? What kind of Puniſhment have you invented wherewith to torment me? Would you have me all at once reſent the Wounds, your Souldiers ſhall give unto thoſe of my Party? Would you have me apprehend my Misfortunes before they fall upon me? What would you have unhappy Mandana do? I would have you know (anſwered he) that upon your Will depends the Deſtiny of all Aſia: Thus many Men, thus many Provinces, and thus many Kingdoms, have you brought hither in my behalf. I know, Madam (added he) that the King your Father, aſſiſted by the King of Perſia, has brought his Troops into the Field, and that he is upon the Banks of the River Gnides, to come to you; and therefore, Madam, I put my ſelf into a poſture of Defence, and try if this laſt Remedy will mollify your Heart: Conſider if you pleaſe, Madam, that the Kings of Lydia, Phrygia, Arabia, Hircania, and an hundred other moſt valiant Princes who are in my Army, do not acknowledg the King your Father, nor are they in love with you as I am, and therefore will not ſpare you, as doubtleſs I ſhall do: Conſider ſeriouſly, I conjure you, that amongſt two hundred thouſand Men, one of them may eaſily deprive you of that Perſon who is ſo dear unto you: O cruel Man (cried ſhe) unto what a fearful Puniſhment do you expoſe me? Ah pitileſs Princeſs (anſwered he) whoſe hard Heart, had rather all Aſiia ſhould be in Arms, that it ſhould ſwim in Blood, and be ruined, and that the King your Father ſhould be engaged in a dangerous War, rather than accept the Affection of a Prince who adores you, who lives not but for you, and who is ready to imploy this ſame Army to conquer more Crowns for you, if thoſe he has does not ſatisfy your Ambition: you ſee, Madam, two hundred thouſand Men, ready to march, and ready to fight when occaſion requires; yet altho ſo many valiant Captains and Souldiers be all impatient to look their Enemies in the Face, and fight them, yet one favourable Look from you is able to make all their Arms fall out of their Hands: Yes, Divine Princeſs, the Fate of People depends upon your Eyes; caſt but one pleaſant Look upon me, pronouuce but one advantagious Word unto me; be but leſs cruel, and afford me but one ſpark of Hope, and then all Aſia ſhall reſt in Peace, and the King your Father in Safety: Speak then, I conjure you, or if you will not ſpeak, let your Eyes ſpeak for you, ſay that you will herafter love the King of Aſſyria, or promiſe once only, that you will love Artamenes no longer. Pronounce the doom, Madam, Muſt I fight? or muſt I diſarm? But conſider well before you give fatal Sentence. Sir (anſwered the Princeſs) the Gods are abſolute Maſters of all Men, and Mandana ought not to uſurp that Supream Authority over them: It is my part patiently to endure the Misfortunes they ſhall ſend me, and not oppoſe their Wills. If they were not reſolved upon a War they would change my Heart, and alſo the Heart of my Father to pardon you. So I am not in a condition to diſpoſe of my own Will. It is enough I know from your Mouth, that the King of Media is in Arms againſt you; I may know thereby that it is not permitted me, to afford you either a favourable Look, or an advantagious Syllable, or to give you the leaſt glimpſe of Hope. Since he holds you for his Enemy, I have a new cauſe to uſe you ill, nor muſt I pardon you, tho I ſhould be ſo weak as to wiſh it: and tho Artamenes were not living, yet I ſhould be the ſame I am unto you. Moreover, altho your Army be very great, yet will I hope, the Gods will be favourable unto the Juſtneſs of my Cauſe, making all my Father's Enemies to fall before him, and giving him the Victory; yet the Gods do kuow, if I could with the loſs of my Life, prevent the danger of my Father's, I ſhould ſacrifice it with incredible Joy: Yes, Sir, if you can ſuffer me to be that Victim, which will bring Peace unto all Aſia, I freely conſent unto it with all my Heart: And if nothing will give you ſatisfaction, but the taking Mandana away from unfortunate Artamenes, I alſo conſent unto it, ſo you will put her into her Grave; and that it may be permitted her to paſs out of the Hands of the King of Aſſyria, into the Hands of Death, which ſhe would ſooner chuſe. But in the Name of the Gods, Sir, be generous; do an Heroick Act, ſurmount that Paſſion which is in your Heart: The Conqueſt of Mandana is not worth half the Blood which will be ſpilt. Love does deceive you, Sir, and that Beauty which thus charms you, is but a pleaſing Deluſion; and altho ſhe were as fair as you fancy her, yet at the beſt it would be but a Treaſure which time would certainly ſteal from any that enjoys it; recollect your ſelf therefore, Sir, and if there be any ſpark of Reaſon in you, affect Honour, and Glory, and prefer it above Mandana, that is much more fair than ſhe, and will treat you better; then will you eſteem Mandana more, and alſo ſhe will you, nor will ſhe then blame you for the Injuries you have done her: Conſider that ſuch a Princeſs as ſhe is not worthy of ſo conſtant a Love as yours; think how ſhe hates you, treats you courſly, and will never love you. In ſhort, either by Reaſon, or Revenge, or out of Generoſity, reſtore Peace unto all Aſia, and hate Mandana, who hates you. I would do ſo, Madam (ſaid the King of Aſſyria) if I could, but alas, I cannot if I would; and I think it is as impoſſible for me not to love Mandana, as it is impoſſible for Mandana not to love Artamenes. But, Madam (added this Prince, in extream anger) if you love the Life of your Father, the King of Media, be moved with my Prayers; for know aſſuredly, that there is not a valiant Man in all my Army, which has not a reſolute deſign to encounter with him: Imagine that all the Arrows in the hands of all theſe Souldiers which you ſee, are aimed at Artamenes, that all their Spears are ſet againſt his Heart, and that all Engines, all Stratagems, all offenſive Arms, are employed particularly againſt him, and that it reſts only in your power to divert ſo many Enemies from him: Therefore, cruel Woman, if you love Artamenes, hate not me, but give me ſome ſlight ſign of Good-will and Repentance. No, Sir (anſwered the Princeſs) you do not yet know me; for if I would have changed my Mind, it would have been when I heard the name of my Father pronounced; and that which I will not do for him, I will never do for Artamenes; not but that (ſince you force me to tell it) I am infinitely tender of that Prince, and ſhall preſerve an immovable Fidelity for him; and between a Father and a Lover, I will do what befits me, without any wavering what Reſolution to take. Then, Madam (ſaid he in a more ſharp Tone) we muſt go fight, and you have appointed it ſo. The Princeſs, ſeeing that he was in earneſt, and was going away much moved, that Boldneſs which ſhe retained in ſpeaking unto him did forſake her, and Tears came in her Eyes; ſhe then threw her ſelf at his Feet, and faſt holding him (O, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him) what are you intending to do? To fight and vanquiſh if I can, ſaid he unto her, and haſtily lifted her up. But tho you ſhould vanquiſh the King my Father, yet you ſhould never vanquiſh the Heart of Mandana, replied ſhe: but on the contrary, I here declare unto you in the preſence of the Gods, who hear me, that if in this War, either the King my Father, or the Illuſtrious Artamenes do die in it, you ſhall expect nothing from Mandana but her Death: Fight, Sir, as long as you will, you ſhall not enjoy the Fruits of your Victory: And ſince the Prize for which you fight is in my diſpoſe, you ſhall never obtain it; you may perhaps overcome the King my Father, and you may perhaps cauſe Artamenes to be killed, after he once gave you your Life; but you cannot hinder Mandana from dying: So that, Sir, if you bring her into deſpair, ſhe ſhall alſo do the like for you. Think with your ſelf once more, and conſider it well; for indeed if you be vanquiſhed, then you will be vanquiſhed with abundance of ſhame, conſidering the Injuſtice of the Action; and if you be Conqueror, you will find no other Recompence for all your Pains, but the Coffin of Mandana. The Gods, Madam, anſwered he, did not ſend you unto the Earth to take you away ſo ſoon; and I will hope that if I return Conqueror, you will then change your thoughts of me. If ever I ſee you victorious (replied the Princeſs) and the noiſe of your Victory precede your Return, my Death ſhall precede the day of your Triumph. But, Madam (replied this Prince) what would you have me do? Since things are at that paſs I cannot live without you; and ſince I cannot ſuffer Artamenes to live, and you to love him, but not the King of Aſſyria; yet, Madam, I ſee you had rather all Aſia ſhould periſh, and you hope I ſhall periſh in it: Yes, yes Madam, I read this ſecret Joy in your Heart, which mingles it ſelf with your Sorrows; but yet for all that I ſtill reſpect you, love you, and adore you: Judg, Madam, whether there be any compariſon between the Love of Artamenes and mine; for he ſees he is beloved of the faireſt Princeſs upon Earth, What wonder is it that he ſhould be faithful unto ſuch a Princeſs who ſcorns all the Grandure of the World for him? To know the difference betwixt his Love and mine, ſeem (Madam) to ſcorn him as you do me, and treat but him as you treat me; then, if after that, he ſhall love you as I do, I ſhall confeſs he has more right unto your Affection than I have. You know, Madam, that I am Maſter in Babylon, and ſo can cauſe my ſelf to be obeyed; yet you have commanded abſolutely here, and I let you have the liberty to ſcorn me, and all this becauſe I am poſſeſſed with ſuch a Paſſion as has no parallel, which combats all thoſe violent Deſires which are in my Heart, and which will not permit me to do any thing but adore you. Indeed, Madam, I muſt be gone, and carry Sword and Fire to the Camp of my Enemies; I muſt go and ſeek out Artamenes; you will have it ſo, and I will obey you: In the mean time, I know you will pray unto the Gods for his Victory and my Ruin; but I conjure you to change your Heart. I have only thus much to ſay unto you, Madam, That if when I am gone, the Image of all thoſe Misfortunes which you cauſe, ſhall happily move you to repent of ſo unjuſt a Reſolution, and would have the Wars to ceaſe; it is but ſending the meaneſt of your Servants unto me, and write only this word, HOPE, and at that very inſtant when I ſhall receive that happy Ticket, tho I were in the midſt of Battel, and my hand lifted up to kil Artamenes, and altho the Victory were almoſt ſure unto me, yet I will promiſe you (inexorable Princeſs) to ſound a Retreat; to flee from before my Enemies, to come and throw my ſelf at your Feet, and look in your Eyes for a Confirmation of that bleſſed Syllable. Whilſt this Prince was ſpeaking thus, Mandana was ſo ſunk in Sorrows, that ſhe hardly underſtood him what he ſaid, and found her ſelf ſo weak that ſhe was glad to ſit down upon the Seat which was in the Balcony; ſo that the King of Aſſyria ſeeing ſhe was inflexible, and would ſpeak no more unto him, he left her after he unperceivedly had kiſſed her Robe. When he was in another Chamber he cauſed me to be called unto him, but I confeſs that I never in all my Life ſaw a more deſperate Man; he ſpoke unto me an hundred things which I ſhould repeat unto the Princeſs, and I anſwered him as well as I could, to reduce him unto Reaſon. And ſince the Princeſs menacing her own Death, did much trouble his Mind; Marteſia, ſaid he unto me, you ſhall anſwer for the Life of Mandana; ſpeak no more in my behalf if you pleaſe, but be ſure you look unto her Preſervation; afterwards he ſaid the ſame unto Arianta, and all the reſt of the Women about her; alſo he ſpoke much more unto Mazares, whom he was to leave Governour in Babylon, and who had been buſied in thoſe Troops which his Father had ſent up to the Rendezvouz, and that was the reaſon we ſaw him not two days together. But, Chriſantes, if I ſhould relate all the Princeſs ſaid after the King of Aſſyria was departed, it would engage me unto a long Diſcourſe: ſhe roſe up, and would once again view this multitudinous Army: But alas, what ſad thoughts did it produce? Alas, Marteſia, (ſaid ſhe, after ſhe had been a long while ſilent) can I ever conſent that all theſe Troops ſhould march againſt my Father, and againſt Artamenes? Muſt I expoſe the Lives of two, who are ſo infinitely dear unto me, to a long and dangerous War? Can I who ever had an Antipathy to War, conſent, that ſo many thouſands of Men, ſo many Princes, ſo many Kings, ſhould be killed for the love of me? Muſt ſo many innocent Souls ſuffer for my ſake? Ah, no, no, Marteſia, I am infinitely wronged; and there was ſome Paſſages in the King of Aſſyria's Diſcourſe, at which I doubt whether I had my Reaſon about me or no; yet I do confeſs, that neither my Hearr nor my Tongue had ſo much power as to afford him one advantagious Word; I know not whether it be an effect of Hatred unto him, as the Raviſher of Mandana, or an effect of Love unto Artamenes. But perhaps, I have not ſaid enough to qualify him; yet, what ſhould I do? ſaid ſhe upon a ſudden, doubtleſs I have loſt my Reaſon; my Heart and my Tongue have been more juſt than my Conceit; for the Truth is, neither Peace nor War are in my diſpoſe: tho I expel that hatred which I have of that Prince who has ſo injuriouſly taken me away, tho I ſhould think no more upon Artamenes, and tho I ſhould reſolve to be ſo wicked as to ſubmit unto the King of Aſſyria; yet all theſe baſe Courſes would not advantage me, ſince the King my Father would not give over the War; and ſince the Illuſtrious Artamenes would become more bloody and furious for Culpable Mandana, than he would be for Innocent Mandana.

Moreover, do I not know very well, that ever ſince the famous Dejoca who ſet Media at liberty, and delivered them from the tyranny of the Aſſyrians, there has been an irreconcilable hatred between thoſe two People? And were it juſt that a Princeſs deſcended from the Illuſtrious Blood of the Reſtorer of her Country, ſhould bring it again into ſervitude? No, Marteſia: for whether I do conſider the King of Aſſyria as the Raviſher of Mandana, or as an Enemy unto the King of the Medes, or as the Enemy of Artamenes, or as a Tyrant of my Country; I have behaved my ſelf towards him as I ought to do. But Artamenes is in the ſame Army that my Father is; he hath already ſaved his Life, and may do ſo again; and conſidering the juſtneſs of their Cauſe, it may be hoped, the Gods will protect and preſerve them both. But, Chriſantes, all her Contemplations of the juſtneſs of her Cauſe, did not procure her ſo much reſt, as the ſight of this vaſt Army did diſquiet her. Madam, ſaid I, look no longer upon thoſe Troops which ſo much trouble you; or, if you will needs view them, then look upon them as a Subject of Glory for the King your Father, and for Artamenes. Ah, alas, my dear Martesia, (cried ſhe) who can tell whether, amongſt all theſe I look upon, I do not ſee the Murderer of my Father, or of Artamenes? Truly, Chriſantes, I was forced to pull her away violently into another Chamber.

Mean while we were informed, that the Army would depart the next Morning, and that the King of Aſſyria had intelligence how the Median Army had paſſed the River Gindes, by a prodigious Invention, which you are not ignorant of, ſince you were there; and how they had repulſed ſome Aſſyrian Troops which were on this ſide the River; the King therefore departed in all haſte, and cauſed the Army to march. The Prince Mazares, moved with thoughts of Honour, did much deſire to accompany him: But the King of Aſſyria would truſt the Guard of Babylon, and the keeping of the Princeſs, unto none but him; ſo that he conjured him to ſtay behind: and I know not whether thoughts of Love (notwithſtanding the great Heart of this Prince) made him glad of it. It was the King of Aſſyria's Mind, that the Troops which belonged unto Mazares ſhould ſtay in Babylon; to the end, that if the People did murmur at the injuſtice of this War in his abſence, thoſe Foreign Forces might keep them in Obedience: But that which was moſt admirable was this, that the King of Aſſyria, a little before he left Mazares, he drew him aſide; and with an unquiet and much diſordered Mind, ſpoke to him in theſe Terms; You ſee, my dear Mazares, that Artamenes is always very Fortunate and Invincible; he hath got over that River in eight days, which might have been well a Year's Work; he hath done that which was only the Work of a God; and if I be not miſtaken, Fortune has not thus befriended him, to forſake him afterwards, not but that I know my Army is thrice as ſtrong as the King of Medes; but for all that I may be overcome, and alſo killed in the fight: Know, that by reaſon of my unexpreſſible Paſſion for the Princeſs Mandana, I am terribly tormented with this cruel thought, that if I die, then will Artamenes quietly enjoy the Affection of Mandana: Promiſe me therefore, I conjure you, that if I die, you will fight with Artamenes, and never deliver up the Princeſs unto the King her Father, until that too happy Rival be dead alſo: promiſe me this I entreat you, and ſeal it with an Oath, for after that I ſhall be at ſome reſt, and be leſs tormented with that envious Jealouſy which perſecutes me; and I confeſs unto you, that if I thought any one ſhould enjoy Mandana, I ſhould die deſperate; but conſidering the extream Affection ſhe has unto Artamenes, I ſhall hope that if you kill him, ſhe will never love any other, nor ever marry. This, Mazares, is the Service I expect from you, and which doubtleſs you will not refuſe me, though it be ſomething difficult, it muſt be acknowledged that you cannot kill Artamenes, but it will be a great Glory unto you, and you will that way find a Recompence in doing this Office for me.

I leave you to judg whether Mazares was not much ſurpriſed at ſuch a Diſcourſe, and you may eaſily think, that without any denial he promiſed the King his Deſire, it being moſt certain, that ſince Reports went in Babylon, Artamenes was drawing towards it, his Paſſion grew more violent. So, Chriſantes, the King of Aſſyria, went away much ſatisfied with what Mazares promiſed, which was, to fight with Artamenes in caſe he died. Now were we under the diſpoſe of Mazares, who doubled his Civilities and Goodneſs to us; and in the tormenting Fears in which we continually were, to hear ſome ill News, it might be ſaid our Captivity was not rigorous, yet it was very much notwithſtanding. The Prince Mazares never came into the Princeſs's Chamber, but ſhe trembled, and looked for ſome ill tidings from the Army. As for him, he was more and more amorous, and I think he had need of all his Generoſity, to wiſh the King of Aſſyria Victory. I remember, one day, that when he ſaw the Princeſs much troubled, and that according to his cuſtom he was very melancholy, Mandana thinking compaſſion of her Misfortunes was only the cauſe of it, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) I am not a little beholden unto you, ſince being what you are unto the King of Aſſyria, you are ſo good as to intereſt your ſelf in any thing which concerns me.

Indeed, Madam, anſwered he, you have wrought a ſtrange alteration in my Heart: I confeſs, notwithſtanding that I cannot wiſh the King of Aſſyria were vanquiſhed, yet I have much ado to wiſh him Victory; and all this, Madam, out of my love to you, and I hope you will not condemn me for it. No, (ſaid ſhe) but on the contrary, I much commend you, and think you more innocent; for truly, not to be prejudicated in the Buſineſs of a Prince whom you love, and to favour the Intereſt of an unfortunate Princeſs whom you ſcarcely know, is truly generous. Ah, Madam, replied Mazares, do not ſay, I beſeech you, that I do not know Mandana; for I know her ſo perfectly well, that none upon Earth knows her better, and therefore I do in ſome ſort betray the King of Aſſyria: Alſo I do know (added he) her Misfortunes better than ſhe her ſelf does. I doubt it not, (replied the Princeſs) for ſince you know him who is the Cauſe of them better than I do, you may alſo better ſee thoſe dangerous Conſequences which that Cauſe may produce. Thus, Chriſantes, did Mazares ſometimes ſpeak ſuch things as might move ſome ſuſpicion of his ſecret Thoughts; and thus did the Ingenuity of the Princeſs cauſe her to expound them without any ſubtilty.

In the mean time, we were always upon extream Uncertainties; the leaſt Noiſe troubled us. I never came into Mandana's Chamber, but ſhe looked in my Face to ſee if ſhe found any ill News in it; and ſhe often thought, that ſhe found Signs of Victory to the King of Aſſyria in it, and the Death of her Father and Artamenes. But preſently after, as we ſtood in that Balcony which I named before, we diſcovered a great thick Duſt ariſe from the Earth, in that great Plain, a great way off; and preſently after a great Body of Horſe appeared: this ſight, and the Princeſs's fears, made her look pale. But after we had well conſidered them, me-thought they came too faſt, and in too great diſorder towards Babylon, to bring Victory with them. Madam, (ſaid I unto the Princeſs) certainly we have had the better on it; it is eaſy to be ſeen, for beſides that they are in no great Number, they come in ſuch haſty confuſion as Conquerors would never do. But, Marteſia, (ſaid the Princeſs to me, alwayes fearing the worſt) how know you whether or no theſe be Priſoners of War, which they ſend away; and whether the King my Father, or Artamenes, be not amongſt theſe I ſee? But, Chriſantes, preſently after, our doubts were all cleared; for a little after theſe Troops were come into the Town, we heard a great Noiſe upon the Stairs; and after that, we ſaw the Door of our Chamber opened, and the King of Aſſyria enter, with his Arms all broken, and ſtain'd with Blood in divers places; his Scarf all torn and bloody; his Plume all ruffled, broken and bloody likewiſe, for he had a ſlight Wound in his Shoulder: There were ſuch ſigns of Sorrow in his Eyes, and ſo many marks of Fury in his Face, that the Princeſs was out of all fears of her Father or Artamenes.

As ſoon as this deſperate Prince was come into the Chamber; Your Prayers, Madam, are heard, Artamenes has got the better of us; and I hoped once in my Life not to diſpleaſe you, in ſeeing at your Feet him whom Fortune has conquered. It is none of my Fault, Sir, (replied the Princeſs) that this Misfortune is fallen unto you; and if you would have ſuffered my Prayers to have overcome you, Artamenes never ſhould have vanquiſhed you; and the Victory which you would have obtained over your ſelf, had been more Glory to you, than that which Artamenes has, is honourable unto him. Madam, (replied the King of Aſſyria) can Mandana, whom I have often ſeen ſo ſweet and compaſſionate over the meaneſt Subjects of the King her Father, hear with dry Eyes, and calm Soul, that for the love of her, there is a Field full of dead and dying Men; Chariots overthrown; Arms broken; Kings loſt their Lives; Princes wounded or Priſoners; an infinite number of Souldiers wallowing in their own Blood, and that near four hundred thouſand Men have fought for you; can I ſay, this obdurate Princeſs, ſee me wounded, and vanquiſhed at her Feet, without one thought of compaſſion? Me, I ſay, who have quite loſt all my Fury as ſoon as I ſaw her:

who as ſoon as I look upon her, has no Sorrows for my Defeat; and who ſhould eſteem my ſelf very happy to ſuffer all theſe Diſgraces, if it were permitted me to hope that ſhe would once pity my Misfortunes. Yes, cruel Princeſs, though I be Vanquiſhed, Wounded, and Misfortunate, yet you can, if you pleaſe, make me the happieſt of Men; but, I beſeech you, do not inſult over a miſerable Man; and conſider, that Artamenes is not yet got into Babylon: And, Madam, to tempt your Joy a little, give me leave to tell you, that it is not ſo eaſy a thing to enter it, as it is to vanquiſh in the Field: Battels do more particularly depend upon Fortune than Sieges; and therefore I can anſwer more abſolutely for the Event of the one than of the other; and Babylon ſhall all be butchered, and alſo I will bury my ſelf in its Ruins, rather than ſuffer Artamenes to enjoy you. Sir, (ſaid the Princeſs, interrupting him, without any paſſionate diſorder) fear of Death does not trouble my Soul; and you have ſo accuſtomed me to deſire it, that it is not a Threatning which affrights me, if you ſhould tell me of periſhing in Flames. Ah, Madam, (ſaid this Prince, kneeling unto her) I beſeech you pardon an unfortnnate Man, in whom you have not left the uſe of Reaſon; I thought not of what I ſaid when I ſaid ſo unto you: but yet, what would you have me do? I have often told you, and do ſo again, that Artamenes ſhall never enjoy you as long as I live, nor ſhall Artamenes overcome me, without ſome danger to himſelf, as brave and fortunate as he is. But, Sir, (ſaid the Princeſs unto him) is it poſſible you ſhould be ſo blind, as not to ſee the Gods are againſt you? But, inhumane Princeſs, (replied he) is it poſſible you ſhould not conſider that you are the Cauſe of this War, and are the moſt cruel Woman in the World? Which way can your Heart be moved? When I laſt ſpoke unto you, I ſaid in my ſelf to excuſe you, that great Souls are never flexible with Arms in their Hands; and you ſpeaking almoſt in the Head of two hundred thouſand Men, ſaid, that there would be found ſome way to reſiſt me: But now I come unto you Vanquiſh'd, Wounded, and Miſerable; confeſs the Truth, Is it not ſomething inhumane, barbarous, and Cruel, not to look upon me with ſome Compaſſion at the leaſt? The Gods do know, Sir, (replied the Princeſs) that I am no lover of War, and that I am a wiſher of Peace unto all Aſia: But for all that I can contribute nothing towards it but my Prayers, my Will depends upon my Fathers, and my Affection is a thing I cannot take away again after I have given it. O, Madam, (ſaid the King of Aſſyria, interrupting her) ſpeak no more, in the Name of the Gods, drive me not into abſolute deſpair, for I confeſs I am afraid my Reaſon has forſaken me; and that thoſe Reſpects which I would have for you until Death, will, whether I will or no, forſake me alſo: Speak not at all, when you can ſpeak nothing but what is inſufferable: Yet (ſaid he in going away) ſince my Blood mingled with my Tears will not move you; and ſince the vanquiſhed King of Aſſyria is no pleaſing Object unto you, I will leave you to rejoice at the Victory of Artamenes. In ſaying ſo, he went out of the Princeſs Chamber; and after he had taken all neceſſary order for thoſe Troops which eſcaped the Rout, and for the preſervation of the Town, he went to Bed; for though the Wound he received was not very conſiderable, yet he having loſt much Blood, it had a little weakned him: though he was dreſſed at a little Town about twelve Furlongs from Babylon.

You may imagine, Sir, what variety of thoughts the Princeſs had, and how impatient ſhe was to know all Paſſages; but it was not poſſible for us to be better ſatisfied: We underſtood that the King of Aſſyria, after he was vanquiſhed, apprehending there might ariſe ſome Sedition within Babylon, came in all haſte that he might be in the Town before the Report of his Defeat: Yet, what Queſtions ſoever we asked, we could receive but confuſedly the Particulars of the Battel; yet they kept us up more cloſe than before, and changed Chambers, with intention doubtleſs to deprive us of that Conſolation, in ſeeing the victorious Army of the King her Father. I will relate unto you no more of the King of Aſſyria's Deſpair, and how irreſolute he was in coming to Babylon, whether he ſhould ſee the Princeſs or no: The ſhame of his Defeat denied it, but his extream deſire to ſee her, conſtrained it; alſo he thought that happily he might move her to pity his Misfortune. Since he was not much wounded, he left his Bed the next day, and began to prepare for a Siege, and to take all requiſite Orders to hold it out. He imagined that ſince the time of lying in the field was almoſt at an end, the King of Medes could not take Babylon in one Winter, but would be compelled to raiſe his Siege, and defer it until the Spring; during which time he would uſe all the ways he could to move the Mind of Mandana either by fair means or foul, and alſo would in the mean time prepare himſelf for a new Battel. For our parts, Chriſantes, we did not fully reliſh our Joys; for we ſaw Mazares ſo ſad, as cauſed us to apprehend he had diſcovered ſome ill Intentions in the Mind of the King; alſo it was eaſy for us to conceive that the Siege of Babylon could not be without much danger; yet this happy beginning gave us good heart; and ſo much joy as drave a great part of our Fears out of our Souls. The Gods (ſaid the Princeſs) are too juſt and good to forſake us; and I have greater confidence in their Juſtice, than in the Arms of the King my Father, or the Valour of Artamenes.

Mean while, we treated Mazares with much more civility than ordinary; for ſince we feared nothing ſo much as the violent humour of the King of Aſſyria, Mazares was the only hopes we had, to preſerve us from him; but we did not know all the intereſt he hoped for in the Princeſs.

In concluſion, as you know better than I, the Siege of Babylon began, and both ſides did as much as Men of great Hearts could do, both in aſſaulting and defending. It was now, wiſe Chriſantes, that our Fears were without intermiſſion; for we know there was not a day in which the Beſiegers did not make an aſſault, and in which the Beſieged did not make a Sally; ſo that our whole Life was but a continued fear: Our Fears were not only for the King, and for Artamenes, and Mazares whom we underſtood commanded the Parties which ſallied very often; but I remember the Princeſs one day, could not chuſe but complain her ſelf unto him; Generous Prince (ſaid ſhe, when ſhe was informed he had been fighting) I look upon you as the only Protector which I have in Babylon; as one who is infinitely dear unto me, and as one who is infinitely ſerviceable unto the King of Aſſyria, and as one whoſe Vertue is a great conſolation unto me; yet I do know that as ſoon as you are out of the Walls of Babylon, you do become one of my moſt dangerous Enemies; ſince you are one of the moſt valiant amongſt them; and that the illuſtrious Mazares, whom Mandana calls her dear Protector, does endeavour to kill not only that Man whom ſhe reſpects as her Deliverer, but alſo the King her Father: Indeed (ſaid ſhe unto him) you are very cruel to take away from me the liberty of praying for you, for indeed all that I can do upon this occaſion, is, to wiſh that you be neither Conqueror nor Conquered by thoſe whom you aſſault, and who are aſſaulted by you. You are all Goodneſs (replied Mazares, ſighing) to ſay ſo unto me, Madam; but yet Honour, Madam, will not permit me to be continually mewed up within Walls, whilſt ſo many brave Men are fighting; when I leave you in Babylon, I do confeſs it is with much regret: And it is extreamly againſt my Mind, that I ſhould quit the glorious Title of your Protector, to aſſume that of your Enemy; but yet reaſon will have it ſo, and there is no way to help it; for beſides that Honour which I told you of, and beſides other Reaſons which I have, what would the King of Aſſyria think if I ſhould do otherwiſe? I ſhould become ſuſpected, and perhaps be deprived of the Honour and Liberty to ſee you: Therefore, Madam, if I be culpable in any thing, it is not in this; yet notwithſtanding, I do confeſs, that I am infinitely to be blamed, and the condition I am in is extreamly unfortunate. Alas, ſaid the Princeſs, I am very ſory to be any cauſe of your diſquiets, and if I could find out any way to let Artamenes know how much I am obliged unto you; I am certain he would not fight againſt you, if he did but know you; But rather he would fight againſt thoſe of his own Side, if they ſhould aſſault you in his preſence. I queſtion not, Madam, (replied Mazares, bluſhing) but if Artamenes did know me by your report, he would eſteem me, but if he did know me by my own Addreſſes, he would not perhaps uſe me ſo. You are very modeſt (ſaid the Princeſs to him, who did not ſuſpect any hidden Sence in his words) and you make me wonder; but however, ſaid ſhe, I beſeech you remember two things when you go to fight: The one is, that there are in the Army which beſiegeth Babylon, two Princes whoſe Lives are infinitely dear unto me; and the other is, that in you only is all the conſolation and ſupport that I have in Babylon againſt the King of Aſſyria. As Mazares was making anſwer, one came to tell him that the King enquired for him, and certainly it was advantagious for him to be ſo interrupted, for doubtleſs he was much nonpluſt to give a direct anſwer unto the Princeſs without contradicting his own Thoughts, which were not very quiet, ſince I verily believe, that never was Soul more paſſionate than the Soul of Mazares, nor any more vertuous, although the violence of Love induced this Prince unto ſome things that were not over juſt.

Mean while, Winter, contrary to the common cuſtom of that Country, did draw faſt on us, and the Weather was very ſharp, which did as much rejoyce the King of Aſſyria, as it grieved us, out of our Fears that the King of Medes and Artamenes would be compelled to raiſe their Siege. We had then no other recourſe, but unto our Prayers; and the Princeſs, by the mediation of the Prince Mazares, obtained permiſſion to go unto the Temple of Jupiter Belus every day; which Temple is the moſt ſtately and famous Church in all Babylon; as well becauſe that this God is the Protector of the Aſſyrians, and him whom they pray unto at the beginning of Battels; as alſo becauſe of the Oracles which are there given by the Mouth of a Woman, whom Jupiter Belus made choice of to declare his Will unto them who would know it: And ſince, I think, if my Memory deceive me not, that you have heretofore told me; how you never was at the place of thoſe Oracles all the while you ſtayed at Babylon; and ſince there is no likelihood, that you ſhould ſee it ſince, conſidering the Tumult and Confuſion in which you put the Town at the taking of it; it is therefore requiſite, that I repreſent it unto you in a few words; After one is entred into the ſtately Court of the Temple, and paſſed through thoſe moſt magnificent Gates of Braſs which opens into it; one ſhall find the Door of that prodigious Tower, which ſupports ſeven others above it, unto the top of which one aſcends by winding Stairs, ſupported by Pillars of Copper: In the midſt of every pair of Stairs, there are Seats to reſt upon, and when one is come unto the higheſt Turret of all, one ſhall find a little, but moſt magnificent Temple, wherein is to be ſeen a great Statue of Jupiter Belus, made of maſſy Gold, a Table of Gold alſo, and a Throne of the ſame Mettal, and many both great and rich Veſſels; there is alſo a moſt ſtately Altar, upon which the Chaldeans who firſt conſtituted the Ceremonies of Religion in Babylon, did every year at the grand Sacrifice, burn above a hundred Talents of Incenſe. As one goes out of that, they enter into another, but leſs, in which was a Couch all covered over with Gold, and a Table of the ſame Mettal, with a great Lamp of Gold alſo upon it, which was always burning. This place was not open on any ſide but the Door, which being ſhut, there was no light at all: It was in this place, where that Woman whereof I ſpoke, did reſide in the day time, and on that Couch ſleeps in the Nights, after the example of one who is reported to be in Egypt at Thebes, and another at Patares a Town in Licia: Here I ſay does the Propheteſs live, ſeparated from all the reſt of the World, and delivers Oracles unto thoſe who come and conſult with her.

After this, Chriſantes, I ſhall tell you, how being moved unto it either out of Devotion, or by a kind of Curioſity, when we were one day in the Temple of Jupiter Belus, to wit, in the great Temple below, where every one does ordinarily walk, the Princeſs had a great mind to go into the top of the higheſt Tower, and to viſit this famous Woman of Babylon, and to deſire her aſſiſtance unto the Gods, without any deſign of conſulting with the Oracle at all: How, Chriſantes, may the chance of things be admired; Mazares, who was then in the Temple, preſented his Hand unto the Princeſs, to lead her up thoſe Stairs which were very ſteep; but both he and we were much amazed, when we came to the top of this high Tower, and found the King of Aſſyria without any with him, but the Captain of his Guard, who was come thither to conſult with this Woman; certainly, if the Princeſs had known of his being there, ſhe would not have come thither that day. Since he was but only entred into the little Temple, and had not yet ſpoke with the Propheteſs, he thought this Accident fell out happily for him, and intended to inform himſelf what he was to expect, as the event of his Paſſion; but before he ſpoke unto the Propheteſs, he addreſſed himſelf unto the Princeſs, and told her very civilly; Madam, ſaid he, doubtleſs you are come hither to ſolicite the Gods againſt the King of Aſſyria: But before the Prayers of one ſo vertuous as your ſelf have incenſed the God of this place who is here adored, I beſeech you permit him to conſult, and in your preſence to enquire the intention of the Deity. The Princeſs, who though ſhe could expect nothing from Heaven which was not advantagious for her, conſidering the Innocency of her Life, and Purity of her Thoughts, told him that ſhe was glad to ſee ſuch ſigns of Piety in him, and conſented unto what he deſired; we entred then into that little place deſtined for Oracles, where the Woman who was very fair, and in very magnificent Habit, asked him, as ſhe would have done the meaneſt of his Subjects, and with no more Reſpect, what he would know? I would have you (ſaid he to her, very ſubmiſſively) ſupplicate that God who reveals the Secrets of Men unto you, that he would be pleaſed to tell me by your Mouth, whether the Princeſs Mandana will be eternally inhumane, and whether ever thoſe Torments which I endure will have an end? At theſe words this Woman opened a great Gate of Gold, which was cloſe by her Couch, and kneeling down upon a Cuſhion, ſhe was a long time holding up her Head unto the Mouth of a little obſcure Vault, which that Golden Grate did ſhut up, and which was hewed out of the thickneſs of the Wall; afterwards, being wrapt, and poſſeſſed with a divine Spirit which tranſported her, ſhe unfolded the Treſſes of her Hair, which ſpread about her Shoulders; then riſing up and turning towards the King of Aſſyria, with a Face quite altered, her Eyes ſparkling more than before, her Complexion ruddy, and her Voice more clear, ſhe diſtinctly pronounced theſe Words.

The ORACLE.

Well mayeſt thou hope, to make her mourn
For all her Cruelty and Scorn,
Becauſe hereafter in her Arms,
Thou there ſhalt find ſuch pleaſing Charms,
As quite ſhall terminate thy Pain,
And turn thy Sorrows into Gain.

I leave you to imagine Chriſantes, how much was the Joy of the King of Aſſyria, and how great was the Grief of Mandana; how deep was the deſpair of Mazares, though he durſt not ſhew it, and what a wonder it was unto me; the truth is, I cannot expreſs it: for we did almoſt certainly know there could be no cheat in this Oracle, ſince the King could not know that the Princeſs would come thither; and certainly the Woman was of a very great Reputation, and extraordinary Sanctity, ſo that we could not ſuſpect the leaſt trick in it; alſo it was by reaſon of this good Repute that the Princeſs deſired to ſee her: But O Heavens, how many Tears did this Curioſity coſt her! ſhe went preſently out of the Temple, and ſpoke not a word unto this Woman as ſhe did intend, and went unto the Palace extreamly melancholy: The King of Aſſyria went thither with her; and he was no ſooner in her Chamber, but looking upon her with many ſigns of ſatisfaction in his Countenance; Well, Madam, ſaid he to her, will you contend with the Gods? The Gods, anſwered ſhe, are not unjuſt, and that's all my hope. They are not unjuſt I confeſs (replied he) but withal you muſt acknowledg with me, that they can be no Lyers. I know it well (replied ſhe) but I know alſo that they are incomprehenſible; and it is preſumptuous raſhneſs in Men, to think they can perfectly underſtand their Language. They do explain themſelves ſo clearly (replied he) that I can doubt no longer of my good Fortune. They explain themſelves ſo unjuſtly in appearance (anſwered ſhe) that I cannot believe they are well underſtood: But, Sir, (added the Princeſs, who deſired to be alone and at liberty to bewail this new Misfortune) if it be the pleaſure of the Gods to make an alteration in my Soul, leave all the care of it unto them, and meddle you no more with it; they have power enough to do it themſelves, if they pleaſe to have it ſo; and I pray you leave me a little quietneſs. Cruel Woman (ſaid he, in leaving her) do you reſiſt both Heaven and Earth? but however it is my part to obey you. As he went out, Mazares, who left us in the Temple came in, but ſo ſad, that I wonder we did not ſuſpect the true cauſe of it, yet we had not the leaſt thought of it; but he diſguiſed his Melancholy, under pretence of that which he diſcovered in the Princeſs, which was not a little; You are very generous Mazares, ſaid ſhe to him, not to participate of the King of Aſſyria's Joy, or at leaſt to hide it from me at this time. I proteſt, Madam, anſwered he, you have no cauſe to thank me, for being more ſenſible of your Sorrow than the King of Aſſyria's Joy, ſince, to tell you truly, my Heart does it without any conſultation with my Reaſon, and ſince I do nothing but what I cannot chuſe. Indeed Orſanes told me afterwards, that he was no leſs troubled at the Oracle than the Princeſs was; and this Converſation at this time was not very regular, for ſometimes Mandana would be reſerved, and ſometimes Mazares would ſilently entertain his Thoughts; and Orſanes has told me, that when he did ſecretly call to mind the preſent condition of his Fortune, he could not deplore it enough: Alas, ſaid he to himſelf, what can I hope for? If Mandana ſpeak, it is after ſuch a manner as makes me believe that Artamenes is the only happy Man ſhe loves; and if I hearken unto the Oracle, then the King of Aſſyria muſt have his hopes ſatisfied, and Artamenes muſt be as unfortunate as Mazares: But whilſt this Prince was thus ruminating, the Princeſs coming ſuddenly out of her muſing; How can I think, ſaid ſhe, that my Heart ſhould change its Reſentments? and how can Mandana ever reſolve to make up the Felicity of that Prince, who is the cauſe of all her Misfortunes? which way can I ever apprehend it? If ever this Prodigy come to paſs, the King my Father muſt firſt die; Artamenes muſt not be upon Earth, and I muſt loſe my Reaſon; for without theſe I cannot comprehend how Mandana can ever be Queen of Aſſyria, as ſhe muſt be, if the Oracle be interpreted after the King of Aſſyria's Expoſition. I ſhall never make an end, Chriſantes, if I ſhould repeat all the Diſcourſe between the Princeſs, Mazares, and my ſelf.

The next Morning, the King cauſed a magnificent Sacrifice to be offered, to thank the Gods for the Oracle he had received. But here, I beſeech you, admire the Deſtiny of things; That ſame thing, for which the King did thank the Gods, the ſame did incenſe the People, who began to grumble, and ſay it was fitter to offer a Sacrifice to appeaſe the Gods, than to thank them: That the War was unjuſt, that the Princeſs Mandana was wronged; that the Babylonians ought to reſtore her unto the King her Father: Thus when they began to diſcant upon the Actions of their Prince, they fell to Murmur, and from Murmur it grew to Inſolence, and to Sedition, and at laſt an abſolute Revolt. Mean while Winter came faſt on, and all was covered with Snow; but all this did not make the Beſiegers give over their Deſign, and continued it ſo cloſe, that notwithſtanding the vaſt greatneſs of the Town, there entred no Victuals into it: Yet, notwithſtanding, the Oracle kept up the Heart of the King of Aſſyria: but for all that, he was neceſſitated a few days after, for the Famine beginning to encreaſe, and pinch the People, they began to caſt off their Obedience unto their King; and in one Night, this great Town had more Enemies in Arms within the Walls, than without; altho the King of the Medes Army, as you know, was become vaſtly great, ſince the defeat of the King of Aſſyria, becauſe many Princes did then quit him, and joyn'd themſelves with Ciaxares. Never was greater Confuſion than this of Babylon. Some took up Arms to force the King of Aſſyria to reſtore the Princeſs unto the King of Medes; others were in Arms to keep her, and by her to make an advantagious Peace: Some there were, who being not only deprived of all Reaſon, but Humanity, did ſpeak of ſacrificing her; others on the contrary, maintained that ſhe deſerved to have Altars erected unto her Vertue and Conſtancy: ſome would now get to maintain themſelves from thoſe who had too much; and others, without any other pretence, maintained they were in Arms to ſhake off the Yoak of Royalty, and make themſelves free, ſince Fortune afforded them ſuch a favourable Opportunity: And indeed, they all talked ſo inſolently, and high, as I am verily perſwaded, that they did contribute as much to the taking of the Town by their Revolt, as all the ſtrength of Ciaxares his Army; or to ſay better, I think the Gods intending to protect the Innocency of the Princeſs, and to puniſh their Rebellion, did make uſe of themſelves for that purpoſe, and blinded them to their own Deſtruction: And although it ſeemed, that the Fury of the People was advantagious unto the Princeſs, conſidering the ſtate of things; yet in lieu of rejoycing her, it did much grieve her; it being moſt certain, that nothing is more horrible, nor entrencheth ſo much upon the Soveraign Authority of the Gods, as this rebellious Crime, which entrencheth upon the Soveraign Authority of Kings, who are the Images of the Gods. Yet, as the King of Aſſyria is a Prince of a great Heart, and Mazares of no leſs to ſecond him, ſo he hoped to appeaſe this Diſorder, and reſolved to take the only courſe by which popular Inſolency is reduced unto Reaſon, which is by Example, and Puniſhment of Mutineers: But ſince the thing could not be done without ſome danger, becauſe if the Beſiegers ſhould make an Aſſault upon the Town, at the time that the People were ſo much incenſed, it was to be feared, they would yeild up the Town; and the King of Aſſyria apprehended that then he could not ſave the Princeſs, eſpecially in the Night, when the Beſiegers were moſt buſy in giving Alarms, and when the People are apteſt to attempt any thing, becauſe they who are moſt forward in ſuch tumultuous Occaſions, cannot be known in the dark. He conſulted then with Mazares upon it, who told him, that it was Prudence in thoſe who do not reſolve to flee, yet to know how they may do it, if any neceſſity ſhould preſs them unto it. It is good Reaſon (ſaid the King of Aſſyria unto him) for all Babylon, and my Crown to boot, are nothing to me in compariſon of Mandana: And at this time, if I ſhould loſe Mandana, I ſhould be in danger to loſe my Scepter as well as her, it being to be imagined, that the People will not then endure me, nor ſuffer me to carry away Mandana with my Life: The main difficulty will be, to find out a way to eſcape, and get out of Babylon if I ſhould be put to it; for, as for a placeof Retreat, it is eaſy to find one; for ſince Aribeus is in Pteria, and keeps half of Cappadocia, I cannot wiſh a ſafer Sanctuary. This Traitor was ſo cunning, as to make the People believe, that the Princeſs was not averſe unto ſuch an advantagious Marriage; and that it was only the King her Father whom ſhe feared, and cauſed her to do as ſhe did. But before he could go unto Pteria, he muſt get out of Babylon, and that was the great difficulty, there being dangers in it both without and within the Town. All this while, the Soul of Mazares, was in Torment, and his Mind much divided.

As he was good and generous, he could not without great difficulty contribute any thing unto the Misfortune of the Princeſs; but as he was paſſionately in love with her, it was much more difficult for him to conſent that ever ſhe ſhould come into the Power of Artamenes; and for his own particular Intereſt, he had rather ſhe were in the Hands of a hated Lover, than a beloved Lover: Not but that he was terrified at the Oracle, yet the averſion which the Princeſs had unto him, did make him leſs eſteem it; and he found much more danger in Artamenes than in him. Jealouſy therefore being predominate in his Heart, he applied himſelf mainly to the King of Aſſyria's Deſires, and that with ſucceſs, tho it was not eaſy to get out of Babylon unſeen: But, Chriſantes, I am perſwaded, that there is nothing ſo difficult, which Love and Jealouſy together cannot bring to paſs. This Prince then told the King of Aſſyria, that he would find out an Expedient for it, and bad him, ſince he deſired him to do his endeavours in it, to command the Women which waited upon the Princeſs to let her have no Clothes but ſuch as were White, according to the Aſſyrian Faſhion, which yet ſhe had not worn, and alſo the like unto Arianta and my ſelf: The King of Aſſyria urging him to explain himſelf and his Reaſons for it; Mazares told him, that this courſe would prove infallible, and indeed made the King confeſs thet it was ingenious, and preſently gave orders for it; ſo that the next Morning, Arianta and myſelf much wondred when we found all our Clothes taken from us, and white ones left in their room, ſuch as Women of Quality uſed to wear in Aſſyria. I asked the reaſon of it, and they told me, the King would have it ſo, becauſe if it ſhould chance the Sedition increaſed, he might more eaſily put the Princeſs into the Temple, and for her better Security, to have them paſs for Aſſyrians. Since Mandana was not yet awake, Arianta and I did dreſs our ſelves in them, thinking indeed, that this way might conduce to her Safety: But when ſhe called her Women and went to dreſs her ſelf, and when ſhe ſaw they gave her white Garments, after the Aſſyrian Mode, altho they were very rich, yet ſhe had ſuch an extream Averſion to them, that I am verily perſwaded the Gods did foretel unto her her Miſfortune; ſhe would not by any means wear them, but when thoſe which waited upon her, told her, with Tears in their Eyes, that it was not in their power to give her any other, ſhe did much againſt gainſt her Mind put them on, and ſighing, ſaid, That the change of her Habit ſhould never change her Heart: I would make her underſtand the reaſons which they gave for it, but ſhe was not ſatisfied with them, nor any thing pleaſed with this new kind of compulſion.

Mean while, the King of Aſſyria and Mazares being reſolved to puniſh the People, were very diligent in giving out orders to that purpoſe: The King in Perſon with all the Grandees of the Court, was ready to teach the People the Duty which they owed unto their Legitimate King; when a Spy which had been in the Army of Ciaxares, came unto him in a great amaze, and told him, that within three or four hours within Night, he ſhould ſee the River Emphrates dry, and forty thouſand Men enter at both ends of the Town. At the firſt the King of Aſſyria would not believe it, but the Spy did ſo directly name the place, where Artamenes cauſed two great Trenches to be digged, to turn the River into them, that he gave credit unto his words; and the Example of the River Gidde, rendred this more probable: The Spy further told him, that if the Snow had not hindred the Pioneers, the Deſign had been executed before now. But tho he was very circumſtantial in his Relation, yet notwithſtanding the King of Aſſyria, with Mazares, went unto the top of the Tower of Jupiter Belus, the better to diſcover the Works of his Enemies, and when they were come there, then the Spy ſhewed him, tho it were far off, the Earth which the Enemy had thrown up, as well to ſhelter themſelves from being ſeen, as to empty the Trenches which were to receive the River Euphrates. You might imagine, wiſe Chriſantus, in what a condition this Prince was: He ſaw from that high Place a whole great Town in Arms againſt him; and he ſaw that he was ready to be aſſaulted in ſuch a manner, that tho the People had ſeconded him, yet he ſhould have much ado to repel his Enemies: for ſince the River Euphrates was very broad, he conceived the Enemy would enter at both ends of the Town in compleat Battalia, and that he had not time to raiſe up ſuch Works as would prevent them. But this was not the worſt he feared, for he thought, that as ſoon as the Enemy appeared, the People would endavour to take away the Princeſs, and make their own Conditions with Ciaxares, by rendring her unto him: And ſeeing himſelf driven to ſuch a neceſſity, as that he muſt defend the Palace where ſhe was, both againſt the People and the King of Medes, he concluded it to be a thing impoſſible.

At the laſt, being out of any hopes to keep Babylon, and the Princeſs, and Love prompting him to ſome other courſe, he endeavoured to execute that Deſign which he and Mazares had contrived. He went down from the Tower in all haſte, and ſeemed as if he would appeaſe the People by Lenity, hoping thereby to gain time, whilſt Mazares put all things in a readineſs for the execution of their Enterprize at the beginning of the Night, if there were any need of it. The King of Aſſyria reſolved not to depart until the Deſign of his Enemies was in execution; for he imagined that Artamenes would enter the Town at both ends of it, and that other places would therefore be leſs guarded; becauſe thoſe two places would take up moſt of their Men. But upon a ſudden we heard a terrible noiſe, for the River being drained in a moment, and the Beſiegers entred, they cauſed a moſt horrible Diſorder and Confuſion. I ſhall not need to relate any further of it unto you, ſince I do imagine you were there; but for my part, I never in all my Life heard ſuch an Aſtoniſhment as this cauſed in all the Streets of Babylon.

In the mean time we were in great Fears; for altho the Princeſs did imagine that perhaps it was Artamenes who would come and deliver her, yet the danger wherein ſhe apprehendeded him, cauſed her Fears. As for the King her Father, ſhe imagined that he would not venture himſelf in this Attempt. As we were thus betwixt Hopes and Fears, the King of Aſſyria came in to us: Mazares ſtayed in the Garden of the Palace with them who were appointed for our Guard: But the King entring furiouſly, Madam (ſaid he to the Princeſs, to the end ſhe ſhould make no reſſiſtance) the People of Babylon are in great diſorder, and ſince they believe you to be the cauſe of the War, they would have you in their Power, therefore I muſt put you into ſome place of better ſecurity than this. Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) ſince I have put my ſelf into the Cuſtody of the Gods, it is my Duty to wait upon their Pleaſures, and ſubmit unto what they ſhall ordain me; and you would do me a great favour, if you would leave me unto their Protection; but when ſhe ſaw four or five Men in Arms enter, knowing ſhe was not in a condition to reſiſt, and not knowing that what the King of Aſſyria ſaid was untrue, ſhe went with them, and Arianta and I followed her; ſhe asked then where Mazares was? and he anſwering her, that ſhe ſhould ſee him preſently, ſhe went whither they conducted her. Then were we led into the Garden of the Palace, where Mazares did indeed ſtay for us: Mandana no ſooner ſaw him, but letting the King of Aſſyria's Hand go, ſhe gave hers unto him, ſuppoſing now ſhe had no cauſe to fear, ſince he was with her. Then they led us unto a back Door, which almoſt joyns unto the Gates of the Town, which the Troops of Mazares guarded, and who were acquainted with what was deſigned. When we were ready to go out of the Garden, which was of a huge bigneſs, we ſaw, by the help of a Candle which was brought, that the King of Aſſyria, the Prince Mazares, and ten Men who were to be of the Party, took every one of them a white Caſſack, which covered them all over, and that they covered their Heads alſo with white. This cauſed us to think, that the white Garments which they gave us, were deſigned for the ſame uſe; as thoſe which theſe Princes, and thoſe Mens were, altho we could not imagine unto what end. Afterwards they brought twelve white Horſes, Saddles and Bridles were of the ſame colour: The King of Aſſyria got upon one of them, and would have the Princeſs to ride behind him, but ſhe refuſed, and did chuſe Mazares, tho with much Reluctancy; yet the noiſe in the Town did ſo encreaſe, tho we were far enough from the place where it was aſſaulted, that her fear of falling into the Hands of rude and inſolent People, cauſed her at the laſt to let Mazares have the care of her Safety. Two Men of Quality of thoſe ten took up Arianta and me behind them; the Candle being put out, and the Door open, we went ſtraight unto that Gate of the Town, which as I have already told you was near it. Then the King of Aſſyria and Mazares commanded a Captain, in a low Voice, I mean, a Captain which guarded the Gate, to go and advertiſe all the Princes and Souldiers, that they ſhould fight it out no longer ſince the Town was already loſt; and that as many as would, might take the advantage of the dark Night to ſave themſelves, and take the benefit of this Gate. We were not above twelve paces from the Walls, but the King of Aſſyria, who went a little before, did ride very ſoftly, leſt his Horſes Feet ſhould make too great a Noiſe, more fearing the Ears than the Eyes of thoſe we ſhould meet: for, Chriſantes, the Ingenuity of this Deviſe was, in that the Prince Mazares conſidering that all the Fields were covered with Snow, and becauſe there was a great Miſt when we went out, it was impoſſible that Artamenes ſhould make good his Round; and therefore he thought it would be no hard matter to paſs between two Courts of Guard, and never be perceived, ſince White is not eaſily diſcovered in the Snow, and in the Night, eſpecially ſince the Moon did not ſhine.

This Invention of white-Horſes, and white-Habits, made us inviſible to thoſe who met us; and they who we did meet not being in White as we were, were diſcovered a good diſtance off, ſo that we could ſhun them before they could ſee us: There was nothing therefore that the King of Aſſyria feared, but the Neighing of the Horſes, and the Horſes Feet: As for the firſt of theſe he put it unto Fortune, but as for the noiſe of the Horſes feet, the Snow was ſo ſoft that they could not be heard. The King of Aſſyria finding this, went a little faſter, and preſently after we diſcovered the Guard of Ciaxares his Army. To tell you, Chriſantes, what the Princeſs thought, to ſee her ſelf in this Equipage, and out of Babylon at that time of Night, and on Horſe-back, amongſt a company of Men all in White, going in ſuch great ſilence, I ſhould lengthen my Story. At the firſt ſhe was glad that ſhe had eſcaped the Fury of the rude Multitude, ſo inſolent as to mutiny againſt their Prince; and ſhe thought, that whitherſoever they carried her, it would be incomparably more eaſy for Artamenes to get her out of the King of Aſſyria's Power, than in Babylon, which ſhe thought impregnable. Therefore conceiving it to be moſt advantagious for Artamenes, and for her own Liberty, ſhe went with them without any reſiſtance; and thinking of nothing but a ready way how to advertiſe Artamenes that ſhe was out of Babylon: But ſhe no ſooner diſcovered afar off the Guard which before I told you of, but ſhe changed her Mind; for when ſhe ſaw her ſelf ſo near Relief, ſhe was in a mind to cry out; but thinking that if ſhe did ſo, ſhe ſhould cauſe Mazares to periſh as well as the King of Aſſyria, therefore ſhe was ſilent: But whilſt ſhe was conſulting in her Mind about it, the King of Aſſyria turned more upon his left Hand, and fortunately eſcaped his firſt Danger. Yet notwithſtanding, ſince ſhe imagined that we ſhould meet ſome other Troops, ſhe began to ſpeak unto Mazares; who preſently deſired her to hold her peace. Generous Prince, (ſaid ſhe unto him, notwithſtanding his deſire, and ſpeaking very low leſt the King of Aſſyria ſhould underſtand) if you have any real compaſſion upon me and my Misfortunes, permit me, as ſoon as we ſhall meet any of the King my Father's Troops, to call them unto my Relief; and I beſeech you promiſe me that you will not oppoſe their Endeavours to deliver me; and by that Conſequence, you will not hazard your own Life, which is very dear unto me. You may conceive I could have done it without ſpeaking unto you; but being ſo much obliged unto you as I am, I ſhould think the Gods would puuniſh me if I ſhould cauſe your Death. Madam, (ſaid he unto her, lower than ſhe ſpoke) the Gods do know how much I wiſh you ſatiſfaction: But, Madam, I only promiſed you to prevent the King, from attempting any thing againſt that Reverence which is your due: And I promiſed that, without any ſcruple, becauſe I did him ſervice alſo by it, in preventing venting him from committing a Crime; and I do again promiſe you, Madam, that as long as I live you ſhall not ſuffer the leaſt violence from him: But, Madam, can I in honour betray him thus, to let him be killed, and commit you into the Hands of his Enemies? Yet notwithſtanding, Madam, if you will do it you may, but I proteſt to you, before the Gods who hear me, that though I do eſcape from the Fury of your Souldiers, yet will I run my Sword through my Heart, to the end I may not be blamed and ſhamed by ſuch an Act, which doubtleſs you have not conſidered before you did ſolicite me. Moreover, Madam, ſince it is Night, in ſtriking at me they may chance hit you; and ſo your deſires to recover your Liberty may become your Death: In the Name of the Gods therefore, Madam, do not expoſe your ſelf unto a Danger, whereof perhaps I cannot heal you. The Princeſs was ſo troubled, and Mazares ſpake ſo movingly, that ſhe knew not what to reſolve on; ſometimes ſhe reſolved to cry out; ſometimes pity of Mazares reſtrained her.

Afterwards taking up the Reſolution to call the firſt ſhe ſaw, ſhe found that ſhe had not the power to do it, and that ſhe determined upon a thing which was impoſſible for her. For my part, I know that it was not in my power to pronounce a word; and when I would have ſpoke, I trembled out of aſtoniſhment and fear, for we ſaw in the Field many Tents, Sentinels, and Courts of Guard, Men which marched, and others that ſtood ſtill. But the King of Aſſyria, who was our Guide, did ſometimes turn to the right Hand, and ſometimes to the Left, and handſomly avoided all thoſe whom the whiteneſs of the Snow diſcovered unto him. But, Chriſantes, to leave that place, which troubled us ſo much, give me leave to tell you, that after we had avoided the Troops of Ciaxares above an hundred times, and were not above two Furlongs from a Wood, in which the King of Aſſyria feared no danger, becauſe it was very thick and dark, and he was acquainted with all the turnings in it, having been often hunting in it. But the Horſe on which Mazares and the Princeſs did ride, began violently to Neigh, when we were within forty paces from a place, where a Company pany of Archers who were horſed did then quarter; who having received Orders to come nearer Babylon, did leave that place and go thither in all haſte: Some of theſe Archers being already horſed, and having heard this neighing from that ſide where they were, took the Alarm, and went towards the place where they heard the Noiſe; but ſeeing nothing, they would have returned, had not one of their Horſes neighed, in anſwer as it were, unto the firſt, and cauſed them to advance further on. Mean while the King of Aſſyria who conducted us, mended his pace, and we went faſter than before; ſo that ſometimes we ſaw theſe Men come ſtreight towards us, and ſometimes again go from us: For their parts I believe they much vexed, to hear Horſes and could find none. But at the laſt, being out of hopes to find us, becauſe we changed our way, ſometimes on the one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, they ſhot their Arrows at random, and levelled ſo unluckily, that one of their Arrows did give Mazares a ſlight Wound in his Shoulder; and another came ſo near Mandana's Head, that the extremity of her Fears made her to recover her Voice, and to cry out, though ſhe did not intend it: This cry being heard by thoſe who ſhot, they gallopped directly to the place where they thought they heard it. But in the mean while the King of Aſſyria ſhifted places, and in lieu of going forward, he went backward, and bad us ride faſter. But ſince we were not above thirty Paces from the Wood, he cauſed thoſe eight which carried no Women to ſtand ſtill, until ſuch time as he imagined us to be in the Wood; and then he and his Men gallopped away as faſt as they could, and vaniſhed out of the ſight of them whom he had fought with awhile, who doubtleſs did think there was ſome Enchantment in the place. At his return, we underſtood how they ſaw two of thoſe who aſſaulted them to fall dead, and one of his Troop received a ſlight hurt. As the Wood was dark and black, the very ſame whiteneſs which made us inviſible in the Plains, did help the King of Aſſyria to diſcover us again, and to join Companies.

In conclusion, Chriſantes, being come into this Wood, as I told you, the King of Aſſyria did lead us unto a little kind of Habitation, where a ſort of poor Men lived, whoſe Profeſſion was to find out a kind of Earth, whereof the wonderful Cement wherewith the Walls of Babylon were built, is made: and when day begun to break, we lighted off our Horſes, and paſſed away all the day in that Cabin, where our wearineſs afforded us more reſt, than the Accommodations of that place could. But, Chriſantes, not to ſpend more time in relating things of little Conſequence, we went with much wearineſs the next Night, unto a little Town which our Army had not taken, nor as yet been on that Side, neither was of ſtrength to defend themſelves if you had come unto it. The King of Aſſyria there got a Coach for the Princeſs, where Arianta and I found room alſo; and both Princes went on Horſeback as our Convoy.

But without any further particularizing the Way we went, we came at the laſt into Cappadocia, and a little after unto Pteria: At our firſt arrival, the Princeſs was very much joyed to ſee it; yet a while after ſhe found her ſelf much more unhappy than ſhe thought; for the thought of being then a Captive in that place where ſhe had been ſo long free and abſolute, did extreamly double her Sorrow. Moreover, the imagination ſhe ſhould ſo domineer over the King her Father's Subjects, was a great vexation to her: But the great torment of all was, that ſhe was ſtill in the King of Aſſyria's Power, and knew no way to let Artamenes know where ſhe was. Mean while Mazares continued always very Civil, Obliging, & Amorous, and the King of Aſſyria was ſtill very courſly treated.

A few days after, when the taking of Babylon was more certainly known, he conſulted with Aribeus what was beſt to be done; but when he heard that Ciaxares his Army was marching towards Cappadocia, they brought us hither by reaſon of the conveniency of the Sea, which the King of Aſſyria thought would be a way to prevent the Princeſs from ever coming into the hands of Artamenes. Aribeus and he endeavoured all they could to get up freſh Troops, making their Rendezvous at Pteria, to the end it might not be diſcovered we were at Sinope. But preſently after, they had intelligence that your Army came up ſo faſt, that it was impoſſible for them to get any ſuch conſiderable Force together as could give a ſecond Battel; which did drive the King of Aſſyria into extream Deſpair, and ſpoke with much more violence than heretofore he uſed: Yet whether he was ſubmiſſive, or whether he was furious, all was one, for he could no way move Mandana, to give him one favourable word. Yet one day he called Mazares unto him, and laid before him all his Misfortunes: Truly (ſaid he unto him) I am brought to ſuch a paſs, that I have no other conſolation to hope for in my Life, but to make Artamenes as unfortunate as my ſelf, although it be in a different manner: The Oracle indeed does make me hope well, but Mandana drives me into utter deſpair, and Fortune has ſo defeated all my Deſigns, and I am reduced unto ſuch Extremities as are above both my Patience and my Reaſon: That which I intend, (purſued this deſperate Prince) is to make ſure of the Gallies and Ships within this Port, ſo that as ſoon as I ſee the Army of Ciaxares appear, and find that I am not able to oppoſe it, I can then embark with Aribeus, and be ſure to carry her out of the reach of Artamenes. But, Sir, (anſwered Mazares, much grieved) what courſe will you then take? I know not well, (replied the King of Aſſyria) but if all the Princes, my Allies, do deny me Sanctuary within their Dominions, I will rather turn Pirat, than yield up the Princeſs unto Artamenes; yes, Mazares, I will rather periſh a thouſand times; and if I am purſued at Sea by Artamenes, (which as yet he cannot do, having no Ships for it) I will rather ſplit my Ship againſt a Rock, than be taken and loſe the Princeſs: Moreover, I muſt not be far of Mandana, but keep cloſe with her, and wait upon the event of the Oracle. As for you, ſaid he, my dear Mazares, it is not juſt that I ſhould engage you any deeper in my Misfortunes, though you would, I would not ſuffer it; therefore I wiſh you to go back unto the King your Father, and endeavour to be more happy than I am. Mazares was now put to a ſhrewd Dilemma, for he could not conſent to leave the Princeſs alone with the King of Aſſyria; and yet he perceived, by the King's manner of ſpeakin ſpeaking unto him, that he would not ſuffer him to accompany him any longer; yet he preſſed him to ſtay; but the more urgent he was in it, the more obſtinate was the King: Furthermore he perceived, that if he departed, the Princeſs would be the moſt unfortunate Woman in the World; ſo that both in reſpect of his Pity, and in reſpect of his Paſſion, he was infinitely to be lamented. At laſt being tranſported with ſuch Paſſions as were unknown unto himſelf, he came unto the Princeſs, and ingenuouſly diſcovered the King of Aſſyria's Deſign: You may well imagine what Sorrow and Deſpair this News brought unto her, eſpecially when he told that he would by no means permit him to ſtay any longer with him. Ah, Mazares, ſaid ſhe unto him, I ſhall abſolutely die if you forſake me; and there is no Reſolution ſo violent which I ſhall not take, if I be left alone under the King of Aſſyria's protection. In the Name of the Gods, ſaid ſhe unto him, perſwade him, and tell him, that he ſhall never obtain the leaſt part of my Affection: And by conſequence you will do him no ill Office, if you can move him to hearken unto my Prayers and Tears, and if you can procure my Liberty. In the Name of the Gods, once more conſider what a moſt lamentable Deſtiny will it be for Mandana to wander upon the Seas, with a Prince whom ſhe hates, and ſhall more and more hate him; and who ſhall reſolve to throw her ſelf into the bottom of the Sea, the firſt time that he ſhall ſpeak of his unjuſt Paſſion unto her. Conſider well, Mazares, what you have to do, and know, that the Gods will require at your Hands an Account of my Life, if you be the Cauſe of my Death. Would you not have me live, and acknowledg my great Obligations unto you? Would you have me die the moſt miſerable Woman upon Earth? O, Madam, (anſwered Mazares, with extream melancholy) I wiſh the Thoughts of my Heart, and how much I would do for you, were well known unto you. I do know (anſwered ſhe) that you are the moſt obliging Prince upon the Earth; and that nothing hinders you from ſatisfying my Deſires, but an ill-grounded Scruple of Generoſity; for indeed, Mazares, I am fully perſwaded, that you do compaſſionate my Miſfortunes, and that you intend Friendſhip unto me: But yet ſince you cannot ſave me, you will ſuffer me to periſh, and all becauſe you are afraid to do an unjuſt Act. But know, generous Prince, that it is no injuſtice to prevent another from committing a moſt horrible piece of Injuſtice.

In ſhort, Chriſantes, the Princeſs ſpoke ſo prevalently unto Mazares, that he deſired two days time to reſolve with himſelf what to do: But, O Heavens! Orſanes told me, that he verily believed, that the turbulency of his Thoughts during this time would have coſt him his Life. Sometimes he reſolved to be faithful unto the King of Aſſyria in ſpight of his Paſſion; ſometimes he would not quench his Love, but in favour of Mandana; afterwards not being able to reſolve either upon the one or the other, he thought how he might benefit himſelf by the Miſfortune of another. At the laſt, (ſaid he unto himſelf) I ſee Mandana does eſteem, and is very friendly unto me; yet it is but a bare Eſteem, and a Friendſhip only, though ſhe muſt know that I love her: Moreover, there is a great difference between the Terms on which the King of Aſſyria ſtands, and thoſe on which I am with her, for there is a natural Antipathy between her and him; but ſhe is very friendly unto me, and I am perſwaded it is not far off a diſpoſition to receive ſome impreſſions of Love, as well as much Tenderneſs and Eſteem; yet I know very well, that there is more likelihood that I ſhall be unhappy, than he has hopes of Mandana's Love: But, alas, from what other courſe can I find any more ſweetneſs and ſatisfaction from her? If I continue faithful unto the King of Aſſyria, then he will put to Sea with the Princeſs; and if I leave her, I am certain ſhe will hate me for being ſo inhumane, as to expoſe her unto ſo great a Torment: I am certain I ſhall never ſee her again, and I am ſure to endure an intolerable Torment, in thinking ſhe is with the King of Aſſyria, who ſtill has great hopes of her. On the other ſide, if I betray a Prince from whom I have the honour to be a Kinſman, to whom I am a Vaſſal, who has made choice of me to be his Confident; and if I ſhould put the Princeſs into the Hands of Artamenes, ſhould I not then be the moſt unhappy Man alive? I ſhould commit a Crime, and ſuch a one as would make me moſt unfortunate, there being nothing more inſufferable, than to ſee the Party loved, in the power of a Rival who is loved. O no, Mazares cannot make choice of either, ſince he ſees a Crime, and a Misfortune on both ſides. If he hearken unto Reaſon, it will tell him, that we ought not to betray thoſe who truſt us: If he give ear unto his Paſſion, it will tell him qu[illegible] contrary, that we muſt never forſake the Party loved, and that all one can do to poſſeſs her, is juſt. Which way ſoever I carry the matter, I muſt either betray the King of Aſſyria, or the Princeſs, and betray my ſelf alſo, ſince I wound my Reputation in it; Therefore if I muſt needs commit a Crime, let me commit that which is moſt advantagious to me, and which will keep me from dying deſperate.

In concluſion, Chriſantes, this amorous Prince, in ſpight of all his Vertue, was ſo tranſported with the violence of his Love, that he reſolved not only to betray the King of Aſſyria, but to delude Mandana alſo: yet truly, I think, never any did more ſeverely puniſh himſelf than Mazares did, by his perpetual remorſe of Soul; for I never in all my melancholy did equal his; yet ſince he was fully reſolved what to do, he ſought out means to aſſure himſelf of a Galley, and eaſily found one; becauſe the King of Aſſyria intending to make uſe of all the Galleys and Ships in Sinope, he did put out thoſe who formerly commanded them, and put in others which did more abſolutely depend upon him: There was one of theſe Captains, who knowing certainly he ſhould be put out as the reſt were, who grumbled exceedingly at it; and unto him Mazares addreſſed himſelf, in whoſe Soul he diſcovered ſuch a Diſpoſition as was fit for his deſign. Mazares then having made ſure of this Galley, was certain he could carry away the Princeſs when he pleaſed; for his Commands paſſed within the Caſtle, as well as the King of Aſſyria's; and ſince the Caſtle was ſo near the Haven, he had not above twenty Paces to go before he was at the Galley, which this Captain who was of the Conſpiracy commanded, for by fortune the Galley was on that ſide: But ſince he was an expert Man, and uſed to War, he told Mazares, that the better to ſecure his Deſign, and alſo to ſatisfy his Revenge upon his Companions, he would ſet Fire on all the Galleys and Ships which remained in the Port, leſt they ſhould follow after, and that all theſe new Captains might not long enjoy their new conferred Offices, or at leaſt put them into ſuch a condition as they ſhould not be able to do any Execution. Although Mazares did ſee it was well thought upon, and almoſt neceſſary for his Deſign, yet it went againſt the hair of his Diſpoſition, not for fear of the Ships, in which few People would be loſt, but leſt it ſhould fire the Town; notwithſtanding the Captain ſaid thus unto him; Sir, although Sinope ſhould be ſet on fire, yet it is a Rebellious Town, and deſerves it: And as for the King of Aſſyria, who troubles you ſo much, the Fire will be quenched before it can reach the Caſtle: Truth is, this Captain ſpoke ſo rationally, that Mazares conſented unto him, and the Captain took upon him the Execution of the Enterprize.

This Prince intending to gain the Heart of Mandana, deſigned to carry her into Bithynia, where he was in hopes to find ſome place of Security, and indeed he could not make a better choice; for he was Kinſman unto Arſamones, and Arſamones was Enemy unto the King of Aſſyria, by reaſon of the Princeſs Iſtrina, with whom he was in good favour all the while ſhe was in Babylon: Moreover, he made War againſt another Lover of Mandana, who was the King of Pontus, and Artamenes having moved Ciaxares to lend ſome Forces unto his Enemy, therefore he thought that he could not make choice of a ſafer Sanctuary. At that time there came into Sinope a famous Pirate, who was reported to be a Man of Quality and great Courage, who being much Weather-beaten, put in there to repair his Ships: The King of Aſſyria received him very kindly, and told Mazares that he was even raviſhed with the happy meeting with him, becauſe that by that time the Ships of this Pirate were ready to make ſail, he would put to Sea with him, and be under his Conduct, for he was a Man whom none ever knew conquered; and knew all the Seas better than any other Man. Mazares, underſtanding the King of Aſſyria's Deſign ſo well, did make more haſte to execute his own; and went unto the Princeſs, Madam (ſaid he to her, in a moſt melancholy manner) there is a predominate Power, which I cannot reſiſt, and which makes me reſolve to betray the King of Aſſyria, and carry you out of his reach: He has a deſign to carry you away very ſhortly; therefore he muſt be preſently prevented: I asked you ſometime to reſolve with my ſelf, and my Reſolution is ſetled; therefore, if you pleaſe, there is a Galley ready to receive you the next Night. Ah, Mazares, (ſaid ſhe unto him) is it poſſible it can be ſo ſoon? To tell you, Chriſantes, all that Mandana ſaid, by way of thanks for the Compaſſion which he had on her Misfortunes, would be a very difficult task, ſo much did ſhe aggravate her Acknowledgments unto him.

Mazares received her Thanks with ſo much Confuſion and Turbulency of Mind, that ſhe thought her ſelf the more obliged, ſuppoſing that the betraying of the King of Aſſyria was the only cauſe of it: But Mazares (ſaid ſhe to him) which way ſhall we go, to go ſafely unto ſome place where the King my Father is? Madam (anſwered he) when we are out of the power of your Enemy? we ſhall then think better upon that: It's true, (ſaid ſhe) and ſo preſently left him: But Night being come, and well on, the Prince Mazares, who had not only gained the good Will of thoſe who kept the Caſtle Gate which was towards the Port, but alſo all the Souldiers in the Caſtle, went to fetch the Princeſs, who was much troubled what to do with Arianta, in whom ſhe did not confide; ſhe thought therefore to carry her with her, becauſe if ſhe were left behind, ſhe would make a great noiſe of the Matter: We told her therefore that the King of Aſſyria, had ſent Mazares unto the Princeſs to tell her, that ſhe muſt take Shipping, and becauſe ſhe ſhould not ſuſpect any thing, we ſeeming to be very ſorry in yielding obedience to him; for we began to think that ſhe kept intelligence with the King.

I forgot to tell you, that Mandana, who would as well as ſhe could make it known unto Mazares, that ſhe had a care of his Protection, had writ a Letter unto the King of Aſſyria: but whilſt we were ſtaying in the outer Chamber, at that hour when Mazares told us we were to depart, the Princeſs bethought her ſelf, how ſhe had forgotten to leave the Letter upon the Table, and entreated him that he would take ſo much pains as to carry it thither, telling him, that if he would open it, he might there find what ſhe had written unto the King concerning him, ſo that the Prince took it, and carried it into the Princeſs's Chamber, where, as I adviſed him, he did read the Letter; I will not relate the Contents of it, for you will preſently after imagine it. So, Chriſantes, we got out of the Caſtle, and we took Ship, and were preſently out of Sinope; immediately after, we ſaw the Port all on fire, and in a moment after that, all the Town alſo, which did extreamly ſurprize and grieve the Princeſs; for her Soul was ſo tender and full of pitty, that ſhe would never have conſented unto it if ſhe had known of the Project; but yet her Joy to be out of the King of Aſſyria's Power, did comfort her in thoſe Sorrows which proceeded only from Compaſſion; and ſhe termed Mazares her Deliverer a hundred times over.

Mean while, the Sea began to be high, and the Mariners told us there was like to be a Storm, as preſently after it began, and the Wind which was ſo favourable for us, turned quite contrary, and whether we would or no, did blow us above twenty times towards the Port of Sinope: To tell you how the Princeſs was troubled at this Accident, would make you ſad, as we were; It will be ſufficient to tell you, how ſhe moved Mazares to promiſe her, that in caſe the Tempeſt was above the Pilots art, or the force of Oars, he would rather ſplit the Galley againſt the Caſtle Tower, than to land again in the Port of Sinope: At the laſt, day beginning to dawn, our Fears were leſs, as well becauſe the Terrors of Darkneſs vaniſhed, as becauſe at the Sun-riſing, the Winds were calmer.

The Princeſs being then upon the Deck, diſcovered that there were Souldiers in Sinope fighting in the midſt of the Flames, at the Foot of the Tower: She no ſooner ſaw it, but looking upon Mazares with extream joy; Ah generous Prince (ſaid ſhe unto him) perhaps the Tempeſt has been our Friend, ſince if it had not been, I ſhould not have ſeen what I do. See (ſaid ſhe unto him) look upon the Troops which are fighting in Sinope; without all doubt it is the King my Father his Army, and perhaps Artamenes, is there alſo; if ſo, it is eaſy for him to become Maſter of a burning Town, and to take the King of Aſſyria alſo: Therefore, my dear Deliverer, give command unto the Rowers that they make no ſuch haſte away; Let them ſend one in a little Boat to ſee whether it be as I ſay, or no: For if it be, there is no need of going any further, ſince we have relief ſo near. Mazares hearing the Princeſs ſay ſo, began to change colour; and looked a long while upon the Troops which ſhe ſhewed him, and he knew much better than ſhe, that they wete the Troops of Ciaxares; therefore without giving any anſwer unto the Princeſs, he gave command to row away with all poſſible haſte. Mandana being extreamly ſurprized at this Command, and believing that ſhe did not well underſtand him, or that the Prince had miſtook himſelf: My dear Deliverer (ſaid ſhe unto him) do you know what you ſay, and did you hear me? O Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and kneeled) beſtow no more that name upon me, whereof I am unworthy; and ſuſpend your Judgment of me, I beſeech you, until you know what I have done againſt my ſelf, before I will attempt any thing againſt you: Do not call me either your Deliverer or your Raviſher, nor pronounce an unjuſt Sentence againſt him who is the moſt paſſionate of all your Adorers: How (ſaid the Princeſs, in a mighty maze) can Mazares not be generous! is it poſſible he ſhould deceive me? Is not then Mandana at liberty? Mazares, (replied the Prince, with unequalled Sorrow) was born generous, and has lived ſo, until the Love of Mandana did force his Heart to degenerate: But, Madam, (purſued he) you ſhall be free; and I do proteſt unto you in the preſence of the Gods, whom I have incenſed, that you ſhall never have any cauſe to complain of my Violence; I will only carry you unto a place, Madam, where I may perfectly make known unto you, the moſt reſpective Paſſion that ever was; you have teſtified ſome ſigns of Friendſhip towards me, and I beſeech you do not preſently paſs from Friendſhip unto Hatred; give me a few days time to acquaint you with my Thoughts of Mandana. No, Mazares (ſaid ſhe unto him) I cannot conſent unto your deſire; you are now either the abſolute Maſter of my Hatred or of my Friendſhip; and if you do not immediately repent of your Crime, I ſhall hate you a thouſand times more than ever I hated the King of Aſſyria, and ſhall eſteem you incomparably more culpable, but alſo (interrupted the Prince) more amorous; No, no, (ſaid ſhe unto him) deceive not your ſelf in that; I ſhall never term an unjuſt Paſſion, Love, but will phraſe it Phrenſy, Fury, or that which is worſe. Why Mazares (ſaid ſhe all in Tears) will you loſe my Eſteem and Friendſhip? you whom I reſpected as my Protector in Babylon, as my Deliverer in Sinope: I perceive you had rather be my Raviſher and my Enemy, and ſee me die in Sorrow, than live a happy Life? Do you not ſee, (ſaid ſhe, in obſerving how the Seas began to be a little more boiſtrous) how you do incenſe the Gods, and that if you do not appeaſe them by a ſpeedy Repentance, they will with ſhipwrack puniſh your Crime? Ah, Madam, (cried out this unfortunate Prince) ſo they will be pleaſed to ſave you from the Shipwrack, how happy ſhould I be, if I periſhed in it? and how happy ſhould I have been, if I had died in Babylon whilſt I was innocent? But, Madam, what would you have me do? how could I every day look upon Mandana, and find her ſo ſweet, ſo civil, ſo pleaſing, and ſo fair, and yet not love her? ſome who never ſaw you but angry at them, yet could not chuſe but love you; and ſince I found you ſo infinitely obliging, was it poſſible but I ſhould be poſſeſſed with moſt violent Paſſion? No, no, it was abſolutely impoſſible. When the Princeſs ſaw that Mazares continued in his Reſolution, ſhe began to be ſo deſperately incenſed, as I never ſaw her in my Life: Alas (ſaid ſhe) into what a pittiful condition am I brought? and what unhappy Conſequences does this little Beauty which the Gods have beſtowed upon me produce, ſince it infuſeth into thoſe who have any Affection unto me, only unjuſt Thoughts? But let me take courage (ſaid ſhe when ſhe ſaw the Sea more boiſtrous than ever) I ſhall preſently find an end of all my Misfortunes in ending my Life; and ſhall have ſo much comfort as to periſh with one of my Enemies. When Mazares ſaw the Princeſs ſo very angry, and in ſo great a Danger, and alſo that he had committed an unprofitable Sin; he became ſo extreamly deſperate, that he offered to throw himſelf into the Sea; and I think if his thoughts of the Princeſs and her Intereſt had not reſtrained him, he had done it. Madam (ſaid he unto her) I am infinitely ſorry, that I have expoſed your Life unto ſo much danger. No, no, (ſaid ſhe unto him) it is only Repentance which I deſire from you; and I wiſh you to ſteer your Courſe another way, that if I do ſuffer Shipwrack, the Waves may waft me unto the Cappadocian Coaſt. But, Chriſantes, I cannot repeat all that the Princeſs ſaid to Mazares, nor all his replies, but certainly although he was culpable, yet he expreſſed ſuch moving Language, as made appear he was full of pity: The Princeſs alſo expreſſed her ſelf in ſuch juſt and lamentable Terms, that ſhe was able to move Cruelty it ſelf.

Mean while, it was not poſſible to chuſe our courſe, we muſt now obey the Wind and Storm: It did often blow us towards the foot of the Tower, and then upon a ſudden turning quite contrary, it drove us far off Sinope: We continued all that day, and the Night following in continual Toſſings upon the Surges of the Sea; ſometimes to the right Hand, ſometimes to the left, and which way ſoever we went, we found danger: Oars were of no uſe, Sails would not abide the Wind, which whiſled from all ſides; and all this while there was no hopes of any thing but preſent Death. As ſoon as day appeared and the Tempeſt ſtill continuing as boiſterous as ever, the Princeſs deſired Mazares to repent of his Act; for as long as it was night, ſhe kept in her Cabin, where out of reſpect, Mazares would not enter, although he knew Mandana could not ſleep: But it beginning to be light, the Princeſs, as I told you, renewed her Complaints and Prayers, with ſo many Tears, and in ſuch a violent manner, that Mazares without giving the Princeſs any anſwer, went unto the Pilot; and whether it was by vertue of his Order (as Orſanes believes) or elſe by the force of the Winds, we ſaw the Pilote turn the Galley towards Sinope. But O Heavens! a huge blaſt of Wind, meeting with a great Billow, made the Galley lean on one ſide; the Rudder broke, and the Galley grated upon the point of a Rock, ſo that it turned, and broke in turning; I catched hold of the Princeſs, Arianta hold of me, and I heard a terrible Outcry, amongſt which I knew the Voice of Mazares, who cried out; O ye juſt Gods, preſerve the Princeſs; after this I knew not what became of us, only this I remember, that in lieu of ſeeing Water, me-thought I ſaw a great Fire, which overwhelmed me, and made me loſe all my underſtanding: Yet, Chriſantes, the Prayers of unfortunate Mazares were heard, and we eſcaped this great Danger: But let me tell you, it was moſt ſtrangely, and will aſtoniſh you, perhaps, almoſt as much as it did us. Be pleaſed to underſtand then, that the firſt thing I ſaw after our Shipwrack, was, as I did a little open my Eyes, I ſaw Men who endeavoured as well as they could to make me let go my hold of the Princeſs (for you know Chriſantes, it is the quality of thoſe who are in Water to hold whatſoever they catch at:) This ſight, and the hurt theſe Men did me, did more revive me than all the Remedies they gave me afterwards; ſo that ſtriving with them, What would you have (ſaid I to them) and who are you? We are ſuch (anſwered they unto me) as would ſave the Princeſs Mandana, and help you: At theſe words I let go my hold, and looſed the Princeſs, alſo I told them, that the Gods would recompence them for ſo charitable an Office. After this, coming a little better unto my ſelf, I firſt ſaw Arianta, and then the Princeſs, who revived alſo as well as I, and who after ſhe opened her Eyes did call upon me, almoſt not knowing what ſhe ſaid. I was yet ſo dizzy, that I had much ado to riſe from the Bed whereon they had laid me, but her Voice did infuſe ſuch freſh ſtrength into me, that I came unto her as ſhe was very attentively looking upon a Man, who was kneeling by her Bed-ſide, and who holding her by the Arm, did try by her Pulſe, whether ſhe had ſtrength to revive ; when I was come unto her, and ſhe knew me ; Marteſia (ſaid ſhe unto me, and pulling her Arm out of the Hands of that Man who held it, with as much haſte as her Weakneſs would permit her) where are we ? Madam (replied the Man) you are in a place where you have abſolute Power and Authority ; the Voice ſurprizing both her and me, ſhe raiſed her ſelf to look upon him who anſwered ; and then we both together found that he who thus had ſaved us, was the King of Pontus.

The King of Pontus (ſaid Chriſantes, and Feraulas interrupting him) is he in love with the Princeſs whom Artamenes took Priſoner ? O Heavens ? can ſuch a moſt prodigious Accident prove true ?

Yes, wiſe Chriſantes (ſaid Marteſia) and ſee how it fell out : You very well know, I believe, the ill ſucceſs which he has had in his Wars againſt Artamenes ; and how in both his Kingdoms he has but one Maritine Town left, in which he was beſieged. But I believe you know not, how when he ſaw this Town was ready to be loſt, he reſolved to convey himſelf out of the Victory of his Enemies, and flee away in a Ship, as he did. That which is the greateſt wonder is, that this Prince not knowing where to find any Safety for himſelf, and perhaps being preſſed unto it by the violence of his Paſſion, which in the midſt of his Misfortunes did not forſake him ; did intend to come and offer himſelf unto Ciaxares, to help him in regaining his Daughter from the King of Aſſyria ; for he had intelligence of her being taken away before he was beſieged: So that embarking himſelf with that Reſolution, he came upon the Coaſt of Cappadocia to inform himſelf in the ſtate of things; and he came thither juſt in the nick to ſave our Lives: his Ship which the Tempeſt had toſſed as well as our Galley, was not far off of us when we began to ſuffer Shipwrack, altho his Pilot endeavoured to gain the place where we were. This Prince being ever very generous and noble, and ſeeing us ready to periſh ſo near him, commanded that all thoſe who appeared above Water ſhould be ſaved if it were poſſible; for as Ships do better endure a Storm than Galleys can, ſo he might do it without any great danger unto himſelf: Preſently, as if the angry Waves were appeaſed by our Shipwrack, there happened a ſudden Calm at Sea, the Winds were huſh'd immediately; and all the mountainous Waves levelled in a moment; ſo that the King of Pontus putting a ſmall Boat into the Sea, his Men ſaved many others, amongſt which Orſanes, who came now with me, was one: As they were all buſied in this charitable Office, and this Prince being upon the Deck of the Ship, and perhaps thinking himſelf more unfortunate in the loſs of his two Kingdoms, than thoſe Men whom he ſaw floating, were in the loſs of their Lives, he diſcovered amongſt the Waves ſome Women, whoſe Clothes kept them above the Water: This Object moving him unto much Compaſſion, he commanded in all haſte that his Men ſhould ſave them, tho no other Intereſt in the World did move him unto it but his own natural Pity: But imagin you, Chriſantes, how this Prince was ſurprized, when after they had took us out of the Water, and brought us into his Cabin, he knew the Princeſs Mandana. He preſently forgot all his Loſſes, and thought upon nothing but ſaving that Life, which had long ſince made him loſe his Liberty.

Theſe were this Prince's Cogitations, when, as I told you before, he aſſured the Princeſs, that ſhe was in a place where ſhe had abſolute Power and Authority. Mandana, knowing his Voice as well as I, Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) you ſee that you are not misfortunate alone:

But to acknowledg the good Office you have done me, I wiſh that you would make ſuch uſe of this Opportunity, which the Gods have given you to aſſiſt an unfortunate Princeſs, as that you may oblige her to aſſiſt you again. Madam (ſaid he unto her) I will complain of my Deſtinies no longer, but I think my ſelf obliged to thank the Heavens for the loſs of my Kingdoms, ſince if I had not loſt them, I ſhould not have had the good fortune to ſave your Life, and ſhould not have hindered the Univerſe from loſing her faireſt Ornament: But, Madam, you are not now in a condition to be ſpoken unto without troubling you; and ſince Marteſia is with you, alſo able to help you, the Reſpects which I owe you, bids me withdraw; all my Men have Orders to obey your Women, ſaid he to Arianta, and my ſelf; they need but ask what is wanting, and follow the Advice of a Phyſician, who is here with me, and who has already begun to aſſiſt you; and indeed by good fortune there was a Grecian Phyſician, who followed this Prince in his flight, who was very helpful unto us; for certainly he was a Man very knowing in his Art, being a Practiſer under that famous Hippocrates, who is ſo cried up throughout the whole World. This Prince being gone out, and his Men ſupplying us with all Neceſſaries, we undreſſed the Princeſs, and got her into Bed: and afterwards Arianta and I having dried our Clothes, and taken an admirable Water, which the Phyſician gave us, whoſe Virtue was to comfort the Heart, and temper the Agitation of the Blood, we paſſed away all that Day and the next Night in very good reſt; for to tell you truly, our fears of Death, and the wearineſs of our Bodies, did, whether we would or no, cauſe Sleep to ſuſpend our unquiet Thoughts. The Princeſs ſhe ſighed very often, and could not chuſe but admire at the prodigiouſneſs of our Chance; ſo that after ſhe waked, and ſaw I was there, and that Arianta ſlept on, ſhe called me; as our Bed by her order was in her Cabin. I no ſooner heard her but I roſe, and dreſſed my ſelf haſtily, then went unto her; I found her indeed not ill, conſidering the illneſs of the Accident, yet I found not her Mind very ſerene. Well, Marteſia (ſaid ſhe unto me) what do you think of our Fortune? where is our hopes? Madam, ſaid I unto her, there are ſuch miraculous Accidents which do befal us, that I do think it much raſhneſs to judg what our future Events will be; for truly, Madam, ſince Mazares has deceived me, I can truſt no more in any one, but muſt needs miſtruſt all; yet I am moſt certain we have eſcaped a miraculous danger, which ſeemed inevitable, and I hope that the ſame Gods who ſaved you will protect you: For my part, I believe the Tempeſt did only riſe to puniſh the unfortunate Mazares. Perhaps (replied the Princeſs) he is eſcaped as well as we; for when our Galley was ſplit, and after we were in the Water, I either ſaw him, or imagined that he held me up by a Scarf, which I then had about me; but when I reſiſted him, and did ſtrive to be looſe from him, the Scarf did looſe of it ſelf, and after that I loſt both my Reaſon and my underſtanding-Faculties. Madam, ſaid I unto her, that which you tell me is more than Imagination, for your Scarf is not to be found, and therefore it is to be thought, that the unfortunate Mazares is periſhed, and therefore the Tempeſt, as I ſaid, did riſe only to puniſh him: And perhaps alſo (added the Princeſs) that the Gods have preſerved me, to make me more miſerable; for truly, Marteſia, it is very ſtrange that the ſetwo, the King of Aſſyria, and the King of Pontus, whom of all Men living in the World I moſt feared to fall into their Power, that one of theſe Princes, whom I thought ingaged in a troubleſom War, and who perhaps never was at Sea but this one time; that this Prince, I ſay, ſhould loſe both his Kingdoms, and fleeing from a Town (which, as his Phyſician told me) he could not keep, he ſhould take the direct way to meet me; and that his Ship, which in all reaſon ſhould have ſhunn'd the Land, ſhould get no further from it; and that he ſhould come juſt at the minute of our Shipwrack; that he ſhould ſave me, and keep me in his Power; I tell you, Marteſia, theſe prodigious Caſualties make me all Fear. But, Madam (ſaid I unto her) the Misfortune of this Prince will be your Security; for what can a King without a Kingdom do? and what Sanctuary could he find if he ſhould offer any Violence unto you, or detain you againſt your Mind? I know not, my Marteſia (anſwered the Princeſs) but I am ſure my Fears are above my Hopes; not but that I have prevalent Reaſons to induce the King of Pontus to do as I would deſire; but, Marteſia, my Fate is to make all Men I deal with to loſe their Reaſon: I baniſh Vertue out of the Souls of them who love me, I alter all their good Inclinations: And I think it a Miracle, that Artamenes in loving me, ſhould retain his Generoſity. Then, Chriſantes, whilſt the Princeſs was thus diſcourſing with me, the King of Pontus, who had changed his courſe, and made towards the main Sea, was no leſs unquiet in his Mind than the Princeſs was; and going into another Room with one of his Servants called Pharnabaſes, in whom he had great confidence, he began to relate the preſent ſtate of his Soul unto him. Orſanes, who is here, and who endured the Shipwrack better than we, becauſe he could ſwim, was in another little Room near them, where he could hear all they ſaid, and all which he related unto me the next Morning; for altho he had been the Servant of Mazares, yet he was ſo ſerviceable unto us whilſt we were in Babylon, that we did not uſe him ill. Orſanes then being in that place I told you of, heard the King ſay unto the Man, It muſt be acknowledged Pharnabaſes, that my Deſtiny is odd, and that the Gods do treat me in a rigorous manner: For beſides the conſideration of the ancient Misfortunes of my Houſe, if I call to mind all which hath happened unto me by reaſon of my paſſionate Love of Mandana, may I not well believe I am reſerved for croſs Adventures? I was left as a Hoſtage with Ciaxares, and I became enamoured with Mandana his Daughter; I durſt not then declare it openly, becauſe then there was no hopes of my being King; yet I was no ſooner out of that Priſon, but I was preſently in the Throne, and then I demanded the Princeſs Mandana of Ciaxares her Father, by way of Marriage, and he denied me: I began a War, and was unfortunate in it; I was taken Priſoner, and did paſſionately love my Vanquiſher; I came out of Priſon by the aſſiſtance of his Generoſity: Then did I enter into a Civil War, not being able to break thoſe Chains which tied me unto Mandana: What ſhall I ſay Pharnabaſes? I have been beaten, purſued, beſieged, and perſecuted by them who my Father left Subjects unto me, and who are now become my mortal Enemies: I had once two Crowns upon my Head, but now I am forced to flee in one ſingle Ship, as my only Safety and Retreat: I am reduced unto this Extremity; I find Mandana, whom I ever adored in my Heart, at the very point of Death; it was my hap to ſave her, and now I have her in my power: Ah, Pharnabaſes! how much would this laſt Adventure advantage me, if I could make good uſe of it? I ſhould value the loſs of theſe my two Kingdoms at a low rate, if I could but conquer the Heart of Mandana. But alas, what likelihood is there, that the Gods will ever permit me to ſo glorious a Conqueſt? If ever they had intended me ſuch a Happineſs, they would never have taken my two Kingdoms from me: But alſo what likelihood was there to find this Princeſs in ſuch a ſad condition? or that they ſhould ever afford me ſo much Joy, as to have her in my power. Surely they intend me ſome Conſolation for the loſs of my two Crowns, when they made me ſtill hope that ſince they have given me poſſeſſion of ſuch an uneſtimable Jewel, which does not belong unto me, and which I am unworthy of, they will render me that which does belong unto me. But, O Heavens, I am not rightly amorous, to remember any Crowns at the feet of Mandana! No, proud Paſſion, which vaunts and domineers in the Hearts of all Men, thou ſhalt not do ſo in mine, and Love ſhall ſurmount thee: Yes, in ſpite of all my Loſſes, all my Diſgraces, and all my Ambition, this very one Thought that Mandana is in my power, ſhall rejoyce me, and make me willingly forſake them all: But yet, thou unfortunate Prince, what canſt thou do? Is it poſſible that a King who is turned out of his Dominions, whoſe Imaginations can think of nothing but ſubjecting Thrones, kroken Scepters, and cruſhed Crowns, can be ſenſible of any Delights? But on the other ſide, it is impoſſible to ſee Mandana, and Mandana riſen from the dead, and riſen by thee, and not be ſenſible of ſo much Joy as may comfort thee in all thy Sorrows! No, no, this is a priviledg of Love, which Ambition cannot diſpute for. The Joys of Ambition are not always ſerene, and the remembrance of my Loſſes do ſometimes trouble me; but the Image of Mandana no ſooner comes into my Memory, but all thoſe melancholy Thoughts forſake me, thoſe Miſts vaniſh, and I ſee nothing but Mandana; yes, Pharnabaſes, I no ſooner apply my ſelf unto this pleaſing thought, but I know not whether I am ſtill upon a Throne, or whether I be thrown out of it; whether I be upon the Sea, or whether I am upon Earth; I know only that I never think upon regaining my Kingdoms, nor of revenging my ſelf upon my Enemies: All my thoughts are how to vanquiſh the Civility of my Princeſs. But, Pharnabaſes, the Enterpriſe is extreamly difficult, and I ſhall have much ado to find out ſuch Reaſons as can give me any hopes of ſoftning the Severity of Mandana. The Obligation, Sir, which ſhe owes you (replied Pharnabaſes) is an Argument ſufficient to move her Mind; and I think that ſuch an one as owes unto you a Life were extreamly unjuſt if ſhe did deny you her Affection. Alas, Pharnabaſes (ſaid the King unto him) it ſeems you are not acquainted with Mandana; yet know thus much, that alto I ſhould expoſe my own Life a thouſand and a thouſand times to preſerve hers, yet would ſhe owe me nothing; for it is no more than Duty of all ſuch as have the honour to know her, to do as much out of their Love unto her, and I ſhould do as much altho I were certain to be extreamly hated eternally. But, Pharnabaſes, my Joy to have ſuch a Treaſure in my poſſeſſion, which I value at a far higher rate than the Empire of all Aſia, is both a moſt ſweet and a moſt bitter Grief unto me, ſince I ſhall not now be troubled by the Misfortune of any Rival; for I underſtand by one of them who eſcaped the Shipwrack, that the Princeſs was ever very averſe unto the King of Aſſyria; and that tho he had her in the prime Town in the World, yet could he not move her at all: what can I then hope to do, who cannot preſent her with any Crowns or Scepters, and has nothing left in my Power to give her but the ſame Heart which ſhe has ſo often refuſed? Ah, Pharnabaſes! Ambition is a great Incitement to Love, Crowns and Scepters moves Hearts which are moſt inſenſible; I cannot think a Prince who is driven out of his Dominions, and can preſent nothing but a ſhare in his Misfortunes, is in a condition to ſtrike deep into the Mind of Mandana: For my part (ſaid Pharnabaſes.) I think you complain of this Accident, which you rather ought to rejoyce at, becauſe if you reſtore the Princeſs Mandana unto her Father, I am certain that the ſame Army wherewith he intended to take Babylon, and ſince is Maſter of it, and which, as theſe Men who have eſcaped from the Shipwrack, do ſay will be preſently returned into Cappadocia, ſhall be imployed to re conquer your Eſtate again; and I am certain that Artamenes, who you ſo much ſpeak of, will not deny you his aſſiſtance. I do confeſs, Pharnabaſes, and am fully perſwaded that it would be more prudent and judicious to take the courſe you ſpeak of, rather than to humour my extream Paſſion: But yet in doing ſo, I ſhould be more ambitious than amorous, and love a Crown better than I do Mandana, and not prefer her as I do, above all the Crowns and Scepters upon Earth: for altho he do give me his Army, yet will he not give me his Daughter; ſo that if I part with her, I ſhall be almoſt certain to regain my Crown, but then I ſhall be certain to loſe Mandana: Ah, Pharnabaſes, there is no Compariſon in the choice of theſe two; and I had much rather never get my Crown, than to loſe Mandana again. But Sir, anſwered Pharnabaſes, all your thoughts of Scepters and Crowns will be but Thorns in your Heart, and you would be ſtill unhappy unleſs you could keep her your loved; and I do make it a great Queſtion whether you ever will be ſo: as for you to live without a Crown, without a Scepter, without a Habitation, but as thus a diſconſolate, and an unfortunate Man: Conſider, Sir, I beſeech you, that by reſtoring Mandana, you will gain a potent Protector, and find a ſafe Sanctuary: and that if you do not reſtore her, then you know not where to find a place of retreat in all the Earth; and you will ruin your ſelf under the Arms of an Enemy, who in the turning of an Eye can command two hundred thouſand Men. I do confeſs, Pharnabaſes, (anſwered the King) that all you ſay is true; but I know alſo, that I have a more formidable Enemy in my own Heart, which I know not how to overcome, and who I ſhould be ſorry if he did ſo: Yes, Pharnabaſes, the ſight of Mandana has ſo much inflamed my Paſſion, that I can hearken unto nothing but what will ſatisfy it. I know, that in lieu of a gallant Act, I ſhall commit a Crime; but what ſhould I do? It is the violence of Love enforceth me to it; and I conceive it a thing abſolutely impoſſible to have one who is beloved, as I love Mandana, in ones power, and voluntarily to part with her. Moreover, there are not the ſame Reaſons why ſhe ſhould hate me, as there are why ſhe ſhould hate the King of Aſſyria; for I did not take her away as he did, but on the contrary I ſaved her Life, and reſcued her out of the Arms of Death; ſhe cannot therefore, without great Injuſtice, call me her Raviſher, ſince I did only preſerve that Treaſure which the Gods did ſend me as a Cordial after all my Loſſes: But alas, how can I keep this unvaluable Treaſure in a poor ſingle Ship without any Refuge or Retreat? and can I find in my Heart to make her, unto whom of all the Earth I wiſh moſt happineſs, ſo infinitely unhappy? Truth is, Chriſantes, this Prince after ſuch an extream agitation of his Mind, could not reſolve upon any thing; but when he underſtood by the Phyſician that the Princeſs was in ſo good a condition that ſhe might be ſeen, he ſent to deſire permiſſion that he might viſit her.

At his firſt approach unto her, he expreſſed much joy to ſee ſo many ſigns of Health in her Countenance, conſidering the Accident, not but there was much melancholy in the Eyes of the Princeſs; but ſince ſhe was ever ſo fair that ſhe could not look ill, he thought better of her than indeed ſhe was: Moreover, the King ſeeing her the day before in a worſe condition, did think ſhe looked well then. The Princeſs, as owing her Life unto him, received him with a Civility; and after ſhe had cauſed him to ſit down, ſhe ſaid unto him, with as much Spirit as Sweetneſs, You ſee here, Sir, a wonderful effect of Fortune's Inconſtancy; for when you left me laſt at Sinope, I was in a condition then to do you a Favour, but now I am in a condition to receive one from you: War brought you into my Father's Priſon, but Fortune has brought me into yours; and I rejoice in my Captivity, ſince I have an Opinion that he who ſaved my Life, will ſuffer me to enjoy it; and perhaps will remember that he went out of Cappadocia without any Ranſom: But, Sir, I do not ſpeak this with any intention to quit my own, but on the contrary, I am certain that the King my Father will both pay it, and alſo if you pleaſe, aſſiſt you in the Re-conqueſt of the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia. I am at this preſent, Madam, (replied the King) ſo rich, ſince I have the honour to ſee you in a Place where I have Power, that I cannot think of any Conqueſts: and if you had not remembred me of my Misfortunes, in ſpeaking to me of my Priſon, I think I ſhould have abſolutely forgot all my Loſſes and Diſgraces. But they are ſo conſiderable, (replied ſhe) that they cannot chuſe but be remembred at all times, and in all places; yet, generous Prince, there wants a Remedy againſt them. Doubtleſs, Madam, you may, (ſaid the King, ſighing) if you pleaſe. Yes, (anſwered the Princeſs) but it muſt be by the Valour of another; therefore, Sir, I beſeech you make towards Sinope, that we may ſend one of your Men on Shore, to get information where the King my Father is. My Deſign was, (replied the King) to go and offer my ſelf unto him, that he would be pleaſed to accept of my Aſſiſtance, in recovering you out of the King of Aſſyria's Power; but now the Courſe and End of my Voyage is altered. You may better proceed in your Voyage, (ſaid the Princeſs) ſince in reſcuing me from Death, you have done that alone, which you could not have done with two hundred thouſand Men, if you had been to deliver me out of the Power of the King of Aſſyria: So that, Sir, you ſhall come into the Camp of Ciaxares, as a Prince who has done more than a puiſſant Army could do. Yes, Madam, (anſwered he, kneeling, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Princeſs); but, Madam, do you know my Thoughts? And if you do know them, can you think that the loſs of my two Kingdoms can alter them? I think, Sir, (replied the Princeſs) that if you did eſteem me, you will do ſo ſtill; and you may in all reaſon think, that ſince you have not changed your Thoughts, no more have I mine, but that I continue ſtill the very ſame I was. O, Madam, (replied he) will you continue ſo inſenſible, and ſo inexorable for ever? Did the Gods ſend me to raiſe you from the Dead, that you ſhould ſo cruelly give me my Death? I do confeſs, Sir, (anſwered the Princeſs, raiſing up her ſelf a little) that I owe my Life unto you; but if you gave it me, with any intention it ſhould be a Torment unto me, I do freely permit you to take it again when you pleaſe. No, Madam, (replied he) you ſhall never loſe it that way, for it is a Jewel which I will ever defend with the hazard of my own. Sir, (anſwered ſhe) do you think that there is neither Fire, nor Sword, nor Poiſon, can ſend me to my Grave. No, no, you deceive your ſelf if you think it, and there are other kinds of Death more cruel than they, though they do not look ſo horridly. Yes, Sir, (ſaid ſhe) I do prefer the moſt violent Death above a Servitude; and I ſhall think you more innocent in killing me, than keeping me by Force, or in making me die by deſpair: but, generous Prince, I cannot believe you have any ſuch Deſign; and when I remember how bravely you treated a Man, who did every day endeavour to catch you into his Power; when I remember, I ſay, how you advertiſed Artamenes of the Conſpiracy againſt his Life, and how you did command he ſhould not be ſhot at; I cannot think that ſince Ambition left you your Reaſon free, Love ſhould ſo deprive you of it, as not to conſider in what ſtate your Buſineſs is in; and though you were not generous, but prudent only and intereſted, yet would it be very advantagious for you to reſtore me unto the King my Father ther, and abſolutely prejudicial unto you to retain me long. I ſee very well, Madam, (anſwered he) that all you ſay is moſt reaſonable, yet I muſt be Maſter of more Reaſon than I am, before I can execute it: That which moſt comforts me in this Adventure, Divine Princeſs, is, that I ſee you never were in Love; ſo that I have no other Impediment to remove, but that of Inſenſibility: For, indeed Madam, if you did but know what it was to love, you would never ſpeak thus unto me, and you would know that all other Paſſions in compariſon of it are nothing. But, Sir, (replied ſhe, and bluſh'd) I think that they who love, deſire to be beloved again; and that it is a general Rule, all Lovers ſhould not incur the hatred of them they love: if ſo, then conſider, if you pleaſe, that by reſtoring me to my Father, you will at the leaſt obtain ſome of my Eſteem, and perhaps my Friendſhip; and that if you do not reſtore me, I ſhall then hate you above all Compariſons, more than I think you love me. Your Eſteem, Madam, and Friendſhip, (anſwered the King) are two things which are infinitely precious, and ought fully to ſatisfy ſuch as do only eſteem and honour you: But Love, Madam, is a Paſſion much more tyrannical, and will be ſatisfied with nothing but the ſame; think it not ſtrange then, I beſeech you, if the hopes which you give me to enjoy your Eſteem and Friendſhip, do not move me to forſake the Intereſt of my Love. But, Sir, (replied ſhe) then in lieu of obtaining my Love, you will find my extream Hate. Who knows, Madam, (anſwered he) whether a little time may not move an alteration in your Heart? and whether Pity may not procure that from you which nothing elſe can? Conſider, I beſeech you, Madam, that he whom you ſee here before you, has a Soul ſo poſſeſſed with violent Paſſion, as never Man had the like; and if you will know it, be pleaſed to conſider but two Things: Firſt, That one only favourable look from you, does comfort me more than the regaining of my two Kingdoms would. Secondly, That though perhaps, I might obtain ſufficient Forces from the King your Father, to reconquer them, if I ſhould reſtore you unto him; yet I had rather chuſe to loſe them both, than to be deprived of you. Take heed, Sir, what you ſay, replied the Princeſs; for in reſtoring me my Liberty, you will only want the ſight of me; but if you do not reſtore me, you will not only loſe my Eſteem, but alſo in a few days my Life; whereas, on the contrary, if you pleaſe, you may ſit in your Throne again in Glory, and have this ſatisfaction to boot, that I ſhall be moſt extreamly obliged unto you. A Throne, Madam, (anſwered he) is not neceſſary for that Prince who cannot live without you: And if during my late Wars I had not retained ſome hopes to find out ways whereby I might move your Heart by my Perſeverance, I ſhould not have ſo obſtinately diſputed the Victory with thoſe who have vanquiſhed me: Not, Madam, but that I know you have great reaſon to deſpiſe and ſcorn that Prince whom Fortune has forſaken: But yet, Madam, it is worth conſideration, to think how inconſtant this Fortune is; who one day perhaps courts him, whom the next day ſhe cruelly perſecutes; and this very Accident in meeting with you, perſwades me, that all my Misfortunes are blown over, and that a ſerene Calm will follow my boiſterous Storm: Yes, Madam, the ſight of you ſpeaks Serenity unto me, and infuſeth lively Hopes into the Souls of them who before were ſunk in Sorrows; I hope therefore, Madam, that good Fortune will follow, as long as I am with you, and that there is no Country I ſhall not find a Sanctuary in as long as I carry you thither: Yet notwithſtanding, Madam, I do promiſe you, never to uſe any thing but my Tears, and Sighs, and Prayers, and Perſeverance wherewith to overcome you: Fear not therefore, Madam, to be engaged in my Fortunes; and believe it, that when I ſee I cannot obtain your Love by theſe innocent ways, you ſhall then receive your Liberty by the end of my Life. How, Sir, (replied the Princeſs, with Eyes full of Tears) muſt I not have my Liberty till you die? I beſeech you do not force me to deſire it, it is a thing I never yet wiſhed unto my mortal Enemies; and I ſhould be very ſorry to be compelled to wiſh it to a Prince who has ſo many excellent Qualities, to one who has ſaved my Life, and one who doubtleſs will never forſake the Ways of Vertue to perſecute me: Moreover, Sir, into what part of the World ſoever you ſhall carry me, the King my Father will follow you; and Artamenes, whoſe Valour is not unknown to you, will perhaps compel you to do that which now will be a Favour, if you will be pleaſed to do it. If I could, Madam, (replied the King, in a moſt paſſionate Geſture) doubtleſs I would do it, and prevent all your Prayers and Menaces: But, alas, Divine Princeſs, I cannot; all that is in my Power, is to tell you, that if it be your pleaſure, I will caſt my ſelf into the Sea, or run my Sword through that Heart, which I have dedicated unto you; I ſhall do it willingly at the very ſame minute you command it, and ſo by my Death ſet you at Liberty. It is not the Will of the Gods (replied the Princeſs) that we ſhould expiate one Sin by committing another, and therefore I ſhall never bid you die in that manner: But, Sir, I do entreat you, with all the Affection which I am capable of, that you would not make me unhappy, by making your ſelf culpable, or by making me bear the burden of your Misfortunes. When the King ſaw that all he ſaid, did but more incenſe the Princeſs, he roſe up, and in all reverence congeeing, ſaid unto her, We ſhall ſee, Madam, whether the Gods will change my Heart, or pity move yours.

After this, without giving any time to anſwer, he went out of her Cabin; and preſently after Orſanes entred, who not knowing what the King had ſaid unto the Princeſs, came to tell us what he heard. Mandana thanked him, and told him, that his Maſter's Crime ſhould not be imputed unto the Servant; but that if ever ſhe came into a condition to be able, ſhe would requite him. My Maſter, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) was ſo infinitely reſpective of you, that if he were alive, certainly he would repair his Fault; and I verily believe we had not ſuffered Shipwrack if he had obeyed you, and changed our Courſe when you deſired. However, Orſanes, (replied the Princeſs) if I have any need of your help, I believe you will not deny it. You may command me, Madam, the moſt difficult Services, (anſwered he) and ſhall certainly be obeyed. And truly I think there was not a more officious Man in the World than this, nor of more Underſtanding; it was by his Reports I came unto much of what I have related unto you.

Orſanes being gone out, the Princeſs began to lament her Misfortunes; and Arianta alſo began to repent that ſhe had been a cauſe of them, and that with ſuch extream ſorrow, as ſhe almoſt loſt her Reaſon; for this Woman, though none did think of accuſing her, did begin to accuſe her ſelf, and beg the Princeſs's Pardon, with a promiſe hereafter of inviolable Fidelity: She told her further, how ſhe conceived it would have been a good piece of Service unto her, to contribute all ſhe could to make her Queen of Aſſyria: And truly, ſhe ſpoke ſo ingenuouſly, and with ſo repentant a Sorrow for her Fault, as the Princeſs pardoned her.

Mean while the King of Pontus had his ſhare in Sorrow; he neither durſt viſit the Princeſs, nor could forbear it; fain would he deliver her up to her Father, and fainer would he keep her; and not knowing whither to go, or what to do; we wandered many days together upon the Seas, and the Pilot received no other Orders, but to keep far from any Land, and avoid meeting with any Ships. You may judg unto what patience we were put; I ſpoke often unto the King of Pontus, but all in vain; and the three laſt days which we were upon the Sea, he came not into the Princeſs's Cabin: But at the laſt, when the King bethought himſelf how the King of Armenia would pay no more Tribute unto the King of the Medes, ſince the Death of Aſtyages, he believed that he might find a Safety there, for there was Alliance between them: So that one Morning as our Ship lay at Anchor, cloſe by the Mouth of the River Halis, the King ſent a little Cock-boat to procure a greater Boat, to row up, by ſtrength of Oar, the ſaid River; and one was preſently gotten, ſo that then he came into the Princeſs's Cabin: Madam, (ſaid he, with a diſordered Countenance) it is not juſt to let you any longer endure the inconveniency of the Sea, you will find leſs diſcommodity in a River. I ſhall ſuffer equal inconveniency in both (anſwered ſhe) as long as you continue thus unreaſonable. Madam, ſaid he unto her, my deſign is to carry you unto the King of Armenia. The Princeſs was glad when ſhe ſaw that we were indeed to leave the Sea; and ſhe hoped for more help on Land, or in a River, than in a Ship on the midſt of toſſing Waves: And although ſhe knew that the King of Armenia had an ambitious and ſtirring Spirit, alſo would be glad of any pretence for a War, yet the Prince Tigranes his Son, who was very vertuouſly diſpoſed, and who ſhe had heretofore ſeen at Sinope, did comfort her a little: She went therefore whither they carried her without any contradiction: It was the Princeſs's deſire that Orſanes and two others might go with us, which was all we could obtain, of fifteen or twenty which were ſaved from Shipwrack,and the King of Pontus took only thirty of his own Men; but we knew not what he did with his Ship: Then began we to Boat up the River by force of Oars; but becauſe the River did run there with a very ſwift Current, it was a long time before we could get into it, and we were almoſt always upon the Land, becauſe the middle of the River did run more rapidly: As we looked about us, the Princeſs eſpied Ortalques upon the River Banks, and knew him at the firſt; but I ſuppoſe that I need not particularize any further concerning this Paſſage, ſince I do imagine that you already know them by him, for Artucas told me, that he came hither: ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but pulling out a little Inkhorn, which ſhe ever carried about her, and hiding her ſelf behind Arianta, and my ſelf, ſhe writ what doubtleſs you have ſeen, or at leaſt heard of it by Ortalques: but as ill luck would have it, the King of Pontus, who was buſy in ſeeing them Row, turned his Head towards us, as ſhe was writing, ſo that ſhe had not time to end her Note, but gave it unto me; I lapped it up in my Hood, and as the Boat almoſt touched the Land neer Ortalques, I threw it unto him, as if the Wind had carried it from me, and ſeemed as if I did not care whether or no I had it again; ſo that they ſtaid not the Boat, for if they had, the Current of the Water would have driven the Boat back again into the Sea. Without doubt, Chriſantes, you know that this River has its Original among the Mountains in Armenia; that it runs along by the ſide of Lydia; and that it ſpreads it ſelf upon the right hand towards Mantiana, and on the left hand towards Phrygia; that afterwards on the right hand it moiſtens a great part of Cappadocia, and on the left hand Paphlagonia; ſo that there were ſome places by which we were to go, that the King of Pontus feared very much, and which the Princeſs alſo feared, becauſe it was on that ſide of Cappadocia, where the People, by the perſwaſions of Aribæus, were revolted, and took part with the King of Aſſyria: But as ſoon as we were paſt Cappadocia, he ſuffered us ſometimes to ſtay in the Night-time, that the Princeſs might more quietly take reſt and ſleep: and to that end, they made her a Cabin in the Boat, which ſeparated us from the reſt of the Company, and where none but her own Servants entered, excepting the King of Pontus. At laſt, Chriſantes, as neceſſity is always ingenious, the Princeſs did not apprehend it an abſolute impoſſibility for us to make an eſcape, ſo that I conſulted with Orſanes, and we reſolved to endeavour it: The Princeſs would have a Candle burning always in the Night-time in our Cabin; but the better to execute our Deſign, we put it out; and proſecuting our Reſolution, one Night when we were neer a great Wood, Orſanes, who lay on the outſide of our Cabin, came under the Hangings on our ſide, and went quietly into the Water, which was not very deep in that place, intending to take us, one after another, and carry us aſhore, and then to hide our ſelves in the thick of the great Wood, which we obſerved very neer us: And ſince the Night was very dark, and we but two to be carried, the Princeſs would not be carried firſt, becauſe ſhe ſhould then be alone upon the Banks, ſo that ſhe ſhould have Orſanes carry me firſt. But, O Heavens, what ill Fortune was it that I obeyed her! and how much injury did the Princeſs do her ſelf in commanding it? For Orſanes and I were no ſooner at Land, but the King of Pontus walking, and ſeeing no Light in our Cabin, cried out to him that ſtood Sentinel (who had not perceived us becauſe it was very dark) and bade him look well to the Princeſs; ſo that at this Cry, the Waterman who always kept a dark Lanthorn, did bring it, and there they found the Princeſs all alone in a great amazement. Orſanes and I, ſeeing this, would have returned what danger ſoever would hap unto us; but the Watermen Rowing away with all their ſtrength, by order from the King of Pontus, cry and call as long, and as loud as we could, they would not ſtay to take us in: The King queſtionleſs imagining, that we had got ſome conſiderable ſtrength upon Land to execute our Deſign. We heard the Princeſs call ſometimes Marteſia, and ſometimes Orſanes: but preſently after, we neither heard nor ſaw any thing, although the Moon preſently after began to break out, and the River in that place did ſo turn and wind, that it was impoſſible for us to ſee the Boat. You may well imagine, Chriſantes, how great my Sorrows and my Fears were: Firſt, to ſee I was ſeparated from the Princeſs: Secondly, to find my ſelf alone with a Man upon the Banks of a great River, neer a great Wood, in the midſt of the Night; The reſt of the Night we paſſed away, and followed the River ſide, hoping always, that the Moon would ſhine ſo clear, that we might once more diſcover the Boat: At the laſt, we being very weary, and having found a little habitation of Fiſhermen by the Water-ſide, we ſtaid there, and found there more helps than we could hope for from Men of ſuch Quality. We told them our Adventure, diſguiſing our Names, and the Qualities of the Perſons, becauſe we were in Paphlagonia, and deſired them to inform us, whether it were poſſible to overtake the Boat we told them of. They told us, that it was abſolutely impoſſible to overtake them with another Boat, conſidering the number of their Oars, and the time we had loſt to follow them: nor was it more eaſy to follow with Horſes, becauſe the River doth turn and wind very much: and their Boat taking always the middle of the River, has by conſequence leſs way to go than they who go by the ſide: Moreover, not far from thence the River divides into two, and who can tell which way they would take?

In concluſion, Chriſantes, we had no other courſe, but to find out ſome way how to come hither; where I did ſuppoſe I ſhould find the King. I had, by good fortune, the Picture of the Princeſs about me, in a very rich Box, which upon this occaſion did us very good ſervice; for when I had taken out the Picture, I ſent Orſanes unto the next Town to ſell it, and to buy a Coach and Horſes, whilſt he left me amongſt the Fiſher-men: At his return we did recompence thoſe honeſt Men for their Courteſies, and came in all haſte hither, where we thought verily to find Artamenes alſo, but little did we think to find him a Priſoner. Now, wiſe Chriſantes, you know thus far of the Princeſs's Fortune: and I did very much deſire to relate it unto you, before I ſpoke with the King, to the end that when you were informed of our Adventures, and my ſelf alſo better inſtructed in the ſtate of things, I might more judicially know what to ſay, or not to ſay.

Marteſia having ended her ſtory, Chriſantes and Feraulas thanked her for the pains ſhe had taken, and began to conſider the wonderful paſſages ſhe had told them. They could not ſufficiently admire the conſtancy of the Princeſs, and her immoveable Vertue wherewith ſhe acted throughout all her Adventures. They conſidered her as carried away by the greateſt King of all Aſia, whom ſhe hated: they then looked upon her as in the power of a Prince, whom ſhe very much eſteemed; and yet they think upon her, as ſhe is in the power of a King, without a Kingdom: They obſerved the greatneſs of the firſt, did not terrify her from treating him leſs rigorouſly; That the eſteem which ſhe had of the ſecond, did not alter her Heart; and that the Misfortunes of the third, did not move her to treat him leſs civilly than if he were upon his Throne: The truth is, they ſaw Mandana was ſo worthy of Artamenes, and Artamenes of Mandana, that when they conſidered how they were ſeparated, and how both of them unfortunate, their converſation could not chuſe but end in Sighs and Tears, and all other ſigns of Compaſſion: Firſt, for ſo many

Misfortunes as the Princeſs had been expoſed unto. Secondly, by reaſon of that ſtrange Oracle which threatned a greater Misfortune unto Artamenes, than his Impriſonment. Feraulas was over-joyed to ſee Marteſia again; and Chriſantes, who did very highly eſteem her Vertues, did bid her very welcome back: yet before they parted, they made a ſhort Relation, according to their promiſe, of all the Adventures of Artamenes: As well his Voyage unto the Maſſagettes, as his return to Cappadocia; and alſo all the Aſſyrian War: They related alſo the lamentable Encounter that Artamenes had with Mazares, when he was dying, who had from him the Scarf whereof ſhe ſpoke in her Relation, and which Artamenes knew to be the ſame which Mandana had refuſed him a little before he went to fight: But (added Feraulas) I am certain he was much more ſad, when he received it, than he was when it was denied him: Truly (ſaid Marteſia) the Deſtiny of the Scarf is very ſtrange; for I beſeech you conſider by what an odd way Fate has brought it into Artamenes hands: Firſt, you know, that it was of moſt rare Golden Tiſſue, and admirably wrought by the Princeſs her ſelf, for her own diverſion, and that was the reaſon why ſhe valued it ſo much, though ſhe had other Reaſons to deny it Artamenes, when he deſired it from her at Aniſa: But as if ſhe valued it at a higher eſteem, becauſe Artamenes had deſired it, ſhe commanded me to have an extraodinary care of it, and would wear it no more. Afterwards when we returned to Sinope, I carried it thither, and when we departed from thence, and went unto Amaſia, and from thence to Themiſcira, I left it there amongſt an hundred other things which belonged unto the Princeſs; ſo alſo, when we returned thither again with the King of Aſſyria, there I found it; for Aribeus did not ſuffer any diſorder in the Caſtle: and that ſame Night we went away, this Scarf, I know not how, fell out of my hands; and immediately, being moved unto it, by I know not what conceit, Madam, (ſaid I unto the Princeſs, who came in as I took it up) ſhall this Scarf which you value ſo much, and which you denied Artamenes, remain in the hands of the King of Aſſyria? No, Marteſia, (ſaid ſhe unto me) it ſhall not; for if Artamenes ſhould hereafter ſee him wear it in any Combat, he would imagine perhaps, that I gave it him. In concluſion, Feraulas, ſhe took it, and wore it, and ſee by what Fate Mazares came by it; and how Artamenes received that from one of his Rivals, which the Princeſs had refuſed him.

Laſt of all, Feraulas and Chriſantes, reſolved that Marteſia ſhould ſtay a day or two before ſhe ſhewed her ſelf, to the end they might have leaſure, firſt to relate what ſhe had told them unto their dear Maſter, and whilſt they had conſulted with his Friends, when would be the fitteſt time the King ſhould ſee her. Marteſia deſired Feraulas to aſſure Artamenes that ſhe would moſt ſeriouſly intereſt her ſelf in his Fortunes; and that ſhe did moſt paſſionately wiſh, that this little ſhadow of Liberty which was permitted him of late, might be ſpeedily ſeconded by an abſolute Freedom, ſo as he might be in a condition to go and relieve the Princeſs. After this, Chriſantes and Feraulas left her, and went to give Artamenes ſo much ſatisfaction, as to hear of Mandana's Fidelity and Conſtancy.

The End of the Second Book.

ARTAMENES, OR, THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part II. Book III.

THeſe two faithful Servants of a famous Maſter, could not ſatisfy their deſires until the next Morning; becauſe it was not poſſible to find Artamenes alone by himſelf, ſince Ciaxares had given this liberty to viſit him, unleſs it were in a Morning before he did riſe out of his Bed: for every one did earneſtly deſire the benefit of that Priviledg; and every one to make this Priviledg to continue longer, told Ciaxares, that Artamenes did bend at laſt, and would diſcover what he deſired: This generous Priſoner was extreamly impatient to be at liberty, that he might free Mandana; but although Love took up all his Soul, he did not forget that Araſpes was in Priſon as well as himſelf and he ſent very often to ſee how he did; and did apparently teſtify that his Impriſonment did augment the rigour of his own: He was extreamly raviſhed with Admiration, when Chriſantes and Feraulas came unto him as he was in Bed, and told him Marteſia was come to Sinope; the name of Martiſia cauſed him to leap up for joy, imagining that Mandana was not far off; and the Relation which afterwards they made unto him of Mandana's Adventures, and of her Fidelity to him, made ſo great a rapture in his Soul, as he was not able to receive ſuch good News in its full Delight; for indeed Chriſantes and Feraulas told him alſo of that Oracle which the King of Aſſyria had received at Babylon: And alſo, to hear that the Princeſs was in the power of the King of Pontus, whoſe excellent Merit he very well knew, was another means to moderate his exceſſive Joy. Do you admire Chriſantes, (ſaid he unto him) the humorous diſpoſition of Fate, which procures me the moſt accompliſhed and moſt reaſonable Men in their Loves, to be my Rivals? For truly if Mandana had been courted only by Princes of brutiſh Paſſions, ſuch as would ſpeak of nothing but Violences, of Sword, or Fire, or Blood; who would make themſelves to be loved, by ſuch Courſes as commonly procures Hatred; ſuch as pretend only unto vicious Favours, and ask them with Daggers in their Hands, and Fury in their Eyes, then I would not fear that the Divine Mandana would prefer them before Artamenes. But, Chriſantes, I have much reaſon to fear what now you come to tell me; and as you relate the Story unto me; the Raviſhers of Mandana are a hundred times more to be feared, than if they were leſs reaſonable, and not ſo ſubmiſſive. But, Sir, (ſaid Feraulas) I beſeech you conſider, that the King of Aſſyria is now not with Mandana: Alſo you are certain, that Mazares is not alive, and ſhe is only in the power of a King who has not a Kingdom. It is true, replied he, but this King without a Crown, deſerves a hundred, and that is it, which makes him terrible unto me; Yet notwithſtanding, he was ſometimes very glad to know that the Princeſs was in Armenia, and ſometimes again he would be ſorry for it; for though the virtue of Tygranes was a comfort unto him, yet the violent and ambitious diſpoſition of the King his Father, cauſed ſome Sorrow in him. Feraulas then preſented Marteſia's Complement unto him, which he received very kindly, and ſent back Feraulas preſently unto her, to teſtify his Thanks, and Sorrow that he was not in ſuch a condition, to come himſelf and tell her what he thought; and alſo to let her know, how much he thought himſelf obliged unto her, for acquainting him with the Princeſs's Thoughts; he alſo ſent Chriſantes unto the Princes which had intereſted themſelves concerning his liberty, to conſult with them upon the return of Marteſia; and all of them conceived that the ſooner ſhe ſhewed her ſelf unto the King, it would be the better; for they thought that the certainty of the Princeſs's Fortune, and the infallible appearance of a new War, would much conduce unto his freedom. Chriſantes then, advertiſing Marteſia of the Reſolution, ſhe appeared the ſame night, and ſaid ſhe came but then to town. The King received her with extream Joy, and ſhed many Tears of tenderneſs, for he knew how the Princeſs his Daughter loved her? ſhe acquainted him with all the removes and rapes of Mandana, and with every paſſage excepting what releated unto Artamenes, which ſhe handſomly concealed with much care, naming him but once in all her Relation; nor did ſhe mention the Oracle received at Babylon, leſt it ſhould trouble him, and diſpleaſe Artamenes, and as ſhe was very witty, ſo ſhe did deliver every thing, or paſs it over, as it might be either advantagious or prejudicial. Ciaxares was glad that the Princeſs was in the King of Pontus's Power, ſuppoſing that a Prince who was deprived of his own Kingdoms, would hardly find Protection in another. He believed that the King of Armenia would be glad to have a new pretence for a War, and upon that Thought he ſighed, and could not chuſe but ſecretly wiſh that Artamenes would put himſelf into a condition to relieve her, by confeſſing what he deſired to know from him.

After the King had welcomed Marteſia, he would have had her lie in the Caſtle, but ſhe beſeeched him to let her return back unto her Kinſman; whither ſhe went accordingly, and was viſited by all the Ladies of the Town, and alſo by all the Princes and Men of Quality in Sinope.

Mean while, all the Friends of Artamenes were continually ſoliciting the King in his behalf; and indeed the King did ſeem much to deſire it, yet was very obſtinately reſolved to know either his Innocency, or his Crime; yet he had ſuch confuſed Thoughts, that he himſelf knew not well what to reſolve upon, until the return of Megabiſes whom he had ſent into Armenia, for if by it, he found that his Daughter would be reſtored, then would he be leſs indulgent towards Artamenes: But if on the contrary, ſhe were refuſed, and that he muſt be forced unto a freſh War, then he knew how neceſſary the Liberty of Artamenes would be unto Mandana. Thus being in himſelf irreſolute, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, and all the reſt of the Princes who were Advocates for Artamenes, could not get one peremptory word from him. As they were upon a day all together about him, intelligence came, that there appeared many Strangers and forraign Troops upon the Plain coming towards Sinope; and preſently after, Thimocrates and Philocles came in and told the King, that the Prince Philoxypes, a Favorite unto the King of Cyprus their Maſter, and an ancient Friend unto Artamenes, having married the Princeſs Agariſta his Siſter unto the Prince of Sicily, had obliged him upon the Marriage to ſend ten thouſand Men unto Artamenes, to the end he might preſent them unto his Majeſty; and that he would be ſo pleaſed as to permit them to have ſome part of that honour which theſe Troops would get, under the command of ſo great a King, and by the Valour of ſo gallant a Man as Artamenes. Ciaxares bluſh'd at the diſcourſe, and ſomewhat wondred, that he who was to preſent the Sicilian Troops, was himſelf in ſuch a condition as to need the help of another, alſo he very civilly accepted all that Thimocrates and Philocles ſaid unto him; and permitted him who commanded theſe Souldiers, who was Brother unto the King of Sicily, to enter. Ciaxares himſelf, to do him the more honour, would go upon the Walls of the Town to ſee theſe Troops come in, which he found to be very gallant, compoſed of handſom Men, well armed, and accoutred; and the Prince who commanded them, young and handſom.

After the King had viewed theſe Sicilian Troops under the Walls, and had ordered them to encamp cloſe by the Troops of Cyprus, they two being in Amity one with another, the young Prince who was their General, called Artibies, was brought by Thimocrates and Philocles unto Ciaxares, who told him that Artamenes was not in a condition to be preſent. Artibies enquiring the cauſe, was much ſurprized at it, and made ſome doubt whether he ſhould continue his offer unto Ciaxares, conſidering Philoxypes would never have moved his Brother to ſend theſe Troops, but only in favour of Artamenes. But Thimocrates and Philocles conceiving that in caſe of neceſſity they might be uſeful unto Artamenes, told him, that he ought not to decline from his offer unto the King, but that he ſhould when he ſpoke unto the King acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion, and tell him, that it was the intereſt of Artamenes which moved Philoxypes unto it. This young Prince was no ſooner come before Ciaxares, but after he had ſaluted him, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) I was in hope to have been preſented unto you, by one who ought to be very dear unto you, and one who has made himſelf moſt Illuſtrious throughout all the World; but I ſee that Thimocrates, and Philocles have great need to comfort me in my Sorrows to be deprived of that Advantage: For indeed, although the Prince of Sicily my Brother and Soveraign, and the Prince Philoxypes, have ſent me for the ſervice of your Majeſty, and accordingly I have obeyed them, yet for my own particular, I muſt confeſs unto you, I ſhould have been extreamly joyful, if I could hope to learn under the illuſtrious Artamenes that Myſtery in which he is ſo exactly knowing. You may find ſo many other expert Commanders in this Army (ſaid the King, and ſhewed him all thoſe about him) that though my Affairs will not permit me to ſet Artamenes at liberty, yet you will find no cauſe to repent you came amongſt us. Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, we are all but Schollars unto Artamenes, and this Prince has great reaſon to grieve, as he does, for the Privation of ſo great an Advantage. Since this Diſcourſe was not pleaſant unto Ciaxares, he turned it to ſomething elſe, and asked very inquiſitively concerning the Health of the King of Cyprus, and of Philoxypes, and alſo of the Prince of Sicily; but ſay what he would, yet Artibies would always bring in Artamenes. If the King ſpoke concerning the King of Cyprus, he would then anſwer that this Prince had ever a good opinion of his Prudence, ſince he underſtood how he had committed the conduct of his Army unto Artamenes : If Ciaxares asked him any thing concerning Philoxypes, then he would anſwer him, that Philoxypes had a great deſire to come himſelf, and command in the room of Thimocrates, only that he might learn of Artamenes. If Ciaxares ſpoke any thing concerning the Prince of Sicily, then would Artibies tell him, that if he were not ſo infinitely uxorious, and loving unto the Princeſs his Wife, whom he had newly married, he would have come hither himſelf purpoſely to be acquainted with Artamenes, of whom Fame ſpoke ſo loud : At the laſt, when Ciaxares ſaw that no Diſcourſe, though never ſo far off the Matter, but ſtill the name of Artamenes was in the Mouth of Artibies, he told him, that it was not juſt he ſhould be kept any longer from his reſt, and commanded him to be lodged in the beſt Lodgings, and treated with all poſſible Civility : But before, Artibies left him, he deſired permiſſion to go and ſee Artamenes in Priſon, whom he hoped to have ſeen in the Head of an Army ; unto which deſire Ciaxares conſented ; then he went immediately unto the Priſon of Artamenes, conducted by Aglatidas, Andramias, Thimocrates, and Philocles. Artamenes, at the name of Philoxypes, and the Princeſs Agariſta his Siſter, did expreſs much Friendſhip unto Artibies. This Prince preſented unto him one of his Captains named Leontidas, who Artamenes knew to be an eſpecial Friend unto Philoxypes, who at his coming from him did charge him to preſent unto Artamenes the continuance of his Friendſhip, and to deliver a Letter unto him. Artamenes receiving it with much Joy (for he did infinitely eſteem Philoxypes, although he had not been long in the Iſle of Cyprus) deſired Artibies that he might read it : The Contents were theſe, Philoxypes unto Artamenes.

I Am very glad that Fortune was of my opinion, and has given you that which I ever thought you moſt worthy of, ſince the firſt time I had the honour to ſee you: I wiſh, that ſince ſhe was not blind in ſerving you, ſo ſhe may not be inconſtant in continuing it; but that you all your Life enjoy that Happineſs, which none who knows you, can without injuſtice Envy. Moreover, I had not married the Princeſs Agharista my Siſter, but upon condition that the Prince of Sicily her Husband, ſhould ſend ſome Troops unto you; and I hope, that for my ſake, the Prince Artibies will be welcome unto you; and that after he has purchaſed your Eſteem by thoſe rare Qualities whereof he is Owner, you will admit him ſome part in your Friendſhip; But to tell you ſomething which is more delightful, that I may thereby the more oblige you, be pleaſed to know, that the ſame famous Man, whom you came into our Iſle to ſeek, out of your deſire to be acquainted with his Vertues, is in love with yours: And if the good of his Country had not called him back unto Athens, he had done that for Artamenes, which Artamenes did for Solon. If you deſire to be further acquainted with my Fortunes, I have entreated Leontidas to inform you; and to aſſure you that I am not more in love with the Beauty of Policrite, than I am with the Glory of Artamenes.

Philoxypes.

After Artamenes had done reading the Letter, he redoubled his Civilities towards Artibies, ſhewing unto him the Letter of Philoxypes; you ſee, (ſaid he unto him) how the Wiſhes of that Prince, are not effectual, and how Fortune, whereof he ſpeaks, has forſaken me: But (ſaid he in turning towards Leontidas) it is from you, Sir, that I muſt receive much conſolation in my Miſery, in relating unto me what concerns the Prince Philoxypes; for truly, if I be not miſtaken, there muſt needs be a great Alteration in him, if it be ſo as he ſays in his Letter, that he hath been in Love, ſince when I was acquainted with him, he was in love with nothing but Books, Pictures, Muſick, and ſuch excellent Arts, and if he had any Miſtreſs then, certainly it was the Vertue of Solon, whom I heard him often ſpeak of. O Sir, (replied Leontidas) there is indeed great Alterations in the Life of the Prince Philoxypes, ſuch as doubtleſs will much ſurprize you, as they did not only the Court, but all the Kingdom of Cyprus ; ſince I believe there was not one in all the Towns of Pathos, Amathuſes, Salmes, and Citherea, who has not without admiration heard of his Adventure : Artamenes then ſeeming to be deſirous of knowing the Fortune of ſo famous a Prince : Leontidas promiſed him to come unto him the next Morning, and ſatisfy his deſire. The reſt of this day was ſpent in Civilities to Artibies ; and the next Morning Thimocrates and Philocles being deſirous to know what Accidents had happened in the Court of Cyprus ſince they left it, waited upon Leontidas unto Artamenes, who as ſoon as they came in, becauſe they would loſe no time, did ſit down, Leontidas being in the miſt of them, began his Diſcourſe thus.

The Hiſtory of Philoxypes and Policrite.

SIR, ſince your Abode in this our Iſland hath not been long ; that you may the better underſtand this Story, it is requiſite that you know part of the Cuſtomes of this Iſland, the which I will in a few words acquaint you with, that my enſuing Diſcourſe may appear leſs tedious to you. You muſt then know, Sir, that this good Iſland, which for its Precinct, Situation, Fertility, for the Beauty and Greatneſs of its Towns, and its Magnificent Temples, paſſeth for the moſt famous and moſt conſiderable of as many as lie on the Egean Sea, hath always been conſecrated to Venus ; and that Love, which every-where elſe is a Paſſion, which hath no particular Priviledges, is in this place accounted a religious Act. All that are born here, ſeem as if they were bound to love from their very Birth; All the Temples are dedicated to Venus, under ſeveral Names; all the Pictures and Statues here, repreſent only this Goddeſs, and depend only upon her. You ſhall find here Cupid ſet out every where, and thoſe who inſtruct us elſewhere vertuouſly in our Youth, by teaching us how to overcome our Ambition, Anger, Hatred, Envy, and all other Paſſions; deal otherwiſe with us here, perſwading us only how to love innocently. But as there is nothing ſo pure or refined, which meets not with Alteration and Corruption at the laſt; a ſtrange diſorder crept in long ſince amongſt us; for you muſt know the firſt Temple which was conſecrated unto Venus, was that of Venus Vrania, who we ſay, is the Daughter of Heaven. This Venus, as we believe, inſpires only rational Reſentments, and vertuous Paſſions; whereas on the contrary, there are ſome Temples on the utmoſt Borders of the Iſle towards the South, built long ſince the former, which are dedicated unto Venus Anodema, as much as to ſay, to Venus coming forth from the foam of the Sea. Now, Sir, theſe Temples do differ very much, as do their Reſentments, who offer Sacrifices at them; yet as thoſe Religions wherein Libertiniſm paſſeth for a Vertue, are grounded with moſt eaſe, the Religion of Venus Anadiomena, hath for a long time prevailed over that of Venus Vrania; and our Iſland hath ſeen things which makes thoſe even bluſh with Confuſion, who remember they have heard them ſpoken of by their fore-Fathers: But thanks to Heaven, a vertuous Queen, who lived ſome ſixty years ſince, did re-eſtabliſh all the Temples of Venus Vrania; made almoſt all thoſe of Venus Anadiomena be beaten down; aboliſh'd all the ſhameful Cuſtomes which were introduced in Cyprus, and left only pure Reſentments amongſt us of that Paſſion, which is the Soul of the Univerſe, and which is the ſole Entertainer of civil Society. We are now taught to love our Goddeſs, our Princes, our Laws, our Countrey, our fellow-Citizens, our Parents, Brethren, Wives and Children; and laſtly, to our Selves, to the end that we may do no ſhameful Act. We are taught alſo to love Glory, Sciences and Arts; to love innocent Paſtimes, and to love Beauty and Vertue above all that hath been ſpoken of: In fine, we are taught that he who loves not, is not rational; and that not to have a ſenſe of all theſe aforementioned things, is to be very much to blame. You may eaſily imagine then, that this being a belief generally held amongſt us, the Court of Cyprus muſt needs be a pleaſing Abode, ſince every one there loves handſome Actions, and handſome Perſonages. True it is, that according to the rules of Venus Urania, the Love by her permitted, is ſo pure, ſo innocent, ſo free from having any thing to do with the Senſes, and ſo free from Fault, as ſhe ſeems to ſuffer us to love others only, that we may make our ſelves become the more lovely, through our care of meriting true Glory, of becoming accompliſh'd, and of getting that courtly Air, and pleaſing Converſation, which is only inſpired by Love. This, Sir, is the preſent condition of our Iſland; all Delights are here, but all innocent. Love is the predominant, and univerſal Paſſion in it, but ſuch a Paſſion as is not incompatible with Vertue and Modeſty, and which hinders not many Lovers from complaining of their Miſtreſſes Rigour. Publick Feaſtivals are here frequent, Converſation free enough, but wholly Spiritual; Games for Prizes very uſual, pleaſing Balls, excellent Muſick, and Women in general infinitely handſom, full of Gallantry, and perfectly Vertuous. But of all the reſt, the Princeſs of Salmis, Siſter to Philoxypes, was the Court-Star, till ſuch time as ſhe withdrew her ſelf from thence. The Princeſs of Agbariſta, now Princeſs of Sicily, is alſo very taking, and the famous Artaphil doubtleſs bears a great renown. To boot with theſe, there is one called Timoclea, and an hundred others, of ſomewhat a meaner condition, which are wonderfully handſom. But, Sir, leſt I may prove too tedious, I will briefly tell you that the King who now reigns in Cyprus, is but two years elder than Prince Philoxypes, who is deſcended from the Race of Demophon, Son to Theſeus, who is held in great eſteem amongſt us. Philoxypes in his younger Years, you may eaſily judge was one of the lovelieſt Perſonages which could be ſeen; for though he be now twenty eight years old, he continues to be ſo extraordinarily handſom, and ſo well behaved, as it may eaſily be gueſs'd what he was when a Child; and though he were wiſe even from his Cradle, and knowing even from the time he began to ſpeak, yet ceaſed he not to be of a pleaſing Humour and Comportment, ſuch as is only infuſed by Youth, and the Air of the Court, and which is the Charm of converſation amongſt Ladies. In fine, ſet one Article aſide, Philoxypes may be truly ſaid, to have fully ſatisfied and made good all the Precepts of Venus Urania.

He reverenced the Goddeſs, he loved his Prince, kept the Laws, he loved his Country, his fellow-Citizens, was ambitious of Glory, which he went in queſt of at fifteen years of Age in the Mileſian War, wherein he gave ſingular Teſtimony of his Carriage. He loved the Sciences, and all the liberal Arts; delighted in innocent Paſtimes, and loved Vertue above all things; but as for Beauty, he had only a general Admiration for it, and never felt in himſelf any particular Addition or Adheration to any whatſoever handſom Lady. You may imagine, Sir, how ſtrange this Senſibility appeared in a Court where it met not with any example, and in a Man ſo fit to occaſion Love. Yet was he ſo lovely, as he was not for this the leſs beloved; he was ſo liberal, ſo magnifical, ſo full of complacency, and ſo civilly behaved, as he was the Wonder of the World.

When Solon, after having eſtabliſh'd thoſe famous Laws at Athens, went from thence, reſolving to forgo his Country for ten years, to the end that he might make no Alteration there, he came to our Court; Philoxypes, who was then but eighteen years old, had a great affection for him, as he had likewiſe for Philoxypes; inſomuch, that as long as Solon abode in our Iſle, Philoxypes gave over all his other Delights, and the frequenting of the Ladies Companies, to faſten himſelf totally to him; whom that he might enjoy with the more freedom, he carried him to a Town of his which is called Apia; built by Demo- phon in a very ſtrong, but rocky Situation, and of hard Acceſs, all the Country about it being craggy, dry, and exceeding barren. Solon being come thither, ſhewed him how that they that laid the Foundations of that Town, might have made it much more pleaſanter, if they had built it upon the Banks of the River Claria, in a ſpatious and fertil Plain, which lies at the foot of the Mountain, where the other Town was ſituated; hardly had Solon ſpoke his Thought, when Philoxypes reſolved to put it in execution, and began already to give all neceſſary Orders for it. And indeed Solon was the Architect who guided this great Enterprize, Philoxypes giving him the Glory thereof, for he called this new Town Soly, to perpetuate the memory of the name of Solon. This place being not far from Paphos, one of our King's moſt uſual Abodes, they went oft to the Court; where our Ladies complained ſometimes of Solon, who by bereaving them of Philoxypes, bereft them of their faireſt Ornament; and to ſhew you how great this Princes inflexibility was, Solon, whoſe Vertue is not auſtere, to juſtify himſelf to thoſe that blamed Philoxypes for this, telling him that Love was a Paſſion which ſweetned all other Paſſions, and which did ſometimes exceed them all. That for his part, he confeſt he would never ſet his whole Heart againſt it, and that he thought it no ſhame to be once in his Life overcome thereby. Philoxypes ſaid in his defence, that he loved all that was lovely; that he had a Paſſion for all beautiful Objects, and that no Man ever loved ſo much as he. But notwithſtanding all his univerſal Affections, there was no one ſo fair in all the Court, who could boaſt in her particular to have inthralled his Heart; and who peradventure had not more than once conſulted with her Glaſs, to know by what innocent Art this ſo famous Heart might be taken: But at laſt, after having ſtaid a good while, Solon went his way much taken with Philoxypes his Vertue, and made ſome Verſes in his praiſe before he imbarked for Egypt. He who was commended by all Greece, did highly commend this young Prince, ſaying, that Nature had taught Philoxypes in eighteen years, what

Art could not teach in an Age, and that a Man might ſee in him by way of Prodigy, all the Ages of Man put together; that is to ſay, the innocence of Infancy, the charms of Youth, the fortitude of a more advanced Age, and the wiſdom of old Age. After his departure, Philoxypes was ſomewhat melancholy, but this Humour being over, he ſpent ſome time in travel, and did not only ſee whole Greece, but likewiſe the famous City of Carthage, which did then wage War with the Maſſilians, who inhabit a place which they have of late made famous, by a cry'd up Academy, wherein Eloquence, and all the Greecian Sciences are raely well taught.

I will not relate unto you all the gallant Actions he did in Africa, nor what befel him during that Journey, which continued till ſome Months before you came to Cyprus; where Solon ſtayed awhile again, not ſuffering himſelf to be ſeen almoſt by any one. But I will tell you that Philoxypes at his return to Court, charm'd all the World; and that the King himſelf grew ſo far in love with him, as never was known ſo great a favour as his, nor yet ſo little envied; neither did he make uſe thereof, but for his Maſter's Glory, and to do good to as many as he could; he received no Rewards, but to enrich ſuch as ſtood in need thereof; all the Advices he gave, were good; he did none but good Offices: and thus he ſtood fair in the opinion of the great Ones, and of the People, as well as in that of the King; and there were none but our Ladies who continued to accuſe him of Inflexibility. Thus did he live amidſt Delights, in the ſtatelieſt and moſt gallant Court of all the World, without Envy, without Love, and without Melancholy. But the King was not this mean while ſo happy as he; for after having had ſome flitting Paſſions, which had notwithſtanding much diſquieted him, he fell mightily in love with the Princeſs Artemphile, who certainly is very beautiful, and hath an hundred good Qualities; but who with all this was extreamly ambitious. The King was no ſooner aware of the violence of this his Paſſion, but that he diſcovered it to Philoxypes, and entreated him to intercede for him with Aretephile, who at that time did often viſit the Princeſs Agharista, Siſter to Philoxypes. You may imagine this Prince did not refuſe to aſſiſt him, ſince his Affection was innocent; yet did he ſometimes crave pardon of the King, if he did not much bewail him in his diſquiets: For, Sir, ſaid he, Love being a malady which I am not acquainted with, and which I have much to imagine is ſo great, as Man would have it thought, I confeſs I do not ſo much compaſſionate your Majeſty, as peradventure I ought; and conſequently, I may perchance not ſo fully exaggerate your Sufferings as I ſhould do, when I ſpeak with the Princeſs Aretephile. Fear not Philoxypes, ſaid the King, that I complain of your Inflexibility: on the contrary, if you had a more tender Heart, I would not have choſen you for the Confident of my Paſſion: and did I think that you could become my Rival, I would not give you Commiſſion to ſpeak ſo often with my beloved Princeſs. But my intention not being to ſpeak of the King's Love, otherwiſe than as it relates neceſſarily to Philoxypes Adventures; I will only tell you, that though Aretephile were raviſh'd to ſee her ſelf beloved by the King, yet aiming at the Crown of Cyprus, ſhe thought ſhe was a little to diſguiſe her ſenſe thereof, and to make it a harder matter for the King to win her, than ſhe had found it to win the King: So as this Princeſs behaved her ſelf with much diſcretion and reſervedneſs, and mingling continually Severity with Mildneſs, the King ſtood long in need of Philoxypes's Aſſiſtance, whom Aretephile, who knew what power he had with the King, uſed with all poſſible civility. Philoxypes was notwithſtanding ſometimes much troubled at the continuance of this Paſſion, which made him for his Recreation, go to a very ſtately Houſe, which the famous Solon had cauſed to be built for him near Soly, and wherein he had made a Collection of whatſoever Greece had of moſt rare and curious, were it either for Pictures, or Statues. In this place it was, which is called Claria, where wondering ſometimes at the King's Paſſion, he did me the honour to bemoan himſelf to me of his Employment, and he himſelf gave me a thouſand pleaſant Marks of his Inflexibleneſs, by thoſe things which he uttered againſt Love.

This mean while, though the King were much in love with Aretephile, yet he had ſomewhat to do to perſwade himſelf to marry her, becauſe indeed, in reaſon he ſhould much rather have married the Princeſs Thimoclea, by reaſon of ſome claim ſhe pretended to have to the Principality of Amathuſa; inſomuch as the King being yet unreſolved what to do, had not as yet acquainted Aretephile, nor let her be acquainted that his Love tended meerly to ſet her upon the Throne; but only following the cuſtom of Cyprus, he had ſufficiently witneſſed his Service, and to purchaſe her Eſteem, had done whatſoever a handſom and ingenuous Prince ſeconded by Philoxypes, could do, who though he were himſelf inſenſible of Love, was notwithſtanding a very great Gallant; ſo as Aretephile who was abſolutely reſolved never to part with her Heart for leſs than a Crown, treated the King ſometimes ſeverely enough, inſomuch as the whole Court was troubled thereat, and Philoxypes's delight lay only in Hunting, and in his ſtately Country-Houſe. Some other times Aretephile fearing leſt ſhe her ſelf might extinguiſh the fire which ſhe had kindled in the King's Heart, was ſomewhat more kind unto him, and by the Prince his Joy, rejoyced the whole Court. 'Twas then in one of theſe pleaſant conjunctures of times, that Philoxypes to oblige the King, made the Princeſs of Salamis his Siſter, and the Princeſs Agharista, do him the honour to entertain the King, upon a day that he invited the King and all the Court, to go from Paphos to Claria, and to paſs one whole day in his Retiredneſs, which indeed deſerved to receive ſo princely a Company. Never was there ſo gallant an Aſſembly as this: It was wholly compoſed of young and handſom Perſonages, of great Birth and Underſtanding; and one would have ſaid, that Fortune had favoured Philoxypes in ordering it ſo as that all Perſons of Quality who were peeviſh, or of ill humour in the Court, were either ſick that day, or buſied about ſome important Affairs, ſo as this well-compacted Company was not troubled with the importunity of any of their Companies: On what ſide ſoever they did caſt their Eyes, they met with nothing but goodly Objects; there was no fear of being wearied or annoyed, Philoxypes had taken ſuch excellent order for all things; were it either for the ſtately Furniture of the Houſe, for the magnificency of the Feaſt, or the excellency of the Muſick, as the King to give him the higheſt praiſe he could, ſaid aloud, That if Philoxypes had been in Love, and that his Miſtreſs had been in that Company, he could have done no more than he did. On the contrary, Sir, ſaid Philoxypes, I think that if I had been in Love, all things would have been much more in diſorder than they are; it ſeeming impoſſible to me that a Man ſhould loſe his Reaſon, and yet have leiſure enough to think of ſuch trivial Affairs. The King began then to oppoſe Philoxypes, and to tell him, that he did little know the Effects of this Paſſion; and this he did more than once, as well for that he could hardly find a more pleaſing Entertainment by diſcourſe, as alſo that by reproaching Philoxypes with his ignorance of Love, he thereby found an opportune means to make the Princeſs Aretephile, who liſtened unto him, know that the Paſſion he had for her, had made him very expert therein. Philoxypes did defend himſelf the beſt he could; Sometimes he ſaid the fear of not being beloved kept him from loving; ſometimes that he had ſo nice a Soul, as did avoid ſuch Pleaſures as could not be purchaſed without Pain; and conſequently that Love not being a voluntary thing, he was not to blame for that he did not love: and for his laſt Reaſon, he ſaid that the difficulty of the choice, made him that he neither did, nor could reſolve on any; for, Sir, ſaid he to the King, how is it poſſible to have the Confidence to prefer any one of ſo many handſom Perſonages as I ſee before all the reſt? Ah, Philoxypes, ſaid the King, the more you ſpeak of Love, the more pity do you move in me, and (ſpeaking low in his Ear) the more ſaid he, do you make me ſee that my Confident will never be my Rival. After this, all the Ladies, and all the Men of Quality, began to argue the matter with him; he did ſometime almoſt hate them all for their reproaching him with his Inflexibility. When they had dined, Philoxypes led all this fair Aſſembly into a ſtately Gallery, painted all over by the Hand of an excellent Maſter, named Mandrocles, who is of the Iſle of Samos, and who having finiſh'd this rare Work, ſome few days before this great Feaſt, was returned to his own Country.

The Story of Venus Urania, was the ſubject of all thoſe Pictures, in whom nothing but modeſty was to be diſcerned. The Painter had not drawn the Graces all naked, as they uſually are drawn, but had clothed them in tranſparent Tiffeny, which rendred all thoſe Figures very delightful: In one of the Draughts, you might ſee Venus deſcend from Heaven in a Chariot, all of burniſh'd Gold, drawn by Swans; a thouſand little Cupids ſeemed to hover about her, and to be the firſt that lighted in the Iſle of Cyprus, which is repreſented in the ſame piece, to prepare all things to receive her. In another Piece, all thoſe little Cupidons, erected unto her an Altar of Turfs, and made dreſſings of Flowers to adorn her. In another Piece, this Goddeſs teacheth Cupid how to chuſe his Golden Shafts which he meant to uſe; and in another, ſhe put a Torch into his Hand, and ſhewing him the Sun, which is painted at the top of that piece, ſeems as if ſhe would tell him, that ſhe would have the Flames wherewith he ſets Hearts on fire, to be more pure than the Beams of this glorious Light. In fine, Sir, this Goddeſs is repreſented in above twenty Parts of this Gallery; but though in different Poſtures, you may ſtill diſcern the ſame Countenance. Though all in this Gallery be beautiful, this Figure is incomparably beyond all the reſt: All the reſt are Pictures, but this ſeems to be effectually a divine Perſonage; for certainly there was never any thing ſeen of ſo much handſomneſs; all the fair Ladies who Philoxypes had brought thither, were amazed to ſee it, and maugre themſelves, confeſs that their Glaſs ſhewed them nothing like it. All their Eyes were fixt upon a Face ſo full of Beauty, and they all agreed in one, that the Painter's Imagination had far out-done what ever Nature had done in the moſt accompliſh'd. After they had well eyed this Venus; For my part, ſaid the Princeſs Aretephile, I would fain know whether Philoxypes's Heart could reſiſt a Perſonage who ſhould perfectly reſemble this Picture? Since I have been able (replied he) to behold all theſe Ladies that are here, without daring to profeſs my Service, it is to be believed, I ſhould be as inſenſible for her, or rather as full of reſpect for her, as I have been for all the reſt that I ſee, who are no leſs fair than this Venus. 'Tis not notwithſtanding (ſaid he ſmilingly, and without any other deſign, than to ſay ſomewhat of Gallantry to entertain Converſation) that I am not glad that this Picture is only the effect of the famous Mandrocles's Imagination. For I confeſs unto you, there is a certain charming, modeſt, and paſſionate Air in the Eyes of this Goddeſs, which would peradventure pleaſe me too much, were it a living Beauty. Philoxypes had no ſooner ſaid this, but all the Company began to ſmile at this firſt mark of his tenderneſs, which they had never before obſerved in him. There was not any one of them who would not willingly, if it had been poſſible, have inſpired Life into this Picture, that they might ſee whether Philoxypes might be bent by her or no; and whether his rebel Heart to Love, would prove proof againſt her extraordinary Charms. If this could be, ſaid the Princeſs Thimoclea, I wiſh at leaſt that this fair Perſonage, ſhould have as much ſweetneſs in her Soul as in her Eyes, to the end that nothing might be wanting to Philoxypes's Happineſs. On the contrary, ſaid the Princeſs of Salamis, Me-thinks it were to be wiſh'd, that (to puniſh my Brother for his Inflexibility) ſhe were as cruel, as fair; And I doubt me, added Aretephile, whether for his greater Puniſhment, ſhe were not to be wiſh'd to be proud and ſtupid; Or rather, ſaid Princeſs Aghariſta, inconſtant, fickle, altering her humour every day; And for his yet further Puniſhment, added the King ſmilingly, that ſhe were all that you all have ſaid. At theſe words Philoxypes deſired ſo much favour of them, as that they would ſuffer him to enjoy that Quiet which liberty beſtows on them who poſſeſs her: But the Sun being already low, he mentioned a Walk to this fair Company, pany, who without reſiſtance gladly accepted thereof. He led them into a large Plot of Ground, which makes an Iſland; for he had drawn a Branch of the River of Claria round about it.

Paſſing from thence over a little Bridg, with Baniſters of Braſs, he led them into an Ally of Orange Trees, 1200 Paces long, which the Sun could never get into, ſo large are thoſe Trees, and ſo thick covered with Leaves and Flowers. Amidſt this Ally, there croſſes a Channel of running Water: At laſt you come to a place where eleven Allies croſs one another, at the end of which the River is every-where ſeen, as if it were ſo delighted with that place, as it were loth to leave it. All theſe Allies are either of Orange-Trees, or Citron-Trees, or Myrrh, or Lawrel, or Pomgranats, or Palm-Trees: But after, being come to the end of one of theſe Allies, into which Philoxypes ſent them, they found themſelves in a large Meadow, which is cut thorow in the middle by the River, which gathered together in that place, ſeems to be a great Channel, which hath on its Banks neither Canes, nor Ruſhes, nor Reeds, nor little Shrubs, but is only bordered by thick Turff, and all beſprinkled over with Flags of different colours, with Narciſſus's, with Lillies, and all other Flowers which love moiſture and freſhneſs. There are likewiſe on this River great ſtore of Swans, which ſwim ſo demurely, as you would think they were afraid to trouble the Water which bears them up. And that there might nothing be wanting to this Entertainment, Philoxypes had ſo ordered it, as this River was all covered over with Boats made like Gallies, painted with lively colours, and guided by young Boys in Maritine Apparel, but very handſom; who rowing gently with Oars painted Red and Green, came to the Bank to receive this gallant Company, who were played unto on Ruſtick Muſick by young Shepherds very quaintly clothed, who drove Herds along that Meadow on the other ſide of the River. Their Shepheards Crooks were all trimmed with Braſs, gilt over, and ſtrewed over with Cypers; their Flutes and little Bagpipes were as well deck'd as were their Sheep, all whoſe Horns were loaded with Flowers. In divers parts of this Meadow, were an hundred lovely Shepherds clothed in White, with Hats of Roſes, who to make the place the more pleaſing, mixt the Melody of their Voices to the Ruſtick Muſick aforeſaid. So ſweet a Place being doubtleſly proper to infuſe Joy and Pleaſure, being no diſpoſition to cruelty; the King found Aretephile a little more gentle; and all the worſt-treated Lovers of this Company, found at leaſt ſome truce to their Sufferings, and were, mauger themſelves, delighted with ſo lovely a Place, which was bounded about by a very high Palliſado, wherein Niches placed at equal diſtances, with Statues of white Marble, the rareſt that were ever ſeen in Geeece.

But I may ſeem to be my ſelf enchanted in a Place ſo full of Charms, ſince I ſtay ſo long thereon: I muſt then haſte to make this fair Company depart, whom Philoxypes waited on back to Paphos, after having offered them a famous Banquet. Some few days after, being returned home, with intention to entertain himſelf alone there for two days, he ſpent all that time very contentedly. But Philoxypes his Humour lying rather to like general Beauties, wherein Art hath nothing to do, than thoſe where Art undertakes to perfect Nature, went out of his Park, and unaccompanied by any ſave one Servant, he went to the River ſide, intending to walk along it till he ſhould come to the Head thereof, which is not far from thence, and which certainly is one of the goodlieſt things in the World: For this miraculous Spring-head, which of it ſelf makes a River, is incloſed by Rocks of an inacceſſible height; at the foot of the greateſt and higheſt whereof is a large Cave, which extends it ſelf even to the loſs of ſight, both on the right hand and on the left, under inacceſſible Rocks. At the bottom of this Cave, is a ſilent Spring, which ſometimes riſeth up to the top of the Den, and ſometimes falls ſo low, as it is not above ſix foot high. This inequality is the cauſe why the River of Claria, as well as all the others of Cyprus, paſs rather for a fair Torrent than for a River; though this be not poſitively ſo, for it is never altogether dried up as are all the reſt. As he went towards this Cave, he got off Horſe-back, leaving his Horſe with his Servant, commanding him to wait his return, and not to follow him.

Thus did he walk all alone along theſe Torrents, with the ſight and noiſe whereof he was much delighted, when raiſing up his Eyes he might ſee, ſome twenty paces off, a very handſom Woman, though in mean Habit, who was ſat upon a Rock, all covered with Moſs; and who ſeemed to take pleaſure in eying attentively the fall of Waters which came ruſhing at her Feet, as if to do her Homage. At firſt Philoxypes thought not to trouble the Contentment of one whoſe Humour was ſo conformable to his, to ſit muſing on the River ſide, and to turn a little aſide that he might not interrupt her. But being come a little nearer, and ſeeing that her Apparel, though clean and handſom, gave her not out to be a Perſonage of Quality, he went directly towards her, becauſe that was the eaſieſt way. But being come very near her, and the noiſe his walking made having made this Woman look about, he was ſtrangely taken; not only to ſee the handſomeſt Creature in the World, but to diſcern perfectly that that miraculous Venus which he had in his Gallery, and which he had always taken only for the Effect of an handſom Imagination, was really the Picture of this Perſonage. Philoxypes, raviſh'd at this ſo ſtrange Apparition, changed his Colour; and ſaluting this Maid with more civility than her Condition ſeemed to require, he advanced yet nearer her; but ſhe riſing up in haſte, and having, not without a bluſh, paid him his Salute, as if ſhe had been troubled to be ſeen alone in that place, ſhe haſted to go unto an old Man and a Woman well advanced in Years, who were not above twenty paces off; yet fearing be-like to be followed, ſhe turned her Head twice towards Philoxypes, who was ſtill the more dazled with her Beauty, and more confirmed in his Opinion.

This Prince ſurpriſed at this Encounter, had a great deſire to know who this young and ſo wonderfully handſom Made might be; and to know alſo how Mandro- cles could come to draw her Picture; and why Mandrocles had always told him, that the Picture which he had drawn, was only an effect of his Fancy: He followed her with his Eyes as far as he could; but having ſtood ſtill a pretty while, not knowing why he did ſo, he loſt ſight of her amongſt thoſe Rocks, after ſhe was come up to thoſe ſhe went unto, ſo as he could no more diſcover her.

Philoxypes did not overmuch endeavour it, though his Mind led him very much thereunto; but coming near the River ſide, inſtead of continuing to walk towards the Spring-Head, he went down the Stream; and were it by Hazard, or out of Deſign, he happened to reſt himſelf upon the ſame Rock coverd with Moſs, on which he had ſeen the fair Maid ſit. Philoxypes being there, could think on nothing but on this Fair unknown One, and upon the pleaſing Adventure which had befaln him. He then remembred the Diſcourſe which had paſs'd in the Gallery, and what he had ſaid of that Picture which every one ſo much commended; and delighted to entertain himſelf upon this Subject, how glad ſaid he unto himſelf, would Princeſs Aretephile be, if ſhe knew what had befallen me, and how would the King mock me if he heard it? They would certainly ſay, that the Goddeſs had wrought a Miracle to puniſh me, by making me meet with a Country Wench, of whom to make the Object of my Choice. But, ſaid he, preſently after, this Country Maid is fairer than whatſoever there is of Beauty in the Court; and I ſhall ſufficiently revenge my ſelf of all our Ladies, if I can once more meet with her, and let them ſee her.

He then reſolved to return the next day to the ſame place, and in the mean time not to ſpeak of her till he had found her again. He then returned home, but full of amazement; at his firſt arrival, he went ſtrait to his Gallery, and grew ſo confident in his belief, that his Venus Urania was the very Picture of this Fair unknown One, as he doubted no more thereof. He compared all the Features of this Picture, with the Image which he bare about in his Mind, not finding any difference between them, ſave that the Original was far above whatever Mandrocles, with all his Art, could repreſent. He ſeemed to have obſerved in her Face, a much more pleaſing youthly Air, a much more majeſtical Modeſty, and a Sweetneſs infinitely more alluring.

In fine, the Prince Philoxypes, who had wont to be more in his Cloſet than in his Gallery, perceiving that the ſight of this Picture detained him there whether he would or no, went forth much perplex'd to ſee, that once in his Life-time he could not maſter his Affections. He paſt the reſt of that Day, and all the next Night, not being able to put this pleaſing Phantaſm out of his Mind. The next Day he returned to the ſame place where he had ſeen that fair One, ſtill thinking how he ſhould be pleaſed to cauſe her to be ſeen by the King and the whole Court. But though he went up the River, even up to the Head thereof, he could not find her; he ſought her long in vain, and being angred thereat, he ſought whether he could not find ſome little track about that place where he had ſeen the Fair unknown One; but it being all Rocky, no impreſſion of Footſteps could be ſeen there, nor could there be any Track found amongſt the Rocks. Deſperat then, as he was, not to find any knowledg of what he ſo much deſired, he returned back, abſolutely reſolving not to return any more to that place: Yet was he no ſooner at home, but that he wiſh'd to be at the River ſide; he enquired of all his Servants, if they had never met any Body thereabouts, which reſembled that Venus; and ask'd them very particularly, in what Places, and into what Houſes Mandrocles went when he painted his Gallery? They anſwered, that they had never ſeen her whom he ſpoke off, and that Mandrocles was a ſolitary Man, who ſaw no Body, who ſpent all his time in deſigning amongſt thoſe Rocks; and that he took almoſt always the way towards the head of Claria. Philoxypes not able to learn any more, did what he could to think no more thereon; but though he had reſolved to return next day to Paphos, he ſtaid at Claria, (for his Houſe bears the Name of the River which paſſeth by it) and whatever Deſign he had, never to return to ſeek out the Fair unknown One, his Feet, maugre himſelf, bare him always towards the place where he had met her. He returned often from thence, not knowing why he would not willingly go thither, nor why he went thither, not having any thought of ſo doing. But at laſt yielding to his Curioſity, he returned towards thoſe Rocks, reſolving to ſuffer himſelf to be guided by Fortune; leaving always his Servant and his Horſe where he left them the firſt time.

He wandring then along amongſt thoſe Mountains, when being weary, he ſate himſelf down, which he had hardly done, upon a neighbouring Rock, when he might diſcover afar off a little Cottage, in a place which appeared very ſavage unto him: ſo as riſing up, it may be, ſaid he unto himſelf, 'tis here where the Gods have hidden the Treaſure which I ſeek for. And indeed he had not walked far, when he ſaw the Fair unknown One, accompanied by the ſame old Man, and the ſame Woman which he had formerly ſeen, and by three or four others all meanly clothed, which ſeemed to take a by-way which led to a little Temple which lies towards the Sea ſide, and which was built for the accommodation of Strangers who traffique in that Iſland, and land on that ſide. The Temple not being above ſix furlongs from this little rural Habitation, 'twas but a walk to go thither on foot.

Philoxypes raviſh'd at this Encounter, went towards them; and addreſſing his ſpeech to the old Man, after having ſaluted, and looked on the Fair unknown one with more admiration than at firſt; Father, ſaid he, know you who they be that live in that little Houſe which I ſee yonder amongſt the Rocks? Sir, ſaid he, they are People who merit not the honour you do them in ſpeaking to them; nor do I know how my Cabbin ſhould cauſe curioſity in a Man of your condition.

Whilſt the old Man ſpoke, Philoxypes had his Eyes fix'd upon the Fair unknown One ſo intentively, as he made her bluſh, and forced her to turn her Head aſide; he willingly would have ſpoken to her, but that (as he told me afterward) he was affraid to run himſelf into ſo pleaſing ſing an Inchantment; and that he would find as much rudeneſs in her Converſation, as ſhe had ſweetneſs in her Eyes; as alſo, that he ſaw her to be ſo modeſt, as he eaſily imagined ſhe would not ſpeak long unto him in her Parents preſence, (for he perceived ſhe behaved her ſelf as if ſhe were the old Man's Daughter) he enquired alſo of the good old Man, if he went oft to that Temple? whether his Abode there had been long? whether he were of Cyprus, or no? whether that were his whole Family? and an hundred other things to continue the Converſation. To all which, though the other anſwered exactly, Philoxypes did hardly hear any thing he ſaid; and thus they parted, after he had taken his leave of them all, hardly knowing what he ſaid.

Not having learn'd any thing, but that he had once more ſeen the Fair unknown One, that ſhe was much more lovely than he had thought her to be, that he knew her Abode, and the Temple whither ſhe ſometimes went. He purſued her with his Eyes as far as he could; but at laſt being aſhamed of what he did, and ſeeking a reaſon for it, he returned back the ſame way, and went into his Gallery, it being the only place in all his Houſe wherein he pleaſed himſelf. When he was come thereinto, he began to walk with more diſquiet than he had wont to be acquainted withal. And far from his former deſign of bringing the Fair unknown One to the Court, he did as far as in him lay, put on a reſolution of never ſeeing her more himſelf; ſo much was he affected with this ſecond ſight.

To this purpoſe, he went forthwith out of his Gallery, got on Horſe-back, and returned to Paphos; the King who loved him dearly, and who had as much of Friendſhip for him, as of Love for the Princeſs Aretephile, complained of his ſo long abode in the Country, and made as much of him as could be. He immediately entreated him to viſit the Princeſs Aretephile, becauſe there had been ſome little quarrel between them, which he acquainted him withal, making the moſt he could of it.

Philoxypes obyes him, viſits the Princeſs, and makes them Friends: but let him do what he pleaſeth, or go whither he will, his Thoughts are ſtill buſied about the Fair unknown One; he compares her with all the Beauties that he ſees, and whether he behold Aretephile, Thimoclea, Agbariſta, or whoſoever elſe, he can ſee none but his Siſter, the fair Princeſs of Salamis, who comes any way neer her for Beauty; but he preferred the other a thouſand times before her, as being a thouſand times more Beautiful than whatſoever the World hath of Beauty. Two dayes after he returned to Claria, and the next day he went to the aforeſaid little Temple, whither thoſe that were of the Iſland went ſeldom or never, it being only built for Strangers.

And this was the reaſon wherefore the Beauty of the Fair unknown One, had not been noiſed abroad, neither in Apia, which is not far from thence, nor in Soly, which is very neer it, nor in Claria which joins upon it. Philoxypes, then maugre himſelf, went thither, whither he was no ſooner come, but he ſaw the fair Maid ſtill accompanied with the ſame Company, who devoutly prayed to the Goddeſs that is there adored. In fine, Sir, to keep that no longer from you, which Philoxypes had much ado to acknowledg to himſelf, this laſt ſight fully conquered him; for the Sacrifice being ſomewhat long, Love had time enough to faſten him with his Chains not to be untied. You may believe it had been eaſy for Philoxypes to have ſpoken to this Maid, as ſhe came out of the Temple, and to have followed her home, if he had pleaſed; but though Love had already gotten the upper hand on his Heart, yet had it not driven out ſhame from thence. And Philoxypes did me the honour to tell me afterwards, that he was ſo aſhamed of his own weakneſs, and of the meanneſs of this Maid's condition, as he ſometimes wiſh'd to be dead.

This little Aſſembly being gone, and he being returned home, ſtrangely perplex'd, What, ſaid he to himſelf, is it poſſible that Philoxypes, who could never be wrought upon by all the fair Ladies of Cyprus, ſhould be in love with one born in a Cottage, bred up amongſt Rocks, and ſavage People? Ah, no, no, it cannot be, I would rather rip out my Heart than ſuffer it any longer to remain ſo mean and ſo unworthy an Affection. But (ſaid he preſently afterwards) there is ſomewhat of Divinity in ſupream Beauty, which is not to be reſiſted. And if this unknown One be more fair than all the Princeſſes of the World, ſhe better deſerves the love of the inflexible Philoxypes than all they do. Yet I am ſure, ſaid he, when the wiſe Solon told me, That a Man might, without ſhame, be once in his life-time overcome by Love; he underſtood it not to be by the Love of a Shepherdeſs, as doubtleſly ſhe——At theſe words not having power to end his Speech and ſay, Whom I love; ſhame ſtop'd his Mouth, and for awhile he ſaid nothing.

Then ſuddenly re-aſſuming his Speech, No, no, ſaid he, Solon would not approve the Folly which poſſeſſeth me: For, in fine, to love a Perſon ſo beneath ones ſelf, a Perſon, whoſe Name one is afraid to ask; one to whom one hath never ſpoken, and to whom I dare not ſpeak, for fear of finding her Mind unworthy of her Beauty; one who peradventure will not underſtand my Language, who peradventure hath neither Vertue nor Goodneſs, and whom the Gods have endowed with extraordinary Beauty, only for my confuſion, and to make me deſpair; once more it cannot, it muſt not be; ſo dreadful an Evil muſt be early withſtood; and as there are ſome Venemous Creatures whoſe Miſchief is only cured by themſelves, the fair unknown One muſt cure me of the Malady ſhe hath cauſed in me.

I muſt once more ſee her, and ſpeak to her, to the end that the Blemiſhes of her Mind, and her rude Converſation, may drive that Beauty from my Heart, which her charming Beauty and pleaſing Eyes hath placed there. But, good Gods, replied he unto himſelf, is it poſſible ſo fair a Perſonage ſhould have any Defaults? Think Philoxypes what thou wilt do; and fear, leſt whilſt you think to find a Cure for your Evil, you render it incurable.

Thus Philoxypes reaſoned with himſelf, who in effect reſolved to go the next day to the Cottage, where the fair unknown one dwelt, with intention to ſpeak unto her, and ſo to cure himſelf, imagining that his ſhame to ſee himſelf in that Cottage, and the Maids groſs Converſation, would infallibly ſalve his Paſſion. But he knew not that 'tis an uſual effect of Love to make thoſe who are in love, make uſe of all Pretences, whereby they may come near thoſe whom they love, not knowing themſelves why they go thither.

Philoxypes failed not then to go the next day towards the Rocks, at foot whereof, according to his cuſtom, he left his Servants: But as he went, he was much diſquieted; ſometimes he wiſh'd this young Maid might neither have Wit nor Attraction; and by and by, deſired again he might meet with nothing in her which might detract from her Beauty.

In fine, not knowing whether he deſired to be ſick or cured, whether he would be free or a captive; and not knowing alſo under what pretence to make this odd viſit, he march'd on till he came to a little Valley, ſeated between Rocks, ſtoln as it were from the World, and very fit, to ſay the truth, to hide ſo infinite a precious Treaſure. At the foot of this little Valley, there lies a pleaſant Meadow; and upon the ſide of theſe Rocks, a little Wood of Myrtle, and wild Pomegranats, intermingled with ſome Orange Trees. At the bottom of this Wood, there ſtands a little Houſe very low built, but in indifferent good repair: As Philoxypes drew near it, his troubles redoubled, and he was almoſt tempted to turn back, ſo aſhamed was he of his weakneſs. But at laſt being forced on by Love, he entered into the fore-Court of this Houſe, cloſed in with Lawrels no higher than ones Elbow, which are very common in this Iſland. At laſt ſeeing a Door open, he came into a little Chamber, decently, though but meanly furniſhed; in which he found a fair unknown one, and two other Women who made Garlands of Flowers, intending to carry them the next day to the Temple, and give them to the Prieſt who lived there, to adorn the Victime, which was to be offered there in ſacrifice. You may imagine, how much aſtoniſhed this young Maid might be to ſee ſuch a one as Philoxypes enter her Cabin, who is always richly clothed, and who, as you know, is of a very ſtately Behaviour; ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but riſing up in haſte, ſhe let all her Flowers fall, thereby affording Philoxypes occaſion of commencing Converſation, who ſtooped down to gather up the faln Flowers: Sir, ſaid ſhe, endeavouring to hinder him, pray trouble not your ſelf, for our Woods and Meadows abound in the like, ſo as I may eaſily repair this loſs, if theſe were ſpoiled. Thoſe which your Woods and Fields produce, ſaid he, are not of ſuch worth as theſe, which I reſtore you, becauſe they have not been gathered by ſo fair a Maid as you. Sir, ſaid ſhe, bluſhing, the Goddeſs to whom I intend to offer them, will look more upon the intention of my Heart, than upon my Face, which certainly hath nothing in it, which may occaſion you to ſpeak as you do. But, Sir, ſaid ſhe, (not giving him leave to interrupt her, to the end ſhe might change the diſcourſe) you have perhaps ſomewhat to command my Father, who will be very much troubled that he is not here, that he might have the honour to obey you; but he is gone forth with my Mother, and will not return till night.

Philoxypes hearing her ſpeak with ſo much Judgment, and ſuch Civility, he having at moſt expected nothing but innocency and ſimplicity in her Converſation, had hardly the power to anſwer her. He beheld her with Admiration, and liſtened to her with Aſtoniſhment; he obſerved a decent negligence in her Apparel, and her tone of Speech ſo exceſſively charming, as he was raviſh'd: She ſpoke not only Greek, but with all the attique Purity, and courtly Smoothneſs; her Action was moreover infinitely becoming, having nothing in it, neither of affected, nor yet Clowniſh. He found ſuch modeſty in her Looks, and ſo lovely a freſhneſs in her Complexion, as he had hardly liberty to reply; yet after ſome Strivings within himſelf, 'Tis true, fair Maid, ſaid he, I had ſomewhat to ſay unto your Father, but till ſuch time as I ſhall ſee him, give me leave to ask you why he makes choice of ſo ſolitary an Abode? Sir, ſaid ſhe, ſuch is my reſpect unto him, as I never informed my ſelf of what you deſire to know; but I have ſometimes thought that this place is not of his choice, and that he lives here, only to fit his Mind unto his Fortune, which not having deſtin'd him a Palace, hinders him not from thinking himſelf happy in his Cottage.

But is it poſſible, ſaid he, that this auſtere ſolitarineſs ſhould not ſeem tedious to you? Sir! (replied ſhe, with a modeſt ſmile) you will doubtleſly think me very ruſtick and ſavage, when I ſhall dare to ſay, that the only trouble I have met withal amidſt theſe Rocks, ſince I have lived here, is that wherewith I am now poſſeſt, to ſee you in a place, where I uſe not to ſee any one; and where certainly I would not ſee you, were I in a condition to do otherwiſe; it not appearing ſeemly to me, that one of your condition ſhould buſy himſelf in talking ſo long with ſuch a one as I am. I ſhould be very unhappy, ſaid Philoxypes, if I ſhould have offended you, or have appeared too importunate: but lovely Perſonage, tell me I beſeech you, your Name, and your Parents Name, and tell me what God or Goddeſs 'tis that comes to inſtruct you in theſe Woods? Sir, ſaid ſhe, my name is Policrite, my Father is called Cleanthes, and my Mother Megiſto; but as for thoſe Gods which you ſay do teach me, they have as yet taught me ſo little, as I am ignorant even of Civility; to witneſs which, I ſhall take the boldneſs to ſay, that ſince thoſe on whom I depend are not here, I ſhall deſire you not to take it ill, if I intreat you not to tarry any longer in a place, wherein you will find more of Incommodity than Content. I ſhall not alter my Mind, replied Philoxypes for what you ſay, but muſt once more affirm, that doubtleſs the Gods have in a moment inſpired you, with what others have much ado to learn in all their whole Lives. For that you ſhould be the faireſt Maid in all the World, and fairer in a Cottage, than Queens are in their Palaces; though this be very much, yet it is not impoſſible, but that living amongſt Woods and Rocks, you ſhould behave your ſelf, and ſpeak as you do, 'tis this fair Policrite, that I cannot comprehend; nor can I imagine that you were born here amongſt theſe ſavage Rocks; 'tis true, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I am not of this Iſland by Birth; but was ſo young when I parted from Creta, as I hardly remember any thing thereof. 'Tis true, the converſation which I have here, cannot have given me the Accent of the Countrey, for I ſpeak with none but thoſe of this Family, who are no more of Cyprus than I.

What, Policrite, ſaid Philoxypes, do you ſpend your whole time without ſpeaking, and yet ſpeak as you do? Once more, this Cottage is unworthy of you; and ſome means muſt be found out to draw you hence. I am ſo well contented here, Sir, ſaid ſhe, as I ſhould thereby receive an Injury, and I imagine you have no ſuch deſign; therefore I conjure you to leave me in that ſolitarineſs that you found me; for neither will I ſay much more unto you, not being able to ſpeak any thing of mine own experience.

Philoxypes, who obſerved that this young Maid was indeed troubled to ſee him tarry ſo long with her, though it were in no diſobliging manner, was loth to anger her; ſo as with much violence uſed upon himſelf, after having ſaluted her with ſuch Reverence as if ſhe had been upon a Throne, he offered to be gone. But, Sir, ſaid ſhe, with much candour, you know my name is Policrite, and I cannot tell my Father what his name is, that hath done him the honour to inquire after him. Replied this Prince, tranſported with Love, my name is Philoxypes. Alas, Sir, anſwered Policrite, I beg your pardon, if I have not uſed you with ſuch reſpect as I ought.

Is not then, ſaid he, my name unknown unto you? No, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and I have heard my Father, though he knows you not himſelf, ſay ſuch things of you by the report of others, as I am ſure will make him rejoyce exceedingly when he ſhall know that you will do him the favour to command him any ſervice. Philoxypes, inchanted to hear Policrite ſpeaking in ſuch ſort, ſaid unto her a thouſand paſſionate and obliging things, if ſhe would have underſtood them; to which ſhe ſtill replied with ſuch readineſs and modeſty, as he ſtill became in love with her more and more.

He then took his leave of her, and departed from this Cottage, with an unconceivable Sorrow. Being come to the ſame place where he firſt ſaw her, he ſtayed; and beholding on the one ſide his goodly and magnificent Palace of Claria, and on the other ſide this little Country Cottage: Ah, Philoxypes, cried he, who would believe, that in the condition thy Soul is in, thou canſt prefer this unlucky Cottage before that ſtately Palace? and that thy Heart ſo inſenſible of Love, and ſo ambitious of true Glory, can abaſe it ſelf before Policrite's Feet? But then, ſaid he again, is it poſſible that Philoxypes ſhould love any thing which is not the handſomeſt thing in the World? And if it be ſo, Policrite ought to be the Object of his Deſires and Love; I ſay, Policrite, in whoſe Looks is no Art, whoſe Words are ſincere, all whoſe Thoughts are innocent, who knows not what a Sin is, whoſe Heart is not prepoſſeſt with any Paſſion, who as yet loves nothing but the Woods, Fields, Flowers, and Fountains; who is hardly conſcious of her own Beauty, and whoſe Inclinations are doubtleſly all vertuous. But when all is done, ſaid he, after a little pauſe, Love is a weakneſs, from whence I have till now defended my ſelf, only becauſe I did verily believe, that it was a Vertue not to be capable thereof; but to love a Perſonage of ſo unequal Birth, is a folly, which I ought by all means to withſtand. For in fine, with what face ſhall I dare to appear at Court? How fair ſoever Policrite be, I dare not ſhew the Irons ſhe makes me wear; they muſt either be broken by force, or ſo cunningly conceal'd, as no Man may ever diſcern them.

With this reſolution did Philoxypes return home, and from thence to Paphos; but he was ſo poſſeſt with Melancholy, as he was forced to fain himſelf ſick. The King, who ſaw him that very Night, both with himſelf and with the Princeſs Aretephile, perceived his Perplexity, and preſſed him to know the cauſe: But Philoxypes anſwered him as he had done the reſt. The Court was very great that day, and all that was gallant was there; which occaſioned Philoxypes in his Ravings, to enquire of himſelf an hundred and an hundred times, why, ſince he was to love, it was not ſome of thoſe illuſtrious Perſonages? Yet though he would uſe violence upon himſelf, and endeavour not to love, by reaſon he could never compaſs it. And Policrite's Image was ſo deeply imprinted in his Heart, as nothing could deface it. He paſſed over three days thus with very much diſquiet, and on the fourth maugre himſelf, he returned to Claria, and from thence to Cleanthes, whom at his firſt approach, he found leaning upon a little Palliſado of Lawrels, which incompaſſed his Cottage. As ſoon as this wiſe old Man ſaw him, he ſtept unto him, and received him with ſuch civility as had nothing of Ruſtick in it. Sir, ſaid he, I thought my Daughter had been deceived when ſhe told me your Name, which kept me from coming to Claria to receive your Commands; and alſo that 'tis hard to imagine, that a Man of my Fortune and Age may be any ways ſerviceable to ſuch a Prince as you. Vertue and Worth, ſaid Philoxypes, makes Friends unto it ſelf of all Ages, and of all Conditions. But Cleanthes, the only thing I deſire to know of you, is, whether it be out of neceſſity, or out of choice, that you inhabit this little Houſe? for, if it be the former, you ſhall not tarry long here; and if the latter, I will come and live with you ſometimes. At which Cleanthes ſmiled, and ſaid, Poor Cottages, Sir, are no proper Abodes for great Princes. 'Tis very true, ſaid Philoxypes, neither ought great Worth to be confin'd to little Cottages, but doth much better become great Palaces: I therefore proffer you my Houſe Claria, where you and your Family may live more commodiouſly than here. Sir, replied Cleanthes, 'tis handſom for a Perſonage of your condition and worth to be willing to relieve the diſtreſſed, but it were not juſt to abuſe that Goodneſs which may be better employed on ſome better occaſion. For, in fine, Sir, I ſuffer no want in this Cottage, my Mind being no greater than it; I here live in quiet; and finding in this little Corner of the Earth ſufficient to keep me from being troubleſom to any Body, I live here much more happily than thoſe who live in Palaces, and whoſe deſires are not therein bounded. But wiſe Cleanthes, ſaid Philoxypes, will you not tell me what Fortune 'tis that hath brought you hither, and acquaint me preciſely with your condition? Sir, ſaid the good old Man, I am deſcended of honeſt Parents, of an indifferent Fortune; for mine, you ſee it is mean enough, and I aſſure you my worth is not extraordinary. I was forc'd to forgo my Country, for many Reaſons, too long now to tell, and to ſeek out a place of Retirement in this Iſland, where I have lived a good while. But ſaid Philoxypes, are you not afraid leſt Policrite, who may juſtly be termed a Treaſure, may not be ſafe in ſuch a place as this? If I ſhould grant, anſwered Cleanthes, that Policrite ſhould be what you ſay, ſince this Treaſure is only known by Prince Philoxypes, I ſhould think it ſafe enough. You have reaſon, Father, ſaid he, for what you ſay, for I engage my ſelf to protect you, againſt what, or whoſoever ſhall go about to injure you. After this Cleanthes led him into his Houſe, where he found Megiſto, Cleanthes's Wife, who received him ſo civilly, as he eaſily diſcern'd that there was nothing of ruſtick nor ſavage in this Family.

She had by her young Policrite, another Maid handſom enough, whom Policrite called Siſter, and whoſe name is Dorida: But, good Gods, how fair did Policrite appear to Philoxypes that day? Her Hair which hung careleſs over her Neck, and which were the one half covered by a thin Tiffany, were tied back behind her Head, with a Garland of Orange and Pomegranate Flowers, over which hung a thin Veil, with which ſhe covered her Face when ſhe went in the Sun, and which very well became her Dreſſing: The reſt of her Apparel was white, of a handſom ſhape; her Sleeves, which were very large, were thruſt back with Ribbonds of ſeveral colours; and though there was nothing of ſtate in this Habit; and that inſtead of Pearls and Diamonds, ſhe was only deck'd with Flowers, yet was there ſomewhat ſo handſom and ſo comely in her Dreſſing, as ſhe never appear'd ſo fair to Philoxypes; the more he ſaw her, the more he was in love with her; and were it that he entertained Cleanthes, that he ſpoke to Megiſto, that he addreſſed himſelf to Policrite, or that he ſaid ſomewhat of civility to Dorida, he was ſtill more and more taken. What did he not do to make them tell him ſomewhat more than Cleanthes had told him, and to perſwade them that he might fit them with a better Lodging? He offered Cleanthes Jewels to diſpoſe of at his Pleaſure; but let him do what he could, he could learn nothing, nor obtain nothing, ſave only leave to come and viſit them ſometimes, which they granted him, meerly becauſe they knew not how to deny it him. I will not ſtay to tell you how frequently Philoxypes returned thither during twelve days ſpace which he ſtaid at Claria, without returning to Paphos; but I will tell you, that Cleanthes, who had underſtanding enough, and Megiſto who wanted not any, eaſily perceived that it was Policrite's Beauty which occaſioned this Prince his ſo frequent Viſits, he read her a long Leſſon, and wiſh'd her to have a care of her ſelf, and that ſhe ſhould conſider that Philoxypes his Affection could not but redound to her prejudice; and that therefore ſhe ſhould live with him, as with one whom ſhe ſhould never look upon but meerly with reſpect, not ſuffering him to engage her in any particular Affection.

This mean while Philoxypes, who perceived he ſhould never have the freedom to ſpeak to Policrite in particular, unleſs it were by chance, came ſo often thither, as he met her once unaccompanied by any ſave the young Dorida. This being too fair an occaſion to let ſlip, he drew near unto her, and expreſſing much Love in his Looks, Think not, Policrite, ſaid he, that I have any thing miſ-becoming to ſay unto you, though I have diligently watched to entertain you alone; 'Tis only that not knowing how you will receive my Affection, I was not deſirous to have any Witneſſes of my Misfortune or Happineſs. Sir, ſaid ſhe, with a Maidenly-bluſh, before you ſpeak, conſider I beſeech you where you are; mark well the Cottage wherein I live, and ſee what Cloathes I wear. No, Policrite, replied he, I ſee nothing but your Eyes, and had you a Crown of Diamonds on your Head, I ſhould no more mind it than what you ſpeak of; ſo firmly are my Looks fixt upon your Beauty. Permit me then, Sir, ſaid the diſcreet and fair Maid, to teach you another thing, which it may be you are ignorant of, and which ought to keep you from ſaying any thing unfitting to me; 'Tis, Sir, that this very Policrite, whom you ſee in this Country Cottage, who is thus ſimply attir'd, who is only known to theſe Woods and Rocks, hath, notwithſtanding her meanneſs and ſimplicity, ſo tender a ſenſe of Honour, that ſhould you offend her never ſo little therein, ſhe were able to die for ſorrow and diſlike: Be careful then, Sir, to ſay nothing which may make Policrite believe, that you know her not; for, in fine, ſhe hath ſuch a paſſion for Vertue, as ſhe ſhould have much ado not to hate thoſe who ſhould ſay any thing unto her in oppoſition thereunto. Fear not, ſaid he, faireſt Policrite, that I ſhall ſay any thing to you, which ſhall offend you, at leaſt, which ſhould offend; for I proteſt unto you in the Preſence of the Gods, who hear me, that the Paſſion which you have for Flowers, Fountains, and for theſe inamel'd Fields, is not more pure, nor more innocent, than that which I have for Policrite: and if there be any difference between them, 'tis that the Affection which I bear to her, is ſo violent and ſtrong, as there is nothing which I ſhall not willingly undertake to witneſs it unto her. You cannot better do it, Sir, ſaid ſhe, than in doing me the favour to ſay no more of ſuch things unto me, which will only ſerve to trouble the quiet of my Life, ſince if I ſhould not believe you, I ſhould certainly be ſomewhat troubled to think you would laugh at my Simplicity; and if I ſhould believe you, I ſhould almoſt deſpair, for being the cauſe why a great Prince ſhould contract a Paſſion ſo unworthy of him, and from whence he can never reap any Advantage.

For in fine, Policrite knowing her ſelf, and knowing you alſo, would not her ſelf commit a Fault, nor yet cauſe you commit one for love of her; do not therefore ingage your ſelf, Sir, in ſo troubleſom an Adventure. Let me alone, ſaid ſhe, looking upon him with an Eye, which did rather detain him than drive him away, though it were done without Art; let me alone I ſay, amongſt our Woods and Rocks, and get you to your Palaces, where you will be much better than here. Philoxypes was aſtoniſhed to hear Policrite ſpeak thus, when throwing himſelf at her Feet, No, no, divine Policrite, ſaid he, you are not what you appear to be; and though you were ſo, yet would your Vertue place you in a degree above all the Queens in the World. Sir, ſaid ſhe, raiſing him up, think not that I am to be won by Flatteries; for though I know not the World by mine own experience, I know it by my Parents Relation; I therefore know that Love is a dangerous Paſſion, and not knowing preciſely what it is, I know it ought to be avoided; and that I ought rather to apprehend that Love which you ſay you bear me, than any other. And wherefore, Policrite, ſaid he, do you thus treat that innocent Paſſion, which you raiſed in my Heart? Becauſe, ſaid ſhe, it cannot be but injurious to Philoxypes, or to Policrite. But ſay, for God's Sake, ſaid he, ſuppoſe that Policrite were a Princeſs, or that Philoxypes, were of the ſame condition that Policrite is; what would you then think of him? I cannot tell, ſaid ſhe, but this I know, Sir, that though I ſhould eſteem him never ſo much; nay, though I ſhould love him very much, Cleanthes and Megiſto ſhould always abſolutely diſpoſe of me. Say then, ſaid he, if they ſhould be favourable, would you without any Repugnancy obey them? Sir, ſaid ſhe, ſmiling a little, I have been ſo told that I muſt not lightly truſt any one, as I think it not convenient to reveal ſo great a Secret to you. Hereupon Cleanthes and Megiſto returned, and broke off their Diſcourſe: Philoxypes preſently obſerved that theſe two Perſons were troubled at his Viſits; and therefore reſolved not to be ſo frequent in them, leſt he might for ever loſe a Happineſs, which now he might ſometimes enjoy. Thus, Sir, Philoxypes after ſome ſhort Diſcourſe departed, and returned not only to Claria, but to Paphos, whither the King had alſo ſent for him; not being able to let him be ſo long alone and ſolitary, all the Ladies, and the whole Court complained of him, and could not comprehend the reaſon of his ſo long retirement : The King continued to give him new Teſtimonies of his Affection, by beſtowing on him the Government of Cithera, which was faln void by the Death of the former Governour. He acquainted him with what had befaln him during his abſence, with Princeſs Aretephile, and conjur'd him to ſpeak always to her in his behalf. For, ſaid he, Aretephile hath taken a phancy to be ſure of the Crown of Cyprus, before ſhe give me her Heart, and I will have her give me her Heart, before I give her the Crown. Philoxypes promiſed the King to ſpeak to Aretephile, but it was with ſuch ſadneſs as all the Court took notice of it. He did almoſt always little better than rave, he would miſtake, and ſay one thing for another, he ſhunn'd Company, and as ſoon as he could, he returned to Claria. He found more reſiſtance in Policrite, than he thought to have met withal ; for ſhe, fearing all things, durſt hardly look upon this Prince ; the difference of his condition, though it made her more obliged unto him in her Soul, yet was it the reaſon why ſhe treated him ſo coldly. Philoxypes would have preſented the whole Family, but they all refuſed to receive any Preſents.

This mean while, he was ſtill more unhappy ; for though he loved Policrite paſſionately, and that he valued her more than all the World beſides, yet could he never put on a reſolution of making any one acquainted with this his ſo meanly placed Paſſion : He would certainly have been able to live with Policrite in any deſert Iſland ; but he knew not how he could avow the marrying a Maid of her condition, to the World ; yet did he ſtill love her with a reſpectful Affection, not giving way to any ſinful Deſire : That pure and unartificial Vertue which he ſaw in Policrite, infuſed into him a greater reſpect for her, than if ſhe had been ſeated on a Throne ; he then perceived he loved, without hope of ever finding a Remedy for his Evil, upon leſſer terms, than reſolving to abandon the Court and Kingdom, and to ask Philicrite of Cleanthes upon ſo vexatious Terms ; but that which moſt of all afflicted him, was, that he knew not how he ſtood in Policrite's

Affection; he found her mild and civil, he obſerves no Marks of hatred in her Countenance; but there was therein alſo ſo great a Reſervedneſs, and ſo exact a Modeſty, as he could not penetrate her Thoughts: He thought alſo, that Policrite was grown ſomewhat more melancholy than ſhe had formerly been; and indeed he was not miſtaken, for Philoxypes his Handſomneſs, his good Behaviour, his Wit and Civility, being things not to be ſeen without liking: Young Policrite could not ſee her ſelf belov'd of ſuch a Prince as he, without having her Heart a little touch'd with Acknowledgment; yet ſeeing her ſelf in a Condition ſo far beneath his, and out of a ſenſe of Vertue ſhe muſt reſiſt this budding Affection, ſhe could not but be afflicted at this Conqueſt which ſhe had made; and to bemoan her ſelf thereof to her dear Dorida who had Wit enough.

Siſter, ſaid ſhe unto her, how happy are you in compariſon of me, who can take pleaſure in walking abroad, in gathering of Flowers, in hearing Birds ſing, and the fall of Waters, and in not being reduced to a condition of complaining of too much good Fortune? For in fine, Dorida, Philoxypes's Heart, is a Conqueſt which I am ſure the greateſt of Queens would be proud to have made; yet, whilſt they might innocently rejoice thereat, I muſt be therewithal afflicted; I could wiſh I had never ſeen him, or at leaſt I think I could: For when all is done, though me-thinks I could heartily deſire that he would love me no more, yet am I glad to ſee him. But if Love, replied Dorida, be ſo powerful a thing as it is ſaid to be, how know you but that Philoxypes may love you well enough to marry you? Ah, Siſter, anſwered ſhe, as I would do nothing misbeſeeming me, ſo neither would I that Philoxypes ſhould do any thing that might misbeſeem him to do. But, ſaid Dorida, belike then you love Philoxypes, ſince you intereſt your ſelf in his Honour againſt your ſelf.

Policrite bluſh'd at this Diſcourſe, and looking confuſedly upon Dorida, If you were better acquainted with this Paſſion than I, ſaid ſhe, I would tell you whatſoever my Soul is ſenſible of, to the end I might know what to think of it: But I cannot yet believe that this dangerous Diſeaſe be yet got into my Heart; for if you remember well, we have heard Cleanthes ſay, and we have read it more than once, that Love makes one loſe their Reaſon; that it cauſeth a thouſand Pains and Vexations, that it ſometimes makes People do amiſs; and I thank Heaven, I do not yet feel any of all this; Me-thinks my Reaſon is free enough, and I am well enough pleaſed with the Melancholy which poſſeſſeth me: For, 'tis true, I oft-times talk I know not what, but I delight in doing ſo; and tho I would not love Philoxypes, yet there are certain Moments wherein I am well enough pleaſed that he ſhould love me: But as for any thing of Fault, ſo far am I from being willing to commit any, as I proteſt unto you, that were it for no other Reaſon, than not to loſe Philoxypes his Eſteem and good Opinion, I would die a thouſand Deaths rather than do any thing that ſhould be unjuſt. You may then believe, that whilſt I love Vertue, and would become worthy the Affection of ſo great a Prince, I will never do any thing contrary to Reputation. I believe you, anſwered Dorida; but for all this, Siſter of mine, you deceive your ſelf, if you believe you love not Philoxypes; for, in a word, you do not love what you lov'd before you knew him; you are ſomewhat more comely, you conſult oftener with the Chriſtal Fountains, and you are quite another thing than you were. Ah, Siſter, replied Policrite, if that were true which you ſay, I would quickly take order for it, I would never ſee Philoxypes, but to uſe him harſhly, to the end that he hating me, I might no longer love him. Theſe two young People having entertained themſelves thus upon the Bank of a little Rivolet, Cleanthes and Megiſto, who had altered their Minds, came thither; and bidding Dorida withdraw a little, Megiſto began to ſay, Policrite, it is not many days ſince I told you, that in reſpect of your Condition, you ſhould never look upon Philoxypes, but with a great deal of reſpect; but fearing leſt through that inequality which you may believe to be between you and him, you may not appear to be ſo much obliged to him for his Affection, as indeed to put ſomewhat too great an eſtimation thereupon. Cleanthes and my ſelf have reſolved to tell you, that your true Condition conſidered, you are not bound to behold Philoxypes at any time, but with a great deal of indifferency: For, in a word, ſaid Cleanthes, not to diſguiſe the Truth from you any longer, you are what you think not your ſelf to be, and we are likewiſe that which you know not, and what you ſhall not as yet know, becauſe the Gods have not permitted us as yet to let you know it: But to ſhew you how much you are more obliged than you think for, to be vertuous; know Policrite, that you are of as Noble Blood as any is in all Greece. How, anſwered Policrite, interrupting him, am I not what I always thought to be? No, Daughter, ſaid he, to number Kings amongſt your Anceſtors, is not the greateſt Mark of Honour that you may boaſt of. There is ſomewhat of more Auguſt in your Race than what I ſpeak of: Therefore that I might raiſe up your Heart, I thought good to intruſt you with this Important Secret, (which I charge you not to reveal to any one) as alſo to let you know the better how much bound you are not to do any thing unworthy of your Father's Houſe, nor of the Condition you are born in. Policrite was exceedingly joy'd to hear Cleanthes ſpeak after this manner, though her Joy was not over quiet; for ſhe was in trouble to know more preciſely what was told her. Father, ſaid ſhe, leave me not in ſuch perplexity: tell me a little more plainly, I beſeech you, ſo pleaſing a Truth, and let me know who I am.

The Gods have forbidden us it, my Daughter, anſwered he, by the Mouth of an Oracle. You muſt be content with what you have heard; but make uſe thereof to defend your ſelf agaiſt Philoxypes's Love; and far from looking on him, as on a Prince who hath done you too much Honour; look rather on him, as on one whom you ſhall favour by your permittance.

This is not, ſaid Cleanthes, to deny but that Philoxypes is endow'd with all the Vertues and Qualities requiſite for a great Prince; but 'tis, my Child, to let you know that there is a certain Pride which doth not miſ-become a young Maid to defend her ſelf thereby againſt Love:

when we have an eſteem for thoſe that are above us, 'tis hard to gain-ſay if they intreat. And on the contrary, when we believe them to be beneath us, or at leaſt but our Equals, we ſtand not much upon denying them unjuſt things. Policrite aſſured then Cleanthes and Megiſto, That though ſhe had known nothing of what they now had told her, ſhe ſhould never have done any thing contrary to that decency which ſhe had learn'd of them. But how much were they miſtaken, if their Deſign were to hinder Policrite from loving Philoxypes.

Sometimes ſhe was filled with Joy to know that ſhe was of Noble Deſcent; and afterwards being willing to make uſe thereof, to drive thereby the beginning of Affection which Philoxypes's Worth had already raiſed in her, out of her Heart, ſhe found it the more fortified by this Knowledg: For, ſaid ſhe, the knowledg of what I am, doth not take from the Obligation which I owe him; ſince he knows not that I am any thing more than what I ſeem to be.

But for me, who now know what I am, why ſhould I not hope that the Gods permitting Philoxypes to know my true Condition, may not ſo order it, as that I may love him and be blameleſs, and be beloved by him innocently? No, no, Policrite, added ſhe, let us no longer defend our Heart with ſuch Opiniatrecy; let us content our ſelves with concealing our Reſentments, and do nothing that ſhall be faulty; and let us not reject, as a Miſchief, the Love of a Prince, to whom the wiſeſt King of the World would not refuſe to give his Daughter. But it may be, ſaid ſhe, that Philoxypes doth but counterfeit, that he hath ſinful Thoughts towards thee, and that thy Simplicity abuſeth thee.

Stay then (ſaid ſhe) to be reſolved herein, and make trial of his Conſtancy and Fidelity, by an appearing indifferency, which may leave him without hope.

Thus was Policrite minded to do, when Philoxypes came to her: As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe began to go towards her Cottage; but he, advancing haſtily, ſtaid her; yet not being above twenty paces from it, and there being two of her Women-Servants at work in a Cloſe hard by them, ſhe ſtaid. What, Policrite, (ſaid he) you ſhun a Prince, who ſhuns all the World for love of you? Sir, ſaid ſhe, (after ſomewhat more an imperious manner than before, though ſhe intended not ſo to do) I do what peradventure you ought to do: For, in fine, what Advantage can you hope for by your Viſits and Solicitations? The Contentment (ſaid he) to hear from your fair Mouth that you do not hate me. If that be all you deſire to be ſatisfied in, (replied ſhe) you may eaſily compaſs your Deſires; but ask no more, upon pain of refuſal. What, lovely Policrite, (ſaid he) will you never love me? and ſhall all I can do to win your Affection prove uſeleſs? No, 'tis impoſſible, were you as inſenſible as thoſe Pictures which I have of you. My Pictures? replied P*olicrite*. Yes, (added P*hiloxypes*, I am not ſo unfortunate as you think for; in deſpite of you, and without your conſent, I have the contentment of ſeeing you daily.

Ah, (ſaid P*olicrite*) I perceive Mandrocles hath betrayed me, and hath falſified his words. P*hiloxypes* ask'd her then, how ſhe came to know Mandrocles? She told him how that famous Painter walking daily, when his leiſure would permit him, amongſt thoſe Rocks, to draw ſome Landskips, had one day by chance light upon their Houſe; where, having ſeen her, he had begg'd leave of Cleanthes to draw her Picture; which Cleanthes would have refuſed him, but that ſeeing his Importunity, he was afraid leſt he might ſpeak of her to him at Claria, and that therefore he gave way unto his deſire, upon condition that he ſhould not make uſe of this Picture in any of his Pieces, but as of a Head made by Fancy and Imagination; and making him take a ſolemn Oath, never to ſpeak with any Body whoſoever, of any Acquaintance he had with them. That ſince that time, as long as Mandrocles tarried at Claria, he came to teach her to deſign, and had drawn her Picture in twenty ſeveral poſtures. She then enquired of P*hiloxypes*, whether Mandrocles had ſpoken to him of her, or no? And he told her the whole Truth: but you may perceive, ſaid Philoxypes, that the Goddeſs whom you repreſent, intends not that you ſhould always be inhumane, ſince ſhe would her ſelf appear in your Vizage.

Sir, ſaid ſhe, not being of your Iſle, my Devotion leads me rather to be a Votreſs to Diana, than to worſhip Venus Urania; therefore it is not this your Reaſon that will prevail with me; and alſo, that his Goddeſs approving only of ſuch Paſſions as are Innocent, will certainly never counſel me to admit of yours. Vertue it ſelf, replied Philoxypes, would adviſe you to it; and did you know my Heart, you would need no other Counſellor than your ſelf. It would take up ſo much time, replied ſhe, to make me know it, as I ſhall adviſe you not to undertake the Work. But, ſaid he, if I do undertake it, and if I make it evident to you, that never Man loved any thing as I love you, what will you then think? I would think, ſaid ſhe, that you were very unfortunate in having ſo paſſionately loved one, who is unworthy of ſo much honour. But, ſaid he, would you think your ſelf any ways obliged unto me? I ſhould be ſorry for you, ſaid ſhe, and would wiſh your Cure, either by Abſence, or by Forgetfulneſs.

Ah, cruel Maid, ſaid he, wiſh it rather by your Compaſſion and Charity, and promiſe me only that you will afford me leiſure to perſwade you, that I am the moſt in Love of all Men. To do as you ſay, ſaid ſhe, would be to be ſomewhat perſwaded thereunto already; therefore (and with this ſhe walked towards her Cottage) I will liſten no longer to you. After this manner did Philoxypes paſs away his time, having but very few moments of Delight amongſt many hours of Anguiſh.

This mean while, he could not endure to tarry at Paphos; and when he went thither, all he could do, was only to viſit the Princeſs Aretephile, which the King compelled him to do; but he appeared ſo melancholly, and ſo changed, as he was hardly to be known. The King, who loved him dearly, was much afflicted to ſee it; he, together with the whole Court, ſought what might be the occaſion of this Alteration, but they could not find it. The King ask'd it of Philoxypes's ſelf, but could learn nothing. Philoxypes anſwering always, that it was ſome Melancholy, which proceeded certainly from his Temper, and from ſome little Indiſpoſition of Health.

But, ſaid the King, Solitarineſs is no uſual Cure for ſuch Incommodities; wherefore you ought not to go any more to Claria. Yet Affairs went ſtill on thus, yea even when Winter was come, which did the more aſtoniſh the whole Court; they knew he built no more at Claria, that the Painters and Engravers, who had been ſo long there, were all gone; that the Seaſon was foul, that when he went thither 'twas but with a ſmall Train, and that he walked always alone; they ſaw a ſtrange Sadneſs in his Face, and a wonderful Alteration, and all this without any appearing cauſe. The King heaped Favours and Honours upon him, he ask'd him an hundred times what he would deſire of him, he had not any one Enemy, the whole Court loved him, he was exceeding rich, he appeared not to have any Sickneſs as the Phyſicians could perceive: In fine, his Melancholy and Retiredneſs, were things which could not be gueſt at. The whole Court talk'd of nothing elſe, and the King was ſtrangely troubled at it; who not knowing how to inform himſelf of what Philoxypes ailed, he bethought himſelf of me, whom he knew this Prince did love particularly, and in whom he did more confide than in any other.

Thus upon a day when Philoxypes was gone to Claria, the King ſent for me; and after having aſſured his Majeſty (as it was true) that I knew nothing of particular concerning this Prince his Melancholy, he did me the Honour to command me to go to him, and to uſe all my Cunning to diſcover what it was that was in his Mind: For, ſaid he, Leontidas, I do ſo love Philoxypes, as I cannot live content unleſs I ſee he do ſo likewiſe, and were it to give him half my Kingdom, I would doubtleſs do it, rather than not to give him ſatisfaction.

I then departed, really intending to endeavonr to ſatisfy the King's Curioſity, who certainly ſtood in need of Philoxypes Preſence, to counſel and comfort him concerning Aretephiles Behaviour: for I think there was never ver known a ſtiffer Combat between Ambition and Love.

I went then to Claria, where I found Philoxypes in his uſual Melancholy; the which I made the greater, becauſe I hindred him from going that day to Cleanthes. At firſt ſight of me, he endeavoured notwithſtanding, to inforce himſelf to honour me ſo much, as to ſeem glad to ſee me; but it was after a faſhion, which made me eaſily ſee that his Heart gainſaid his words, and that notwithſtanding any Friendſhip he had for me, he wiſh'd I had tarried ſtill at Paphos.

Leontidas, ſaid he, I am much beholden to you for coming to viſit me in a ſeaſon, when the Country has loſt all its Ornaments; and when the Court is fulleſt of Diverſions.

Sir, ſaid I, you commend me with leſs reaſon than the Court complains of you; for to forgo Paphos for Claria, when you are there, 'tis to forgo the Court, for the Court; nay, for the moſt pleaſing part of the Court: but to forgo Paphos, only to ſeek out Solititarineſs at Claria, as you do. O Sir, ſaid I (not ſuſpecting him notwithſtanding of any Paſſion) 'tis all that a Prince in Love, who is upon bad terms with his Miſtreſs, can do. Philoxypes bluſh'd at theſe words, and looking upon me with a kind of Smile, which did not notwithſtanding drive the Melancholy from his Countenance; I perceive, Leontidas, ſaid he, I am not ſo much beholden to you as I had thought, ſince doubtleſs you are come hither rather to chide me, than to viſit me.

I am come, Sir, ſaid I, to try whether I may not be able to ſerve you in a time when all the World believes that ſomewhat of great importance, which they cannot gueſs at, doth afflict you. Leontidas, ſaid he, I am much bound to you, but I ſhould be ſo more, if you could hinder the Court from looking ſo far into my Heart. For I confeſs ſaid he, I find it ſomewhat hard that a Man may not look inwards ſometimes, tho whilſt he does ſo, he is hardly maſter of his own Mind.

Sir, ſaid I, were you leſs beloved, you would not ſuffer under this Perſecution which you complain of: This kind of Love, replied he, cauſeth in me no ſmall Suffering: For what can I more rationally do, than to conceal my Melancholy in a Retiredneſs, to the end that I may not trouble the Joy of others. But, Sir, ſaid I, 'tis the cauſe of this Melancholy which every body ſeeks after, and none can find; as for my particular, I muſt crave your pardon if I do. For, Sir, 'tis not Ambition that torments you: No, Leontidas, ſaid he, if I were ſick of that Diſeaſe, the King would quickly cure me: Neither is it Revenge, ſaid I, for not being hated by any, it is not to be believed that you are poſſeſt with Hatred. You have reaſon for what you ſay, ſaid he, and ſighing added, I think I am my own greateſt Enemy. It is not, ſaid I again, the Paſſion which you have for Books, for that Paſſion may cauſe Solitarineſs, but not ſuch Melancholy as you are poſſeſt withal. And moreover, you have had that Paſſion along time, without the product of ſo bad an Effect. It is not Books certainly, ſaid he, which cauſe my Trouble, which, were I capable of Reaſon, would rather be my comfort. It is not Love, ſaid I, that torments you, for you ſee none that can cauſe it in you. Conclude then, ſaid he, taking me in his Arms, that there is no more to be ſaid, but that I hate my ſelf, that I have loſt my Reaſon, and if my Friends be wiſe, they will let me alone, and will leave the knowledg or cure of my Malady, to proceſs of time.

Sir, ſaid I, ſhall Leontidas, who hath ſo particular an Affection for you, be dealt withal as others are? Shall he have known nothing more of your Concernments, than do your Enemies, if any ſuch you have? Ah, Sir, ſaid I, you muſt if you pleaſe do otherwiſe, and to prove to you that Leontidas doth in ſome ſort deſerve you ſhould do ſo, know Sir, that hitherto I have ſpoken unto you as a Spy ſent by the King, who will know at whatſoever price, what 'tis that afflicts your Mind. But after having needleſly acquitted my ſelf of my Commiſſion, I ſpeak no longer, Sir, as one ſent by the King, but as one who is reſolved to ſerve you with his Life, if it ſhall be needful, and never abſolutely to give you over till he know the cauſe of your Melancholy: for, Sir, if there be no cauſe of this Melancholy, and that it be but a Diſtemper of Humours, I muſt ſtay here, that I may endeavour, maugre your ſelf, to divert you; and if there be any cauſe for it, Leontidas muſt likewiſe ſerve you therein, if there ſhould redound no other benefit thereby than to help you to keep it concealed from the King, and from the whole Court, if you deſire it ſhould be concealed from them.

I do not know any way, ſaid he, to keep it undiſcovered better, than to tell it to no body.

But, Sir, ſaid I, if you treat me with this indifferency, when I ſhall return to Paphos, and the King ſhould ask me what I think of your Melancholy, I muſt needs ſay ſomething to him.

And what will you ſay to him, replied Philoxypes? I think, Sir, ſaid I, that to revenge my ſelf for the little Confidence you have in me, I will ſay what I do no ways believe, to wit, that you are in Love; and that the ſhame of your former Inflexibleneſs, or of your new Weakneſs, hinders you from avowing it; nay, I will peradventure tell him, ſaid I in mockery, that that Venus Urania, which People have ſo much quarrell'd with you about, ſince the great Feaſt which you made here, and which did precede but a few days your Melancholy Humour, hath ſtruck you effectually in Love. In fine, Sir, there is nothing ſo odd, which I ſhall not ſay to revenge my ſelf for the Wrong you do the Paſſion which I have to your Service.

During this Diſcourſe, Philoxypes changed colour twenty times; and were it out of Friendſhip, or out of Importunity, or that indeed thoſe that are in Love, love naturally to ſpeak thereof, he took me by the hand, led me into his Cabinet: and after having made me take ſundry ſolemn Oaths never to diſcover what he ſhould ſay unto me; and all this with as much Ceremony and Preſſure, as if he had ſome Conſpiracy to diſcover unto me againſt the State, or ſome Attempt upon the King's Perſon, he told me that he was in Love.

What, Sir, ſaid I, theſe Retirements, theſe Melancholics, and this impenetrable Secret, which all the World in vain ſeeks to find out; Is it only that you are in Love? Ah, Leontidas, ſaid he, mock not at my Miſery; for it is greater than you can imagine. But, Sir, ſaid I, I have much ado to imagine that you can be ſo unfortunate as you ſay, ſince I cannot conceive that there is e're a Princeſs in the Kingdom (except ambitious Aretephile, who will be Queen) who will not favourably entertain your Affection, when you ſhall make it known unto her. Alas! ſaid he, with a ſigh, Love hath dealt much more cruelly with me than you are aware of; and ſince I muſt diſcover unto you the Secret of my Heart, know that I have met with an invincible Reſiſtance in one who lies amongſt theſe Rocks, and dwells but in a Cottage.

Yes, Leontidas, I have found a Maid, or to ſay better, I have found Vertue it ſelf, wholly pure, and under the Viſage of Venus Urania, which hath, and doth yet reſiſt me. A Maid who is not touch'd with Ambition, in whom Beauty cauſeth no Affectation nor Pride; who hath Simplicity and Wit, Gallantry and Sincerity, and who in a ſandy and deſart place, which the Gods alone have pointed out unto me, ſpeaks better than all the witticſt Ladies in the Court.

But when all this is done, ſhe lives in a Cottage, her Condition appears to be very mean, if I conſider all that is about her, and when I conſider only her ſelf, or do but hear her ſpeak, ſhe appears to be upon a Throne; her Governours are vertuous and diſcreet, but ſtill Leontidas, they live in a Cottage and will not abandon it. At laſt, ſaid he, with Tears almoſt ſtanding in his Eyes, I am the moſt unfortunate of all Men: I have a Paſſion which I cannot overcome, and which I will not have known; I too much reſpect Policrite's Worth (for ſo is ſhe called of whom I ſpeak) to have any ſinful Deſire towards her, which tho I ſhould have, it would be to no purpoſe: I likewiſe am too great a lover of Glory, to reſolve to marry a Maid of this condition without much Repugnancy; yet can I not live without her, my Sufferings are ſuch that I cannot expreſs them; and ſeeing no Remedy for my Malady, I bear it patiently without complaining of it, and void of all hope but Death.

Philoxypes told me this in ſo feeling a manner, as I much pitied him: He then told me all that had befallen him; how 'twas he met Policrite, how he was ſurprized, that it was ſhe by whom Mandrocles had drawn the Picture of Venus Urania, and all the reſt which I have told you. I was ſomewhat ſurprized at this fantaſtick Paſſion, chiefly when I called to mind Philoxypes former Inflexibleneſs, yet did I endeavour to comfort him. Sir, ſaid I, ſuch a Beauty as that is which you repreſent unto me, and ſuch an one I have ſeen in the Venus in your Gallery, bears ſome excuſe with it, of what condition ſoever the Poſſeſſors are, eſpecially when it occaſions only ſome paſſing Paſſions, and which are of no long durance, as I hope yours will prove. No, no, ſaid he, Leontidas, do not deceive your ſelf, I will love Policrite till death. But, Sir, not to abuſe your Patience, perceiving Philoxypes Grievance too great to be cured, I ſmothered it, and ſweetned it as much as poſſible I could. He then led me into his Gallery to ſhew me his Excuſe, tho I had ſeen his Pictures many times before: we afterwards walked abroad, but he being able only to walk one way, we were ſoon amongſt the Rocks, in a place from whence we might diſcover Policrite's Habitation, which we no ſooner ſaw, but, bluſhing with Confuſion, he ſaid, 'tis there, my dear Leontidas, where ſhe that I adore doth live; 'tis underneath that Roof, which I prefer before the proudeſt Palaces, that Philoxypes finds ſomemoments of Contents; and 'tis there in fine that all my Joy and Happineſs is circumſcribed. Sir, ſaid I, there needs no greater proofs of Policrites Beauty, than the ſmalneſs of her Cottage; and whoſoever ſhall imagine that Philoxypes Affection is placed therein, cannot doubt but that he hath argued the matter with himſelf as much as he was able.

In fine, Sir, after that he had enlarged himſelf in expreſſing Policrites charming Beauty, not ſuffering me to ſee her for fear of offending her: I muſt think of returning to Paphos, for I had promiſed the King to return that very night. I asked Philoxypes what I ſhould ſay unto him? Any thing ſaid he, my dear Leontidas, rather ther than the truth of my Adventure; for in the mind that I am of, I think that I ſhould run mad if the King ſhould know it.

I then left him after he had made me ſwear an hundred times, not to diſcover the leaſt part of his Misfortune. I went to find out the King, who expected me with much Impatience, and who had purpoſely withdrawn himſelf early, to the end that I might ſpeak with more freedom to him when I ſhould return.

And how, Leontidas, ſaid he, What doth our ſolitary Companion do?

Sir, ſaid I; terming him as you do, your Majeſty may eaſily gueſs at what de does. He muſes, he walks, he reads, looks upon his Pictures and Statues, goes from one place to another, and ſeeking Eaſe every where, he finds it no where.

But, Leontidas, ſaid he, you ſpeak to me as Philoxypes doth, and 'tis not that which I expect from you.

Sir, ſaid I, I have done all I am able to ſatisfy your Majeſty; but I confeſs my Journey hath not been ſo ſucceſsful as I hoped for; for all that Philoxypes ſays, is only that he finds himſelf ſomewhat ill diſpoſed, and that he is poſſeſs'd with a Melancholy which he cannot maſter.

Did you ask him, ſaid the King, whether it were not that he did wiſh for ſomewhat which I have not bethought my ſelf to give him, becauſe I knew not that he did deſire it?

Oh, Sir, ſaid I (thinking I had done well) it is not Ambition that torments Philoxypes, who is ſo ſatisfied with your Majeſties Goodneſs, as he deſires nothing more than what he hath.

Have you then diſcovered, ſaid he, that he hath any thing of private Diſcontent againſt any one of this Court? For if it be ſo, I will make his Intereſt mine, and will as ſeverely revenge any Injury done unto him, as if it had been done unto my ſelf.

Sir, ſaid I, Philoxypes appears to be ſo well beloved of all the World, as 'tis hard to think any one ſhould injure him. I know not then what to imagine, ſaid the King, but if Philoxypes Ambition be ſatisfied, and that it is not Hatred nor Revenge that doth troubled him, he muſt needs be in Love.

Your Majeſty, Sir, ſaid I, doth too well know Philoxypes's Inflexibleneſs, to ſuſpect any ſuch thing in him. No, Leontidas, ſaid he, Philoxypes's paſt Obdurity, is not a Reaſon ſtrong enough to perſwade me that he is obdurate ſtill. I am almoſt confident that 'tis this Paſſion which robs me of Philoxypes's Company: For in fine, he hath all the marks of one in Love: His Countenance is altered, he not having been ſick; he is melancholy without any appearing cauſe; he doth little elſe but rave, he cannot ſtay long in a place, he conceals his Melancholy from us, he cannot endure that one ſhould take notice of it, he gives over thinking of his Affairs, he viſits none but by conſtraint, and unleſs it be the Princeſs Aretephile, whom he hath ſeen by my command, he hath not viſited any one Lady ſince we were at Claria.

Sir, ſaid I, part of what you alledg to prove that Philoxypes is in Love, methinks makes for the contrary; for if he were in Love, he would certainly ſeek out the Party beloved, we ſhould never ſee him from her; inſtead of being melancholy, he would ſtudy to play the Gallant more, and would be the more ſociable; and inſtead of ſeeking our Solitarineſs, as he doth, methinks he ſhould rather add to the Court-Diverſions; and that his chiefeſt Employments ſhould be Muſick, Balls, Converſation, and going abroad.

You ſay well, anſwered the King, for what concerns ordinary Paſſions, or ſuch Lovers as have been fortunate in their Affections; but there are certain giddy-headed Paſſions out of the common road, which ariſing from a melancholy Anguiſh, feed themſelves there-withal, and ſhun whatſoever affords Delight. But that which doth a little trouble me is, that I cannot imagine who 'tis that Philoxypes can love and be hardly dealt withal by; for certainly there is never a Lady in all my Court, who would not glory in having won his Heart; and moreover, I have not obſerved that he hath applied himſelf to converſe with any one in particular, yet doubtleſs Philoxypes is in Love.

Sir, ſaid I, be not ſo reſolute in your Aſſertion, till you have ſtronger proofs thereof, and till you may at leaſt conjecture who it is he is in love withal. The King began then to number over all the Ladies of the Court one by one, and found not any one of them that he was likely to be in love withal.

He then began to walk not ſaying one word; ſoon after I ſaw ſome colour come in his Face, and preſently methought he was much diſquieted.

Leontidas, ſaid he, you know more than you will tell me.

Sir, ſaid I, I have ſaid nothing but truth unto your Majeſty. For in fine, Philoxypes his Ambition is ſatisfied; he hath no Enemies that I know of, and if I be not deceived, the faireſt Ladies of the Court have no great power over him.

Ah! Leontidas, ſaid he, you conceal the truth from me; but I know it without your telling. Yes, Leontidas, ſaid he, Philoxypes doth love, and ſo love, as doubtleſs he is much afflicted thereat, and which he will withſtand and overcome. Were not my thought true, he would not make his Paſſion ſo great a Secret. But good Gods, ſaid he, how unfortunate am I? and to what ſtrange Extremity am I reduced; for in fine, Leontidas, ſaid he, confeſs the truth, Philoxypes, maugre himſelf, is become my Rival, and his Grief for it is the cauſe of his Melancholy.

Ah! Sir, ſaid I (not having leiſure to think of what I ſaid) I know not the cauſe of Philoxypes his Melancholy; but I very well know he is not in love with the Princeſs Aretephile, and that he too much reſpects your Majeſty to ſuffer ſuch a thought enter his Breaſt.

Think well Leontidas, ſaid he, on what you ſay; you aſſure me you know not the cauſe of Philoxypes his Melancholy, and yet you know he is my Rival: once more, Leontidas, if you know the buſineſs, let me know it; or if you know it not, confeſs my Suſpicions are well grounded, and fear not for all this, that I wiſh any harm to Philoxypes; on the contray, I ſhall be beholden to him for it.

I was extreamly troubled to hear the King talk thus; for without violating what we hold moſt ſacred, I could not reveal Philoxypes his Secret, which he had made me ſwear above an hundred times not to do.

To conſent likewiſe that the King ſhould ſuſpect him to be his Rival, me-thought it was a buſineſs of too great importance to leave him in that Opinion; but the more I perſwaded him to the contrary, the more firmly did he believe it. No, ſaid he, I am cauſe of mine own Misfortune, and of Philoxypes his Misfortune too; 'tis I who made him viſit Aretephile more than any other, 'tis mine own hand that has enthral'd him, and 'tis I who am the cauſe of all his Sufferings: For, ſaid he, I eaſily comprehend he ſeeks out all this Solitarineſs only to rid him out of this Paſſion; nay, I have obſerved that of late he hath been troubled as oft as I have ſpoken to him to ſpeak to Aretephile, that he hath ſhunn'd ſuch Commiſſions as much as he could, and I am too much perſwaded that he hath argued the buſineſs ſtifly with himſelf, and I am the only cauſe of what he ſuffers.

Good Gods! ſaid he, how great is my Misfortune? there is not any one Man in all my Kingdom, whom I ſhould not hate if he were my Rival, unleſs it be he; and there is not any Lady in the Court, in whoſe Love he would not have been happy except Aretephile.

But, Sir, ſaid I again, I proteſt unto you he is not in love with her; and I proteſt to you, replied he, expreſſing an extream Grief, that Philoxypes is my Rival; for were it not ſo, he would not conceal his Paſſion from me.

The Reſpect he bears to you, ſaid I, ought to hinder him from ſo doing, if he were in love.

No, no, replied he, you ſhall no longer abuſe me; and I am equally perſwaded of Philoxypes his Love, of his Innocency, and of my Misfortune. For in fine, that the Man in the World that I love beſt, ſhould fall in love with the onlieſt Lady that I can love; and that I ſhould ſee my ſelf cruelly neceſſitated, either to forſake Aretephile, or to ſee Philoxypes die, it is an unſufferable Adventure.

Sir, I beſeech you, ſaid I, expect till ſhe hath once more ſeen Philoxypes, and have abſolutely commanded him to diſcover his Heart unto her, before you reſolve on any thing; and if you pleaſe I will bring him hither to morrow Morning.

No, no, replied the King, you ſhall not ſtir out of the Palace this day; nor ſhall you ſee Philoxypes before me. In effect this Prince gave one of his Servants charge over me; and commanded me to withdraw into a Chamber, which was appointed for me in the Palace.

'Twould be too difficult a thing to repreſent unto you my Vexation, and the King's Diſquiet: ſince to tell you true, he had as much Friendſhip for Philoxypes, as Love for Aretephile.

Who ever ſaw, ſaid he, (for he himſelf told it afterwards) an Adventure like to mine? I have a Rival whom I muſt love in deſpight of me, and who gives me more occaſion to love him, for the Affection he bears to my Miſtreſs, than for all the Service he ever did me; and then for all the good Offices he hath done me to her, it being certain that I need only look upon him, to ſee what he ſuffers in my conſideration; and that I need only conſider what Life he leads, to ſee how much I am beholden to him. I obſerve in his Eyes a Melancholy, which makes me apprehend his Death; and I ſee in all his Actions, viſible ſigns of his love to Aretephile, and of his reſpect to me. What ſhall I do, ſaid he? ſhall I ſeem not to know this Paſſion, and let Philoxypes die? But 'tis no longer time to conceal what I think, ſince Leontidas knows it. Leontidas who is ſo much his Confident, and ſhares ſo deeply in his Friendſhip; ſhall I alſo tell Philoxypes that I know his Love, and not complain of him? and if I ſhould complain, how weak a Succour would this be? I ſhould peradventure haſten his Hour of Death, by making him deſpair. But ſhall I quit Aretephile, and let my Friendſhip exceed my Love? Philoxypes his Paſſion is unjuſt; but Paſſions are not voluntary, and he hath done what ever he could or ought to have done, ſince not being able to keep from loving, he hath yet kept from making his Love known; and hath rather choſen to hazard his Life by his reſpectful Silence, than to preſerve it by making his Paſſion known, which he knows will diſpleaſe me.

The King paſt the Night in this manner very unquietly; ſometimes he was agitated with Anger and Hatred, not knowing whom he hated, or on whom he deſired to be revenged; ſometimes he did a little blame Philoxypes, for not having at the very firſt acquainted him with his Paſſion; ſometimes he betook himſelf to Aretephile's Beauty; but at laſt he blamed himſelf.

Then ſuddenly conſidering the pittiful condition into which Philoxypes was brought, and what an unhappy Life he led, his Heart was ſo touched with Compaſſion, as he did almoſt love his pretended Rival, better than his Miſtreſs. He then called to mind, how that all the favours he had received from her, had been husbanded, and obtained by Philoxypes his means. He paſt the next Morning in like perplexity, and ſtrange Irreſolutions; at laſt having dined ſomewhat early, he went well accompanied to lie that Night at Claria, not affording me any opportunity to give any notice thereof to Philoxypes; for he into whoſe Cuſtody I was given, thinking it had been for ſome Buſineſs of another nature, treated me as a Priſoner of the State, and would not give me the leaſt liberty.

The King commanded me to follow him, ſo as I came with him to Claria, he not having ſpoken one word all the way long, but muſing ſtill on his Adventure: But when we were come thither, Philoxypes's People told the King, that their Maſter was not at home; and that according to his cuſtom, he was walked out all alone. The King informed himſelf carefully of one of his Servants, who had a long time waited on him, whether he knew not the cauſe of his Maſter's Melancholy? This Servant who loved his Maſter dearly, that he might make uſe of the honour the King did him in ſpeaking to him, ſaid;

Sir, I know not what my Maſter ailes, but this I know, that if your Majeſty out of your goodneſs find not ſome means to cure him of the Melancholy which poſſeſſeth him, he will certainly not live long: For he eats little, hardly ſleeps at all, does nothing but ſigh, cannot endure that one ſhould ſpeak to him about buſineſs, wanders whole days in the Fields; and I once heard him cry out, when he little thought I did ſo, good Gods, what would the King ſay, if he ſaw how great my ſadneſs is! and how hardly would he gueſs at the cauſe of my Death?

In fine, Sir, ſaid this Man, with Tears almoſt in his Eyes, I know not what to ſay, but I am very certain your Majeſty will loſe the faithfulleſt of all your Servants, if you loſe the Prince my Maſter.

Whilſt this Man ſpake thus, I was ſtrangely in pain; for I ſaw all that he ſaid tended to confirm the King in his Opinion: I was never the better for beckning unto him, he never looked on me, ſo intent was he to what he ſaid.

The King on his part ſighed, and having left the other, Well, Leontidas, you will not have it that Philoxypes is in Love, nor that it is Aretephile whom he loves? Sir, ſaid I, I confeſs I am ſtill of that belief, and I would your Majeſty could reſolve to be ſo too.

O unfortunate Philoxypes, cried the King! (not anſwering me) how ſad is this Diſtemper? and how unfortunate am I my ſelf, that I cannot abſolutely cure thee of the malady that poſſeſſeth thee? I would then have gone to find out Philoxypes, that I might acquaint him with the King's Senſe before he ſaw him, but the King would not ſuffer me: but making the way be ſhewn unto him, which Philoxypes moſt uſually went, we went directly towards the Head of Claria.

Philoxypes was this mean while gone to Cleanthes his Houſe, where the face of Affairs was a little altered; for Policrite knowing that her condition was not what ſhe believed it to be, Philoxypes his deſert had made a further Advancement in her Heart than formerly; neither could ſhe ſo well hide her Affection, but that Cleanthes and Megiſto were much to their grief aware thereof.

Yet was Philoxypes ne're awhit the more happy; for Policrite having taken a Fancy to make trial of his Affection by an appearing indifferency, did very carefully conceal from him the Affection ſhe had for him.

And in truth that very day that the King came to Claria, where we miſt of Philoxypes, ſhe had cauſed as much trouble in him, as admiration. For being gone to her, and having found her at the Root of a Tree, where ſhe was deſigning out a Corner of the Countrey which pleaſed her, he began to entertain her with his Paſſion, and to tell her how it grew ſtill more violent upon her.

Sir, ſaid ſhe, if I may be permitted to do ſo, I ſhould tell you, that if you deſire to win my good Eſteem, you ſhould do better to tell me, that your Paſſion grows every day more moderate: for to tell you the truth, I do ſomewhat apprehend theſe extravagant Paſſions which I have heard ſpoken of, and which they ſay, does diſorder Reaſon, makes Men loſe the reſpect they owe to Vertue, though it inhabit in a Cottage, and which occaſion a hundred ſtrange things, the very hearing whereof cauſeth Horror: Therefore, Sir, if you would oblige me, you will ſatisfy your ſelf with telling me, you have Affection enough for me, to wiſh if it were poſſible that Fortune had been more propitious to me, that I had been born of a higher condition than I am, or at leaſt this not being ſo, I might reſt content with my own condition, without envying others.

To love you with indifferency, ſaid Philoxypes, (who acquainted me afterwards with this their Converſation) your Beauty ſhould be indifferent, your Vertue and Diſcretion ſhould be ſo alſo: In fine, that inexpreſſible Charm, which I find in every of your Words, Looks, and Actions, ought not to inchant me as it doth: But divine Policrite, apprehend nothing from the violence of my Paſſion; for the ſtronger it is, the fuller of reſpect ſhall I be, and the more obedient to your Will.

Sir, ſaid ſhe, if what you ſay be true, ſpeak no more thereof I beſeech you; for not comprehending that I may lawfully give you any part of my Affection, methinks I ought intreat you to entertain me no longer with yours.

But Divine Policrite, ſaid he, for whom do you reſerve that glorious Affection, which you cruelly affirm I ſhall never enjoy?

At theſe words ſhe bluſh'd, and modeſtly bowing down her Eyes, I reſerve it ſaid ſhe, for our Woods, Fields, Rocks, and Fountains, whereof, Sir, ſaid ſhe, ſmiling, I think you will not be jealous.

I ſhall not be jealous of them, ſaid he, but I ſhall envy them, and I ſhall not eaſily endure that you ſhould love things to my prejudice, which cannot love you again. But cruel Maid, will you ſay nothing to me more obliging? and forgoing the Court as I do for love of you, and renouncing what ever is in the World, except it be Policrite? is it poſſible you ſhould not deal with me a little leſs ſeverely? I do not deſire you to love me, ſay only that you are not ſorry that I love you; and add, if you pleaſe, that if I be not beloved, 'tis becauſe you neither do nor will love any thing.

For what's to come, ſaid Policrite, 'tis a thing to which I ought not to anſwer with ſuch aſſurance; and as you knew not the day before I had the honour to be known unto you, that you ſhould ſo oft forgo your Palaces to come to this Cottage wherein I live; how do I know whether the Reſolution which I now take of ſuffering no Affection to enter my Heart, will ſtill continue? No, Sir, we muſt not truſt ſo abſolutely in our ſelves; nor can I anſwer otherwiſe than for my preſent Opinions.

Shew me then, replied he, what they really are; to the end I may know what to do.

Sir, ſaid Policrite, having much eſteem, and much of reſpect for you, I muſt confeſs I ſhould be ſorry that you ſhould love one long, whoſe condition were not anſwerable to yours, and that I could not receive a much greater diſpleaſure.

Philoxypes, who knew not the hidden ſenſe of theſe words, anſwered, That ſupream Beauty had in it ſomewhat of Cœleſtial, which did ennoble all thoſe that were therewithal indued.

In my opinion, ſaid ſhe, a certain proportion is requiſite in all things to occaſion Love, therefore do not deceive your ſelf; and if I were at any time to love any Body, it ſhould certainly be one of my own condition; nor ſhould I ever reſolve to marry any one that were not ſo.

What P*olicrite!* ſaid P*hiloxypes*, much afflicted, do you ſpeak the truth?

Yes, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and time will make you find it ſo.

But P*olicrite*, replied he, you remember not that you are a Miracle, and that there are no Men of your condition amidſt theſe Rocks, who deſerve ſo much as to look upon you.

I will then love nothing, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and ſo ſhe roſe up, for ſhe ſaw Cleanthes and Megiſto coming, who much troubled at this Prince his ſo frequent Viſits, eſpecially, having obſerved what they thought they had done in P*olicrite's* Behaviour, deſired him not to give himſelf the trouble to come ſo often thither.

P*hiloxypes*, who was ſomewhat moved at thoſe cruel words (as he underſtood them) which P*olicrite* had uttered, which made notwithſtanding ſo much for him, could not with his accuſtomed moderation receive the diſcourſe of Cleanthes and Megiſto, but Anger might eaſily be ſeen in his Face, and Grief in his Eyes.

Cleanthes, ſaid he, ſince I come not hither to rob you of the Treaſure which the Gods have given you, withſtand not the ſatisfaction which I find in admiring that virtue in Policrite which you have infuſed into her.

Sir, ſaid Cleanthes, though I very well know your Worth, I cannot but fear leſt Policrite, who hath not yet lived long enough to know preciſely what bounds to put to the Reſpects ſhe ows you, may be failing in ſomething either to you, or to her ſelf.

No, no, ſaid Philoxypes, ſomewhat roundly, you need not fear what you ſay, you may rather fear leſt her Severity and yours make me loſe my Reaſon. In fine, this converſation, though full of reſpect to Policrite, was ſo paſſionate, as Cleanthes and Megiſto were much troubled at it, and Policrite her ſelf was ſufficiently diſquieted thereat, and was ſorry that ſhe had ſpoken ſo deſpitefully to Philoxypes. But at laſt this Prince departed much diſcontented, and much in Love; and as he returned back with intention to get on Horſe-back where he had wont to leave his Followers, he met the King who was lighted on Foot, and on whom I had the honour to wait.

You may imagine how much he was ſurprized at this ſight. As ſoon as he ſaw the King, ſtriving as much as he could to hide his Melancholy, he mended his pace. And having done his obeyſance, Sir, ſaid he, your Majeſty quits Paphos in a ſeaſon wherein you are not much accuſtomed to ſeek out ſolitary Walks.

You have reaſon for what you ſay, ſaid the King, but it ſeems leſs ſtrange to me that I ſhould come to ſeek for Philoxypes at Claria, than that I ſhould find him amongſt the Rocks. The day being fair enough, though in Winter, the King who could no longer ſtay from acquainting Philoxypes with what he had in his Heart, made a ſign to the few that waited not on him to ſtand off, and commanded me to ſtay.

There remained none then with him but Philoxypes and my ſelf; we all ſtood ſilent for a good while, and certainly had all of us much differing Thoughts. The King ſeeing Philoxypes ſo altered, ſo melancholy, and ſo perplex'd, endeavoured to make his Friendſhip out-go his Love: Philoxypes would have found by the King's Eyes and Mind, what the King had to ſay to him, and why he had taken this Journey, fearing by the ſigns which I made, leſt he had diſcovered his Paſſion.

For my particular, I was ready to go wild, to think I could not advertiſe Philoxypes, nor durſt not tell the King what I knew of his Love, whom he took to be his Rival; but at laſt this long ſilence wherein every one of us ſaid ſeveral things unto our ſelves, was firſt broke by the King, who looking in much obliging manner upon this Prince, imbraced him, and ſaid, Be not offended that I know the Secret of your Soul, and that I am not ignorant of the Paſſion which torments you.

Philoxypes ſurprized to hear the King ſpeak thus, looked with a Bluſh upon me; and the King imagining (as it was true) that he thought I had betrayed him, looked upon me too; and to puniſh me (as he told me afterwards) for not having told him the truth, not giving me leave to ſpeak, and not diſabuſing Philoxypes, in what he had conceived of me; once more, ſaid he, My dear Philoxypes, be not afflicted that I have diſcovered your Love, and believe I eſteem you never a whit the leſs.

Sir, replied Philoxypes, me-thinks if your Majeſty did know the true cauſe of my Affliction, you ſhould be ſo good as to bewail me, and not to ſpeak of it.

No, Philoxypes, replied the King, my goodneſs ſhall extend it ſelf much further than ſo, for you: I am come hither expreſly to accompany you in your ſolitarineſs; for ſince I cannot make you happy, I muſt at leaſt make my ſelf unhappy with you.

Sir, ſaid Philoxypes, you altogether confound me; take no ſuch reſolution I beſeech you, leave me to bear the puniſhment of my weakneſs alone, believe me I ſhall infinitely praiſe your Goodneſs, if you will ſuffer me to die in peace amidſt theſe Woods and Rocks.

The King touched with extream Compaſſion, once more ſtraightly imbraced Philoxypes, and looking upon him with a very ſad Look, I crave your pardon, ſaid he, Philoxypes, if I cannot as yet abſolutely yield Aretephile to you: but I am come hither to endeavour to gainſay for your ſake the Paſſion I have for her, as you have ſtroven a long time for my ſake to ſuppreſs the Paſſion which ſhe hath occaſioned in you.

Philoxypes ſurprized at the King's Diſcourſe, felt two contrary Agitations at the ſame time; he was grieved to find his odd Opinion, and joyed that he knew not the true cauſe of his Love, as he thought he had done. And believing that he might eaſily diſabuſe him in a thing ſo falſe as the former was, he reſolved to continue the Concealment of his true Paſſion.

The King then had no ſooner ſaid what I have told you, but Philoxypes ſtepping back a little, ſaid, What, Sir? does your Majeſty ſuſpect me of ſo much boldneſs as to be your Rival? Confeſs, ſaid the King, for I know your Misfortune hath been ſuch, as not to be able to reſiſt Aretephile's Charms. But Philoxypes, I blame you not for it; 'twas I that firſt made trial thereof; I know how inevitable they are; you have done more than I my ſelf ſhould have done; it may be had I your Part to play, I ſhould have betrayed my Maſter, inſtead of reſolving to die of Grief and Sorrow, as you have done for my ſake. Thus Philoxypes, I am not diſpleaſed with you for loving Aretephile.

Sir, ſaid Philoxypes, to witneſs unto you that I am not in love with her, I promiſe you never to ſee her more, nor yet ever to come within Paphos, or at leaſt never to ſpeak to that Princeſs.

I very well know, ſaid the King, your Generoſity rather leads you to reſolve on Death, rather than to be failing in your Duty. But Philoxypes, to the end you may not object unto me, That I have done nothing to vanquiſh my ſelf, I am come to ſtay at Claria, as well as you, that I may endeavour to cure my ſelf of this Paſſion, and to yield up Aretephile to you. You on your ſide ſhall do the like, and he that is firſt cured, ſhall ſurrender his part in her to the other.

But my dear Philoxypes, ſaid he, you are yet more unhappy than you think for, for when I ſhould ceaſe to love Aretephile, you would not have won her Heart; you know how ambitious ſhe is, that her Soul is only ſenſible of greatneſs; and when I ſhould have yielded up my Miſtreſs to you, unleſs I ſhould alſo yield my Crown unto you, you would not win much upon her Inclination.

But in fine, ſaid he (not affording Philoxypes leaſure to anſwer him) if I yield up Aretephile, to you, it will not be hard for me to yield you up my Crown. And in a word, I will not be upbraided with your Death.

I will do what I can to cure my ſelf, to the end that you may cure your ſelf; and if we can neither of us cure our ſelves, we will at leaſt die together.

Sir, ſaid Philoxypes, I vow, by whatſoever I hold moſt Sacred, and moſt Holy, that I have not the leaſt pretence to the Princeſs Aretephile.

What then (ſaid the King, who did not believe him) is the cauſe of your Retreat and Melancholy? I confeſs, Sir, I was an hundred and an hundred times ready to break my Word which I had paſs'd to Philoxypes; but ſeeing the trouble he was in, and that, in fine, he could not reſolve to tell the King the Truth, I withheld, whilſt Philoxypes anſwered, That what his Majeſty did command, did not deſerve his Curioſity, and that he could not tell it him.

Being by this time late, we returned to Claria, where the King ſpoke ſtill after the ſame manner to Philoxypes, as Philoxypes did alſo to him. Having found a moment of time to entertain Philoxypes alone, I would have perſwaded him to have acquainted the King with the Truth; but he could never reſolve to do ſo, ſaying, it would be ſufficient to let him ſee he was not in love with Aretephile, if he ſhould never ſee her more.

This mean while, the more Obſtinacy and Grief the King found in Philoxypes, the more did he compaſſionate him, and the more he laboured to overcome his own Paſſion.

And to this purpoſe he ſtaid eight days at Claria, all which time Philoxypes was ready to go mad, as well in conſideration of the King's Opinion, and more for that he could not get to ſee Policrite.

I do not think the King would ſo ſoon have left this retiredneſs, had he not been advertiſed that an Ambaſſador from Amaſis King of Egypt was come to Paphos, which forc'd him to return. But Philoxypes, do he what he could, muſt needs go along with him: Not, ſaid the King, I will not ſee Aretephile, without ſeeing you at the ſame time. The Melancholy which I ſhall ſee in your Eyes, muſt be to me an Antidote againſt the Charms which I ſhall ſee in hers.

We went then to Paphos, but, good Gods, how little delightful was the Court then, and how much troubled did the Ambaſſador find the King, who was three days without ſeeing Aretephile, and Philoxypes being in unimaginable pain for the above-ſaid Reaſons, ſeemed to grow ſtill more Melancholy; whereat the King was ſtill more and more afflicted.

Ambitious Aretephile was in the mean while not without her perplexity, as well by reaſon of the King's Journey to Claria, as that he came not to viſit her; and for that ſhe heard he was returned wonderfully ſad.

But at laſt the King deſirous ſtill to confirm himſelf in his belief, brought Philoxypes with him to Princeſs Aretephile, hoping to diſcover his Paſſion better there than in any other place.

Philoxypes, who thought there was no better Means to undeceive the King, than in letting him ſee that he took no pleaſure in looking upon this Princeſs, was ſtill careful to look another way; but that which he did to diſdeceive the King, did the more deceive him; for, ſaid he to himſelf, unfortunate Philoxypes cannot endure the ſight of her whom he loves, and whom he will not love.

He accuſed himſelf then of too much inhumanity, in expoſing him to ſo great a Puniſhment; and ſeeing how ſtrangely perplex'd he was, his Viſit was not long.

Mean while, he having, during this Viſit, eyed his pretended Rival, as much as his Miſtreſs; and having been much diſquieted, the Princeſs was not much ſatisfied with his Converſation, and knew not whereunto to attribute the Cauſe of the Change which ſhe ſaw in him.

At his coming forth he ſaid a thouſand obliging things to Philoxypes, and Philoxypes made as many Proteſtations to him of his being unconcerned in Aretephile. But at laſt, that I may ſhorten my Diſcourſe as much as I may, Philoxypes being perſecuted by the King's Conceit, anger'd at Cleanthes Diſcourſe, much afflicted at what Policrite had ſaid, and much more that he could ſee her no more, and that he durſt not return to Claria, fell dangerouſly ſick; all the Phyſicians gave up their Opinions, that unleſs ſome Cure were found for his Melancholy, he would infallibly die. The Feaver continued ſeven days upon him very violently, at which the King was greatly diſconſolate; and during which time, I had taken a little Journey to Amathuſe, about ſome Buſineſs that I had there; for I think if I had been at Paphos, I ſhould have had much ado to have kept Philoxypes his Secret from the King.

As oft as the King came into his Chamber, and ſaw him in that pitiful Condition, he reſolved to think no longer on Aretephile; but as ſoon as he came from him, or that Philoxypes grew any thing better, this Reſolution ſlackned a little.

Nor was he yet reſolved what to do; but the Fever having at laſt left Philoxypes, and the Phyſicians continuing ſtill to affirm that he would infallibly die, if the Cauſe of his Melancholy, whence his Malady proceeded, were not taken away. The King ſeemed to have put on a very ſtrong Reſolution, to pluck from out his Soul the Paſſion which poſſeſs'd him.

He then reſolved to viſit Aretephile no more; who not knowing what to think of this Change in the King, thought it might be, he was offended that ſhe had not all this while been to ſee Philoxypes, whom he ſo dearly loved, eſpecially ſince almoſt all the Ladies of the Court had been to viſit him. For during his Sickneſs, the Princeſs of Salamis, and Princeſs Agbariſta had never left him, ſo as the Ladies might with decency enough go thither.

Yet ſo it happened, that the day that Aretephile came thither, Philoxypes being much better than he was, they were gone forth; ſo as Aretephile going, accompanied with four or five of her Women, found him all alone. 'Tis true, ſhe was not there long without Company, for the King came thither preſently after. Philoxypes bluſh'd when he ſaw him come in, and ſeemed ſo amazed at this Encounter, as if he had been really in love with Aretephile. The King, who obſerved this his change of Countenance, being much concerned to ſee that he ſhould be the Cauſe of Philoxypes's Danger, after a great ſtrife within himſelf, drew near to Princeſs Aretephile; who out of her reſpect, would have given him her Place, which he would not accept of: and after having looked upon her a while without ſpeaking, he ſighed, and ſaid, Madam, will you not cure Philoxypes?

Sir, ſaid ſhe, if his Health depended on me, your Majeſty ſhould ſoon be eaſed of the Grief his Sickneſs cauſeth in you.

Philoxypes, who found a great alteration in the King's Countenance, was afraid leſt he might ſay ſomewhat which might have made Aretephile know his Opinion of him; wherefore not affording the King leaſure to reply, Sir, ſaid he, though I believe Princeſs Aretephile be able to do great Things, and to charm great Pains, yet I think I may ſay, without offending her, that thoſe Evils which I lie under, depend not on her Will; and that none but the Gods themſelves can withdraw me from the Grave.

The King hearing theſe words pronounced in ſo ſad a manner, and endeavouring to overcome whatſoever oppoſed his Deſign of ſaving Philoxypes; drawing yet a little nearer to the Princeſs Aretephile, for fear leſt they that were in the Chamber might over-hear him; Madam, (ſaid he, making a ſign to Philoxypes, that he would not be interrupted) I ſhall tell you a thing which will much ſurprize you: I conjure you notwithſtanding, to give it a favourable interpretation, and to oblige me ſo far as to believe, that upon better terms than the ſaving of Philoxypes's Life, I would not tell it you, no not though my own Life were concerned therein.

O, Sir, cried out this ſick Prince, if your Majeſty end what you have begun to ſay, you will haſten my Death inſtead of retarding it.

Princeſs Aretephile amazed to hear what ſhe heard, and not able to gueſs what the Matter ſhould be, looked ſometimes upon the King, ſometimes upon Philoxypes: but at laſt the King compleating his Determination, 'Tis you, Madam, ſaid he to the Princeſs Aretephile, who ſend Philoxypes to his Grave; your Charms have been more powerful than his Reaſon, though his Nobleneſs hath been yet greater than his Love. He loves you, divine Aretephile, not daring to tell you ſo; he will not ſo much as acknowledg it, yet I know for certain, that unleſs you take compaſſion on him, he will infallibly die.

I therefore ſpeak no more to you in my own behalf, ſaid he, in a ſtrange melancholy manner, but deal leſs rigorouſly with him, than you have done with me, ſince he deſerves it better: And if your Ambition be not to be ſatisfied without a Soveraign Power, I promiſe you, Divine Princeſs, that if I cannot place Philoxypes upon the Throne, he ſhall always be ſo near, as his Place ſhall hardly be diſcernable from mine.

In fine, (ſaid he) if Philoxypes die, I ſhall die, and ſo I ſhall for ever loſe you: But if you ſave Philoxypes, I may at leaſt hope to languiſh on a while, and to ſhare part of your Eſteem, not being able to pretend any longer to any part of your Affection. Nor think not (ſaid he) that this which I do, is any mark of weakneſs in my Affection, ſince on the contrary it denotes the violence thereof.

For, in fine, if I could reſolve to abandon you, and to follow Philoxypes to the Grave, I would not yield up to him the part I pretend to have in your Affection, tho he be more worthy thereof than I; but not being able to ſee him die for my ſake, without expiring with Grief; I muſt live, that he may live, and conſequently muſt endeavour for a while to prolong the ſatisfaction I take in ſeeing you.

Aretephile was ſo aſtoniſh'd to hear the King after this manner, and Philoxypes ſo afflicted, as Aſtoniſhment and Sorrow producing the ſame Effect in theſe two Perſonages, they ſtaid a good while without ſpeaking.

Aretephile had opinion good enough of her Beauty, to ſuffer her ſelf eaſily to be perſwaded that Philoxypes was in Love with her; and ſhe had likewiſe Opinion good enough of his Generoſity, to believe he durſt dot diſcover his Paſſion.

But as nothing that was not King could touch her Heart, ſhe was ſtrangely perplex'd to hear what ſhe heard; and ſometimes ſhe thought 'twas peradventure but a Pretext ſought by the King to break with her.

Philoxypes on his ſide thinking that at the laſt he muſt be forced to tell the King the truth, that he might diſabuſe him, was ſo ſtrangely confuſed as he could not open his Mouth; ſo as the King ſeeing them both ſo ſurprized, and finding that peradventure his Love might quickly make him unſay all that his Friendſhip had made him affirm, roſe up, and without expecting what Aretephile would anſwer, Madam, ſaid he, the pitiful condition which you ſee Philoxypes is in, perſwades you better than I can do, and he doubtleſly will pardon me if I ſpeak not ſo long to you for him, as I have formerly done to you for my ſelf; which ſaid, he went his way, tho Philoxypes deſired him to tarry, aſſuring him that he would wholly diſabuſe him.

This mean while, tho Aretephile had a great mind to be gone too, yet being imbitter'd in mind, and deſirous to know a little more preciſely what the buſineſs of this ſo ſtrange adventure would prove, ſhe ſtay'd a little after the King, and looking upon Philoxypes, who appeared to her to be ſo ſtruck mute, as if he had been in love with her: Is it you, Philoxypes, ſaid ſhe, that have loſt your Reaſon, or is it the King? for I confeſs unto you, I know not whether of the two it is, and that I cannot comprehend either of you.

I confeſs, Madam, ſaid Philoxypes, that I am not maſter of my Reaſon; but, Madam, 'tis a Malady which you are no way the cauſe of, and whereof I accuſe you not. Had you any deſign then, ſaid ſhe, to make me loſe the King's good Opinion? or is it that the King ſeeks ſome bad pretext to bereave me of it? But if it be ſo, Philoxypes, there needs not ſo far a fetch about the buſh; you need but give me reaſon of the leaſt ſuſpicion, and I aſſure you I ſhall not long lament the loſs of ſo divided a Heart as his is. For till now, the King did always love his Crown better than Princeſs Aretephile, and by his this days diſcourſe, he will make me believe that he loves you better than me.

Madam, ſaid Philoxypes, I beg it as a favour from you, not to blame the King upon ſo ſmall reaſon, and not to blame in him the Compaſſion he is pleaſed to have of an evil, which he believes you to be the cauſe of.

I engage my ſelf, Madam, to free him from the Error of his Opinion; for tho your Charms be without compare, the Reſpect which I have always born to you, and that which I ſhall always bear to the King, have aſſuredly warranted me from almoſt an inevitable danger, from thoſe who have not had ſo powerful Reaſons to withſtand your Beauty; therefore, Madam, do not diſquiet your ſelf, and do me the honour as to promiſe me to pardon the King's Injuſtice, in deſiring that I ſhould ſhare with you in a Heart where you ought only to reign.

But, Madam, the King had given me the place which I now enjoy before he loved you, you ought not therefore to be troubled thereat.

No, no, replied ambitious Aretephile, you will not eaſily be able to juſtify the King; he is generous I confeſs, but he is but a bad Lover, and whoſoever can yield up his Intereſt in the Party beloved, his Love is certainly very indifferent.

This being ſaid, ſhe bid him farewel, and left Philoxypes ſo much grieved as his Malady encreaſed. Fearing then leſt he might die and leave the King in the Opinion he was in, he ſent to deſire him that he might ſpeak with him, and this was juſt as I returned from Amethuſa. I hapened to be by the King when he received this Meſſage, who inſtantly went to Philoxypes, but with ſo much Diſcontent as I pitied him; he had repented himſelf more than once of what he had ſaid to Aretephile, and not knowing whether ſhe might not have ſaid ſomewhat obliging to Philoxypes after he had left them together, he returned unto him much diſquieted.

When we came thither, he enquired whether the Princeſs Aretephile had tarried there long after him or not? and being told not, he entered into Philoxypes Chamber, who was glad to ſee me with the King.

Sir, ſaid he, I ſee it is time that I confeſs my weakneſs to you, and that I diſabuſe you.

The King, who could not reconcile theſe two things, anſwered him only with a ſigh, and being ſet down by his Bed-ſide, Philoxypes ask'd him pardon for the trouble he had put his Majeſty to, and deſired me to acquaint the King with what I knew of his adventure, deſiring him not to be offended that I had not told his Majeſty the truth, ſince unleſs I ſhould have drawn down the Anger of Heaven upon me for Perjury, I could not have revealed his Secret, after the Oath that he had made me to take to the contrary. I then began to acquaint the King with all that I knew touching Philoxypes Love; but all I could ſay to him appear'd to be ſo incredible, as it was a long time before he could believe it. At laſt he told Philoxypes, that unleſs he ſhould let him ſee Policrite, he would not believe what he had heard.

Philoxypes perceiving the King's Obſtinacy, told him, That tho he was very ill he would be carried to Claria, in caſe he were any thing better the next Morning, imagining he ſhould ſooner recover his Health being near Policrite, than if he ſhould ſtay at Paphos.

All this while the the King did not believe what I had told him. Sometimes a Man might ſee ſome ſign of rejoycing in him: Ah, my dear Philoxypes, would he ſay, is it poſſible you were not my Rival, and that I was deceived? if it be ſo, I think I ſhall adore that Policrite you ſpeak of, inſtead of blaming the Love you bear her, ſince thereby I ſhall not be inforced to yield up what I hold dearer than my Life, and that my Confident will not prove my Rival,

But obſerve, Sir, the extraordinary Effects of Love: Philoxypes was very ſick when he ſent to deſire the King to come unto him; but when once he had any thought of returning to Claria, he grew better; he ſlept all the night quietly enough, and the next day was carried in a Litter to Claria, whither the King went to lie that night.

The next day Philoxypes left his Bed, and the following day, notwithſtanding all his Weakneſs, he got on Horſeback together with the King, waited on but by very few; and came to the foot of the Mountains where they were to light. Being there, the King followed by none but Philoxypes and my ſelf, went towards Cleanthea's Cottage; which as ſoon as we diſcovered, Philoxypes, who had need enough howſoever to reſt, ſtaid a while, and ſhewing it to the King, Sir, ſaid he, ſtrangely confuſed, ſee the place which made me forgo Paphos; ſee the inch of all the Earth that likes me beſt, and where you go to ſee one, who peradventure will rather make you Philoxypes his Rival, than Philoxypes ſhall prove yours.

He ſpoke this with a Smile, by which it viſibly appear'd, that the hope of re-ſeeing Policrite had brought Joy into his Heart; yet did he fear diſpleaſing her, and to anger Cleanthes, by bringing the King thither; but there being no Remedy, he reſolved to do it, nor did this Fear juſtle out his Joy.

When the King had ſufficiently conſidered the greatneſs of Philoxypes his Affection, in reſpect of the meanneſs of Policrite's Cottage; and that he had notwithſtanding acknowledged that there was ſomewhat of wild in that Deſert, which was not diſpleaſing, we went on, and came at laſt to that little Paliſado of Lawrels, wherewith Cleanthes his Court was incloſed. We entred thereinto, and Philoxypes ſtepping before the King, went to the Houſe, where he found the Door ſhut; he knock'd, but no body anſwered, which made him at firſt believe that Cleanthes his whole Family was gone to the Temple where he once ſaw Policrite.

Yet ſince there might be ſome body there who might not hear, he knock'd again, and knock'd ſo hard, that a young Slave who ſerved Cleanthes, came and opened the Door, who very well knowing Philoxypes, told him, after that Philoxypes had ask'd him where his Maſter was? that he could not tell him what he deſired to know, and that all that he knew was, that Cleanthes, Megiſto, Policrite and Dorida, were gone from thence, and were not to return thither any more; that they had carried along with them the Women, which they had brought from their own Country; and that his Maſter had commanded him to wait his further Directions there, not knowing wherefore he was gone, nor why he left him there.

Philoxypes, ſurpriz'd and afflicted at this Diſcourſe, was a good while without ſpeaking; the King thought at firſt that there was ſome trick in it, and that Philoxypes had made me ſay what I had ſaid only to abuſe him; but at laſt this young Slave being ſtept into the Houſe, and returning preſently, Sir, ſaid he to Philoxypes, when Policrite was ready to depart from hence ſhe drew me aſide, unſeen by any one, and gave me this which I give to you, ordaining me ſo to do if you ſhould come hither. Philoxypes taking immediately what the Slave preſented him with, opened the Letter whilſt the King did me the honour to ſpeak with me, and read theſe enſuing words.

Policrite to Philoxypes.

I Know not, Sir, whither it is that Policrite is convey'd, but I very well know that Philoxypes is the cauſe of her Exile, not being peradventure, likely ever to have the Honour to ſee him. I thought I might without blame, let him know my Mind by this Letter, which I refuſed to acquaint him withal, the laſt time I ſpoke with him. He may then be pleaſed to know, that at firſt not eſteeming my ſelf worthy of his Affection, by reaſon of my Birth, I with-held mine from him as much as I was able; but that having learn'd ſince that I am not of the condition I appeared to be, and that there have been Kings of my Race: I confeſs I was gladded that I could not reproach Philoxypes for having an Inclination too diſproportionable for his degree; and that I thought it became me to let him know what I am, to the end he may not think he doth any thing unworthy of himſelf, if he ſometimes think upon Policrite, who will always with much Contentment think upon his Worth, whether his fortune be to lead his Life in a Cottage, or in a Palace.

Policrite.

Philoxypes, as ſoon as he had read this Letter, came to the King and preſented it unto him; Sir, ſaid he, your Majeſty may read in this Letter my Innocency, and my Misfortune. The King began then to read aloud what Policrite had written; but good God! in what pain was the unfortunate Philoxypes that he could not interrupt him: but as ſoon as he had read it out, looking upon him with a fix'd and grieved Eye; how ſay you now, Sir, ſaid he, am I yet in love with Princeſs Aretephile, or am I not the moſt unfortunate Man in the World? the King imbracing him, ask'd him pardon for his Suſpicions, and of the trouble he had given him; but my dear Philoxypes, ſaid he, I ſhall be ſufficiently puniſhed for it, as well in reſpect of your Sorrow, which ſhall always be mine; as for Aretephile, who will not eaſily forgive me; yet, ſaid he, you have wherein to rejoyce, ſince you learn two things at once of great importance, and of great Conſolation. For now you know that Policrite loves you, and that ſhe is of Princely Deſcent: Could you have ask'd more of the Gods if you had been to have had your Wiſhes granted you?

Ah! Sir, ſaid Philoxypes, that which you alledg to comfort me is the greateſt part of my Misfortune: For 'tis true, I find that Policrite does not hate me, and that ſhe is of Birth equal with my ſelf, but at the ſame time this lovely and cruel Perſonage tells me, ſhe ſhall never ſee me more, and that ſhe knows not whither ſhe is carried.

Oh! Sir, I ſhould be more to blame, were I in love with Princeſs Aretephile, but I ſhould be leſs miſerable; I ſhould have Reaſons to gainſy my Paſſion, but here I ſee nothing which doth not fortify and augment it.

In fine, after Philoxypes had ſufficiently bemoaned himſelf, he left the King, and went to ask an hundred things of the young Slave, without being able to learn any thing, either of Policrites Birth, nor whither Cleanthes and Megiſto were gone; all he could learn, was only, that 'twas above a fortnight ſince they were gone; nothing elſe could be gotten out of this young Slave neither by Prayers, Promiſes nor Threats, whoſe Fidelity Philoxypes for all his Rage could not chuſe but approve of; but not being able to learn any more, he waited back upon the King to Claria.

Fo

For my part I was never more at my Wits end; for the King was ſo ſad, as well for his own occaſion, as for thoſe of Philoxypes, as he could not reſolve to ſay any thing, neither by way of bemoaning himſelf, nor yet of comforting Philoxypes, whom he ſo dearly loved.

Philoxypes on his part was more perplex'd, he was ſorry to forgo that Cottage, tho his Beloved was no longer there; he ſometimes looked back upon it, ſometimes he looked upon Policrites Letter, which the King had given him back.

He would ſometimes lift up his Eyes to Heaven, then again fix them on the Earth, and walking ſometimes without ſpeaking, ſometimes fetching deep ſighs, he ſeemed not to know whether the King were there or no, or whether he were alone, ſo deep was his Melancholy. At laſt we came to Claria, but good Gods, how ſad was the Converſation the reſt of that day!

At laſt ſaid the King to Philoxypes, You have this advantage, to know that Policrite is much obliged to you, that ſhe hath nothing to reproach you withal, that you have not offended her, and that whereſoever ſhe is, if ſhe think of you 'tis only to bewail your abſence; where, on the contrary, I have incenſed Aretephile, whoſe aſpiring Soul does doubtleſs accuſe me of want of Affection, and who will take it very ill that I preferr'd your Life before my Love to her.

But, Sir, ſaid the afflicted Philoxypes, you know where the Princeſs Aretephile is, you may make your Reaſons known to her, you may ask her pardon for that Fault, which an exceſs of Generoſity made you commit; you may ſit and ſigh by her, and may appeaſe her Anger. But for my part, Sir, ſhould I complain, ſhould I ſigh, ſhould I pour forth Torrents of Tears amidſt theſe Rocks, would all this reſtore to me my Policrite? ſhould I thereby learn where ſhe lives? It may be Cleanthes is put to Sea, and it may be I ſhall never know neither who Policrite is, nor where ſhe is.

Ah! Sir, ſaid this diſconſolate Prince, if you knew the cruelty of my Adventure, you would eaſily know that I am the moſt unfortunate Man in the World; for if I loved one that did hate me, Deſpight might cure me; if I loved one that was inconſtant, the Scorn I ſhould have of her Weakneſs might conſolate me; if I were jealous, a part of my Melancholy would paſs away in ſeeking how I might prejudice my Rivals; were Policrites Abſence bounded, the hope of her Return, how long ſo e're it were, would allay my Diſcontents. Nay, were any Perſon whom I ſhould love, dead, I think my Sufferings would not be ſo great as they are: For in fine, my Malady is ſuch as doth ſtupify Reaſon, and makes my Soul almoſt inſenſible.

In this manner did the King and Philoxypes entertain themſelves. I endeavoured to comfort them both, but to tell you truth, my Reaſons were not liſtned unto; as for Philoxypes, he knew not what Remedy to ſeek for; for having learned by the Slave, who gave him Policrite's Letter, that 'twas a good while ſince ſhe went away, he could not dream of following her, nor knew he where to ſeek after her.

All he could do, was to give order to his People to watch night and day about the Cottage, with directions to ſtay any who ſhould come thither, that they might learn by them what this too faithful Slave would not diſcover; and to follow him wherefoever he ſhould go, believing probably that Cleanthes had not left him alone in that Houſe, without ſome ſecret reaſon, and without having deſign to return, or at leaſt to ſend ſome body thither on his behalf, or that the Slave himſelf ſhould return to him.

As for the King it fared not thus with him; he knew that it was at Aretephile's Feet he was to ſeek for pardon; he would not, notwithſtanding, make his dear Philoxypes return ſo ſoon to Paphos, but ſtay'd the next day at Claria.

But tho there was no hope of finding Policrite, Philoxypes deſired the King that he would be pleaſed to ſend to all the Ports of the Iſland, to know whether Cleanthes had taken ſhipping in any of them or no, it being eaſy to be known, by reaſon of the many Women that were in his company, which would make him remarkable.

The King promiſed him to do what he deſired, but conjured him alſo not to refuſe to go with him to Paphos, to aſſiſt him in getting Artephiles's Pardon. Philoxypes appeared viſibly diſpleaſed to be forced to return to the Court, but being ſo much obliged to the King, and the King being upon ill terms with his Miſtreſs, only out of his Love to him, he thought it became him to go, as he did. When we were come to Paphos, the King went that very Night to Princeſs Aretephile's Lodgings, and found her only accompanied with her Women. She received him with all the Civility that was due to his condition, but alſo with as much coolneſs as could be expected from an incenſed Party.

Seeing Philoxypes with the King, Sir, ſaid ſhe, with a malicious Smile, Did not I tell you Philoxypes would recover without my medling with him? Madam, ſaid he, Philoxypes is much worſe than I believed him to be; but thanks to Heaven, I will not lay his Death to your charge, ſince you are not the cauſe of his diſquiet: May it pleaſe the Gods that you put not Philoxypes in a condition of reproaching you with my Death!

No, no, Sir, ſaid ſhe, your Life is in no danger; as long as Philoxypes lives, your Majeſty needs fear nothing. Alas, Madam, cry'd the King, deal not ſo hardly with me! Alas, Sir, ſaid ſhe, go not about I beſeech you to perſwade me to things ſo directly oppoſite one to another, in ſo ſhort a time; it is not above four or five days ſince you did me the honour to tell me at Philoxipes his Lodging, that you would no more ſue to me for your ſelf; that my Affection was a thing wherein you did no longer deſire a part; and if I remember well, you did alſo intreat me not to deal ſo rigorouſly with Philoxypes, as I had done with you. And it may be, ſaid ſhe, (expreſſing an extremity of Malice) that yielding much to your Intreaties upon that occaſion, I ſhould have granted what you have demanded for Philoxypes, had my Friendſhip been neceſſary to ſave his Life; but ſince, God be thanked, he needs it not, he may be pleaſed to content himſelf with my eſteem; and your Majeſty may likewiſe be ſatisfied with my Reſpect, which is all I can or ought to give you. For in fine, to make me believe that you love me, after being able to permit that another ſhould love me, and you your ſelf wiſh me to love him, is a thing not eaſy to be underſtood, nor yet eaſily digeſted. Believe me, Sir, ſaid ſhe, to love ones Rival, better than ones Miſtreſs, is a thing whereof there are not many Examples, and which may allow me to let thoſe know, who ſhall be acquainted with the buſineſs, that 'tis an excellent way to make a faithful Servant, but a very bad Invention to make a Princeſs love him, who treats her after that manner. Shall the compoſſion I had of Philoxypes, Madam, replied the King, deſtroy me for ever in your good opinion? Me, I ſay, who underwent an unexpreſſible torment, before I could reſolve to pitty him? Me, who did not yield you up, ſave only becauſe I could not abandon you, and who found that Philoxypes's Death did haſten mine? If you could have loved Aretephile, anſwered the Princeſs, more than Philoxypes, you would have lamented his Misfortune alone; you would have endeavoured to have cured him by abſence, or by a thouſand other ways; you would have bewailed his Death when it ſhould have happened, and would yet have been comforted, by the ſole ſight of Aretephile; but becauſe you love Philoxypes better than you love Aretephile, you reſolve without much difficulty to loſe her. Yet, Sir, you could yield up to Philoxypes no more than that part which you held in her, which was not peradventure ſo great as you believe.

Ah! inhumane Princeſs, ſaid the King, make me not deſpair, and know that when I made a ſurrender of you to Philoxypes, I was reſolved to die. It may be, Sir, ſaid ſhe, if I had ſo much weakneſs as to lend a favourable Ear to what you now ſay, that upon the firſt occaſion that ſhould preſent it ſelf; and upon the firſt ſuſpicion you ſhould have that any one ſhould bear me never ſo little good will, you would again conjure me to be his cure. No, no, Sir, ſaid ſhe, with a yet more ſerious Face, you never loved me, nor do you know what it is to love: Love is ſomewhat above Reaſon, or Generoſity, which hath reaſons of its own: A Man may give his own Life for his Friend, but as for the Miſtreſs whom he loveth, it would be more juſt, and more uſual, to quit all his Friends for her intereſt, than to yield her up to any one Friend.

In fine, ſaid ſhe, you may perchance have thought you could have lived without me; for had you dream't you muſt have died, me-thinks you might as well have died without yielding up Artephile to Philoxypes, as after having ſurrendred her to him. But, Sir, ſince you have rather choſen to ſpecify an extraordinary mark of Generoſity, than to give the commoneſt proof of Love, I have no more to ſay; neither have I more to do, but to preſerve my Heart as free as it hath always been. The King ſeeing he could not appeaſe this haughty Spirit, call'd Philoxypes in to his Aid; Come, ſaid he, come make amends for the fault which you have innocently committed; and if you will preſerve my Life, as I would have done yours, be a mean of replacing me in the condition wherein I was before I had compaſſion of you. Madam, ſaid Philoxypes, addreſſing his Speech to the Princeſs, if you judge of the King's Love to you, by his Friendſhip to me, what may you not expect from thence; ſince to ſave my Life, he could for ſome few Moments only renounce the Poſſeſſion of ſo ineſtimable a Jewel. And will you not then believe, That upon the leaſt occaſion which ſhould preſent it ſelf, he would for your ſervice ſacrifice, not only Philoxypes, but even all his Subjects, nay, even his own Life? No, Sir, ſaid ſhe, you are not ſo much bound to the King, as you imagine, and inſtead of your deſiring me to judg of his Love to me, by the Friendſhip he bears to you, I ſhall adviſe you to judg of his Friendſhip to you, only by his Love to me; and to believe, that ſince he was able to yield me up, he never had ſo reſolute a Paſſion for Artephile, as to deſerve that Philoxypes ſhould be much beholden to him for what he hath done for him, ſince he would have done the like for any other. But, cruel Princeſs, ſaid the King, what will you have me to do? Me-thinks, ſaid ſhe, I ſhould demand no unjuſt thing of you, if I ſhould humbly intreat you to think no longer on Artephile, and quietly to enjoy the Life of Philoxypes, which hath coſt you ſo little.

Ah! ſaid he, if I ſhould have purchaſed the Life of Philoxypes, at the loſs of your Affection, I ſhould have bought it more dear, than if I ſhould have given my Crown for it. Confeſs the truth, ſaid this malicious Princeſs, if Philoxypes had been as ſick of Ambition, as you did think him Love-ſick, he would not for certain be yet cured, and you would not ſo ſoon have forgon your Scepter, as you did Aretephile. Philoxypes, who eaſily conceived the hidden Senſe of theſe words, whereunto the King replied not, ſo was he overborn with Grief, ſaid, Madam, if the King ſhall confeſs unto you that he had done amiſs, and ſhall ask your pardon for it, will you be more inexorable, than are the Gods, and will you ſhew no Mercy? When the King, ſaid ſhe, ſhall have done, to cure me of any Malady of mind, if any ſuch ſhall befal me, ſo extraordinary a thing, as that which he hath done for you, I ſhall then ſee of what mind I ſhall be. In fine, Sir, all that the King and Philoxypes could do or ſay, did no ways avail with this imperious Princeſs.

When they were come from her, and were returned to the Palace; Philoxypes who was well acquainted with Aretephiles's Humour, told the King, he knew a way how to work his Reconcilement with her. Alas, ſaid the King, there are few things I would not do to purchaſe that Content: Speak therefore, my dear Philoxypes; muſt I be long in pain? muſt I ſigh abundantly, and pour forth abundance of Tears? and muſt I be everlaſtingly proſtrate at her Feet? No, Sir, ſaid he, you ſhall only put the Crown upon her Head. But, replied the King, I would gladly not have owned Aretephile's Love to her Ambition; on the contrary, I would have had the Crown of Cyprus to have been a reward of her Affection to me.

Five or ſix days being thus paſt over, and Philoxypes not being able to tarry any longer at the Court, he deſired leave of the King to return to Clavia. Thoſe who the King had ſent to the Port-Towns which were neareſt to P*aphos*, returned at the ſame time, but brought no news of P*olicrite*; ſo as the unfortunate P*hiloxypes* returned to his ſolitarineſs in great deſpair.

He had yet engaged the King not to diſcover the cauſe of his Melancholy; nor were there any that knew it, but he, the Princeſs Aretephile, and my ſelf; nor did the Princeſs know any more, then that P*hiloxypes* was faln in love with one that he knew not.

It would be very hard to relate unto you what Life he led; when it was fair Weather, he went to viſit P*olicrite*'s Cottage, and all the places where he had ſeen her, or ſpoken with her; he went to ask more Queſtions of the Slave who was there, and whom they had ever had an eye unto, not finding any one that ſpoke with him, nor that he ſpoke with any one. But all the Addreſſes this Prince could make, could not prevail againſt the Fidelity of this Slave, who deſerved a better condition.

When Philoxypes could not walk abroad, he walked in his Gallery, gazing on the Picture of his dear P*olicrite*. When he called to mind how contented a Life he led before he fell in Love, he almoſt wiſhed he had never ſeen P*olicrite*; but when he remembred her charming Beauty, her bewitching Mind, and the happy Hours which he had enjoyed in her Company, though ſhe had always concealed the Eſteem ſhe had for him; he preferred all the Sorrows he had ſuffered ſince he was in Love, before all his former Pleaſures.

Oh! would he ſometimes ſay to himſelf, when he ſhould read P*olicrite*'s Letter; how ſweet, how pleaſing, and how cruel things have I learn't in one day? P*olicrite* is of illuſtrious Birth, Policrite will always remember me, and P*olicrite* will never more ſee me. Alas, if it be ſo, ſaid he, why have I not recourſe to Death, and what ſhall I do with ſo unfortunate a Life? Then ſuddenly remembring that P*olicrite* was alive, and that ſhe did not hate him, he conceived a beam of hope, that peradventure ſhe might make enquiry after him, and knowing how miſerable a Life he led, ſhe might at laſt reſolve to let him know in what part ſhe lived.

This Thought afforded him only ſo much hope as to keep him from dying; not ſo much as to comfort him in his Misfortunes. Living then in this manner all the reſt of the Winter, he went ſometimes to ſee the King, when the King could not come to him; and deſpairing of all Remedy, he only expected Death, or news of Policrite: the one or the other whereof were the Object of all his Thoughts, and the Bounds of all his Deſires. The Spring it ſelf, which ſeems to inſpire Joy into whole Nature, wrought no alteration in him. He beheld the Roſes in his Gardens bluſh, with the ſame Melancholy as he had ſeen his Knots white with Snow in Winter. Thoſe who watched over Cleanthes his Slave, brought him word one Morning, that he was ſuddenly dead. This angerſom News did redouble his Grief, in as much as for that he ſeemed concerned in any thing which belonged to Policrite; and that this Slave appeared to him worthy of ſuch good Fortune, as that in loſing him, he loſt almoſt all hopes of ever diſcovering where Policrite was. He forbore not notwithſtanding, to have watch kept for a while, to ſee whether any body ſhould come to that rural Cottage, or no: but at laſt, weary of wearying out his People, he diſpenced with their further trouble therein; and abandoned his Fortune abſolutely to the Guidance of the Gods.

As he was one day in this ſad mood, Solon came to Claria; he was at firſt much joyed to hear a name he ſo dearly loved; but conſidering what an alteration there was in him, ſince he had ſeen him, and how confounded he ſhould be to acknowledge his weakneſs to him, though he knew that lawful Love was not a Paſſion to which Solon had declared himſelf an Enemy, this Joy ſuffered a little allay. He went notwithſtanding with much eagerneſs to meet him; but ſadneſs having ſo deeply ſeized upon his Heart and Eyes, the ſatisfaction which he received to ſee the famous Solon, was ſo inward, as there hardly appeared any ſign thereof in his Countenance. Solon no ſooner ſaw him, but he obſerved his Melancholy; and Philoxypes on his part, looking on Solon, inſtead of the peaceful Phyſiognomy, and that chearful and pleaſing Aſpect which he had wont to have in his Eyes, he ſeemed to ſee a great deal of Sorrow.

The firſt Complements being over, and Philoxypes having brought Solon to his Chamber; Sir, ſaid he, the ſight of you would ſurely much rejoyce me, did I not ſee ſome ſigns of Sorrow in you, of which I muſt needs requeſt to know the cauſe. Noble Prince, replied Solon, I ſhould have prevented you, and have deſired to know the cauſe of your Melancholy, before having afforded you leaſure to inform your ſelf of mine. But I confeſs unto you, the Law-giver of Athens, is not at preſent in a condition of preſcribing Laws unto himſelf; and that the Sorrow I feel, is ſtronger than my Reaſon. Philoxypes, embracing him then ſtraitly, conjured him to tell him the reaſon thereof, and deſired him to believe he would do all that lay in his power to comfort him.

But, Sir, ſaid he, I thought that Philoſophy had been a ſalve to you againſt all the Misfortunes of Life; and that Sorrow was a thing unknown to Solon, to whom whole Greece gives the name of Wiſe.

Philoſophy ſaid this famous Athenian, is a vain-glorious Art, which boaſts of governing in Places, wherein ſhe hath no great power; ſhe may doubtleſly, ſaid he, teach Men to be vertuous, make them know whole Nature, teach them how to diſcourſe, and give them Laws and Precepts for the Government of Kingdoms and Common-wealths; nay, ſhe may oft-times make us overcome our Paſſions; but when an equitable feeling, which Nature gives us, is to be overcome, believe me Philoxypes, the ſame Philoſophy which hath ſometimes made us loſe Crowns without change of Countenance, or which hath made us not ſtick to refuſe them, is weak in leſs eminent Occaſions. And in my particular, I may ſay, I have been thrice in my Life-time abandoned by her; though peradventure I have been aſſiſted by her upon an hundred difficult Occaſions. But yet, ſaid Philoxypes, ſhall I not know what 'tis that afflicts you? It very well behoves that I tell it you, ſaid Solon, ſince 'tis from you alone that I can expect any help. I will not repeat unto you, ſaid he, the ſo many particulars of my Fortune which formerly I have acquainted you withal, for I believe you have not forgot them; but that you may perfectly know the cauſe of my Grief, I muſt however take the riſe of my Diſcourſe afar off, and tell you ſome Circumſtances of my Life which you have not yet known. You know I never believed that Marriage was incompatible with Philoſophy and true Wiſdom, as Thales that famous Mileſian did imagine; you know likewiſe that I married a Perſonage of great Worth and Underſtanding, by whom I had Children, who died ſoon after they were born; one only Son excepted, whom I have bred up carefully, intending to make him worthy of that noble Blood whence he is deſcended. He was about 14 or 15 years old, when I was at Milet, about ſome Affairs of mine; where I viſited wiſe Thales, who was one of my very good Friends. He civilly reproach'd me with my weakneſs, and ſaid, I did ſufficiently witneſs my indulgence to Love, by a little Image of Cupid, which I one day conſecrated to that Deity, and placed in the Park belonging to the Academy, there where they who run with the ſacred Torch, are wont to aſſemble themſelves. Paſſing from one thing to another, we ſpake of the Happineſs, and of the Misfortunes of Marriage; and thus our Diſcourſe varying, as it oft falls out, from our firſt ſubject, we ſpoke of News and other ſuch like Matters.

Preſently after, Thales feigning to have ſome order to give to one of his Folk about his own Affairs, roſe to ſpeak to him in his Ear, and came and took his place again. Not long after, I might ſee a Stranger come, whom I knew not, who told him he was come from Athens, not above ten days ago. Preſt by the natural deſire of Curioſity, to know whether there was nothing of new befaln in my Country, ſince my departure thence, I ask'd him whether he knew any thing conſiderable there or no? No, ſaid he, ſave only that the day I came away on, I ſaw the Funeral Obſequies of a young Youth of the beſt Rank, whereat all the People of Note in the Town, were preſent, and were very ſenſible of the Sorrow this Child's Death would cauſe in his Father, who was not then at Athens. I confeſs, when I heard him ſpeak thus, my Colour changed, fearing my Son might be concerned; which made me ask him whether he knew not the Name of that unfortunate Father? I have forgot it, ſaid he, but I know he is a Man of great Integrity, and who is much eſteemed of in that place.

I confeſs, Sir, that ſince Philoſophy teacheth Sincerity, as well as Modeſty, I thought I might be the Man ſpoken of; was willing to know the truth, without offence to good Manners; his Name doubtleſly, ſaid I, was not Solon: Pardon me, ſaid he, his Name came juſt to my Memory as you pronounced it. To what end ſerves it to deny it? I could not hear ſo ſad News without Sorrow, and that ſo great as Thales pitied me, and jeſting at my weakneſs, asked me whether it were advantageous for a wiſe Man to marry, or no? Putting himſelf thereby in a condition to have ſtudied Philoſophy for others, not being able to make uſe thereof himſelf. After this, he told me there was not one word true of all that this Man had ſaid; that he had not ſo much as been at Athens of a long time; and that he had ſaid all this by his Directions, which he had cauſed to be given him, when he roſe from me to ſpeak in the Ear with one of his Servants.

At my return to Athens, I found my Son alive indeed, but I found the whole Town in confuſion, by reaſon of ſome diſorder that had happened between thoſe that were deſcended from Megacles, and thoſe that were come of them that had been of the Citonean Conſpiracy. The Megarians ſurprized the Port of Niſa, and re-took the Iſle of Salamina, which had cauſed me ſo much trouble. And to add to the Misfortune, all the People were ſeized on with a ſuperſtitious Snare, which perſwaded them that Spirits returned; that Fantaſmes and Apparitions appeared; and this Imagination prevailed ſo much with moſt of them, as there was an univerſal Humiliation.

Thoſe who had the charge of the ſacred Things, ſaid, that they found infallible ſigns by the Victims, that the Town needed Purification, and that the Gods were incenſed by reaſon of ſome ſecret Offence committed.

To this effect, by the advice of the wiſeſt ſort, they ſent an Expreſs to Crete, to Epimenides the Phaeſtien, who was, and doubtleſly is ſtill an incomparable Man, a Man whoſe Life is altogether pure, innocent and holy; who eats no more than what is ſufficient to maintain Life, and whoſe Soul leans as little to the Senſes as in this Life it can; who is very learned in the knowledg of Heavenly Things, and who paſſes in his Country, not only for one who has ſometimes Divine Revelation, but is by the People of Crete believed to be the Son of a Nymph, called Balta: However it be, Sir, he is a Man of extraordinary Knowledg and Vertue.

Epimenides, not refuſing the Entreaties that were made unto him, came to Athens, and of ſo many famous Men as were in that noted City, did me the favour to chuſe me for his moſt intimate Friend, having through his Wiſdom, and through the Peoples belief in him, diſſipated all their falſe Imaginations, and that by Prayers, Sacrifices, and Ceremonies, he had rid them of all their Fears, he would yet ſtay a while at Athens for my ſake, where certainly he told prodigious Predictions to an hundred ſeveral People. As we were ſpeaking one day of humane Weakneſs, and how little a Man ought to rely upon his own Strength, nor yet upon Philoſophy; I acquainted him with what had befallen me with Thales the Mileſian, and how much aſhamed I was, not to be Maſter of my firſt Opinions. Solon (ſaid he to me) is eaſy to be overcome on that ſide, and as often as Fortune will make uſe of the Affections of Nature againſt him, ſhe will certainly overcome him: For he hath a Soul as tender upon ſuch Encounters, as ſtrong againſt Ambition: But Solon, ſaid he, you are to be bewailed if you do not reſolve to believe me; and believe that what you underwent whilſt you were with your Friend Thales, is little in compariſon of what you ſhall one day ſuffer in the Perſon of a Daughter, of whom your Wife is at this preſent with Child.

I have, ſaid he, obſerved your Birth, and your Life, and I find that this Child, which will be ſoon born, will be a prodigy for Beauty and Vertue, and will alſo be one of the happieſt Women in the World, if you believe my Counſel; but alſo if you will not believe and follow it, ſhe will be the moſt unfortunate. In fine, ſaid he, if you do not what I ſhall ſay unto you, you ſhall have the diſcontent to ſee that your Daughter's Beauty will make your Country deſolate; and that after having refuſed the Soveraign Power (as you will one day refuſe it) ſhe will make one of your Citizens fall in love with her, who will become the Tyrant of the Common-wealth, which will make her reſolve to die rather than to marry him.

I confeſs I was much troubled to hear Epimenides ſpeak after this manner; for I had heard him foretel divers things which I had ſeen punctually fall out according to his Predictions. I then deſired him to tell me what he would have me to do, to preſerve a Man who did ſacrifice his whole Life to the Glory of Athens, from having a Daughter who ſhould cauſe Love in him that would be the Tyrant thereof. He told me then, that ſince it was not yet known in Athens that my Wife was with child, I ſhould conceal her great Belly, ſend her into the Country, and when ſhe ſhould be brought to Bed, that I ſhould cauſe this Daughter to be ſecretly brought up, not ſuffering her to know whoſe Child ſhe was, nor yet any other body whoſoever, except thoſe who were to have the care of her Education, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, as I ſhould be forced to forſake my Country, I muſt, during my Exile, leave her in ſome Iſland upon the Egean Sea; and that things being thus carried, ſhe ſhould be infallibly happy, and I ſhould not need to fear that ſhe ſhould be beloved by the Tyrant of Athens. In fine, Sir, to ſhorten my Diſcourſe, I obeyed Epimenides his Advice, I ſent my Wife into the Country, where when her time was come, ſhe was brought to Bed of a Daughter; wondering at the Accompliſhment of the beginning of this Prediction, I continued to follow Epimenides menides his directions, who at his departure (after having refuſed all the Preſents that were made him, and taking for his Reward only a Branch of the ſacred Olive) told me that my Daughter would one day cauſe as much Joy in me by her Vertue and good Fortune, as ſhe would cauſe Sorrow in me by reaſon of her Loſs. Theſe obſcure words continued fix'd in my Memory, ſo as I put my Daughter into the hands of a Siſter of mine whom I loved very well, who was married in Corinth, and was come to ſee me; truſting only her and her Husband with the Secret which Epimenides had acquainted me withal.

I will not ſtay to tell you, that ſoon after I loſt my Wife, for which I was very much grieved; neither will I entertain you with the Diſorders of Athens, which are too well known to all Men; nor yet with the Relation how I was ſolicited to accept of the Soveraign Power, being put in mind that there had been Kings of my Race, and that one that was deſcended from the illuſtrious Chodrus, need make no ſcruple to accept the Scepter; nor with what ſtedfaſtneſs I rejected thoſe who made ſo unjuſt a Propoſition to me, following Epimenides his Predictions: neither will I tell you what Laws I there eſtabliſhed, you know them, and know how they were obſerved; nor yet the Reſolution which I took to quit my Country for the ſpace of ten Years, to the end that I might make no further alterations, and leave the People leiſure to accuſtom themſelves to their new Laws.

But I will tell you, that being ready to take my voluntary Baniſhment from Greece, and not forgetting what Epimenides had told me, I came to Corinth unknown, and having told my Siſter that I was obliged to leave my Daughter in an Iſland during the time of my Exile: This vertuous Perſonage, who loved her no leſs than a Daughter which ſhe had of her own, had married a Gentleman of extraordinary worth, and who had long lived a retired Life, ſo as ſhe eaſily prevailed with him, not to abandon my Daughter, who really appeared to me, to be the ſweeteſt Child I ever ſaw. I conſulted the Gods touching my Deſign, who confirmed me therein. Thus I took this little Family along with me in my Ship; and being deſirous that the place of Exile for theſe whom I ſo dearly loved, might be a pleaſant place, I choſe this Iſle to leave them in.

Whilſt Solon diſcovered thus at large; Philoxypes, who longed to interrupt him, could no longer forbear; Did you, Sir, ſaid he, leave a Daughter in this Iſland? Yes, ſaid Solon, with a ſigh, and I ſaw her here about four Years ago, when I would be ſeen by none but by you: and, Sir, if I may be allowed to ſay ſo, I ſaw her ſuch a one as Epimenides had decyphered her, to wit, handſom, full of Wit and Vertue.

When I firſt left thoſe, to whoſe Guidance I commited her, I willed them to ſay they were of the Iſland of Crete. At this word Philoxypes changed colour, remembring that it was of thence that Cleanthes ſaid himſelf to be. But Sir, ſaid he, how was this Daughter called that the Gods gave you? Policrite, replied Solon. Policrite, ſaid Philoxypes, is Policrite, Sir, then your Daughter? Solon ſurprized at Philoxypes queſtion, changed colour alſo, and feared leſt this Prince might have known ſomewhat of Policrite, which might diſpleaſe him more than the uncertainty he was in of her Life or place of Abode.

How, Sir, ſaid he, come you to know my Daughter, whom to ſay truth, I left near enough to you, but whom I had alſo left in a place where I thought not you ſhould have met with her; and that when you ſhould have met with her, you ſhould not have known her to be what ſhe is? It was the Gods, replied Philoxypes, who brought me to the knowledg of her; and 'tis the Gods likewiſe, ſaid he, who have taken her from her Cottage, doubtleſly to puniſh me for not preciſely knowing the Daughter of that famous Solon. At laſt he deſired this Law-giver to go into his Gallery, which was painted ſince his laſt being at Claria; and ſhewing him the ſeveral Pictures of Policrite, under the figure of Venus Urania; Behold, Sir, ſaid he, the Goddeſs which made me know Policrite! Solon ſurprized with the ſight, looked on Philoxypes, and not comprehending how he could come by thoſe Pictures without Policrite's Conſent; Sir, ſaid he, Epimenides aſſured me that Policrite ſhould be vertuous; but theſe Pictures make me believe, that being bred up amongſt the Rocks, ſhe may have become too indulgent. Ah, Sir, ſaid Philoxypes! how far is Policrite from what you ſpeak of? but ſhall I dare to acquaint you with my Boldneſs? and ſhall I dare to enquire of you, before I acquaint you with my Misfortune and yours, wherefore you left her in that place? Solon, who knew Cleanthes and Megiſto's Integrity, who knew likewiſe how vertuous Policrite was, condemned his firſt Suſpitions, and haſted to tell him how when he firſt arrived in our Iſland, he made Cleanthes and his Family come on ſhore as Paſſengers which he knew not, that afterwards he placed them near the Sea-ſide, but that being afterwards at Claria, and whilſt he aſſiſted him in the building of that Town to which he would give his Name, being walk'd abroad alone, he had obſerved that little deſert place, where he placed Policrite, having given Cleanthes wherewithal to build that little Cottage, and wherewithal to ſubſiſt commodiouſly during the time of his Exile. That paſſing from Africa into Aſia, to go to Cræſus his Court, he would firſt come once again to Cyprus that he might ſee his dear Policrite. That he had been a whole Month in that Cottage, Policrite not having all that while either known his Name, nor that he was her Father; and that afterwards he came to viſit him at Claria, that he confeſt he had in that Journy diſcovered ſtrange light in the young Maid's Underſtanding, which obliged him to be very ſenſible of her loſs: For, ſaid he, I can find no body now in that Cottage, and cannot learn, neither why thoſe that did inhabit there have left it, nor how long it is ſince they went from thence, nor what way they are gone.

But you, Sir, ſaid he, be pleaſed I beſeech you to let me hear all whatſoever you know of my Daughter, and conceal nothing from me; for I confeſs I ſtand upon Thorns. Philoxypes having obſerved that Solon was really very impatient to know how he came to know Policrite, and how he had got ſo many Pictures of hers, told him the whole truth, he made him call to mind his former Inflexibility, and how he had told him long ſince that a Man might once in his Life be overcome by Love without any Shame. Then he told him what glorious and gallant Company he had had at his Houſe; how miraculouſly this Venus was eſteemed by them all; the Conteſtation which he had with them thereupon; how afterwards he met with Policrite at the head of the River Claria; how ſurprized he was to ſee that the Pourtrait of his Venus, ſhould be the Picture of this unknown Maid; how much he was troubled that he could not find her again; how happily he met Cleanthes as he was going with his Family to the Temple; how he ſaw her the third time when he found her in the Temple; how at laſt he diſcovered her Cottage, and his ſundry Thoughts thereupon; he acquainted him with the firſt viſit he made to Policrite, when he found her making Garlands of Flowers, what ſpeech he had with Cleanthes and Megiſto; and in fine, how violently he was taken with her. He told him alſo how he had endeavoured to ſuppreſs his Paſſion, by reaſon of the ſuppoſed meanneſs of her Birth; what an alteration this Paſſion had wrought in his Mind; how the Court was ſtartled at his Melancholy; the King's odd conceit thereupon, his diſcourſe with the King, and with the Princeſs Aretephile; how angry this Princeſs was, and how much he himſelf was perplex'd; how it came to paſs that Mandrocles had drawn Policrite's Pictures; and in fine, he told him all that had befallen him; and when he had ended his recital, not affording Solon leiſure to ſpeak, thus you ſee, Sir, ſaid he, I am no longer that inflexible Philoxypes which you formerly knew me to be, but I may ſafely proteſt unto you, that I loved Policrite in a Cottage with the ſame reſpect as if ſhe had been ſeated on a Throne, and I may alſo aſſure you, that my Paſſion for her was as pure as if I had known ſhe had been your Daughter.

Do not blame me then, I conjure you, ſince I have only adored Solon's Vertue and Worth in Policrite's Perſon; for 'tis her vertuous Mind which I am more enamour'd of than of her perſonal Beauty; yet do I deſerve to be puniſh'd, for doubtleſs my frequent Viſits have cauſed Cleanthes to change his Abode. He knew not Philoxypes, and imagined he might have abuſed him in Policrite: But to prove, ſaid he, that I lived reſpectfully with her, and that I never received a favourable word from her, ſee (ſaid he, Sir, ſhewing him the Letter which he had received) the innocent and cruel ſign of acknowledgment, that this Divine Perſonage hath given me, ſince that at the ſame time when ſhe ſays ſhe will remember me, ſhe ſays alſo ſhe ſhall never ſee me more: yet, Sir, ſaid he, if my Paſſion do diſpleaſe you, you ſhall ſee how ready I will be to die, as ſoon as you ſhall have given me the leaſt occaſion ſo to do; ſince that is the only way whereby I can pluck her out of my Heart; but on the contrary, if you do truly love me, you will rather bewail me than accuſe me, you will promiſe me not to oppoſe me, if the Gods reſtore Policrite to you, and you will ſuffer her to be Miſtreſs of that ſtately Town which was built by your Directions.

I wiſh, Sir, I were able to offer her ſundry Scepters, but I think not that he who refuſeth them, will ſtick much to beſtow his Daughter on a Prince, who thinks himſelf happy in being but near a Throne, and to aſſiſt his King to ſuſtain the weight of his Scepter.

When Philoxypes had made an end of ſpeaking, and Solon had read Policrite's Letter; My Daughter, ſaid he, is yet wiſer than I thought her to have been; and ſince ſhe hath been able to reſiſt the Charms of Philoxype's Greatneſs and Worth, I find Epimenides had reaſon to ſpeak of her as of a Miracle.

Be you then aſſured, ſaid he, Sir, thas if the Gods reſtore my Daughter to me, I ſhall bring no other Obſtacle to your Deſigns, than my humble deſire that you will ſeriouſly conſider, whether ſhe be worthy or no of the Honour you would do her; for if you continue in your Reſolution, and that I ſhall know that ſhe doth indeed deſerve a part of the Favours which you vouchſafe her, I ſhall be ready to command her to look on you, as on him whom the Gods have choſen to make her happy and glorious.

I do not tell you Philoxypes, that the famous Exceſtides, my Father, who left me poor only out of his own Magnificency, was deſcended from the illuſtrious Blood of King Chodrus; for theſe are not things which I think Men ought much to boaſt of: But I will aſſure you, that all thoſe of my Houſe, ſince they have left the Crown, have been as good Citizens as their Fore-Fathers were good Kings; and that for my particular, I had always rather oppoſe my ſelf to Tyranny, than be a Tyrant.

In fine, ſaid he, as it is not to your Greatneſs that I give Policrite, I pretend alſo, that Policrite's Virtue ſhall ſupply the place of a Crown.

But alas, ſaid Philoxypes! how will you give me this, Divine Policrite, if we know not where ſhe is? She muſt be begg'd of the Gods, replied Solon, ſince 'tis from them alone that we are to expect all the good that can befall us.

In fine, Sir, Philoxypes conceived an unexpreſſible Joy, to find Solon ſo favourably diſpoſed towards him: But alſo his Grief was no leſs extream, to think that Solon's good Intentions would prove of no uſe, if Policrite were not found. Yet was he ſomewhat comforted with the ſight of ſo famous a Man, and the converſation of one ſo perfectly wiſe, made his Sorrow appear at leaſt more moderate, though really it was always very great. Nay, I remember he told me, that notwithſtanding all his ſadneſs, he forgot not you, Sir, but entertained Solon with the Diſcourſe of you, as of a very extraordinary Perſonage.

This mean while the King having heard of Solon's Arrival, and how that Policrite was his Daughter, was exceeding glad, and would have him and Philoxypes to come to Court; ſo as this Prince his Love was no longer ſo great a Secret.

Imagining that Cleanthes was not gone out of the Iſland, Command was ſent again to all the Towns and Villages, to give an account of what Strangers lived in them: but do what they could, they could learn no acceptable News.

This mean while the Court grew very Melancholy; for Princeſs Aretephile, not able to put on a reſolution of pardoning the King, the King by an odd phanſy of Love, reſolved alſo to win this Princeſs's Heart, before he would aſſure her to make her his Queen.

Philoxypes on his part was mad to think he could not find out Policrite, and that he had been the cauſe why Solon had loſt her: and Solon was alſo very ſad that he could hear no news of his Daughter; eſpecially at a time when he was of neceſſity to return to Athens, where he had learned that there were great diſorders, and that all things tended towards Sedition.

He knew that there were three ſeveral Factions there; that one Lycurgus was chief of thoſe that inhabited the Plains; that Megacles, Son to Alemeon, commanded over thoſe of the Sea-coaſt; and that Piſiſtrates, whom certainly you knew when you went to Athens, was chief of the Mountaineers. So, as though all that numerous People had punctually obſerved his Laws ſince his departure, yet the face of Affairs was likely ſoon to alter.

Solon being then neceſſitated to be gone within a few days, told Piloxypes, That the intereſt of a Man's Country, was to be preferr'd before all things elſe; and that he who choſe rather to conceal his Daughter, than to expoſe her to the love of a Tyrant, would not abandon his Country, to expect in vain to hear of one whom certainly the Gods would preſerve if ſhe were worthy of their care; ſo as he had no more to do, than give him full leave to marry her if he ſhould find her. Philoxypes being at that ſame time both much afflicted, and much joyed, thank't Solon for the honour he did him; but the Wind not ſerving for his departure, and his Ship not being ready, he muſt have patience for a while. During this interval of time, Solon underſtood that there was a famous Temple about ſome forty Miles from Paphos, dedicated, as were almoſt all the reſt in the Iſland, to Venus Urania, where 'twas ſaid this Goddeſs delighted more to be honoured, than in any other Temple; becauſe the cuſtom there was, that all the Ceremonies were performed by Maids of good deſcent, who dedicated themſelves to the ſervice of that Goddeſs, and who were to ſerve her three years in her Temple before they were to marry.

Solon who believed he could not imploy the time better, which much againſt his Will, he was to ſtay in Cyprus, than in praying to the Gods, moved Philoxypes to go thither, who eaſily gave way thereunto; ſo as getting on Horſeback the next Morning, and attended but by a few Servants, they came to this Temple, which is very delightfully ſeated.

I know, Sir, I ſhould not ſtay to acquaint you with all the Ceremonies of the Sacrifice, which upon this occaſion was offered for Solon and Philoxypes; yet it being famous amongſt us for what enſued thereupon, I will crave leave to do it; as alſo, becauſe peradventure you have not ſeen the like: For 'tis a Sacrifice which doth not coſt the victims Lives, but on the contrary, makes them recover their Liberty.

This Temple is fairly enough built; the Altar is ſtately, at the foot whereof, and juſt in the midſt, is placed a great Candleſtick of Gold with twelve Branches, whereon Chriſtal Lamps hung which were all lighted inſtantly after. Fifty Maids, clothed in ſilver Tiffany, mingled with Blew, to denote the original of that heavenly Venus whom they ſerved, having each of them a Coronet of Flowers on their Head, and Sprigs of Mirrh in their Hands, rank'd themſelves on the two ſides of the Temple, ſhe only excepted who was to perform the Ceremony, who ſtaid in the middle.

At the foot of this golden Candleſtick there was a great Cheſt or Coffer of the ſame Mettal, wherein there was Fire which they termed Sacred, becauſe it is only lighted by the Agitation of certain Stones conſecrated to the Goddeſs; ſhe who offered the Sacrifice in the name of Solon, and Philoxypes, put Amber, Frankincenſe, Benjamin, and divers other Perfumes, into this Pile of Wood: This being done, and having made a little Pile of the dry Boughs of Myrrh upon the Altar, ſhe took a Torch made of perfumed Wax, wherewith ſhe ſet it on fire, and with the ſame Torch ſhe lighted fifty others which were placed in ſundry parts of the Temple: after this, one of theſe Maids brought two Turtles tied together with Threads of gold and blew Silk; and before her who carried the Birds, went four other Maids ſinging a Hymn after the Lydian manner: after theſe came four others, bringing with them two Swans tied together with a ſtring of blew and gold, and followed by four more who ſung as did the former.

Theſe Maids who carried the Victims, kneeled down before the Altar, which being done, ſhe who did the Ceremony, (to the end that ſhe might not irritate Venus Anadiomena, who had been formerly worſhipped in that Temple, by the honour that was done to Venus Urania) took Roſes and Cockles, which ſhe ſtrew'd upon the Altar, and taking a great ſhell of the Mother of Pearl full of Sea-Water, taken up towards the Eaſt, ſhe ſprinkled the Victims therewith.

The holy Knife, adorn'd with Oriental Aggat, was likewiſe prepared, as it were to ſacrifice them; but the Maids who ſung continually, forbad them in the behalf of Venus Urania, ſo as ſhe who carried the Turtles, and the other who carried the Swans, drawing near her who performed the Ceremony, ſhe untied them, and opening one of the Windows of the Temple, at the ſame time when they threw new Perfums into the Pile of Wood, they were loſt in that cloud of Perfume which aroſe, and flying towards Heaven, ſeemed as if they went to carry up the Vows of Solon and Philoxypes, to the Goddeſs to whom they were offered up.

After this, all the Maids which were in the Temple, began a Canticle of Joy, and one of them taking a little Fagot of Myrrh, which was bound about with Threads of Gold, ſwept together the Aſhes of the little Pile, to ſee whether all were quite conſumed or no; for this is one of the Tokens that the Sacrifice hath been well received.

In purſuit after this, they went to viſit the ſacred Garden, wherein the Turtles and Swans, deſtined to the ſervice of the Goddeſs, are bred up, to ſee whether thoſe that were offered up unto her, were returned thither or no; ſor when this falls not out, 'tis an infallible Obſervation that the Sacrifice hath not been well accepted of, and that the Goddeſs thinks not thoſe Birds pure enough to be preſented unto her another time. But as for Solon's Sacrifice, it had all the Marks of a happy Sacrifice; the Pile was totally conſumed, the Perfumes mounted ſtraight upright toward the Temple's Roof, the Birds flew Eaſt-ward, and were found in the ſacred Garden. In fine, theſe Maids aſſured Philoxypes and Solon, that their Vows were well accepted of by the Goddeſs; and that they had not of a long time offered any Sacrifice, which had been ſo well accepted of.

Having then returned Acknowledgments to the Divine Urania, theſe two returned to Paphos: Solon did ſo pleaſantly entertain Philoxypes, and ſaid ſuch fine things to him, as not taking heed, he miſt the way by which they came. Thoſe who followed them, thought that Philoxypes, who very well knew that way, intended to go ſomewhither that they knew not of, ſo as they let him go on. Continuing to ride on thus by this by-way, they ſtrayed not only from the way they were to go, but came at laſt to a place where there was no beaten track at all: finding themſelves at the Sea-ſide, amongſt wilde, and almoſt inacceſſible Rocks, the ſight hereof recall'd into Philoxypes's Memory the deſart wherein he had found Policrites's Abode.

But at the ſame time he found that he had loſt his way, and that he knew not where he was; yet it appearing delightful enough unto him, though ſandy enough, he ſaid to Solon, that continuing to go along the Sea-ſide, they ſhould meet with ſome Path which would lead them back into the right way; wherefore they did not return back, but continued on their way; and Philoxypes rode formoſt, that he might be a guide to thoſe that he had led out of the way.

Being advanced a good way, he might ſee five or ſix Fiſhers Cottages, built upon the Sea-ſide, and heard the Voice of certain Women, who ſeemed to bewail ſome Misfortune.

He then mended his pace, not knowing why the Voice of thoſe Women had had ſuch an operation in him; and being come near them, he knew Megiſto and Dorida, and found them ſorely weeping, and accompanied with many other Women, who wept as well as they, and who not minding him, looked all towards the Sea.

He then looked the ſame way they did, where, alas! he might ſee Policrite, all alone in a little Boat floating, without either Oars or Rudder; who not knowing what to do, was upon her Knees praying to Heaven; for though the Sea went not very high, yet was it ſomewhat moved; and moreover, the Rocks bearing back the Waves on that ſide, and a breath of Air blowing from Land, the Boat went ſtill further off.

Philoxypes ſeeing Policrite in ſo great a Danger, and not ſeeing any Boat that he might make uſe of, lighted ſuddenly off Horſeback, and threw himſelf into the Water, ſwimming ſtraight towards Policrite.

So as when Solon, who was a little behind, was come to the Sea-ſhoar, you may eaſily imagine how much he was ſurprized to ſee Megiſto covered with Tears, Policrite all alone in a Boat, which the Waves bore towards the full Sea, and Philoxypes ſwimming towards Policrite; but he was ſo far from her, as it was to be believed that (the Boat floating ſtill forward) his Strength might fail him before he could get up to her; and that Solon might ſee his dear Daughter periſh in his ſight, as alſo a Prince whom he loved no leſs than her.

To tell you alſo how ſtrangely aſtoniſh'd Megiſto was to ſee Philoxypes throw himſelf into the Sea, and preſently after to ſee Solon come, is not a thing eaſily done. Nor yet to ſet forth Policrite's Thoughts, when ſhe knew Philoxypes, and ſaw him in ſo great danger for her ſake.

This gallant Perſonage told us notwithſtanding afterwards, that ſhe no ſooner knew him, but the Object of her Vows altered; and that ceaſing to think on her own danger, all her Prayers were poured forth for Philoxypes. This mean while, Solon was upon the ſhore with Megiſto, whoſe Mind was not then at liberty enough to tell him how this Miſfortune hapned; telling him only that Policrite was loſt.

And to ſay truth, I think that upon this encounter, Solon's Wiſdom was put to a greater trial than ever it had been; and that it was much more eaſy for him to refuſe a Crown, than to ſee Policrite and Philoxypes in the danger they were in, without giving apparent tokens of Deſpair.

Yet this famous Man kept himſelf within the lawful bounds of Sorrow; and not doing any thing unworthy of himſelf, did notwithſtanding, feel what ever pains a tender and generous Soul could ſuffer under.

This mean while, though Philoxypes was but lightly clad, for the ſpring was already very hot in our Iſland, he could not ſwim with that Facility as he might have done, had he been naked; ſo as Policrite's Boat driving ſtill away, he could not get up unto it.

One might ſee this young Maid uſe ſome bootleſs Endeavours to ſtay this little Boat, but 'twas impoſſible for her to do it; nay, ſhe did things which ſhe her ſelf knew were of no avail, yet could not keep from doing them.

One might likewiſe obſerve Philoxypes to ſtrive to his utmoſt, and then he ſeemed to be ready to periſh through Wearineſs. But at laſt being got near the Boat, ſometimes one might ſee the Boat driven near unto him by one Wave, and ſometimes born from him by another; for it went to and fro with the Wind.

It was ſo near him as he might hear Policrite's Voice, not being able to anſwer her, ſo much was he out of breath with ſwimming.

Sir, ſaid ſhe, Let me periſh; do you return to the ſhoar; and ſtrive not bootleſly to ſave me.

You may imagine whether ſo obliging a Command did not oblige Philoxypes to redouble his Strength. At laſt, Sir, after that Solon had ſeen the Waves riſe up more than once, ready to over-turn the Boat, and ſwallow up Philoxypes, who was now able to do no more, a great Wave having driven the Boat towards him, he luckily laid hold of the Rope whereby it was faſtened formerly to the Sea-bank.

You may imagine, Sir, what Philoxypes's Joy was then, as likewiſe what that of Policrite, Solon, Megiſto, Doxida, and the other Women that were upon the ſhore; they all ſhouted for joy.

Yet was it not yet time to rejoyce; For though it be not hard to guide a floating Boat, yet Philoxypes was ſo weary, as there was reaſon to deſpair of his ever accompliſhing what he had ſo happily begun; he was ſeen to ſink twice under Water, yet never quit the Rope which he had in his Hand. Think, Sir, how great Policrites's Grief was then, and with how many Tears ſhe repaied the pains he took to ſave her. One might obſerve this amorous Prince do two contrary things; for he would look back upon the Shore, that he might the ſooner bring back his dear Policrite thither; and ſometimes believing he ſhould periſh without ſaving her, he would at leaſt have the Contentment of ſeeing her at his laſt Gaſp.

He looked thus, ſometimes towards the ſhore, ſometimes on Policrite: and things were in this condition, when Philoxypes and Solon's Servants, who tarried a good way behind, by reaſon of ſome Accident which had befallen one of their Horſes, were come up, amongſt which was one of Philoxypes his Gentlemen, who being skilful in ſwimming, threw himſelf inſtantly into the Water, and helped his dear Maſter to guide Policrite back unto the ſhore, where this Prince was no ſooner arrived, but that his force failing him he ſwounded.

'Tis needleſs to tell you what Solon, Megiſto, and all the reſt that were on the ſhore, did to aid him. As for Policrite, ſhe was ſo ſurprized, and ſo afflicted, to ſee what condition Philoxypes was in, as ſhe was not ſenſible of the Joy of having eſcaped ſo great a danger: but at laſt, after having carried Philoxypes into one of thoſe little Huts, and having by the means they uſed, brought him to Life again, and dried his Apparel, he asked where Policrite was? whom Solon brought to him out of a little Chamber whither ſhe had retired her ſelf, though ſhe had not yet perfectly ſhook off the fear ſhe had been in of her ſelf, and of Philoxypes.

But at laſt all being retired that were in thât little Hut, ſave Megiſto, Policrite, Dorida, Philoxypes, and Solon. Solon deſired Megiſto to tell him, why ſhe had quitted the little Abode which he had cauſed to be built for her? wherefore ſhe was come to this place, and where Cleanthes was? wherefore they had left no order to acquaint him with their removal? and how this laſt Misfortune had befallen P*olicrite?* But, ſaid he, Siſter, ſpeak freely without any-wiſe diſguiſing the truth. For Prince P*hiloxypes* knows I am your Brother, that P*olicrite* is my Daughter; and I know alſo that he does her the honour to love her; therefore conceal nothing for his Reſpect, for he hath now a deeper ſhare in P*olicrite* than I have, ſince I have given her to him; and that he may now lay a new claim unto her, by having ſaved her Life.

I leave you to imagine, Sir, how P*olicrite* was ſurprized to know that ſhe was Solons Daughter, whom ſhe knew to be a great and excellent Man, but whom ſhe know not to be her Father; and to know at the ſame time that ſhe was beſtowed on P*hiloxypes*; ſhe bluſh'd, but with a great deal of Modeſty; and looking upon Megiſto, as if ſhe would ask her whether it were true or no, that ſhe was Solons Daughter? ſhe confirmed her in that belief; and afforded her leiſure ſo to confound the Joy ſhe had to ſee P*hiloxypes* again, with that of her knowing her ſelf to be Daughter to ſo famous a Man, as nothing appeared in her Countenance, but what ſo great an Honour might cauſe in her.

P*hiloxypes* beginning then to ſpeak, ſaid as obliging things to Solon in P*olicrites* behalf, as in his own; and Megiſto was ſome-while before ſhe could ſatisfy her Brother's Curioſity. But at laſt ſhe told him; That knowing the Love Prince P*hiloxypes* bore to P*olicrite*, ſhe had thought it fitting to acquaint P*olicrite* only, that ſhe was more than what ſhe took her ſelf to be, to the end ſhe might know how to treat P*hiloxypes* with more indifferency; and that ſhe might think her ſelf the leſs obliged to him for his Affection: That Cleanthes and ſhe, having obſerved that this had produced a contrary effect in P*olicrite*, and Prince P*hiloxypes* having ſhewed much Paſſion in the laſt viſit which he made them, ſhe confeſt the ones Worth, and the others Youth, had cauſed ſome Apprehenſion in her, that in purſuit hereof, knowing that the King was at Claria, and fearing leſt Philoxypes might ſpeak to him of Policrite's Beauty, ſhe had adviſed Cleanthes to quit his Abode, which in effect they had done, and were come to this little Maritine Hamlet, where Cleanthes was acquainted with an old Fiſherman, who had left them his Hut, being himſelf gone to live with a Son of his: That they had left a young Slave at their former place of Abode, with direction, that if Solon ſhould come thither, he ſhould wiſh him to come the firſt day of the next enſuing Moon, to a Temple which they named unto him, where Cleanthes would not fail to be on the ſame day to meet him when he ſhould come thither.

That ſince that time, Cleanthes had learn't by the Prieſt of the little Temple which was near their former Abode, that this Slave was dead; ſo as knowing that the time of Solon's return drew near, Cleanthes reſolved to go live himſelf alone at Paphos, knowing that when he ſhould return to Cyprus, he would not fail to wait upon the King, and ſo he could not miſs of him; to which purpoſe he was gone thither that very Morning; that Policrite, who had no better paſtime, eſpecially ſince they had left their former Abode, than to draw every day ſomething or other upon her Table-book: ſeeing all the Fiſher-men were gone from their little Hamlet, leaving no Boat behind them, ſave that wherein they had ſeen her, and wherein there was neither Rudder nor Oar, ſat down in it, and not minding whether it were well faſtened to the ſhore or no, was deſigning forth that little rural float of Boats, which went ſtill further from her; that ſhe was ſo attentive to her work in hand, that as ſhe her ſelf had told them, ſhe did not perceive the Boat wherein ſhe was, was looſened from the Land, and went floating as the Winds blew it; ſo as ſaid, Megiſto coming forth to look after Policrite, I ſaw her in the poſture I have told you, and ſkreek'd out ſo loud, as I made her perceive the danger ſhe was in, not being able to help her, there not being one Man left in the whole Hamlet; and all the Fiſher-boats, having already doubled a Cape of Land, whereby we loſt ſight of them.

Megiſto having ended her Relation, Solon began t'admire the Providence of the Gods in the guidance of worldly things; and conſidering that unleſs Philoxypes and he had loſt their way, Policrite in all appearnce had been loſt, he could not ſufficiently praiſe the Goddeſs, who had ſo well received his Sacrifice; in effect, this Temple of Venus Urania, hath got much renown by this Adventure. But, Sir, to abuſe your patience no longer, I will only tell you, that inſtead of going to Paphos, Philoxypes and Solon went the next day to Claria, whither they brought Megiſto, Policrite, Dorida, and all the Women that attended them, after that Philoxypes had largely rewarded all the Fiſher-mens Wives for their Hoſpitality and Courteſy ſhewed to Policrite. To tell you how great Philoxypes and Policrites Joy was, would be no eaſy matter, and to relate unto you in what terms this happy Lover expreſt his ſatisfaction to Policrite, and with what an obliging modeſty ſhe received the Teſtimony of his Affection, and gave him ſome marks of hers, would be to undertake too difficult a task. For to learn in one and the ſame day, that ſhe was Daughter to the ſo illuſtrious Solon, and that ſhe was to be Wife to Philoxypes, were two things wherewith her Soul was divided. Philoxypes failed not to ſhew Policrite her Pictures in his Gallery, which, though rarely handſom, came much ſhort of her. The next day Solon ſent to enquire out Cleanthes at Paphos, where he was found and brought to Claria. Neceſſary order being taken for it, Cleanthes, Megiſto, Policrite, and Dorida, had Clothes made anſwerable to their condition.

The next Morning the Princeſs of Salamis, and the Princeſs Agbariſta, being advertiſed by their Brother Philoxypes of the truth of his Adventures: Theſe two fair Princeſſes, I ſay, who loved him dearly, who had learned Policrite's illuſtrious Birth by this Advertiſement, and who did reverence Solon as a God, went to Claria, to conduct this beautiful Creature to Paphos.

But, good Gods! how they were ſurprized with her extream Beauty, comparing which with her Pictures, they found her to exceed them far; but if ſhe appeared fair unto them, ſhe ſeemed yet more ſpiritual.

She had ſomewhat in her of admirable Modeſty, which having nothing in it of Ruſtick, rendred her yet more pleaſing: She had a Soul doubtleſly fraught with all that Innocency which ſhe had preſerved amidſt thoſe Rocks; but withal a Mind and Humour, wherein were all the Charms which the Court could afford.

For Megiſto being rightly Solon's Siſter, knew as well as any one what was requiſit in, and did neceſſarily become thoſe of her Sex, and had perfectly inſtructed Policrite therein.

Young Dorida appeared alſo to be very fair and lovely at the Court; where the King received Solon, Cleanthes, Megiſto, Philoxypes, and Policrite, with unexpreſſible Joy and Honour. And this ſo much the more, as that being at laſt, reſolved to content Princeſs Aretephile's Ambition, that ſo he might ſatisfy his own Love, had made her be told the day before, that it ſhould be her fault if ſhe were not Queen.

But if Aretephile were Queen of Cyprus, Policrite was the Queen of Beauty; none but the Princeſs of Salamis could any way diſpute that glorious Empire with her. In fine, Sir, there was nothing heard of now, but Feaſts and Rejoycing. Solon being of neceſſity to be gone, they haſted the Conſummation of thoſe famous Marriages: The King would have one Ceremony ſerve for them both; nor did Cyprus ever ſee any thing more glorious, though it were done with ſome Precipitation. Solon called then to mind Epimenides his Predictions, and confeſt that there was ſomewhat of Divine in that holy Man. But his Countreys intereſt prevailing more with him than whatſoever other intereſts, he departed for Athens, ſo as ſome Tears of Sorrow did for a while a little allay Policrite's Joy; but to comfort her, young Dorida was left with her, when Cleanthes and Megiſto imbarked themſelves ſelves with Solon. This was the condition, Sir, wherein this great Man left the Court of Cyprus; to wit, the King highly content: Queen Aretephile as highly ſatisfied; and Philoxypes and Policrite ſo happy, as wiſhes could not add thereunto.

Within a few days after, the Prince of Sicily ſent to ask the Princeſs Agbariſta, Siſter unto Philoxypes, in Marriage; and it was conſented unto. Alſo it was included in the Conditions of the Marriage that he ſhould ſend ſome certain Troops unto you, as the King of Cyprus already had. And ſince it was I who had the honour to conduct the Princeſs Agbariſta into Sicily, I accepted of the Employment which was offered me, to come hither: And returning unto Cyprus to accommodate my ſelf with neceſſary Equipage, the Prince Philoxypes charged me to relate his Adventure unto you; and to entreat you from him, that you would not leſſen his good Fortune by depriving him of your Friendſhip, which is infinitely dear and precious unto him.

As ſoon as Leontidas had made an end, Artamenes aſſured him, that if the Felicity of Philoxypes were never leſſened but by the want of his Affection, he might be certain to be happy for ever. Thimocrates and Philocles ſeemed to be exceeding joyed at the ſatisfaction of a Prince whom they infinitely loved; Artamenes alſo was doubtleſs as pleaſant as any one in his preſent condition could be: But his ſtate ſtood upon ſuch terms as he could not hear of either any good or bad Adventures without ſome Sorrow; for when the Felicity of any one was diſcourſed upon, and comparing it with his own Misfortunes, he always ſighed; and alſo when he heard of any diſaſterous Accident, he ſighed ſtill: So that it was very true, that experience in Misfortunes makes a Soul ſenſible of Compaſſion. He rejoyced then at the good Fortunes of Philoxypes, but it was with a ſigh; and he teſtified unto Leontidas, how ſorry he was not to be in a Condition, wherein he might make the Prince Artibies and himſelf ſee, how infinitely dear the Recommendations of Philoxypes was unto him. But Leontidas (ſaid he unto him) you are come to ſerve a great and moſt juſt King, who will never ſuffer your Vertues to be unrecompenſed, as well as if I were at liberty. Sir, (anſwered Leontidas) it would be a difficult matter to perſwade all Aſia, that the King of Medes is juſt in all things, as long as you are a Priſoner. Kings (replied Artamenes, with much wiſdom) do ſometimes commit Injuſtice innocently; becauſe they are perſwaded they have reaſon for what they do; and ſuch as ſuffer ſuch Injuſtice as I ſpeak of, are themſelves unjuſt, if they do not endure it without murmur or complaint, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas were raviſhed with the prudence of Artamenes; and to ſee he knew how to make uſe of bad fortune as well as good; and ſo they left him, making a thouſand new Proteſtations of inviolable Fidelity. But all the while he endured his ſtrict impriſonment with invincible Patience; all his illuſtrious Friends had no other thoughts but how to get him out. Ariobantes, whom Ciaxares had left Regent in the Kingdom, came from Themiſcira unto Sinope, as well to render an account of his Office, as to advertiſe the King, how all the Inhabitants of Themiſcira, Amaſia, and that part of Cappadocia, which was not revolted, began to ſpeak high, that they would ſend Deputies unto the King, to deſire him that Artamenes might be ſet at liberty. Sir, (ſaid Ariobantes unto Ciaxares) all Galatia ſays the ſame; and all your three Kingdoms cannot brook, that a Man whom they reverence as a God, ſhould be in Priſon: Alſo that which I tell you of Cappadocia and Galatia, I underſtand that all Media intend the ſame. Ciaxares hearkened unto Ariobantes, but returned no anſwer, becauſe he ſtayed for the reſult of the King of Armenia's Anſwer, before he would reſolve upon any thing.

Mean while, Chriſantes and Feraulas were continually negotiating, both by their own Endeavours, and the Solicitations of all the Kings, Princes and Friends which Artamenes had: Ciaxares was never without ſome about him who were ſpeaking for this illuſtrious Priſoner: The King of Phrygia was no ſooner gone out, but the King of Hircania came in, and after him ſucceeded Perſodes or Hidaſpes: In ſhort, either by Aglatidas, or Thimocrates, or Philocles, or Gobrias, or Thraſibulus, or Madates, or Artucas, the name of Artamenes was perpetually pronounced. If Ciaxares went to the Temple, the Sacrificers ſpoke of him: If he went into the Streets of Sinope, the Inhabitants kneeled and begged his Liberty: If he went out to walk in the Fields or Camp, all the Souldiers petitioned for their General; and except that old Friend to Aribeus, who always held intelligence with Artaxes, there was not one but was ready to ſerve Artamenes: ſo that this Man whoſe name was Metrobates, was doubtleſs the only Man that had a deſign to deſtroy him: Marteſia for her part, who was informed by Feraulas of all that paſſed, was extreamly glad to ſee the merit of Artamenes ſo applauded; and to ſee that it was not with him, as with other Favourites, who when Fortune forſakes them, then all the World does the like; but that on the contrary, the Love of every one augmented with his Misfortunes: She alſo received every day by Feraulas, a Complement from Artamenes; who told her that his Priſon had wrought no Alteration in him, but that he ſtill retained his Paſſion, as well as his Civility. As all things ſtood in this condition, Megabiſes returned, and came unto the King, when very many were with him, and more ſtill preſſed after him when he entered, to hear news: Ciaxares no ſooner ſaw him, without making any ſecret of his Anſwer, well, Megabiſes (ſaid he unto him) let us know how they have received my Daughter into Armenia; will that King reſtore her unto me, as he is obliged to do? Sir, anſwered Megabiſes, my Journey has not had happy Succeſs; I cannot know who the King is which the Princeſs ſpoke of in her Paper; the King of Armenia will not acknowledge that ſhe is in his Dominions, although there is great appearance ſhe is; nor did I find the Prince Tigranes in his Father's Court. But yet (ſaid Cixares unto him) how did that King receive you? Sir, (anſwered Megabiſes) when I came at Artaxates, and had ſent unto the King to demand Audience, he made me wait three days; and during that time I was always carefully obſerved ſerved by ſeveral People: Afterwards, according to thoſe Commands which I had received from your Majeſty, I told him, that ſince you underſtood the Princeſs your Daughter was within his Dominions, you had ſent me unto him to demand her: I thought (ſaid he unto me very fiercely) you were come to ſolicite me about the payment of that Tribute, which I paid unto Aſtyages, but will not pay unto Ciaxares, ſince I never promiſed it: But as for the Princeſs Mandana, ſhe is not in my power, and though ſhe were, queſtionleſs I would not reſtore her, but would keep her for a Hoſtage, until by an authentick Treaty, your Maſter would acknowledg, that the Kings of Armenia, are not tributary Kings. Sir, (ſaid I unto him) conſider well what you ſay, before you diſmiſs me: for the King my Maſter knows moſt certainly that the Princeſs is in your Dominions. I will cauſe her to be ſearched for, ſaid he unto me, and ſhe ſhall be treated according to her Quality; but if ſhe be here, I tell you once again, that I will not ſend her unto the King of Medes, until he has quitted his Pretenſions unto any Tribute out of Armenia: Let him be contented, (ſaid he unto me) that Fortune has given him ſuch a Man as has made him ſo full of Conqueſts; and let that comfort him for the loſs of a poor Tribute. Sir, (ſaid I unto him) if you give me no other anſwer but that, I have orders to tell you, that the King my Maſter will come himſelf with an Army of an hundred thouſand Men, and fetch the Princeſs his Daughter. Go then ſpeedily (ſaid he unto me) and bid him prepare himſelf; and tell him, there are no ſuch valiant Souldiers in the World as thoſe who fight for their Liberties; and that ſince Artamenes is in priſon (as I underſtand he is) the Prince Tigranes my Son will not make any great difficulty of it to fight him; and perhaps Victories will not come ſo cheap unto him as they have done. Megabiſes did know very well that there was no great prudence in ſpeaking thus unto Ciaxares, before ſo many People; nor to tell ſo preciſely what the King of Armenia ſaid concerning Artamenes: But thinking that perhaps it would be advantagious unto him, he reſolved to do ſo. Then he ended his Relation, by telling, that after he went out from the King of Armenia, they brought him Commands to be gone out of Artaxates the next Morning, and that they guarded him unto the utmoſt Frontiers of Armenia. Ciaxares hearing the anſwer of this Prince, was in a high and cholerick Paſſion; and preſently reſolved upon War: No, no, ſaid he, I make no queſtion but Mandana is in Armenia; ſhe her ſelf has writ it, and Marteſia confirms it; alſo the anſwer of this audacious Prince does tell it plainly: But yet, ſaid the King of Phrygia unto Megabiſes, were you not enformed by any whether there were any forraign Princeſs arrived at that Court? Yes, Sir, ſaid he, for I heard, that there came once ſome Women, whoſe Quality every one was ignorant of; and that they were ſent unto a Caſtle, towards the Country of the Chaldeans, but ſtayed not at Artaxates. No, no, (ſaid Ciaxares once again) there needs no more information; Mandana is in Armenia, and I muſt carry the War thither. And by conſequence (ſaid the King of Phrygia, with as much Generoſity as Boldneſs) we muſt have Artamenes out of Priſon; for, Sir, if your Souldiers do not ſee him in the Head of them, but that he ſhould be left at Sinope, they will march but very ſlowly into Armenia, and perhaps not fight as they uſed to do, when they come there: alſo (added the King of Hircania) I cannot believe there is any better way to move the Gods to become propitious, than to protect that Man whom they have ſo much favoured. Theſe two Princes were not the only Perſons who ſpoke thus, for every one in the Chamber ſaid the ſame. It ſeemed that the preſent neceſſity did work upon his former Reſolutions; and he did not ſo obſtinately deſign to preſs out what the intelligence was which Artamenes held with the King of Aſſyria; inſomuch as there ſeemed to be great hopes of his ſpeedy Freedom.

The King of Medes did ſuffer them to commend him in his preſence without any Anger, he did not reject their Prayers in his behalf, and without any direct conſenting, he made as if there were ſome Reſolutions in him of altering his opinion, but carried it as if himſelf would have the advantage of doing it, and not as forced unto it by any other.

Theſe Reſentments being perceived by all the illuſtrious Company, they ſpoke no more unto him concerning Artamenes, fearing to prejudice him, whom all the World would advantage. Yet they went from the King in great hopes of his Liberty, ſo that preſently a general Voice went about all the Town and Camp, that Artamenes was to be at liberty; Artamenes himſelf was told as much for certain: His Guards all wept for joy, Andramias could not hold from hoping to ſee him preſently in the ſame condition he was formerly; Marteſia was ſo tranſported, that ſhe could not expreſs her raptures of Joy: Criſantes and Feraulas were ſo glad of it, that Artamenes himſelf could be no more; for in conſideration of the Princeſs, and the ſtate ſhe was in, he prized his Liberty as the greateſt good which could befal him. Well (ſaid he in himſelf) I may once again hope to do Divine Mandana ſome ſervice: O Heavens! could I ever believe to be in ſuch a ſtate as either to deliver my Princeſs, or to die in her ſervice? Can I flatter my ſelf with ſuch a pleaſing Thought, as both to ſee and be ſeen by her? Is it poſſible I ſhould ever have the liberty to diſcourſe with her of my moſt adoring Paſſion? If this be ſo, why ſhould I complain of thoſe hardſhips I have endured, ſince I ſhall receive ſo ample a Recompence? Thus did Artamenes entertain himſelf, whilſt all the Town and Camp was rejoycing, by reaſon of their hopes of his Liberty; and to give him an addition of Joy, Feraulas came into his Chamber, and confirmed the News, telling him that it was not without ground; and falling into diſcourſe concerning Mandana, he repeated almoſt all that Marteſia told unto Chriſantes and himſelf: At the laſt, remembring himſelf how they had told him that when Marteſia was on the Banks of the River Halis, amongſt the Fiſhermen, ſhe made uſe of a Box which had a Picture in it, to bring her unto Sinope, and that the Picture was Mandana's. Ah Feraulas, ſaid he unto him, are there no means, by vertue of that Credit which you know you have with Marteſia, to move her unto ſo much Favour as to ſend me that Picture, with a promiſe to reſtore it unto her, if ſhe pleaſe, the ſame day I come out of Priſon? Sir, ſaid he to him, I do not think Marteſia will deny it upon that condition; but as for giving it abſolutely unto you, I think that her fears to diſpleaſe the Princeſs, (who, as you know, is of ſuch a nice Vertue, as that ſhe will ſcruple at the ſmalleſt things) will not permit it; alſo ſhe her ſelf is ſo much enamoured with it, that it would be a piece of great difficulty to obtain it from her for ever; but yet for a certain time ſhe would not refuſe it. Artamenes then engaged Feraulas to uſe his beſt endeavours; and Feraulas charged with this Commiſſion, left him, and left him with more joy than he had a long time found in his Heart.

Ciaxares for his part, was ſecretly pleaſed in himſelf to be overcome, and as it were, conſtrained to free Artamenes; yet ſometimes he would be very angry that he could not exactly know what this Intelligence was which he could not diſcover: But after all, the high Merits of Artamenes, the great Acts he had done, the many Obligations unto him, the preſent neceſſity of his Valour: All theſe were ſo prevalent in his Mind, that he reſolved to ſet Artamenes at liberty, the ſame day he was to march with his Army towards Armenia. But whilſt he was in ſo advantagious a Reſolution for himſelf, and ſo beneficial for his Daughter; ſo pleaſing unto the famous Priſoner, and ſo general a Joy unto all Aſia, eſpecially ſuch as had intereſted themſelves in his Fortune, Metrobates only, that cloſe Enemy of Artamenes, and that old Friend unto Aribeus, was in extream ſorrow. This Man had a Soul ſo ambitious, that he valued not by what Stairs he aſcended unto Greatneſs, ſo he could but get up. There happened many Paſſages in his Tranſactions, which moved Artamenes, whilſt he was in the height of his Fortune, not to eſteem him, and by conſequence not to do ſuch good Offices as he did unto all others; for Artamenes thought it a piece of great Injuſtice unto unfortunate Men of Honour, to load with Benefits nefits thoſe who deſerved them not, whilſt others more meritorious were in miſery. Moreover, Metrobates being linked unto the Fortunes of Aribeus, had ever followed his Principles; and Artamenes deſtroying him, juſt at that time when Metrobates was in higheſt hopes to receive Recompence for all the Services he had done him. This Man therefore was ſo much incenſed againſt Artamenes, that he would enterprize any thing which might conduce unto his Ruin.

Chriſantes and Feraulas were informed of his bad Intentions; but ſince he did not openly tranſact againſt their Maſter, and ſince they could not deviſe what ill Office he was able to do him, they had not recourſe unto any violent ways to defeat him; as well becauſe they were both Wiſe and Vertuous, as becauſe it might be prejudicial unto Artamenes: Neither could they handſomly diſcover his Deſigns; for the Party who informed them of the ill Will of Metrobates, died a little after with Sorrow that he had been the cauſe of Artamenes his Impriſonment. Moreover, as the ſtate of things then ſtood, they had no ground to believe any thing could obſtruct his Liberty, ſince it was demanded by a great Army, and by three whole Kingdoms. But on the contrary, it was almoſt an infallible Certainty, that a Man who was equally beloved, both of Venquiſhed and Vanquiſhers, would be ſet at Liberty; and that none durſt ſhew their Hatred, no not Metrobates himſelf. As he was burning in his ſecret Envy, at the Univerſal Joy which all the World expreſſed for the freedom of Artamenes, he received intelligence from Artaxes, who was Commander in chief at Pteria, and who underſtood that Ortalques had been to tell the King of Aſſyria ſomething, though he could not exactly tell what; but it was in all probability Artamenes who ſent him, for he knew him to be his Servant, and that he had brought Orders from the King, when he was in Bithynia; he whom Artaxes ſent unto Metrobates, was commanded not to go into Sinope, leſt he ſhould be ſtopped, but to ſend ſome unſuſpected Meſſenger to bid meet at the Temple of Mars. Metrobates having received this notice, failed not to go thither: And he no ſooner underſtood, from the Confident of Artaxes, of Ortalques his Voyage unto Pteria; but he began to conceive ſome hopes of diſturbing the Publick Joy. But ſince he had many things to talk of with this Man, and fearing to be ſeen in his Company, at a Place ſo much frequented as a Temple, they went to walk by the Sea-ſide, and juſt in the ſame place where Artamenes had heretofore been, when he found the ſigns of the Princeſs her Shipwrack; and being come cloſe unto the Cabin where the Prince Mazares had been carried, and where they told Artamenes he died. When he was there, he deſired to find out ſome pretence to reſt himſelf, to the end he might write unto Artaxes, having Ink and Paper in his Pocket for that purpoſe. But as Chance ſometimes works Wonders, the Fiſhers who dwelt in that Cabin, and who were very affectionate unto Artamenes, though he had been but a little while amongſt them, ſeeing ſuch a Man as Metrobates amongſt them, took the liberty to ask, whether Artamenes was going to be ſet at Liberty, as the Reports of the Town went, and as they wiſhed it?

Metrobates was ſurpriſed to hear Artamenes named, in a place weere he thought there was none who had any Intereſt in his Fortune. He asked them, whether they knew him whom they ſeemed to love ſo well? And they anſwered, That they had the honour to ſee him in this Cabin; and told him, how he ſound Mazaree there when he was dying. And the better to circumſtance their Tale, they told him in their manner, how that Prince ſpoke unto him concerning the Princeſs Mandana, and gave him a Scarf; alſo ſaid thus unto him: "Is it you, "whom the Affection of a great Princeſs has made "the moſt happy Man, and whom I have made the moſt "unfortunate, by depriving you of one who loved you "ſo well? Though they did not directly relate the ſame words which Mazares uſed, yet they uſed others which made the Matter worſe, thinking it more advantagious for Artamenes, by relating how the Princeſs loved him well, ſince the Prince Mazares, as he was dying, ſaid it. But ſaid they further, Certainly Artamenes does love her alſo, for he put an hundred Queſtions unto the dying Prince; and when he was told that in all likelyhood ſhe was dead, he went out of this Cabin ſo furiouſly and deſperate, as never was Man; and taking a Scarf with him, which the other had given him, he went unto the Sea-ſide, as if he would have thrown himſelf into it: Metrobates who had his Comment upon every word theſe poor honeſt Men related, began to ſuſpect that Artamenes was in love with Mandana; and that this Secret which was between the King of Aſſyria and him, was a Secret of Love and Jealouſy together. So ſeeming to like of the Peoples Affection unto Artamenes, and telling theſe Fiſhermen, that he would e're long be at Liberty, he went out of the Cabin, and taking leave of Artaxes his Friend, returned to Sinope, well ſatisfied with his Voyage. As he paſſed by the Houſe of Artucas, he accidently ſaw Feraulas and Chriſantes come out, who had been to viſit Marteſia, and to afford him more matter to prejudice Artamenes, one of Metrobates his Domeſticks was Brother unto a Boy which ſerved Artucas: So that when he ſaw Feraulas and Chriſantes come out of this Houſe, he deſired to know whether they frequented it very often; and to that end he employed the ingenuity of his Servant, to diſcover, by means of his Brother, to find out whether it was to Artucas or to Marteſia that they went. This Boy was very young, and his Brother uſed both Cunning, and Gifts, and Threatnings unto him, to make him diſcover the Truth: And though his Maſter had forbidden him to tell that Marteſia was two or three days in Sinope before it was publickly known, yet he told unto his Brother, and promiſed to tell him all he knew concerning the Viſits of Feraulas and Chriſantes: So that he underſtood by this Boy his Brother, that whilſt Marteſia was concealed in the Houſe of Artucas, they did both of them viſit her; and that ever ſince ſhe came thither, Feraulas did viſit her every day, alſo Chriſantes very often. There did need no more to ſatisfy ſuch a miſtruſting mind as that of Metrobates; and when he called to memory an hundred Paſſages which he regarded not before, he did no longer doubt but that Artamenes was in love with the Princeſs, and that the Princeſs knew it, or at leaſt ſuſpected it.

He being thus furniſhed with ſuch ſtrong Arguments to ruin Artamenes, he went unto the King's Bed-ſide, who treated him very kindly; for this Prince knowing how Aribeus loved him, thought, that ſince Metrobates was not engaged on his ſide, it was an infallible ſign of his Fidelity, not imagining how this Man remained here as a Spy for Aribeus. Metrobates then being in the Night with the King, when none could diſturb the freedom of ſpeaking, he thought to effect his Deſign. Yet notwithſtanding, he would not begin to ſpeak concerning Artamenes, but ſtaid a while, in hopes the King, whoſe Mind was taken up with nothing but the Armenian War, with the Princeſs her Captivity, and with the Liberty of Artamenes, would ſpeak ſomething which might give him an occaſion to execute his Deſign, without making any affectation appear in his Diſcourſe. At laſt Ciaxares gave him ſuch an opportunity as he deſired; Metrobates, (ſaid he unto him) are you of the Opinion with the reſt, that Artamenes will ſerve me with as much Zeal and Fidelity as he hath heretofore? Is it not to be feared that his great Soul will not ſuffer him to forget his Priſon?

I believe, Sir, (replied Metrobates) that Artamenes will forget all, and remember all to deliver the Princeſs Mandana. But yet (ſaid the King unto him) is it poſſible to gueſs what this Secret is, which I muſt ask no more, ſince I am reſolved to ſet him at liberty who will not reveal it unto me?

Sir, (replied Metrobates) if I durſt tell your Majeſty my thoughts, perhaps I ſhould abſolutely undeceive you in your Opinion, that Artamenes will not ſerve you for the future as well as heretofore: For ſince it was my ſelf who was the cauſe of his Impriſonment, becauſe from my hand you received that Letter which the King of Aſſyria writ; ſo I think my ſelf in ſome ſort obliged to tell you ſomething which I know will conduce unto his Advantage, as well as I told you that which conduced unto his Prejudice.

When the King heard him ſpeak in that manner, he preſſed him extreamly to explain himſelf.

And Metrobates making himſelf very ingenuous and ſincere, told how an Accident drove him into the Fiſher's Cabin, to write a Letter in behalf of one of his Friends which by chance he met withal, and related unto him how thoſe Fiſhers told him that Artamenes was paſſionately in love with the Princeſs; he did ſo aggravate the deſpair which Artamenes was in when he heard the Princeſs was dead, that he did fully poſſeſs the King's Mind with the knowledg of what he deſired to know.

It ſeems, Matrobates, (ſaid the King unto him) by your Diſcourſe, that Artamenes is in love with my Daughter.

Sir, (ſaid he) I do confeſs it is in that, which I would do Artamenes Service; and I dare aſſure your Majeſty, that ſince he has ſuch a noble Paſſion in his Soul, he will forget his Priſon, and be more valiant and faithful than ever he was; for, Sir, (ſaid he, in ſuch a manner as if he had no ill Intentions towards him) the Love of Artamenes will do the Vertue of Mandana no wrong: Beauty upon a Throne, is like the Sun in Heaven, every one has liberty to behold it; and as a glorious Light does not impair its Rays, although it ſhine not always upon Flowers: So the Beauty of the Princeſs, although it captivate others beſides Kings, is not to be blamed.

In the mean time, this ſubtile Poiſon which Metrobates had infuſed into the King's Mind, did afterwards operate in his Heart, and cauſed him to remember ſome light Suſpicions which he had of Artamenes his Love, when he firſt put him in Priſon: He would have Metrobates repeat over what the Fiſhers had told him. But Metrobates feigning as if he had not well enough remembred, nor ſufficiently hearkened unto them, to aſſure himſelf that all he had ſaid was poſitively true, therefore he offered to go again the next Morning, and more exactly inform himſelf.

The King, whoſe Mind was much troubled, commanded him not to fail, but endeavour to diſcover all that ever he could concerning ſuch an important Buſineſs as that. Metrobates ſeemed to be very ſorry for thoſe Vexations he had put into the King's Mind, and told him, he would uſe his beſt endeavours to learn out any thing that might make his Soul to enjoy its reſt.

In the mean while Ciaxares was extreamly troubled; for when he remembred himſelf that Artamenes never asked for his Liberty ſince he was impriſoned, until ſuch time as he knew the Princeſs was living; therefore he made that a ground of his Suſpicion, and thought he was in Love with her. Moreover, he remembred his extream violent Sorrows when he returned unto Themiſcira, and related how he had relived the King of Aſſyria, and facilitated the carrying away the Princeſs Mandana. He called to mind that exceſſive Sorrow he ſaw in his Eyes, when he was returned unto Sinope, and acquainted him with the Shipwrack of the Princeſs.

He paſſed over that Night with ſuch reſtleſs Imaginations, and expected Metrobates moſt impatiently, who ſeeming as if he had been to inform himſelf better in ſuch things as the King deſired to know, returned and went unto the King's Cloſet, where the King, as ſoon as he was dreſs'd, did uſe to be.

As ſoon as the King ſaw him, he turned towards him, and ſaid, Well, Metrobates, what more can you inform me of? muſt Artamenes be ſet at Liberty, or muſt I keep him cloſe?

Metrobates then ſeemed very ſad, and made as if he knew much more than he durſt ſpeak: Sir, ſaid he unto him, I beg your Pardon, ſince it is my Deſtiny to bring none but ill News always unto your Majeſty.

Such Crimes as theſe (replied Ciaxares) rather deſerve Recompence, than either Pardon or Puniſhment; for commonly, Kings never hear of ſuch things as are unpleaſant unto them, but from thoſe who are their moſt faithful Servants.

Metrobates grew more bold upon the King's Anſwer, and told him, how it appeared by that Diſcourſe which Mazares made of Artamenes, that he not only loved her, but alſo the Princeſs loved him again: Then he repeated, word for word, all that the Fiſhers told him.

How (cried out Ciaxares) could my Daughter know of the fond Paſſion of Artamenes, and endure it? If ſhe can, Metrobates, my beſt courſe were to let her remain ſtill in the hands of the King of Armenia; for if ſhe be of ſo ſlaviſh a Soul, ſhe cannot be better than in the Priſon of my Enemy.

Sir, (ſaid he unto him) I beſeech your Majeſty, be not ſo much tranſported; the Affection of the Princeſs is not perhaps ſo much to be blamed, for Artamenes is furniſhed with ſuch high Qualities, that although his Condition ſeems to be but mean, ſince he will not tell us what it is, yet the Princeſs is excuſable, though ſhe ſhould be ſomething indulgent towards him.

No, no, Metrobates, (ſaid the King) you do not ſpeak as you think; ſuch as my Daughter, ought to receive only Teſtimonies of Reſpect from ſuch as Artamenes, and ought to reject the leaſt ſuſpition of any Love, and baniſh it from her for ever.

That which does moſt puzzle me, (ſaid the King) is, that I have impriſoned both Artamenes and Araſpes; becauſe finding a correſpondency between the King of Aſſyria and Artamenes, I ſuppoſed that Araſpes helped the King to eſcape: But if Artamenes be in Love, is it credible he ſhould ſet his Rival at Liberty? And ſince it is ſo that he did not ſet him at Liberty, what can this ſecret Intelligence be which moved him to write as he hath unto him.

Indeed, Metrobates, I know not how to expound this Riddle: If I look upon the King of Aſſyria's Letter, I find that Artamenes is ambitious, and has treated with my Enemy: If I hearken unto the Diſcourſe of Mazares, I find Artamenes is a raſh Man, and my Daughter has loſt her Wits; What ſhould I think of theſe things? and how ſhall I tranſact? Mandana is a Captive in Armenia, and Ar- tamenes is a Priſoner in Sinope. I am talking of giving him that is here his Liberty, and intend to ſend an Army to deliver the other in Armenia: Yet if it be ſo that Artamenes is in Love, and that Mandana knows it, and ſuffers it, I muſt then ruin Artamenes, and forſake Mandana; but in doing ſo, I muſt diſhonour my Daughter in the Eyes of all Aſia, and alſo diſhonour my ſelf.

Sir, (replied then the wicked Metrobates) I hope your Majeſty will never come to that; for if it ſhould appear (as I think it will not) that Artamenes is ſo much in fault, as ſhall move you to ruin him, you will not want other ſpecious Pretences to cloak it, and never bring the Princeſs upon the Stage.

But, Sir, (added he) I think it not expedient your Majeſty ſhould ſo ſoon releaſe Artamenes, but endeavour firſt to make Matters more clear than yet they are; for me-thinks theſe Sicilian Troops which are come hither, and which Philoxypes ſent unto Artamenes to be preſented unto you, are to be a little ſuſpected; there being already ſome of Cyprus his Troops in your Army, which had never been in it but by his Means. And truly, if you remember it, the Prince Artibies ſpoke unto your Majeſty after an odd manner: And Megabiſes alſo at his return from Armenia, told ſuch things unto you, as makes me conjecture that there is ſome cloſe Deſign, which muſt not be ripe until Artamenes be at Liberty.

Who can tell, Sir, whether all that is reported in Armenia concerning the Princeſs be true? The Friends of Artamenes do perhaps retain her by force in ſome place: and there is ſomething in it which deſerves to be made more clear before Artamenes be ſet free: And if your Majeſty will appoint me, I ſhall uſe my beſt endeavours to make a more exact diſcovery.

The King, whoſe Soul was highly incenſed, did command to do it accordingly; and becauſe he would not ſeem to be moved with the Counſels of Metrobates, who feared leſt his Deſign ſhould be prevented, he would ſee no Body that day, but cauſed it to be given out he was not not well.

Mean while, Metrobates reſolved to return at night, and tell the King all he knew concerning the Journey of Ortalques unto Pteria; and how Marteſia was three days concealed in the Houſe of Artucas, before ſhe would appear at Court: Alſo how Chriſantes and Feraulas did frequently viſit her all the while. But Metrobates was more happy in his Project than he thought to be: For the young Boy who was with Artucas, told his Brother, who ſerved Metrobates, that it was not above two hours ſince Feraulas was with Marteſia, who was in private with him in her Cloſet. Their Diſcourſe together was long, and the name of Artamenes and Mandana was much uſed between them; that ſhe opened a Box, and gave him ſomething, which he believed to be a Letter.

That Feraulas after this went out, and as he departed from her, ſaid, he would immediately carry that which ſhe had given him, unto that Party who expected him with much impatience.

This Boy ſaid further, that he went out after Feraulas, and followed him to the Caſtle, and afterwards unto the Chamber where Artamenes was kept Priſoner. Metrobates having met with this intelligence, went unto the King with as much Melancholy in his Face, as he had Joy in his Heart: As ſoon as he was entred into his Chamber, and ſaw none with him, Sir, ſaid he unto him, I am forced to acquaint you, that without all queſtion there is ſome conſiderable Matter in it which muſt be diſcovered: for indeed (ſaid he) I am certainly informed by a Friend which I have in Pteria, that ſince Artamenes was a Priſoner, Ortalques who brought the news of the Princeſs being living, hath been from Artamenes with the King of Aſſyria, who ſince is gone from thence, and none knows where he is: Alſo I underſtood further, by one of Artucas his Domeſticks, that Marteſia was three days in his Houſe before ſhe ſaw your Majeſty: She, I ſay, who had no more to tell you, but that the Princeſs Mandana was not dead. I know ſhe ſent a Letter unto Artamenes, and that there paſſed not a day, but Feraulas doth viſit her.

Moreover, I obſerve, that Chriſantes and he are continually going from one place to another: ſometimes to the King of Phrygia; ſometimes unto the King of Hircania; ſometimes to Hidaſpes, Thimocrates, Gadates, Gobrias, and others.

Then, Sir, all theſe Princes, are great Admirers of Artamenes and his Valour, and are apt to undertake any thing in his behalf. But (ſaid Ciaxares then unto him) what courſe ſhould I undertake to be more fully ſatisfied of theſe things, which I hardly need to make any doubt of? Sir, (ſaid Metrobates unto him) I believe your Majeſty would diſcover all, if Ortalques were arreſted and brought to render an account of his Voyage unto the King of Aſſyria; and if the Cabinet of Artamenes were ſearched, who ſince he is in hopes of Liberty, will doubtleſs keep the Letter which Marteſia ſent unto him.

It would not be amiſs if Artucas, Marteſia, Feraulas, and Chriſantes were ſecured: Moreover (added he) ſince certainly the Quality and Birth of Artamenes is very mean, I would have theſe Men compelled to declare it; for the knowledg of it would produce three Conſequences: It would aggravate his Crime againſt the Princeſs; his ingratitude to you more odious: and would perhaps baniſh him out of the Mind of Mandana; if it be true, as in all likelihood it is, that her Heart is full of Affection unto Artamenes.

The Mind of Ciaxares was ſo ſharp upon this Advice, as he never conſidered how dangerous the Deſign was: but on the contrary, he believed that if he ſhould let all theſe Kings and Princes underſtand that Artamenes was a Traitor; a Man of a mean and deſpicable Birth, and had abſolutely failed in thoſe Reſpects which he ought unto the Princeſs his Daughter, they would all deny him any Protection, and would with the firſt give counſel to deſtroy him; not but that he was much put to it, whom he ſhould chuſe for Executioners of his Orders: But as Metrobates was as bold as wicked, he offered himſelf, ſo his Majeſty would give him power to act what he had adviſed unto. Ciaxares was a long while before he could reſolve with himſelf; but at laſt, he thought the firſt buſineſs would be to ſearch the Cabinet of Artamenes, and to that effect, he ſent Orders unto Andramias, by Metrobates, to be aſſiſtant. Metrobates went then to Andramias, whom he did not find with Artamenes: But ſince great liberty was now allowed to viſit this famous Priſoner, Arbaces Lieutenant of the Guards under Andramias ſuffered him to enter with twelve of the King's Guard which followed him, for the King commanded him to make uſe of Force, if a bare Command would not do it.

As he entred into the Chamber, he ſaw Artamenes locking his Cabinet very haſtily, becauſe of the noiſe he heard. Sir, ſaid he, going unto him, The King has commanded me to bring this Cabinet unto him, and I beſeech you be pleaſed to permit me to yield obedience unto him.

Metrobates (ſaid Artamenes unto him, and ſtanding between the Table and him) cannot eaſily perſwade me that the King has given him any ſuch Commiſſion, and therefore ſince I think he acts without his Orders, I will endeavour to hinder him from ſatisfying his particular Curioſity.

Sir, (ſaid Metrobates unto him, and calling in the Guards, who were in the outer Chamber) I am able to yield obedience unto the King, therefore do not force me to uſe any violence upon you.

Artamenes was ſo deſperate at this Accident, that he knew not what was beſt for him to do: It was in vain to reſiſt; and to let him carry away the Cabinet, in which was a Buſineſs of that import, he could not reſolve, therefore turning towards the Table to open it. Then, ſuffer me (ſaid he) to take that out, which is none of my own, before I give it you.

But Metrobates having ſeized upon the Cabinet, commanding the Guards to keep off Artamenes; they were in a mind not to obey him: Yet when Metrobates threatned them, that the King would puniſh them, they hindred Artamenes from taking the Cabinet out of his Hands; and Metrobates carried it away, the Guards following him.

He came then with all ſpeed unto the King's Chamber, commanding Arbaces to let none enter unto Artamenes until new Orders; but as he went he was not without his Conceits; for indeed he did not directly know what it was which Marteſia had ſent unto Artamenes, and he was fearful it would not prove a buſineſs ſo criminal as he wiſhed it: Yet ſince he could not imagine what innocent Intelligence there could be between them, he went to Ciaxares with much boldneſs, and alſo much hopes; the reſiſtance of Artamenes ſeeming unto him to be an infallible Mark, that there was ſomething in that Cabinet which would make againſt him: He did therefore very much aggravate the deſpair of this illuſtrious Priſoner; and breaking open the Cabinet which was not full, becauſe Mandana's Scarf remained upon the Table, when Artamenes did ſhut it, upon the entrance of Metrobates; then they began to look what was within it; and there was found ſome Jewels and Perfumes, one of Homers Illiads richly bound up; likewiſe the Laws of Lycurgus and Solon; the Comedy of Theſpis, ſome Verſes of Sappho, and Erina's compoſing; certain Enigmaes of the Princeſs Cleobuline; ſome ſmall Geographical Papers; the Model of Babylon; the Deſcription and Encampment of Ciaxares his Army before that Town; ſome Songs of the famous Arion, and many other ſuch things: All this while Metrobates deſpaired of finding any thing againſt Artamenes, and Ciaxares was very glad of it: but at the laſt, finding a little Golden enamel'd Box, Ciaxares ſaw that the Picture of Mandana was within it, about which this Device was written in the Cappadocian Language.

I am better in your Heart.

This Picture was made for a Princeſs of Cappadocia, whom Mandana loved very well, and who loved her moſt tenderly again: So that this Princeſs dying before ſhe had this Picture, Mandana gave it to Marteſia, who deſired it of her. But alas, how extreamly was Ciaxares ſurprized to find it there! and how jocund Metrobates, to ſee himſelf happier than ever he hoped for.

The King's Mind was ſo much troubled, that he neither knew what he did, nor what he ſaw, he read this harmleſs Motto which he thought to be ſo criminal; and afterwards cried out, Who could have thought that ever Mandana would have ſpoke ſuch a word unto Artamenes? How could that ſevere Vertue which ſhe ſeemed to own, ſuffer her to imagine ſuch a piece of Gallantry as this, in favour of a ſimple Cavalier, who wanders about the World, and none knows what he is? Ah, ſince it is ſo, as it is but too too true, Mandana has ſome further Deſigns; Perhaps ſhe is hid in the Houſe of Artucas, where ſhe ſtays only until Artamenes be at liberty; and then when he has got himſelf in the head of all thoſe Forces which are of his intelligence, he will take my Crown from me, and ſubvert my Throne. No, no, (ſaid he unto Metrobates, and throwing the Picture into the Cabinet again) we muſt loſe no time; the Guards of Artamenes muſt be changed: Chriſantes, Feraulas, Artucas, Ortalques, Marteſia, and Andramias alſo muſt be ſecured, for I ſuſpect him alſo.

Sir, (ſaid Metrobates) I know very well that this Deſign is ſomething dangerous to execute, yet I humbly offer my ſelf, and will adventure it, ſo I may have your Majeſties Guards to aſſiſt me; then I believe the reſpect which all People owes unto you, will keep them from oppoſing your Will: So that except Andramias and Artucas who are Men of Rank, and Marteſia who is a Woman of Quality, all the reſt are inconſiderable; as for Chriſantes and Feraulas they are Strangers, and doubtleſs are no more to be feared than their Maſter; and I am ſure there is no danger in ſecuring Ortalques.

The King then recalling into his Mind the Diſcourſes of Mazares unto Artamenes; and the Journey of Ortalques unto the King of Aſſyria: the ſecret Carriage of Marteſia with Artucas; the frequent Viſits of Feraulas and Chriſantes; the Picture of Mandana in the Hands of Artamenes; and ſuch a paſſionate Motto, too gallant for a Lady which made profeſſion of ſo much Vertue, he thought queſtionleſs to diſcover ſome great Crime; and queſtioned no further but Artamenes was in Love, and that Mandana allowed of it.

In concluſion, being tranſported with Anger, he cauſed Metrobates to take fifty of his Guard, to execute his Pleaſure before the Paſſages in Artamenes's Chamber was noiſed abroad.

Andramias coming into the Caſtle as Metrobates was going out, he was eaſily arreſted, as well as Ortalques who was with him: From thence going to take Artucas, he found Chriſantes and Marteſia there, and took them three; conducting Marteſia and a Woman to wait upon her in a Coach unto the Caſtle, but carrying Chriſantes and Artucas on foot; afterwards, he went to look for Feraulas, but could not find him; for hearing by good Fortune, that Metrobates had been in his Maſter's Chamber with a Guard, he was gone unto Hidaſpes to acquaint him, where he found the King of Phrygia: Preſently after he was come thither, they heard of Andramias his Arreſt; and alſo how Ortalques, Marteſia, Chriſantes, and Artucas, were impriſoned in the Caſtle; and that Artamenes was kept more cloſe than ever.

So that hearing of all theſe Paſſages at one time, and knowing that Metrobates had been to ſeek for Feraulas; the King of Phrygia would not have him ſtir out of the Houſe of Hidaſpes, becauſe he might be much more ſerviceable unto his Maſter than if he were in Priſon. This Prince having ſent in all haſte to acquaint all the famous Friends of Artamenes with it; they all went unto the King as faſt as ever they could to know the cauſe of this ſudden change.

The King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Perſodes, Thraſibulus, the Prince of Paphlagonia, the Prince of Licaonia, Ariobantes, Gadates, Artibies, Hidaſpes, Aduſius, Aglatidas, Gobrias, Madates, Artabaſes, Leontidas, Megabiſes, Thimocrates, Philocles, and many others, came thither; but it was told them, they could not ſee the King: Yet, notwithſtanding, ſince they feared leſt he ſhould fall upon ſome violent Reſolution, they preſſed ſo much, that at the laſt he commmanded the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania only ſhould enter, where they found him extreamly ſad. Sir, (ſaid the King of Phrygia unto him) we are come hither to know whether your Majeſty has any need of us: Yes, (anſwered the King in great rage) I do not think you will any longer protect and defend ſuch an ungrateful, raſh, and ambitious Man as Artamenes; who came into my Court, with no intent but to diſhonour me; and aſſumes ſo much boldneſs, as to fix his Eyes upon my Daughter: All her Raviſhers are leſs worthy of my hate than he, ſince in taking her away, they have done nothing which is unworthy of her: But this inſolent Fellow, in raviſhing away her Heart, has done her an irreparable wrong, and mortally offended me. The King of Aſſyria, although he was a Stranger unto her, and an Enemy to the Medes, is yet a great King: The King of Pontus, although he hath loſt both his Kingdoms, yet he retains the Quality of a King: The Prince Mazares was royally born, and lived in expectation of a Crown: But as for Artamenes, doubtleſs he was born in a Priſon; his Parents were ſome Slaves, elſe he would not hide his condition from us as he doth. Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, Artamenes has performed ſuch Martial Actions in War, as me-thinks ſufficiently denotes the contrary to what you ſay. Artamenes (replied Ciaxares) has committed ſuch a Crime in ſtealing away my Daughter's Heart, that I will never pardon him; for he ſaw I denied her unto the King of Pontus, who had then two Crowns: He ſaw, that I armed above a hundred thouſand Men, to fetch her out of the power of one of the greateſt Kings in all Aſia; and yet he preſumes to bear ſuch an Affection unto her, as cannot be innocent; for if he do not deſign to marry her, then his Aims are to defame her: and if his preſumptuous Thoughts do aim at marrying her, then his deſign is to ſet a Slave upon the Throne of Media, and doubtleſs to depoſe me hereafter, ſince it is not poſſible he can ever hope that I ſhould conſent unto his deſign: The truth is, he has ſuch unjuſt, ſo ſtrange, and guilty Thoughts, that Death is too ſmall a Puniſhment for them, and him that owns them. Yet, Sir, (replied the King of Hircania) what new matter have you againſt him, ſince you were once in a Mind to acquit him? A hundred things (anſwered Ciaxares) which makes me think of nothing but his ruin. Sir, (replied the King of Phrygia) ſuch a Reſolution as that ought not to be tumultuouſly undertaken; and though Artamenes were culpable (as I believe him innocent) yet he hath ſo gained the Hearts of the Souldiers, that it is much to be feared, that if you ſhould ruine him, it would make a great diſorder in your Camp. Not at all (replied the King) for when I ſhall fully know the baſeneſs of his Birth, as doubtleſs I will know it, ſince I have Chriſantes in my power; and when I have publiſhed unto the World by a Declaration, that a common Souldier of Fortune, and perhaps ſomething worſe, is ſo audacious as to think upon the Daughter of a King, and to take away his Crown; I believe there will be none ſo unjuſt as to oppoſe me in puniſhing ſuch a one: For truly, it is moſt ſtrange that ſuch a Man as Artamenes ſhould be ſo inſolent as to dare ſo much as to look upon my Daughter: My Daughter, I ſay, who hitherto has appeared as wiſe and prudent, as any in the World: But Marteſia ſhall tell me, by what Charms ſhe loſt her Reaſon, and by what Enchantments Artamenes made her forget her Duty both unto her ſelf and me. But, Sir, (replied the King of Phrygia) you did accuſe Artamenes for holding intelligence with the King of Aſſyria as a Lover of your Daughter, and now you accuſe him for loving her himſelf; how can you reconcile theſe two things which ſeem ſo directly contrary? I know not (replied Ciaxares) but the rigour of Puniſhment, and fear of Death, will doubtleſs make Chriſantes, Ortalques, and Artamenes himſelf, confeſs what I yet know not. But, Sir, (ſaid the King of Hircania) what convincing Reaſons have you for it? I have a hundred, I tell you (replied Ciaxares) all which do plainly let me ſee that Artamenes does hold intelligence with my Enemy and with my Daughter, and that my Daughter hates not him; there needs no more to move me to pronounce Sentence of Death againſt a Man whom I ſo much loved, although he was of ſo baſe an extract. But, Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, what if he ſhould prove the Son of a great King? He would have told it long ſince, replied Ciaxares, if he had been ſuch a one: but certainly he is only a forward ambitious Man whom Fortune favours, and whom the Simplicity of my Daughter has made both happy and culpable; and when I am fully informed in all the Circumſtances of his Crime, out of his own Mouth, and by the confeſſion of Marteſia, Chriſantes, and Andramias, whom I ſuſpect to be too much his Friends; when I ſhall know, I ſay, by Artucas, Ortalques, Araſpes, and by Feraulas, if I can catch him, all that Love and Ambition did prompt this ſecret Enemy unto, then I will call you all to be Witneſſes of his Condemnation. Sir, (ſaid the King of Phrygia unto him) I do moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, not to condemn him upon Surmiſes, and Appearances; he is perhaps one whom you do not know how great he is; and that Affection which he has unto the Princeſs, alſo the Intelligence he hath held with the King of Aſſyria, are not ſo criminal as you ſuppoſe them. Afterwards, the King of Hircania added; I dare tell your Majeſty thus much, that thoſe Services which Artamenes has done you, deſerves a Pardon for greater Crimes than theſe. It is true, (replied Ciaxares) and truly I was reſolved to pardon him for holding intelligence with my Enemy; but that ſuch a Man as he ſhould have any Attempts upon my Daughter, I ſhall never pardon that.

Theſe Princes ſeeing Ciaxares ſo incenſed, would not urge him any further at that time; they only intreated him to examine the buſineſs very well, and not to condemn him but upon convincing Proofs; as, that he was abſolutely of a guilty Correſpondency with the King of Aſſyria; that he had plotted ſome unjuſt Deſign with the Princeſs Mandana; and that he ſhould prove no more than a vile Slave (as he ſuppoſed him) or a common Cavalier: After this they left him, intending to adviſe all together what was moſt expedient to be done. As they went out of the King's Cloſet, all they who were in the Chamber gathered about them, to know how Squares went; ſeeming by their Diſcourſe and Actions, that they were ready to undertake any thing in behalf of Artamenes; but thoſe Kings, being unwilling to enform them of any thing in that place, went unto Hidaſpes, whither they were waited on by all this Multitude of brave Men, which this great Alteration brought unto the King.

They were no ſooner there, but Feraulas who there expected them, deſiring to ſpeak a Word in private unto the King of Phrygia, told him, That ſince he went out, he underſtood that Metrobates had taken the Cabinet of Artamenes from him, and carried it unto the King; he told him further, how certainly he would find Mandana's Picture in it, which was never made for him; and that Mandana did not give it unto him, as it would be eaſily proved; and that Marteſia did lend it to him that ſame day: But though it was an eaſy matter to juſtify the Princeſs concerning this Picture, yet there was no pretence to colour the Love which Artamenes bore unto Mandana, which ſeemed to be the cauſe why he deſired to have this Picture in his Priſon.

In concluſion, ſince all thoſe who were with Hidaſpes, were all of them Friends unto Artamenes, this Prince ſaid unto thoſe who were not acquainted with his Story, that he would engage his Word unto them, Artamenes was the moſt faithful Servant Ciaxares ever had; and that it would be a piece of good Service unto the King of Medes, to hinder him for acting ſuch a piece of great Injuſtice: That moreover, it was eaſy to be ſeen how Metrobates, the old Friend of Aribeus, was imployed in this Buſineſs; and that it was to be feared, this revengeful Man, did much incenſe the King. That in the mean time, it is expedient to keep the Souldiers ſtill in their good Opinion of Artamenes and his Innocency; and to that end it were requiſite for every one to go immediately and give out all neceſſary Orders in the Camp accordingly. And moſt of that illuſtrious Company went in all haſte to divulge the report of a new piece of Injuſtice which had been due unto the famous innocent Priſoner; and none remained there but ſuch as knew the Story and Life of Artamenes; to wit, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Perſodes, Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, Aduſius, and Feraulas; and then they conſulted what was moſt expedient to be done in ſuch a diſaſterous Buſineſs: They all imagined that Chriſantes would never ſpeak a word, neither concerning his Maſter's Love, nor his Birth, what Torments ſoever they put upon him: But they imagined alſo, that the more he denied to tell who Artamenes was, the more apt would the King be to believe, that his Condition was Baſe; and alſo thought him more criminal. They had ſome fears of Ortalques, leſt he ſhould confeſs ſomething which might prejudice; for Feraulas underſtood from Artamenes, what his Buſineſs was at Pteria. They apprehended alſo that Marteſia, out of her fears of Death, would diſcover nothing but the innocent Affection of Artamenes unto the Princeſs; and being deſirous to juſtify Mandana, ſhe would never tell who Artamenes really was.

In concluſion of all, they apprehended nothing but apparent cauſes of fear; and ſo no greater hopes in any thing than Force; and they conceived that it was no certain way to ſave his Life neither, ſince Ciaxares kept him in the Caſtle, and might chop off his Head before they could be in any condition to relieve him; they reſolved then to ſee how things would go in the Morning, and in the mean time to keep themſelves in a readineſs to reſiſt all manner of Violence, if there ſhould be any need.

Feraulas ſpent that Night in continual ſtirring; he went out of Town unto the Camp, and there, from Tent to Tent, from Hut to Hut, to infuſe freſh Deſires into all the Captains and Souldiers to ſave the Life of Artamenes; and returning unto the Town at break of Day, he paſſed through four or five ſeveral Places before he could come at the Houſe of Hidaſpes.

Never was ſuch a Diſorder ſeen; all the Inhabitants of Sinope ſaid, that they never could nor would ſuffer ſuch a Man as he to periſh. The Souldiers, both of the Town and Camp, ſpoke high, and ſaid, they would not endure it. The King's private Guards did but willingly obey; and if Metrobates had not been very cautious, he would have found himſelf in a very ſad Condition. But he had no ſooner arreſted all theſe, whom by the King's Orders he was to impriſon, but he ſent in all haſte unto Artaxis, to ſend him a thouſand Men, ready at the Gates of Sinope, in the beginning of the Night; and at the ſame time he told the King, that he brought them from a Town whereof he was Governor. And Metrobates carried it ſo, that he cauſed theſe Rebel Troops to enter into the Town and Caſtle that Night; ſo that the next Morning the Friends of Artamenes were amazed to ſee all ſtrange Faces, and Souldiers they knew not.

Mean while Chriſantes, Ortalques, Artucas, Andramias, Araſpes, and Marteſia, were to anſwer Metrobates unto theſe three Queſtions: The one, who Artamenes was? The other, what was the Intelligence which he held with the King of Aſſyria? And the laſt, when he began to be in love with Mandana?

Chriſantes fearing to prejudice his Maſter in ſaying he was Cyrus, and conceiving that he ſhould as much prejudice him, if he left him in the conceit of his mean Original, took therefore the Medium betwixt thoſe two Extreams, and ſaid, That he was deſcended from the moſt noble Family——but that it was not permitted him to tell any further; And as for the matter of Intelligence with the King of Aſſyria, he ſaid, that it was advantagious rather than any thing prejudicial unto Ciaxares, but he would ſpeak no further concerning that particular. As for his demeanour towards Mandana, and hers to him, he ſaid, that ſince ſhe was ſo much obliged unto him, and was a Debtor for the Life of her Father, and for ſo many Victories which he had obtained for him, it was not at all ſtrange if ſhe did much eſteem of him; but for any thing further, he knew not.

Ortalques for his part, ſaid, that he knew nothing of any particulars between the King of Aſſyria and him, which could be any way obnoxious unto the King's Service; for he knew they were Enemies one to another.

Andramias could make no anſwer, but all in the Negative, unto all the Queſtions; for indeed, he knew nothing at all concerning them. As for Marteſia, ſhe told Metrobates, with as much prudence as boldneſs, that though her Miſtreſs had truſted her with any Secret, yet would ſhe never diſcover it; and that ſince ſhe was placed with the Princeſs by the King himſelf, ſo ſhe would render an account unto none but him.

All this while, Artamenes was unconceivably perplexed. What, ſaid he in himſelf, ſhall ever I be the cauſe that the King does accuſe my Princeſs? cannot her Vertue, her Severity, and Rigor, keep her from their Suſpitions, but that they will blame her, and perhaps unjuſtly condemn her? O moſt imprudent Man that I am, to truſt in thoſe hopes they gave me! Ought I not rather to heave feared the capricious humour of my Fortune; which did not promote me, but only to throw me down with more precipitation? Alas, Mandana, will the King think that you gave me that Picture which he ſaw? and from thence will conceive an hundred falſe Imginations, and all as falſe as it. Sometimes Artamenes fearing the fury of Ciaxares towards the Princeſs, did rather wiſh her in the Power of a reſpective Rival, as the King of Pontus was, than in the Power of a violent and incenſed Father, as Ciaxares was.

Theſe apprehenſions laſted not long, but he repented himſelf of his former wiſh; and when he conſidered that all hopes of his Liberty was loſt, and that he had cauſed the Misfortunes of ſo many innocent Perſons; and how little appearance there was to avoid them otherwiſe than by Death, he fell into extream deſpair: his great Soul notwithſtanding did always endeavour to reſiſt his Sorrows: And if it had been only in conſideration of himſelf, he would not have ſtood in need of all his conſtancy. All his Guards were changed, and thoſe Souldiers which Artaxes had ſent, were placed about him; ſo that he received no conſolation at all.

Since the King was well acquainted with his reſoluteneſs, although he once intended to examine him himſelf, concerning his Birth, concerning the Correſpondency with the King of Aſſyria, and concerning his Love, yet he did alter his Opinion, and reſolved to uſe others in the Buſineſs whom he had in his power; and to that end, he promiſed them Recompences, he terrified them with moſt cruel Puniſhments, and began to uſe them courſly: But do what Metrobates could, he could not make them alter their Anſwers, neither Chriſantes, nor Marteſia, nor Ortalques; as for the three others, they had nothing at all to ſay: Artucas did confeſs his Coſen was three days in his Houſe, before ſhe went abroad; but he ſaid, the reaſon was, becauſe ſhe was not in a condition to be ſeen, or at the leaſt, ſhe gave him no other reaſon for it; and tho indeed Marteſia did deſire to ſee Chriſantes and Feraulas, he could not tell what the Buſineſs was. Metrobates did not relate their Anſwers unto the King rightly, but on the contrary, did aſſure him they trembled when they ſpoke, and often contradicted themſelves, and that e're long they would tell all.

Mean while, the King would needs ſee Marteſia, although Metrobates oppoſed it as much as he could; ſo that this couragious Woman was guarded unto him: After ſhe had done all due reverence unto the King, and behaving her ſelf boldly like one that was innocent tent in the Buſineſs. Marteſia, (ſaid he unto her) you are the Confident both of Mandana and Artamenes; and I muſt have the Truth from your Mouth, though I have met with it other ways.

Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) ſince I know not any thing which can prejudice thoſe two Illuſtrious Perſons you name, I ſhall eaſily anſwer you. How, Marteſia, (replied the King very angry) do you not think it prejudicial unto Mandana to love Artamenes, as moſt certainly ſhe does? I think, Sir, (replied ſhe) that the Princeſs were one of the moſt unreaſonable Women in the World if ſhe did not highly eſteem him, and one of the moſt ungrateful alſo, if beleeving him ſo Innocent as he is, ſhe did not acknowledg thoſe Services which he has done your Majeſty: But, Sir, all the thoughts of the Princeſs are confined unto theſe two; ſhe eſteems him, and thought her ſelf obliged unto it. But, Marteſia, replied the King, vertuous Princeſſes, who only eſteem a bare Cavalier, ſuch as Artamenes, do not uſe to beſtow their Pictures upon him. O, Sir, cryed out Marteſia, the Princeſs never gave that Picture unto Artamenes; if it be found in his hands, it muſt needs be Feraulas who is a good Friend of mine, and unto whom I lent it, that ſhewed it unto him, as a fine Piece; for that Picture, Sir, was never made for me, much leſs for Artamenes; and if we we were at Themiſcira, I could eaſy prove it was made for the Princeſs of Pteria, who died before ſhe received it. Indeed Marteſia, replied the King, this Picture is found in the Cabinet of Artamenes, and doubtleſs, Mandana did ſend it by you to comfort him in her abſence. No, Sir, ſaid Marteſia, I cannot endure that the Calumny of wicked Men ſhould make you believe ſo; I do invoke all thoſe Gods whom I adore, to witneſs, that the Princeſs does not know that Artamenes hath it; and you would be the moſt unjuſt Prince upon Earth, if you ſhould accuſe the moſt innocent and the moſt vertuous Princeſs in the World of any ſuch thing. But what were you doing, (replied he) thoſe three days which you were with Artucas, before you ſaw me? Marteſia being not well able to anſwer this laſt Queſtion, changed colour; yet preſently aſſuming her confidence, Sir, (ſaid ſhe to him) ſince I was not then in ſo handſom a condition to appear at Court, I had no diſpoſition that another ſhould acquaint you with what I had to ſay; therefore I thought that thoſe three days might well be ſpared, ſince I knew you were not ignorant how the Princeſs was living. But all that while (replied the King) you ſaw Chriſantes and Feraulas. It is very true (ſaid ſhe) I did ſo, and I endeavoured to comfort them in their Sorrows, and to give them ſome hopes, that 'ere long your Majeſty would know how innocent their Maſter was. You might have contented your ſelf (ſaid this violent Prince) with concealing the Weakneſs of your Miſtreſs, without juſtifying ſuch a bold and unthankful Perſon, as never remembring the baſeneſs of his Birth, durſt caſt his Eyes upon my Daughter. Sir, replied Marteſia, when the King of Aſſyria was in your Court, under the name of Philidaſpes, you then thought his condition no greater than that of Artamenes. It is very true, replied the King, but that is no argument to perſwade me Artamenes is any other than what I think him to be. Yes, Sir, replied Marteſia, I ſhould rather think Artamenes to be the Son of a great King, than the Son of a Slave. What King (ſaid Ciaxares very angerly) can he be Son unto? the King of Phrygia hath none? Was the King of Hircania ever married? hath the King of Armenia more then two, whom all the world knows? Had the King of Arabia ever any? is not the Son of the King of Saces drown'd? Or can he be Son unto the King of Perſia, who as they ſay was never heard of, and whoſe Father yet mourns for? Sir, ſaid Marteſia, (whom the Name of Cyrus cauſed to bluſh) I cannot tell you whoſe Son Artamenes is; but let me tell you, that I am fully perſwaded that your Majeſty does not know what he is. The King then being tranſported with Choler, ſeeing Marteſia could not chuſe but take part with this famous Priſoner, and to ſpeak ſo ſharply unto him, in the behalf of the Princeſs, of Artucas, and her ſelf: No, no, (ſaid he unto her) Artamenes is not like Philidaſpes, I know how to put a difference between a great King and a common Souldier, but I can make none at all between Mandana, and the Daughter of a Slave, nor between Marteſia and Mandana. The Gods change your Heart, (replied Marteſia) you will one day repent of what you ſay now.

At the laſt, the King not being able to ſcrue any thing out of Marteſia, ſent her back, and was extreamly troubled: He might know by her anſwers, although ſhe denied all, that there was a Secret in the Buſineſs which ſhe would not reveal: The words of Mazares, and Mazares dying, were conſiderable: Mandana's Picture was a convincing Argument; the concealment of Marteſia with Artucas; the frequent viſits of Feraulas, and Chriſantes; Ortalques his voyage unto Pteria, and an hundred Circumſtances which came into his memory, did moſt ſtrongly perſwade him, that Artamenes was moſt culpable; and the impoſſibility to find out his true condition, did confirm him in his belief that he was of a baſe Deſcent, but when he conſidered ſometimes, whether he would or no, how this extraordinary Man had ſaved his Life, had got him ſo many Battles, had ſubmitted ſo many Kings, he could not chuſe but wonder at the obſcurity of his Birth: yet ſince he could not underſtand what it was, he concluded, that it was ſuch as he was aſhamed to confeſs: ſo that paſſing from this thought unto another; Is Mandana (ſaid he) deſcended from ſo many Illuſtrious Kings, and who her ſelf muſt one day raign over ſo many People, and ſuch great Kingdoms, ſo weak, as to endure the unjuſt Paſſion of an unknown Man? Ah, no, no, I muſt puniſh Artamenes for his Boldneſs, and Mandana for her Weakneſs. Furthermore, when he ſaw that Feraulas would not ſuffer himſelf to be apprehended, he did imagin that to be an infallible ſign of his knowledg of many things; for he knew that Feraulas was of ſuch a couragious Spirit, as the fear of his Life would never make him flee away.

In concluſion, the King did ſuck ſo much Venom out of every Imagination, and his Mind became ſo much incenſed againſt Artamenes, as he would not ſuffer the King of Phrygia to ſpeak any more in the behalf of him. The King of Hircania was no leſs rudely rejected then he. And ſeeing ſo many Princes and Men of high Quality about him: How is it poſſible (ſaid he he unto them all) that you ſhould thus importunately preſs me, in the behalf of ſuch a Man, as you know not who he is? If he would himſelf ſay, he were a Subject unto any one of you, I ſhould then with more patience hear you intereſt your ſelves in his Fortunes. But, queſtionleſs, he is of ſome ſuch inconſiderable Country, that he is aſhamed to own his very Nation; and yet all of you ſpeak for him, as if he were the Son of ſome great King, or as if I ſhould incenſe all the Kings upon Earth by puniſhing him: But (ſaid he unto them, in a mighty Fury) either ſpeak no more in his behalf, or let me know your Reaſons why you ſhould ſo eagerly intereſt your ſelves; For let me tell you this, once for all, and it ſhall be my ultimate Reſolution, that if within two days ſpace, Artamenes do not confeſs his Faults, his Life ſhall pay for it, and ſatisfy Revenge; and afterwards at more leiſure all his Complices ſhall follow him.

After Ciaxarss had thus expreſſed himſelf, he went into his Cloſet, and left all the Kings and Princes extreamly dejected. They all went then unto the Houſe of Hidaſpes, becauſe he was moſt intereſted in him, and becauſe they were more free and at liberty there than any where elſe: When they were all there, the King of Phrygia having conſulted with the King of Hircania, with Hidaſpes, Aducius, Artabaſes, Thraſibulus, Madates, and Feraulas, they concluded, That ſince Ciaxares did object againſt Artamenes, the baſeneſs of his Quality, and thought That his greateſt Crime, therefore it was requiſite to tell him who he was, and try if that way would prevent him from his violent Reſolutions. They conceived, that ſince Aſtyages was dead, Ciaxares perhaps would not ſo much ſtartle at the Stars, and Predictions of the Magi, as the King his Father did: but that when he ſhould know Artamenes was the Son of a King, his Coſin, and had thirty thouſand Perſians in his Army, he would perhaps look better about him, before he deſtroyed him; and that if it ſhould once come to open Force, the Souldiers would fight with more ſury for the Son of a King, than they would have done for an unknown Stranger.

This Reſolution was not fixed upon without great Conteſts; but after the grounds of it were well examined, it was ſo determined, and they reſolved, that after they had given all requiſite Orders unto their Regiments, they would tranſact the next Morning accordingly, and that in the mean time, they ſhould get as many Men as they could to be about Ciaxares that Morning, to the end that the noiſe of the Buſineſs might ſooner ſpread, and be divulged thorow all the Town and Camp.

After this ſhort Conference, the King of Phrygia went unto all them that yet were ignorant of Artamenes his Quality, and were only honourers of his Vertues, deſiring them to be at Court to morroſh Morning before Ciaxares was up, and to bring as many of their Friends as they could, to contrive the ſafety of Artamenes. There needed no further Invitations to move their beſt Endeavours; and indeed, it may very well be ſaid, the Court of Ciaxares was never ſo full as it was that day. The King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caducians, the Prince of Lycaonia, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Gobrias, Gadates, Thraſibulus, Artibies, Thimocrates, Philocles, Leontidas, Megabiſes, Ariobantes, Hidaſpes, Aduſius, Madates, Artabaſes, Aglatidas, and an hundred others were there. But their haſte was, notwithſtanding, not ſo needful, for do what they could, it was impoſſible for them to ſee the King that Morning; he would by all means Dine that day in private, becauſe he would avoid the Solicitations of ſo many as were oppoſite unto his Deſign. But at laſt, knowing that they were all of them extreamly importunate to ſpeak with him, and were come into his Chamber, he came out of his Cloſet in a high fury, abſolutely reſolved upon the Death of Artamenes. Preſently after, according unto the laſt days Reſolutions, Feraulas came alſo into the Chamber, and thruſting thorow the preſs, to get near the King, he preſented himſelf before him with as much Boldneſs as Reverence. Ciaxares being infinitely ſurprized to ſee him, What, Feraulas, (ſaid he unto him) do you fear Death ſo little, that you dare put your ſelf into the Power of a Prince, who has cauſed you to be ſought for as a Delinquent? It is not death, Sir, (anſwered he) that I ſtand in fear of; but my greateſt fear is, leſt your Majeſty ſhould precipitately act a piece of high Injuſtice upon the Perſon of my Maſter: Therefore I come to tell you, that Artamenes is ſo far from being of any obſcure Extract, as he is the Son of a great and good King. Of what unknown Country, I pray you, is the Father of Artamenes King? (replied Ciaxares); Ah, my Friend, this Excuſe is too groſs, and I cannot believe it, unleſs all theſe Princes confirm what you ſay. If that be all, Sir, replied Feraulas, you may very well believe, that Artamenes is the Son of a great King, ſince there are thirty thouſand of his Father's Subjects in your Army: and all theſe Kings and Princes who hear me, are able to atteſt the truth of it: Truth is, Sir, Artamenes is Cyrus, Son to the King of Perſia; and Hidaſpes, Aduſius, and ſo many famous Perſians as you ſee about you, are all to be one day his Subjects. Is Artamenes, Cyrus (replied the King of Medes) away, away, it is impoſſible? Sir, (ſaid Hidaſpes) the thing is ſo true, that nothing upon Earth can be more. Yes, Sir, (purſed Aduſius) and we are able to make it moſt apparent unto you; the Report of his ſhipwrack was moſt falſe; and Cyrus was never in any danger of Death, but in your Majeſty's Service. You know (ſaid the King of Phrygia) that this is not likely to be an invented Buſineſs; for if it were not true, Hidaſpes would not ſay it. I know (replied Ciaxares, infinitely unquiet, and troubled in his mind) that the thing which you diſcover unto me, is the way to haſt his ruine; for Artamenes, as he is only a raſh, ingrateful, and a deluding Man, and a particular Enemy unto Ciaxares, who according to his Clemency, or Juſtice, ſtice, may pardon or puniſh him: But if it be true, that he is Cyrus, then it is as true that he is the general Enemy of all Aſia, and ought to be deſtroyed: You are all of you as well as I, concerned in this publick Intereſt (ſaid he unto all about him, except Perſians) It is your Tyrant who is in priſon; one, whom all the Magi ſay, will ſubvert all Aſia, and become our Maſter: And if any thing can perſwade me, that Artamenes is Cyrus, it is his moſt prodigious Exploits. But, Sir, ſaid the King of Hircania, all his prodigious Exploits conduce unto your Majeſtie's Advantage: All his Combats, Victories, and Conqueſts, are yours; and he findeth no other ſhare in them but his Fetters. No, (replied Ciaxares) becauſe by the favour of the Gods I have prevented him; But, (ſaid he in looking upon Feraulas) does Mandana know he is Cyrus? Sir, replied he, I know nothing concerning the Princeſs, further than that I am certain, there is no criminous intelligence between her and my Maſter, and that his Affection towards her, did never cauſe him to neglect his Reſpects neither to her nor you. The Affection which your Maſter has (replied Ciaxares, very ſharply) is only an unlimited Ambition, and a Thought of horrible Revenge; he intends to puniſh Ciaxares, for that which Aſtyages in the behalf of all Aſia, did intend to do in his Cradle; but I ſhall without any ſcruple at all, do that which he attempted not without much fear; for I have more convincing Arguments inducing me unto it; and alſo more convincing Reaſons (replied the King of Phrygia) to avert you from it.

Cyrus (replied Ciaxares) was then but an Infant, and was not able to hurt: But Cyrus is now a culpable fortunate Man, one that is able to attempt any thing, and to execute what he attempts. It is very true (replied the King of Hircania) but he is alſo a Man who attempts and executes all for your Glory. Yes, ſaid Ciaxares, and would attempt and execute all to my Shame and Deſtruction, if I did not prevent him.

Moreover (added he) that Cyrus whom Aſtyages would have deſtroyed, had never done him any harm. It is very true, (replied Hidaſpes) But this Cyrus in whoſe behalf we ſpeak unto you, has done you Service, and ſuch Service as is highly advantagious unto you. Rather ſay (replied the King in extream fury) that he has moſt baſely betrayed me. He comes hither into my Court, and ſtays here in a diſguiſe, and all was to ſeduce the Mind of my Daughter; Doubtleſs he has diſcovered himſelf unto her; he has infuſed Ambition into her Soul: She looks upon him as the Conqueror of all Aſia: And without conſidering, that he cannot make himſelf Maſter of it, unleſs he throw her Father out of his Throne; ſhe hearkens unto him, ſhe ſuffers him, ſhe loves him. But thanks be unto the Heavens! I am able to puniſh them both at once, ſince if ſhe love Artamenes, as I make no queſtion but ſhe does, then ſhe will ſuffer a Death in the Perſon of this raſh Man, until I can get her unto ſuch a place, as I ſhall make her ſuffer in her own. O Sir, (cried out all the Men which were in the Chamber) we beſeech you, either grant us the Life of Cyrus, or elſe we beſeech you give us our Deaths. How (replied Ciaxares, extreamly aſtoniſhed) my Subjects, my Vaſſals, and my Allies, all ask Life for their Tyrant! or at leaſt will be ſo one day. We beg the Life (ſaid they all with one Voice) of a Man, whom the Gods did ſend to be the Legitimate Maſter of all Men, and have adorned him with Vertues accordingly; and one who, although he was able to have got out of Priſon (added Hidaſpes) yet would not attempt it. A Man (purſued Gobrias) who would not live but to do you ſervice. You may ſay (added Gadates) very many, who would never have vanquiſhed but for your Glory: A Prince (purſued Thraſibulus) who has made all the wiſe Men of Greece adore him: And one (added the King of Hircania) who has converted all them whom he has vanquiſhed, to be his Friends. Say rather (purſued Feraulas) one who has made his moſt mortal Enemies admire him. Add unto theſe (ſaid Aglatidas) that the Deſtiny of Artamenes is ſo extraordinary and glorious, that his moſt mortal Enemies do owe their Lives unto him. You may further ſay (added Artibies) that thoſe who hardly know him, are ſo much charmed by his Vertues, that they are ready to die for him. For my part, (added Thimocrates) I ſhould think my Life could never be better employed, than in ſaving ſuch an illuſtrious Prince as he. Indeed (replied Philocles) your Lot would deſerve Envy if you could obtain that favour; for what Appauſe did not that Man deſerve who ſhould have the honour to reprieve ſo vertuous a Prince? A Prince, replied Megabiſes, who is valiant in the higheſt degree. Who is as liberal as valiant (purſued Artabaſes) who is as prudent as couragious (added the Prince of Lycaonia). Who is as mild and ſweet after a Victory, as he is furious in fighting (replied Madates) Whoſe Reputation is fam'd thorowout the World (ſaid Leontidas.) Who is owner of all the Vertues (added the Prince of Paphlagonia.) And to ſum up all in few words (purſued Ariobantes) he is a Man who never did any ill, but always good. How, ſaid Ciaxares in a great fury! did Cyrus never do any ill? has he not rendred himſelf ſo prevalent and powerful in the Minds of my Friends, my Enemies, my Allies, my Neighbours, and my Subjects, that it ſeems as if I durſt not puniſh him? Is not this Crime great enough to ruin him; to the end that I may teach others to be more reſpective unto me? But is it poſſible (added he) that there ſhould not be one amongſt you all who loves his Liberty, and is a Hater of that Man, whom ſo many Predictions might move you to look apon as a Traitor?

In the mean while, ſince you neither reſpect my Intereſt, nor your own, nor the Intereſt of all Aſia, I will look only to my ſelf, and will puniſh this pretended Cyrus, as a Man who is come into my Court to betray me; as one that has conſpired with my Daughter againſt my Life; as one that has voluntarily let the King of Aſſyria eſcape; as one that holds a criminous Correſpondency with him, and as a Man who indeed would ruin me. Take heed, Sir, (ſaid Hidaſpes) what you do; for after all this, Cyrus is not your Subject, and the King my Maſter knows well enough how to be revenged upon you for ſuch a piece of high Injuſtice. In the name of the Gods, Sir, (ſaid the King of Phrygia) do not reſolve upon any thing in the heat of your Choler. In the name of the Gods (replied Claxares) ſpeak not a word more unto me either concerning Artamenes or Cyrus: But be ye all aſſured, that I take him for my ſecret Enemy, for a ſeducer of my Daughter, and for the Tyrant of all Aſia, and nothing ſhall ſave him; and therefore, ſince his Deſtruction is inevitable, prepare your ſelves to hear preſently of his Death: In ſaying ſo, he cauſed Feraulas to be guarded away, and leſt them. Immediately after, the King of Phrygia was advertiſed, that Metrobates had given Orders, that the Guards ſhould ſuffer none to come into the Town from the Camp, nor none to go out of the Town unto it: So that when he made it known unto the King of Hircania, and all the Princes and Officers about him, they made a doubt whether they ſhould have liberty to go out of the Caſtle, and whether Artamenes were not already dead: For Metrobates ſpoke unto the King in a low Voice ſince he came into his Chamber, and told him that he had underſtood Artamenes was Cyrus.

ANNE LUCAS.

MADAM,

T*HE Great* CYRUS now makes his ſecond Addreſs to Your Honour: His Former ſo proſper'd under Your Ladiſhip's Name, that he vows to think of no other Dedication. For at his firſt entrance into our Language, He reſolv'd to caſt himſelf at the Feet of ſome Excellent Perſonage, whoſe Extraction ſhould be Illuſtrious as your own Name of NEVILL, (which confeſſedly is as great as our Chronicles can boaſt of) and a Perſon accompliſh'd with all the Titles of Honour, Knowledg, and Vertue, as well as thoſe powerful Ornaments of Nature. And at all theſe Capacities He found himſelf bound to make choice of Your Ladiſhip: For He knew (if His Story met any Exception) You were beſt able to give him all the Protection your whole Sex could afford: And if there could be any poſſible Addition, He might ſafely expect it from your own Noble Lord, whoſe Learned Soul is ſo Heroically ballanc'd, ballanc'd, as at once might challenge both Ariſtotle and Hercules; and yet (which is ſtronger) conceals theſe Tranſcendencies from the Eye of the World, becauſe He knows the World is now at worſt, and incapable of Correption. Therefore (MADAM) I were ſtrangly bold to preſent Your Ladiſhip with a common Romance: But all the judicious Wits I have met with, do aſſure me the GRAND CYRUS is a noble uſeful Work; the Plots are deeper, the Turns and Changes much more frequent, the Diſputes and Arguments far ſtronger, than in other Compoſitions: For, the famous Author is not only a Scholar, a Traveller, and a Souldier, but one of the moſt eminent Wits of France, and in every page hath left ſome marks and Impreſſions of his Spirit. The former Volume left CYRUS at the Block: This ſhews what means were us'd to preſerve him, a Felicity which all good Princes have not enjoy'd. And amidſt all, the Scenes of Honour and Love are ſo twiſted, that every Noble Lover may here meet his own Flame, and learn both how to manage and advance it till he reach his Deſires. But I treſpaſs too much on your Ladiſhip's precious Minutes, which are ſtill taken up by the nobleſt Conſiderations. My only hope is, that you that can ſo exactly judg, can alſo pardon,

Your Honours moſt Humble, and moſt Obedient Servant,

ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part III. Book I.

EXtream Fears turning the Souls of all the Kings, Princes, and Heroique Perſons into Fury, they once determined to caſt off all the Reſpects which they owed unto Ciaxares. But afterwards, conſidering, that the Guards of the Caſtle did depend abſolutely upon Metrobates, they altered their Determinations, and took a more rational Courſe. They went with all haſte unto the Houſe of Hidaſpes, there to adviſe upon the beſt Remedy againſt a Diſaſter of ſo great Importance: great indeed, ſince it ſo nearly concerned the Life of the moſt Illuſtrious Prince upon Earth. Their Fears of not getting out of the Caſtle proved groundleſs: for Metrobates contented himſelf with the Execution of the King's Orders unto the Gates of the Town, which was, That none ſhould be permitted to go out of Sinope to the Camp, nor none from the Camp to enter the Town. Theſe Heroes were no ſooner with Hidaſpes, but he, that famous Perſian, ſpoke haſtily thus unto them: Sirs, Whether ther you look upon Cyrus as Artamenes, or upon Artamenes as Cyrus, you are all of you obliged to ſave him, if it be poſſible; There is not one amongſt you all, whom he hath not obliged, and by Conſequence not one amongſt you, who owes not your beſt Aſſiſtance unto him. As for us Perſians, ſaid he (ſpeaking to Aduſius, Artabaſes, Madates, and concerning himſelf) we were the baſeſt Varlets upon Earth, if we would not die to ſave his Life, or revenge his Death. And you, Sirs (if it be permitted me to ſay ſo in the Heat of my Zeal) would be very unjuſt, if not ungrateful, in not doing the ſame with us. As for you (ſaid he unto Ariobantes, Megabiſes, and Aglatidas,) who are natural Subjects unto Ciaxares, although the Intereſt of Cyrus does not concern you, yet the Honour of the King, your Maſter, ought to move you, and make you to undertake any Expedients, which may prevent the ſpilling of that Blood, which as pure as it is, will ſtain his Life with an infamous Brand, never to be waſhed out: Whether therefore ye be Phrygians, Hircanians, Grecians, Aſſyrians, Medes, Caduſians, Paphlagonians, or Perſians, let us all ſpeedily reſolve upon ſome Expedient; or to expreſs my ſelf better, Let us ſpeedily put it into act, and loſe not a Minute of time, leſt Metrobates prevent us.

No ſooner had Hidaſpes ended his Speech, but all the Kings, Princes, and Heroes, teſtified their Reſolutions to imploy the moſt deſperate Remedies, againſt ſo deſperate a Diſeaſe; and to hazard their Lives a thouſand times to preſerve the Life of Cyrus. They contrived all imaginable ways to effect their Deſign; and the Heat of their Zeal did ſo tranſport them, that they propounded an hundred different Propoſitions; and ſome of them ſuch, as the Execution of them was impoſſible: for the Accident did ſo diſturb their Reaſon, and animate their Courage, that all of them did ſtrive how to ſignal themſelves, by the Dangers they would undertake in the Enterprize. Some would have them go by open Force unto the Caſtle, and demand Artamenes; others adviſed to joyn the Subtilty of the Fox to the Fury of the Lion: and others would have them go kill Metrobates immediately.

Some adviſed to go and raiſe the People; ſome others would have them cauſe the Army to advance: And all of them concluded to tranſact, and beſtir themſelves, to ſave the Life of Cyrus. Since they looked upon Ciaxares, as a prejudicated Prince, yet ſince they were all of them really generous, they had not one thought of attempting any thing upon his Perſon; but only ſo far as might get that Hero out of his Hands, unto whom he owed the Glory of his Reign, and the Conqueſt of many Kingdoms.

In Concluſion, it was reſolved upon, to let ſome one down the Walls of the Town by Cords, that he might go unto the Camp, and make it known unto the Perſians, that the only Son of their Soveraign was in Danger of Death, if they did not ſpeedily relieve him; hoping that afterwards, all the whole Army would come unto the Gates of Sinope, and move Ciaxares not to execute his Deſign with ſo much Precipitation. In the mean time it was reſolved that Ariobantes, and Megabiſes, ſhould return into the Caſtle, and advertiſe them concerning all Paſſages, and alſo to try if they could any ways qualify the King: For their parts, they aſſembled all their Friends which they had within the Town, to wait until the Army came up, and to be in Readineſs for any Attempt, if there were a neceſſity of it, and to ſtir up the People, if there were no other Remedy; but there was no need of taking any thought for that, becauſe they perceived the People to come out of the Caſtle in Tumults, and as they walked the Streets, nothing could be heard but the Name of Artamenes, pronouncing it with troubled Spirits: Immediately after, the People of Sinope ſeeing all their Hopes turned into Fears, and their Joys into Sorrows, grew into ſo great a Commotion, that there was not any who followed his accuſtomed Courſe; Shops were ſhut; the Women ſpoke loud in the Streets; Merchants conſulted together upon what was beſt to be done; the Gentry flocked about the King and Princes, to hear what was done in the Caſtle; and the Confuſion was ſo tumultuouſly apparent, that it was eaſy to perceive, they wanted but little of a declared Revolt. That which did moſt of all augment the Tumult, was the Orders which Metrobates had given to ſuffer none to enter, or go out of the Town: for they who were come out of the Camp into the Town, being deſirous to return thither again; and they who were gone out of the Town into the Camp, being alſo deſirous to come back, and both reſtrained; The one endeavouring to come in, the other to go out, made ſuch an hideous Garboil at the Gates, that the Noiſe of them ſounded throughout all the Town: and one Benefit accrued by it; for ſince all the Souldiers which Metrobates had brought from Pteria, were all buſied either at the Gates of the Town, or at the Caſtle; it was leſs difficult for Madates during the Obſcurity of the Night to get over the Wall and Ditch. He went then in all haſte unto the Camp, and acquainted all the Perſians that Artamenes was Cyrus, and that their Prince would preſently be put to Death, if they did not interpoſe their Lives to ſave his. When he came there, he found the Camp already in diſorder, by the Return of ſeveral Captains and Souldiers, who were denied Entrance into the Town, who reported that certainly they would put Artamenes to Death, and perhaps all their Commanders, and Princes alſo. Madates then found the Army in a fit Poſture for his Deſign; if he met any Captains, It muſt be you (would he ſay unto them) which muſt ſave the invincible Artamenes, you who have been Sharers with him in the Honour, and you who he has ſo favourably looked upon: If he ſpoke unto the Common Souldiers, It muſt be you (would he ſay to them) who muſt preſerve your valiant General, who would ever be in the deepeſt Dangers, but would never have any Share in the Magnificent Plunder wherewith you are enriched. If he ſaw any Phrygians, he told them, that it was their King's Command to come unto Sinope, and demand Artamenes: If he ſaw any Hircanians, he would tell them the ſame from their King, and ſo the like unto all the ſeveral Nations which were in the Army: ſo that the Diſcourſe of Madates, meeting with that violent Paſſion which had taken Root in the Hearts of all the Captains and Souldiers towards Cyrus, (for we will not hereafter call him Artamenes,) it is not at all ſtrange if Madates did ſo ſuddenly kindle ſo great a Fire, out of Matter which was ſo combuſtible. The Name of Cyrus was quickly divulged throughout all the Army: for the thirty thouſand Perſians, who had it from their Commander in chief, unto whom Madates had imparted it, did preſently diſperſe it abroad. And as this great Body was moved by one Soul, every one ranged himſelf under his Colours, and deſired to be conducted unto Sinope.

The Name of Artamenes, and of Cyrus, ecchoed from Company to Company, from Regiment to Regiment, and above an Hundred Thouſand Men did in an inſtant talk, and beſtir themſelves, to relieve him whom they regarded as a God, both in times of Peace, and War. Mean while, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania's Troops, grew great in the Town, compoſed of all the Men of Quality in Sinope, and of thoſe who were not permitted to return into the Camp. The People alſo, who at the firſt did only grumble, do now take Arms, and rendezvouz into Companies in divers Quarters of the Town. Ariobantes, and Megabiſes, were within the Caſtle, where the Diſorder was greater than either in the Camp, or Town. Metrobates moved Ciaxares with all his Arguments to pronounce the laſt Sentence of Death againſt Cyrus: and Ciaxares himſelf was at the ultimate Reſolution; both of them did foreſee the dangerous Conſequences of ſo diſmal a Deſign; but Choler did ſo prepoſſeſs the Spirit of Ciaxares, that he diſguiſed his Thoughts: And the wicked Metrobates, that he might expel out of the Soul of Ciaxares all juſt Fears of an univerſal Subverſion of his Empire by the Death of Cyrus, did blow the Coals of his Fury, and quenched all ſuch Apprehenſions in him. Sir, (ſaid he unto him) the Reaſon why all theſe Kings, and Princes, are ſo hot and zealous in the behalf of Cyrus, is only, becauſe they hope that if they can get him out of Priſon, they ſhall receive a Recompence for it: but if he were once in his Grave, you ſhould ſee them in another Mind: The Fidelity of Courtiers never follows Favourites further than their Funerals; If therefore you would allay the Tumult of the People, diſſipate the Faction of Grandees, and huſh the Force of the Army, you muſt ſpeedily put both Cyrus and Artamenes to Death; and cauſe that neither of thoſe Names be any longer pronounced: It is but a requiſite Victim to appeaſe that Storm which he hath raiſed; ſince certainly Cyrus ſhall no ſooner be in a Condition, to move no further Hopes nor Fears, but the Diſorder will ceaſe, and you ſhall be King again of many Kingdoms, and enjoy your Crowns in Quietneſs. This ſo violent and unjuſt Diſcourſe wanted not a favourable Ear from Ciaxares; not but that whether he would or no, he did remember all thoſe great Services which Cyrus had done him under the Name of Artamenes, and that tender Affection which once he bore that Prince; but he was oppoſite unto all that either Juſtice or Piety could inſpire into him, and hearkened not unto any thing but Fury and Revenge. All the reſt of the Priſoners which were in ſeveral Places of the Caſtle were aſtoniſhed, when they ſaw their Guards changed, and themſelves treated worſe than ordinary: They alſo heard a very great Noiſe, which begot both Fears and Hopes in them: Marteſia never heard the Door of her Chamber open, but ſhe had Thoughts both of Death and Liberty. Chriſantes, whoſe Soul ſtood immoveable, looked upon every thing with an indifferent Eye. Fearaules never thought upon any thing but his dear Maſter. Andramias being accuſtomed to command others, did impatiently endure to be commanded: Araſpes took his Fetters patiently: Artucas without ever repenting of the Services he had done unto Cyrus, endured his Priſon without Murmur. Ortalgues, that moſt faithful Servant, found this Conſolation in his Miſery, that it was for his Illuſtrious Maſter which he ſuffered. Mean while Cyrus, ſeeing all his Hopes of Liberty like to be ſeconded by a violent Death, beſtowed all his Thoughts upon his Princeſs: and without accuſing Ciaxares, or murmuring at his Injuſtice, his only Wiſh was, That Mandana might be happy when he was dead. This Wiſh was no ſooner made, but he did almoſt recal it; for, ſaid he in himſelf, thoſe Services which I have done her, and all the Princes which I have taken, and my moſt reſpected Paſſion towards her, does merit ſome light Remembrance, and ſome Sighs from my Princeſs for me: Yes, Divine Mandana, I may without out Offence pretend unto ſo much Honour as to be lamented by you, ſince heretofore your Goodneſs afforded me ſome Tears at the News of my Death: But I ſhould be infinitely unjuſt, if I ſhould deſire that my Ruin ſhould diſturb the Tranquillity of your Life; Live then, Divine Princeſs, though I die; but do not quite blot out the Memory of too happy Artamenes, and moſt unhappy Cyrus; live in all abundant Happineſs, and let no Sadneſs ſit upon your Soul.

This paſſionate Apprehenſion dwelt not long in his Heart, without the interruption of another: Sometimes the Image of Mandana, all in Tears, did preſent it ſelf unto his Fancy, and made him find a ſad Conſolation, and ſome Sweetneſs in the horrours of his Tomb. Whilſt this illuſtrious Priſoner beſtowed all his Thoughts upon Mandana, all things were in a fearful Confuſion: Metrobates received News after News all the Night long, That all the Town was up in Arms; That the Army was upon its March towards Sinope; That the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania had muſtered a conſiderable Body of Men together; And, that there was ſmall likelihood the King ſhould find any Obedience, either from People, or Souldiers, or Officers. In this deſperate Extremity he made his laſt Endeavour to move Ciaxares, to put Cyrus to Death; and indeed, the King did fully intend it. Metrobates had ſent Orders unto Artaxes, to ſend him two Thouſand Men more, the next Night following, and to come a back-way by the Sea-ſide, where the Troops of the Army could not ſtop them; and this was the Reaſon, why the Matter was not more haſtily executed. Notwithſtanding, when he heard the great hurly-burly more and more increaſe, and receiving continual Intelligence of freſh Diſorders: And ſeeing at the break of Day the State of things, he wrought ſo upon Ciaxares, that he was upon the Point, to bid them put Cyrus to Death, when the grave Thiamis, one of the Sacrificers belonging to the Temple of Mars, who was accidentally ſhut up in the Town, came with all the Magi of Sinope, and deſired to ſpeak with Ciaxares. Metrobates would needs avert the King from hearing him; but a ſecret Apprehenſion moved Ciaxares not to follow the Counſel of this wicked Man, but would needs hearken unto Thiamis. Permiſſion then being given for him to enter, this venerable old Man, followed by abundance of the Magi, all dreſſed in ſuch Mourning-Veſtments as they were wont to wear at publick Mournings, appeared before the King both with much Reverence and Boldneſs, and looking upon him with Eyes full of Melancholy, but yet full of ſuch ſevere Majeſty as begot both Fear and Reverence, he ſpoke thus to him.

The Diſcourſe of Thiamis unto Ciaxares.

SIR, as it is our Duties to be moſt faithful Subjects unto Kings as our Maſters; ſo it is our Duty alſo, to be bold in declaring thoſe important Truths unto them, which concern the Good of their State and Perſons, when Occaſions preſent themſelves. Therefore being inſpired by the Gods, and without any fears of diſpleaſing you, I come to beſeech your Majeſty to hear me, but to hear me without Prejudication: It concerns, Sir, not only your own Glory, but the Glory of your Empire, the Safety of many Kingdoms, and indeed of all Aſia, and particularly your own ſelf; therefore I conjure you, once more to hear me favourably without interruption. I know, Sir, by the publick Voice, that Artamenes is Cyrus; that he is the ſame Prince who was uſher'd into the World by ſo many Prodigies; for whom both Heaven and Earth have interrupted the Order of all the Univerſe; the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſtately Temples have tottered; the Lights of many Candles did of themſelves extinguiſh, and miraculouſly incorporate themſelves into one Flame; the Sun it ſelf was eclipſed, and its Splendor and Heat was afterwards redoubled. All the Victims have pronounced his Grandure, and all the Stars have written it in Characters of Gold. Indeed Sir, we have obſerved ſo much of him, that we are moſt certain, the Perſon of Cyrus is extraordinary; and one whoſe Life is not to be under the Juriſdiction of any Kings upon Earth. I know very well, you will think it ſtrange that thoſe Men, who according to your Orders have offered Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods for his Death, ſhould now intercede for his Life. But Sir, give me leave to tell you, that all humane Prudence is erroneous, and oftentimes in lieu of directing does delude us: nor ought Man to be ſo preſumptious as to penetrate the Secrets of Heaven. It is true, Sir, that the Magi of Ecbatan, perceiving that the Gods intended a great Alteration in all Aſia, did think that ſome great Evil was menaced; ſo that when Intelligence was brought of the ſuppoſed Death of him, who ſhould be the Cauſe of it, they rendred Thanks unto the Gods for the Death of that Prince, who they thought would make uſe of unjuſt Courſes, to ſubvert the Throne, and would become the grand Tyrant of the World. But now at this Day, ſince we know that Artamenes is Cyrus, we do clearly perceive that we have been deceived; and that all the Signs and Prodigies did rather ſpeak infinite Good, than menace any bad Misfortunes. Give me leave to ask you, Sir, What has the moſt illuſtrious Artamenes done, ever ſince the firſt Day of his Arrival at Sinope, when I had the happineſs to ſee him in our Temple? For my part, I am certain, that this Valour has brought us more Cauſes of Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods for the Victories which he hath brought you, than any four Ages ever produced either in Cappadocia, Galatia or Media. The Gods, Sir, did not permit him to preſerve your Life, that ſhould become Maſter of his; nor is he born your Subject, but you ought to treat him as your Equal. If the famous Artamenes were not the Son of a King, but born in your own Dominions, then might you abſolutely diſpoſe of his Life and Fortune, without rendring an account unto any but the Gods for it. But he is a born Subject unto another Prince, unto whom he is Son, as well as Subject, and you ought not to uſurp that Authority, which does not belong unto you. Moreover, Sir, thoſe, ſuch eminent Perſons as he, whom the Gods have ſent to advance your Glory, ought to be ſacred in your Eſteem. When we rejoiced at the falſe News of the Death of Cyrus, we did then ſuppoſe he would prove a wicked Man, and imagined that he ſuffered Shipwrack by the permiſſion of the Gods: But now, ſince we do know him to be the moſt vertuous of Men, and the greateſt Prince upon Earth, we ought rather to worſhip him than to put him to Death. Indeed, Sir, when I conſider what he has done for you; how he hath preſerved all Cappadocia by preſerving your Life; how many Battels he hath won for you; how many Kings he hath ſubjected; what Towns he hath taken; and that the proud City of Babylon, which aſpired unto univerſal Monarchy, hath been ſubdued by his Valour; I do confeſs, I cannot underſtand by what Principles you tranſact; You, I ſay Sir, whoſe Prudence and Goodneſs we have all admired. Why was the Sun eclipſed, and afterwards appeared in far greater Splendor than before, but only to manifeſt, that when he ſhould have extinguiſhed all other Powers, his own ſhould be infinitely more great, than ever the others were? Do not tell me, that all theſe Signs did mark him out for a terrible Prince, whoſe Death was to be deſired: No, Sir, deceive not your ſelf: The Gods do uſe to give us Hopes as well as Fears, and Promiſes as well as Menaces: And if it be their intentions that Cyrus ſhould reign, they intend that it ſhall be by juſt ways. They have foretold him to be one of the greateſt Conquerors in the World, whoſe victorious Hand has planted Lawrels upon all the Rivers of Aſia: A Prince he is, who is the Love of all Nations, who ſurmounts all, either by Force or Favour; yet in the midſt of all his Victories and Conqueſts he is abſolute Maſter of his Ambition, and proſtrates all his Triumphs, and all his Glory at your Feet. So that, Sir, to accompliſh the Will of the Gods, Cyrus muſt reign by your means: Nor know I any other Interpretations of all thoſe Prodigies, but this, That you your ſelf cauſe Cyrus to Reign hereafter, by giving unto him the Princeſs Mandana, who is your ſole Heir. I do ſee that this my Diſcourſe does incenſe you, in lieu of appeaſing you; yet for all that, I am obliged to tell you from thoſe Gods whom I ſerve, and with whom I have conſulted by extraordinary Sacrifices, ſince the Impriſonment of this Prince, That if you put him to Death, you will deſtroy your Empire; you will make all your Subjects, Slaves unto your Enemies, and perhaps alſo———

As Thiamis was going on with his Diſcourſe, and as Ciaxares was incenſed with the boldneſs of his Language, they heard a great noiſe from the Court before the Caſtle.

Ariobantes, and Megabiſes, were in a Balcony over againſt it, and ſaw, that it was a great Multitude of People, and Souldiers together; who without any Diſcipline or Commanders, did demand Artamenes. This bold Attempt did move Thiamis to proceed in his diſcourſe to the King but he in his great choler rejected him, and ſeemed to be more incenſed. Ariobantes ſent Megabiſes to advertiſe the King of Phrygia that nothing could moliſie Ciaxares. Though Thiamis had been denied, yet would he not go out of the Caſtle, but ſtaid in another Chamber, hoping to meet with ſome more favourable Opportunity to be better hearkened unto. During this while Metrobates was advertiſed that the whole Army was at the Gates of the Town, and would have entrance; fain would he conceal this bad news from the King; but yet it muſt be known, and therefore he told him; who was troubled at it beyond all Imagination. He was in a Caſtle with a very few People with him; and in a revolted Town, whoſe Gates, although they were guarded by Men which were for him, yet the Town was aſſaulted by an Army of a hundred Thouſand Men without, and by a great part of the Inhabitants within: All this while he accuſed Cyrus, as the cauſe of all theſe Diſaſters, not conſidering that he was only the innocent Cauſe. But never was the like ſeen, both without, and within the Town: The Army made the Air Eccho, with the glorious Name of Artamenes, and Cyrus: the Souldiers of Metrobates had work enough: A hundred Ladders in a Place might be ſeen reared againſt the Walls, and Soldiers, covered with their Bucklers, running up them; others uſing that warlike Engine which the Ancients called Battering Rams, all ſtriving to mount the top of the Wall; ſome fell down; others more ſtrong and happy got up and beat off their Enemies, maintaining fight upon the Walls whilſt the reſt of their Companions entred the Town in that Place: As the Valour of them who ſcaled the Walls was great, ſo the Valour of them who ordered the Battering Rams was no leſs; Theſe huge Engines, which were moved by Arms that were infinitely zealous for the ſafety of Cyrus, did thump ſuch great blows againſt the Gates and Walls, that they made them ſtagger; The found of theſe Rams, whoſe Heads were of fine Copper, which is called the Gold of Corinth, was ſo terrible, that Thunder was never louder.

There were an hundred other Engines, which by Antiquity were termed Baliſtæ, and Catapultæ, and Ontgri, which ſhot whole Clouds of Arrows and Stones againſt the Walls, and into the Town: They were no calmer within the Town, than without; for all the People were ſo animated, that nothing could be more terrible. The Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, did wiſh that things would have looked with another Face; and they were extreamly vexed to be conſtrained to make uſe of ſuch a dangerous Remedy, ſince there is nothing in the World more to be avoided, than the Rebellion of the People: But that which cannot be helped, muſt be endured; and they endeavoured to qualifie this Popularity as much as they could; thinking that this ſtriking ſome Apprehenſions of fear into Ciaxares, would be enough to ſave Cyrus. Mean while the Gates of the Town were broke open, and thoſe who defended the Walls forſook them, who not knowing whither to retreat, were all killed, both by them without, and within the Town. This great Army being entered in ſeveral Places of the Town, did not ſtay to plunder, but preſently inviron'd the Caſtle. Metrobates would fain have fled if he knew how; but Guards were ſet on all Sides both by Sea and Land; That Ciaxares himſelf had no other thoughts but to die in defending himſelf, after he had firſt put Cyrus to Death. Whatſoever Thiamis and Aribbantes could ſay was vain, for the King was all fury and deſpair: Mean while, Metrobates, the vileſt Wretch upon Earth, not knowing what to do, went to the Chamber of Cyrus, and counterfeiting both Pity and Generoſity, told him, That if he would promiſe him two Things, he would ſet him at Liberty. This Prince having no mind to promiſe him any Thing, he was forc'd to expreſs himſelf, that if he would beſtow the Government of Pteria upon him for his Security, he would then kill Ciaxares, and ſhewed him ways how he could bring it to paſs. For Sir, (ſaid this villanous Man) this is the only way to prevent your Death, and to make you Lord of all

Aſia. This vicious Propoſition was ſo horrid in the Apprehenſion of Cyrus, that he thruſt Metrobates out of his Chamber; and, as good luck was, a Souldier which guarded this gallant Priſoner, heard all their Diſcourſe. This Traitor then, ſeeing no way but Ruin, thought how to make all in the Caſtle periſh with him; yet ſince he imagined that ſome accident might fall out, wherein the Perſon of Cyrus might ſtand him in ſome ſtead, therefore he was not ſo haſty to kill him. Mean while, the Noiſe and Tumult increaſed; and all that the Kings and Princes could do to reſtrain the Souldiers, was in vain: for ſince the greateſt Part of them were not Subjects unto Ciaxares, they were extreamly animated by the thirty thouſand Perſians, who would deliver their Prince: They caſt off that Reverend reſpect unto Kings, which ought to be imprinted in the Souls of Subjects, inſomuch as they were ready to act any Violence. They had already brought the Ladders unto the Caſtle; and I am verily perſwaded, they would have ſet it on fire, if they had not feared the burning of Cyrus among the reſt. The Battering Rams were brought unto the Gates, and two thouſand Men ready to make an Aſſault when the breach was made; and alſo an hundred thouſand Men more to ſecond them, when preſently a great noiſe upon the left Hand was heard, which ought to be underſtood, notwithſtanding the tumultuous confuſion of Voices, to be a noiſe of Joy. Preſently after, the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, accompanied with Perſodes, Artibies, Aduſias, Artabaſes, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Thimocrates, Philocles, and many others, did ſo ſee Hidaſpes, Thraſibulas, Aglatidas, and the faithful Orſanes, conducting Cyrus, whom they had happily delivered out of a Window, by breaking the Bars, as ſoon as ever Metrobates had left him: This Sight did produce a prodigious effect; and every one that had a Tongue, pronounced the Name of Cyrus, or Artamenes, for as yet they gave him both Names indifferently. In the mean while this generous Prince, as ſoon as he perceived the Ladders, and Rams, and all ready to aſſault the Caſtle, ſpeaking not a word of his Intentions unto his illuſtrious Friends, did upon a ſudden with his Sword in his Hand (for he had one given as ſoon as he was delivered) ſeparate himſelf from them who were about him, and went ſtraight unto the Gate of the Caſtle: ſo that Ciaxares who was then in a Balcony, to ſee what the cry of Joy ſhould be, did ſee Cyrus ſeparated from his Deliverers, and at the Gate of the Caſtle in a poſture to defend it againſt them who for his Liberty did aſſault it. This Act being ſeen unto an hundred Thouſand ſeveral Perſons, did cauſe as many Admirations in their Souls, and moved them to ſuſpend their Action. Ciaxares, who a minute before thought Cyrus to be a Priſoner, did not well know, whether what he ſaw, was true: In the mean while this generous Prince, being before the Gate, holding his Sword in one Hand, aud making Signs unto the People with the other, that he deſired to ſpeak, he did in an Inſtant cauſe as huſh'd a Silence, as before there was tumultuous Noiſe.

Do not think, my Deliverers, (ſaid he unto Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, Aglatidas, and Orſades,) that I will accept of any Liberty which ſhall be imployed againſt the King; No, no, I do not value Glory at ſo poor a rate, as to prefer my Life before it: If I did come out of Priſon, it was only, my Companions (ſaid he, looking upon the Souldiers) to come and teach you that reverend Reſpect which you owe unto your Maſter: Force me not to turn this Sword againſt you, which heretofore has rendred you victorious: Obey, obey the King's Commands, without the leaſt Contradiction: and if he demand my Head of you, you ought to give it him without Reſiſtance: Did I ever teach you (ſaid he, and doubled the Fervency of his Speech) to rebel againſt your King? Did you ever perceive by any of my Actions, that I would allow of what you have done? No, no, deceive not your ſelves, I can never be won unto an Act ſo criminal, which makes me culpable as well as you. For after all this which you have done, I am not a whit more innocent than I was before, but I rather find, that the King without any Injuſtice, may chop off that Man's Head, who hath raiſed all his Subjects againſt him: Lay down your Arms then; and if you deſire to ſerve me, cauſe all the Souldiers to return unto the Camp, and all the Inhabitants to their Houſes, whilſt I, after I have begged your Pardon from the King, will return unto my Fetters. Cyrus having ended his Speech, a great humming Noiſe was heard all over; thoſe who underſtood not what he ſaid, asked of others; and thoſe who did underſtand him, did with Admiration, cry out, and every one did abſolutely ſay, That they would die a thouſand Deaths, rather than he ſhould periſh. When he perceived that they would not obey him,he then turned towards the Caſtle,looking up to the Balcony,where Ciaxares ſtood,and ſpeaking as loud as ever he could: Command Sir, (ſaid he unto him) that they ſuffer me to come unto you, to the end I may die in defending you againſt your rebellious Subjects. Thraſibulus, Hidaſpes, and Aglatidas, who indeed feared that they would not let him enter, did range themſelves on his Side; but he looking upon them with great Turbulency of Spirit, ſaid unto them; No, my too generous Friends, come no nearer, unleſs, ſince I cannot turn the Point of my Sword againſt you, you will provoke me to turn it againſt my ſelf.

Whilſt theſe Paſſages happened in that Place, the King was in extream Agitation of Soul; for at the ſame Inſtant in which he ſaw Cyrus in that generous Poſture, a Souldier preſenting himſelf at his Feet; Sir, (ſaid he unto the King) that Illuſtrious Priſoner, whom my Companions, and my ſelf did guard, is eſcaped; But, if it be permitted me to ſay it, your Majeſty need not to be troubled at it: for he is too generous to do any harm, but it is the wicked Metrobates who you had more need to be troubled at. The King was ſo much ſurprized and troubled both at what he ſaw, and what he heard, that his Spirits were not at ſo much Liberty as to inform himſelf further, by what the Souldier deſired to ſpeak; if Thiamis, and Ariobantes, had not moved him unto a further Curioſity: But at laſt the Souldier being commanded to ſpeak on, he told the King in few Words, How he over-heard the Propoſition which Metrobates had made unto Cyrus, how he offered to kill Ciaxares upon Condition Cyrus would give him the Government of Pteria. Thiamis, and Ariobantes, took hold upon this favourable Opportunity, and aggravated the Hainouſneſs of this wicked Act: The King did yet make ſome Doubt of the Truth, but the Souldier continuing his Tale; Sir, (ſaid he) to juſtify the Truth of what I tell you, give me leave to acquaint you further, That Metrobates no ſooner knew of the Eſcape of Cyrus, but in lieu of advertiſing you, he provided for his own Safety, and as the Ladders by which Cyrus was delivered, did remain ſtill at the Window, he made uſe of them, that way to go out of the Caſtle, having carried along with him a Party of my Fellow-Souldiers: for my part, I ſhould have come to advertiſe you of this horrid Motion, as ſoon as I heard it if I had then the Power to have done it; but being ingaged upon my Duty, in the outer Chamber of Cyrus, when Metrobates came thither, I could not get out, until after his Eſcape. The King was extreamly troubled at this Relation, yet not altogether believing it, he ſent into all Places of the Caſtle to ſeek for Metrobates, and to ſee whether they who delivered Cyrus had not killed him: But he knew that Cyrus had been delivered without any Reſiſtance; he knew alſo that Metrobates went the ſecond time to the Chamber of Cyrus, and perhaps with an Intention to kill him, though he had no orders for it, and when he found him eſcaped, it ſeems he eſcaped himſelf, in the ſame way as the Souldier related. Now Sir, (replied Thiamis) I hope you will no longer reſiſt both Heaven and Earth: Do you not now ſufficiently ſee the Innocency of Cyrus, through the Crime of Metrobates? I know very well (anſwered Ciaxares) that Cyrus is generous, but I cannot yet ſo clearly diſcover his Innocency. As ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, Marteſia, Chriſantes, Feralus, Araſpes, Artucas, and Ortalgues, did all of them enter: for ſuch a Fear had ſeized upon the Souldiers, ſince Metrobates, who placed them there, was eſcaped, that they looked after their Priſoners no longer. Ciaxares being much ſurprized at the Sight, and not knowing whether his Perſon was ſafe amongſt ſo many People whom he had hardly uſed, did yet manifeſt his Confidence; and asked all about him very angerly, Whether or no he was King, ſince they were ſo bold as to fail in their due reſpects unto him? The Princeſs MANDANA, unto CYRUS.

Since it is your Deſire I ſhould write my ultimate Reſolution unto you: I ſhall repeat that which I have already ſpoken unto you; which in Sum is this, That all the Obligations whereby I am bound unto you, and all the Services which you have rendred unto the King my Father, ſhall never move me to recede from the exact and rigorous Rules of Vertue: I do know very well, that you did never deſire any thing from me to the contrary: Therefore you ought not to be ſurprized, if I again tell you, That if you do not find out ſome Expedients, and Ways to make the King my Father acquainted, who you are, and procure his Conſent within the time prefixed, you muſt return into Perſia, and never ſee me more: This is the total Sum of all I can, or ought to do.

MANDANA.

The King having read the Letter, and ſeeing Cyrus oppoſe his own Friends, and command the Souldiers to lay down their Arms: Let him live (ſaid he,) let the happy Cyrus live, whoſe own Vertues has more induced my Soul to ſave him, then an Hundred Thouſand Men could do. It is your Office, Grave Thiamis, (ſaid he) to pronounce the ſame unto the Souldiers; and it is yours Ariobantes, to give out all neceſſary Orders for the Safety of the Caſtle. Oh Sir (cried out Chriſantes, Feraulas, and all the reſt who were in the Chamber,) as long as Cyrus lives, your Majeſty need not to fear any thing. Mean while, Thiamis deſiring to execute the King's Order with all Speed, and not to give him any time to repent of ſo gracious a Sentence, went down unto the Gate of the Caſtle, followed by all the Magi which waited upon him. As ſoon as the Gates were opened, Cyrus came up, and endeavoured to enter, and forbid Entrance unto any elſe; All his Deliverers and Partakers did advance, all the Captains and Souldiers cried out, that he ſhould not enter, and made a terrible Noiſe: But when the Gates of the Caſtle were wide open, and none but the Magi and Sacrificers appeared, the Tumult ceaſed; every one kept his Station, and Silence to hear what Thiamis would ſay unto them. Cyrus then ſaluted the Magi with much Reverence, holding down his Sword, and looking upon him with as little Diſmayedneſs as if his Life were not at all in Danger; Is it from you, Grave Thiamis, (ſaid he unto him) that I ought to re-aſſume my Fetters? No Sir (anſwered he) the Miniſters of the Gods do not uſe to abaſe themſelves ſo low, as to execute the Injuſtice of Men. But generous Prince, I come to proclaim that Liberty which the King hath granted unto you*:* The Flight of Metrobates hath cleared his Soul from all Doubts, and the Gods, unto whom you are moſt precious, have by your own Victories freed you from that Danger which ſeemed to be inevitable. Come then, Sir, and triumph, come and receive that Tenderneſs of Soul which the King keeps for you. Cyrus then making moſt low Reverence unto Thiamis, Doubtleſs it is your pious Prayers (ſaid he unto him) rather then any Vertue in me, which hath wrought this happy Change in the King. But grave Thiamis, Does the King eſteem me as a juſtified Man, or as a Criminal, whom he pardons? You ſhall know that from his own Mouth, replied Thiamis. This grave Magi had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Cyrus turning himſelf towards his illuſtrious Friends, did intreat them to let him enter alone; but he could not hear their Anſwer; for this good News having in a Moment paſſed from Mouth to Mouth, nothing could be heard but Shouts of Joy. Yet certain Miſtruſts did remain in many Minds, and they could not be ſatisfied with any thing*:* Some would have Hoſtages before he entred; others asked whether Thiamis, whoſe Wiſdom and Integrity was known unto all the World, would anſwer for him? Inſomuch, as hearing himſelf named by ſo many Voices, and different Men; No, no, (ſaid this ſage Sacrificer unto them, as loud as he could ſpeak) fear nothing, but truſt me with the Perſon of Cyrus: It is my Office to conduct Victims unto the Feet of Altars, not into the Hands of Executioners. I uſe to appeaſe the Gods by Sacrifices, not but I do not uſe to execute Vengeance upon Men*:* Let your Obedience (ſaid he unto them) teſtify that your Zeal is grounded upon good Principles; and in lieu of ſerving, do not prejudice your moſt Illuſtrious General. Mean while, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Perſodes, Thraſibulus, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Hidaſpes, Artabaſes, Thimocrates, Philocles, Leontidas, Megabiſes, Aglatidas, Orſanes, and many others came near, and deſired that they might follow Cyrus into the Caſtle; but Thiamis told them, it would better accommodate the Buſineſs, if ſome part of them only, did enter in with him, and the other part remain without, to keep the Souldiers and People within the Limits of their Duties: leſt ſome Panique Fears, ſhould freſhly incenſe them, and leſt they ſhould imagine Cyrus is ill uſed; and moreover it would be much more requiſite they ſhould endeavour to take Metrobates, who was yet out of the Caſtle. After this Conteſt, Cyrus entred; the King of Phrygia, Hidaſpes, Artabaſes, Aduſius, Thraſibulus, and Aglatidas, only following him, the King of Hircania, and all the reſt remain without, to take all requiſite Courſes to prevent any new Commotion. In the mean while, Thiamis was no ſooner gone towards the King, but this Prince was entred into his Cloſet, whither he ſent for Chriſantes and Marteſia only.

Theſe two Perſons had both of them ſo much Spirit and Diſcretion, and had told Ciaxares ſo much, that they made his Soul deſirous to hear the Juſtification of Cyrus with Delight; for ſince neither his Truth nor his Paſſion was not any longer to be concealed as a Secret, it was much more eaſy for them than before, to make his Innocence appear: Chriſantes did then with all Ingenuity confeſs, of what Nature that Intelligence was which Cyrus held with the King of Aſſyria, and cauſed him ſo well to underſtand, that it was no criminous Correſpondence, as that the King would ſigh for Sorrow, conſidering into what a bad Condition this ſuppoſed Crime had brought him. Marteſia, for her part, did juſtify her Miſtreſs ſo handſomly, and did ſo ſincerely and briefly relate all the Paſſages, that Ciaxares himſelf found no Cauſe of Complaint: There was nothing but that Picture which was found in the Cabinet of Cyrus, which moved him to conceive it to be too much for a Princeſs of ſo great a Vertue, as Mandana profeſſed: for although Marteſia had told him it was made for the Princeſs of Pteria, yet there was no Proof of it; but as good Fortune was, Marteſia did bethink her ſelf of a paſſage which would clear the Buſineſs. Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) Ariobantes, who as you know was Brother unto the Princeſs of Pteria, for whom that Picture was made, is able to witneſs that I tell you no Lie; he may perhaps know it, if your Majeſty ſhew it unto him; for I do remember he was with the Princeſs the ſame day it was finiſhed, and that the Princeſs his Siſter falling ſick the next day after, ſent Ariobantes unto the Princeſs for it: But the Picture-drawer being deſirous to take it with him, that he might do ſomething unto the Dreſs, ſhe could not receive that Satisfaction ſhe deſired: So that the ſame Princeſs died, and, as I told your Majeſty, never received it. As ſoon as Marteſia had told this, Ariobantes entred, who gave the King an Account of thoſe Orders he had given for the Guard of the Caſtle. Ciaxares then fetching out the Cabinet of Cyrus, which he always kept in his Cloſet, ever ſince the wicked Metrobates brought it unto him; he took out the Picture of Mandana, and ſhewing it unto Ariobantes, asked him, Whether ever he had ſeen it before? Yes, Sir, (anſwered he, after he had a while looked upon it) doubtleſs I have ſeen it, and that more than once, for I ſaw it when the Princeſs out of her Goodneſs was pleaſed to let it be taken for my Siſter; and I ſaw it afterwards, when it was carried unto Marteſia, a few days before the Princeſs was carried away by the King of Aſſyria: I remember alſo, how I perſwaded her to keep that which was intended for my Siſter. O, Sir, (cried out Marteſia) this is ſufficient to juſtify the Princeſs, ſince your Majeſty knows ſhe never ſaw Cyrus ſince that time; and therefore could not give him this Picture. Thus was the State of Things, when Thiamis came and told the King, he had brought Cyrus unto him; who, to appear with more ſubmiſſion before Ciaxares, had left his Sword with Feraulas in the outer Chamber, where he did imbrace him, and Andrameas, Artucas, and Araſpes, deſiring their Pardons for thoſe Inconveniences which they had ſuffered for the love of him. Ciaxares then, at that time calling to mind how much he was indebted unto Cyrus, under the Notion of Artamenes, and what Artamenes had done in his preſence under the Name of Cyrus, he calmed his Mind, and commanded him to enter. Marteſia would have gone out of the King's Cloſet; but Ciaxares ſtaying her, No Marteſia, ſaid he unto her, you muſt have your ſhare in the Pacification, as you have had in the War. Preſently after, the King of Phrygia entered, who would have ſpoke ſomething by way of excuſe unto the King.

Preſently after, the King of Phrygia entered, who would have ſpoke ſomething by way of excuſe unto the King.

But Ciaxares taking him by the Hand, Speak not of any Excuſes, ſaid he unto him, ſince it is my part rather to make Excuſes for not believing you, than yours for not obeying me.

The Grave Thiamis followed the King of Phrygia, and preſented Cyrus unto Ciaxares. This Prince did ſo much reverence the Father of Mandana, that he would have thrown himſelf at his Feet, as if he had been Criminal; yet the King would not ſuffer him, but lifted him up, and imbraced him moſt tenderly; asking him, Whether Cyrus could forget all the Injuries which had been done unto Artamenes? Artamenes, replied he, ſhall never forget your Benefits, nor ever will he ſuffer Cyrus to be ungrateful. But, Sir, I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, give me leave to anſwer directly, without diſguiſing the leaſt part of Truth, unto every Queſtion that ſhall be asked me: and that you will be pleaſed to honour me ſo far as to tell me, Whether there do yet remain any Grounds of Suſpicion, or Fears of my Fidelity in you? and if it appear that I ever failed in that Duty which I owe you, if I cannot give ſatisfaction by my Reaſons, I ſhall be more ready to ſubmit unto ſuch Puniſhments as you ſhall ordain. For, Sir, what Thoughts ſoever they have infuſed into you concerning Cyrus, I can moſt certainly aſſure you, that he ſhall ever be moſt ſubmiſſive unto your Will, inſomuch as there is not the meaneſt of your Subjects whom you may of right command, but my own natural Inclination, gives you the ſame Supremacy over me: Now, Sir, you ſee what are all the moſt real Thoughts of him whom they ſay is the Ruiner of all Aſia; of that grand Uſurper, who muſt ſubvert Kingdoms, uſurp Crowns, and reign by unjuſt Courſes. You may very well imagine, Sir, that the ſame Prince who conceals himſelf from 30000 of his Father's Subjects which were in your Army, had no very ambitious Deſigns; eſpecially, ſince for fear to offend you, he reſolved to loſe his Life, before ever he would diſcloſe his Quality. Enough, enough, (ſaid Ciaxares, with Tears in his Eyes, and embracing him again) juſtify your ſelf no further, for the more you endeavour it, the more you prejudice me, and the greater culpable ſhall I appear: It were more for my Glory if you appeared leſs Innocent. I am in Fault enough, replied Cyrus moſt modeſtly, ſince I was ſo unfortunate as to diſpleaſe you, and to be the innocent Cauſe of Rebellion in your Subjects: I beſeech you, Sir, (added Cyrus in a moſt reſpectful manner) to charg me only with their Crime, and puniſh my Perſon for it. No, no, replied the King very ſweetly, the very ſight of Cyrus has renewed ſo much tender Affection in my Soul, that I cannot think of any puniſhing, but rather I will recompence them all in your Perſon for preventing me from committing ſuch an horrid piece of Injuſtice, whereby I ſhould have deprived all Aſia of her greateſt Glory, and principal Ornament: Therefore to reduce the Souldiers and People unto their Duty, reaſſume your Charge, command them to return unto the Camp, and prepare them and your ſelf alſo to go very ſhortly into Armenia, to deliver Mandana from her Captivity. O, Sir, replied Cyrus, I deſire not ſo much, it is enough that you give me leave to obey, and not command: Permit me only ſo much liberty, as to fight in the firſt Rank in the firſt Battel, and I ask no more. I do not know any (anſwered the King of Phrygia) that dare preſume to be your General, and there is none who thinks it not an Honour that you ſhould be his. The Gods (ſaid Thiamis, interrupting them) being ſole Authors of all the Happineſs which befals us, it is requiſite to render thanks unto them to morrow by a ſolemn Sacrifice. Moſt true, grave Father, ſaid the King unto him, therefore it is expedient that Cyrus do cauſe the Troops to go out of Sinope, to the end we may offer the Sacrifice with more tranquillity.

Cyrus then obeying Ciaxares, after he had made an hundred Proteſtations of inviolable Fidelity, went out to give all requiſite Orders concerning the Buſineſs. The King of Phrygia, and Ariobantes ſtaid ſtill with Ciaxares to keep his Mind in the ſame Reſentments. Marteſia asked leave from the King to go back unto the Houſe of Artucas, as ſoon as the Troops were retired, which he conſented unto, thinking that place fitter for her, than the Court, where now there were no Women. Mean while Thiamis waited upon Cyrus to the Caſtle-Gate, where after many imbracings he left him, and went to take order for the Sacrificers. The Souldiers no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but they began their Acclamations and Shouts of Joy, not doubting now but that his Peace was perfectly made; yet notwithſtanding, he behaved himſelf with ſo much moderation, as was admirable; telling all thoſe who came about him, that the King was ſo gracious as to Pardon them; therefore ſaid he unto them, it is your Duties to extol his Goodneſs: and reſolve with your ſelves to become Worthy of it, by your Gallant Deportments in the Armenian War, whither very ſhortly he will ſend you. Mean while, the King of Hircania, and all the Princes which ſtaid without the Town, ſaluted him, and great Joy was expreſſed on all ſides; afterwards, having aſſembled all the chief Commanders, he gave Command to carry the Army out of the Town immediately, and to leave none in the Town but only ſo many as uſually were in it. Preſently after, the King ſent Orders to change the Guards of the Caſtle: as for thoſe at the Port of Sinope, they all periſhed when the Town was entred; ſo that reſtoring Andramias unto his Charge, they drew off the Souldiers which Metrobates had placed in the Caſtle, the Number whereof was not great, becauſe many had eſcaped with him. Cyrus commanded him to be ſearched for very narrowly, but all in vain. This Prince went in Perſon to the principal Port of the Town, to ſee the Army paſs; ſo that ſeeing all the Regiments one after another, he might more conveniently command them unto their Duties: And becauſe he was beloved, and feared, and reverenced by all the Souldiers, they obeyed him without the leaſt murmur, and returned as joyful as if they had won a Battel, and as well content as if they had been loaded with Plunder. Within three hours, the Town was quiet, and the whole Army without the Walls, excepting thoſe Companies neceſſary for the Guard of the Ports and Caſtle, whither he returned to render an Account unto Ciaxares of what was done. The King of Hircania, and all they who had not ſeen the King ſince all theſe Adventures, were preſented unto him by Abiobantes; and the Night cauſing every one to take leave; Cyrus, by Orders from Ciaxares was lodged in his old Chamber, where he was no ſooner entred, but every one came to teſtify their Joy for his Liberty: But after all Complements had paſſed, and none but Chriſantes, and Feraulas with him, he imbraced them with extream Affection: Well, my dear Friends, ſaid he unto them, Do you think we have now made our Peace with Fate? or is this ſerene Calm which we now begin to enjoy, only a breathing to give us more leiſure in preparing our ſelves for new Misfortunes? The Gods (replied Chriſantes) have made trial of your Vertue by ſo many ſeveral Ways, that it is a Piece of great Difficulty to foreſee what ought to enſue hereafter.

But now, Sir, (ſaid Feraulas) you are at Liberty, you are alſo known to be Cyrus; Ciaxares knows it; nor is he ignorant of your Love to the Princeſs; and the Princeſs her ſelf eſteems you. It is true, (replied Cyrus ſighing) but yet the Princeſs is in Armenia, and in the Power of the Rival. Yes, Sir, replied Feraulas, but it is ſuch a Rival, whoſe Ambition Fortune has ſo croſt, that it cannot poſſibly be thought ſhe will favour him with any part of her Affection. With ſuch Diſcourſe as this, Chriſantes, and Feraulas, entertained their dear Maſter, until he was in Bed: yet he was no ſooner laid, but all the prodigious Revolutions of his Fate came into his Memory. The Image of Mandana appeared in his Fancy, and entertained him until after Midnight; Sleep was no ſooner cloſing up his Eyes, but his Imaginations being filled with his Princeſs, awaked him. The next day, in the morning Ciaxares ſent him his Cabinet, within which he had put the Magnificent Scarf of Mandana very carefully, but he found not the Picture of the Princeſs in it; becauſe the King had ſent it back unto Marteſia, who was returned to Artucas, as before I told you: his murmur at it was only in ſecret; and he went unto the King, who prepared himſelf for the Temple of Mars, where the grave Thiamis attended him. But that he might make it evident unto the People, that he was really reconciled unto Cyrus, he walked through the Town talking unto him: The whole Town did ring joyful Acclamations, to ſee the moſt Illuſtrious of Men at Liberty: All the Kings and Princes which were at that Court, did wait upon this Ceremony; and the preſs was ſo great between the Town, and the Temple of Mars, that there remained none in Sinope, but only thoſe who guarded the Ports. As the King lighted from Horſe, (for they did ride thither) within ten or twelve Paces of the Temple-Gate, Cyrus, who was next him, obſerved four or five Men, whoſe Faces ſeemed odd, and were unknown unto him, who endeavoured to come nearer. Although he had not any Reaſon at all to ſuſpect, or fear any thing; yet notwithſtanding, as if he were inſpired by Heaven unto it, he fixed his looks upon one of theſe Men, who had a very bad promiſing Phiſiognomy; preſently after he perceived two of theſe Men, pull out Daggers; the one deſigning to ſtab Ciaxares, and the other advanced towards him, with the ſame Intentions. The moſt generous Cyrus did immediately interpoſe between the King and the Aſſaſſinate, and received that Blow upon his left Hand which was aimed at Ciaxares: whilſt with his right Hand, he forced the Dagger out of that Hand which ſtrook with it, and laid him dead at his Feet: there were eight or ten others who abetted theſe two who undertook to kill the King and Cyrus, and who ſeeing the Deſign fail, did make their eſcape, during the Amazement which every one was in at the Adventure: but Cyrus drawing his Sword, did ſo purſue theſe Conſpirators, through the midſt of this great croud of Men, and aſſaulted them ſo furiouſly, that moſt of them periſhed by his own Hand: for after he had in a minute put the King into the Temple, and committed him to the Cuſtody of the King of Phrygia, and many others; he purſued the Aſſaſſinates cloſe unto the Sea-ſide, whither they fled, and where a Fiſher's Boat did wait upon them, that thereby they might eſcape away. Although there was a World of People about Ciaxares, yet the thing was ſo ſudden, and ſo few ſaw the firſt Paſſage, that it was a long while before it was known what the matter was: and certainly had not Cyrus interpoſed, Ciaxares had been killed, and perhaps the Aſſaſſinates eſcaped.

But Cyrus, being aided principally by Feraulas and Araſpes, purſued them, and killed them, and took one of them after they had well wounded him; who, rather than he would be taken, would have thrown himſelf into the Sea, when Cyrus catched him by the Hair; No, no, Traytor, ſaid he unto him, I muſt firſt know who you are, and upon what ſcore you have made this Attempt. He had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but for all the diſguiſe of his Habit, and Face, and though he was all over ſmeered with Blood, yet he knew him to be Metrobates, who endeavoured all he poſſibly could, either to eſcape, or kill himſelf, or elſe throw himſelf into the Sea: But ſeveral of the King's Guard being come in, Cyrus did put him into their Cuſtody, and commanding them to follow with him, he went unto Ciaxares, who was at the Houſe of Thiamis which joins unto the Temple: As ſoon as Cyrus appeared, the King did cloſely embrace him; and this being the ſecond time he did owe his Life unto him, he did acknowledg it a hundred times over, and expreſſed as many teſtimonies of Repentance for what he had done againſt him. Sir, (ſaid he unto him, and cauſing that Traitor whom he had taken to be brought nearer) I give the Gods moſt hearty Thanks, that they have ſhewed you the difference betwixt Metrobates, and my ſelf: No ſooner had the King heard that Name, and looked upon him, but he knew him: Oh thou Villain, (ſaid he unto him,) is it thou that makes ſuch Attempts upon my Life, as well as upon the Life of Cyrus? for the King did perceive the Intentions of thoſe two Men who would have killed them: Yes, it was I, (anſwered the Traitor moſt furiouſly) who not enduring to commit unprofitable Crimes, intended to commit two, which would ſomething advantage me. From whom, wicked Wretch, (replied the King) didſt thou expect a Recompence for ſuch an Act? From ſo many Kings and Princes (replied he) as Artamenes by his good Fortune has ſubjected unto you, who by this my Act would have been no longer Tributaries. The King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania did then begin to ſpeak, and ſay, That he ought to ſpeak more particularly concerning this wicked Action: But he, without further preſſing, and conceiving no hopes of Life, although he ſhould eſcape of his Wounds, told them, That they need look for no other Author of the Conſpiracy than himſelf; and as for his Complices, they were all of them Dead. He confeſſed further, that ſeeing himſelf ruined, when Cyrus went out of Priſon, he himſelf went out alſo; That ſince his Principles was only Ambition, he conceived all his Fortunes utterly undone, ſince Cyrus was at Liberty: and that he thought he ſhould receive a large Recompence from the King of Aſſyria, if he had at once took away the Life of him who poſſeſſed his Dominions, and the Life of him who had conquered him, and contended with him for the Princeſs Mandana. Metrobates confeſſed this, with ſo much inſolent ingenuity, that the Truth of it was not at all ſuſpected. As for thoſe who aſſiſted him, they were all of them known to be the ſame Souldiers which went out of the Caſtle with him, and which he had brought from Pteria. The King, being not able to endure the ſight of ſuch a Villain any longer, who had attempted both againſt his own Life, as well as againſt the Life of Cyrus, commanded him to Priſon, until ſome ſevere Puniſhment for ſuch Crimes were better reſolved upon; but that needed not, for he died in the Hands of the Chyrurgions, and ſaved himſelf thereby, from a more tormenting Death. Mean while the Sacrifice became a Sacrifice of real Thanks unto the Gods; and Ciaxares renewed the tenderneſs of his Affection towards Cyrus; and to augment it, if it were poſſible, ſo that his Mind enjoyed abundance of Tranquillity.

The Grave Thiamis, who from the firſt day that he ſaw Cyrus, under the Notion of Artamenes, and had ever moſt dearly loved him, did make an excellent Oration, full of ſtrong Arguments, to confirm Ciaxares in his good Opinion of him: I ſhould abſolutely have loſt my Reaſon (ſaid the King unto him) if I ſhould be ungrateful unto that Man, who hath hazarded his own Life to ſave mine, after my Intentions of putting him to Death: For grave Thiamis (ſaid he unto him) this moſt generous Prince was contented to receive that Blow upon his left Hand, which was intended at my Heart, and to interpoſe his own Body between the Aſſaſſinate and mine. No, no, added he, never fear, but that I ſhall as long as I live, look upon Cyrus as my Protector and Preſerver, and as a Prince whom indeed the Gods have ſent unto me, for my Glory and Felicity. Theſe were the apprehenſions of Ciaxares, when he retired himſelf, ever deſiring to have Cyrus near him. This Action being divulged, not only unto all the People of Sinope, but the Camp alſo; Applauds and Acclamations of Joy were redoubled, and Artamenes was never ſo precious to the Soul of Ciaxares as now Cyrus is; ſo that within the compaſs of three days the King's Soul, and all the Hearts both in Court, Camp, and Town, were full of Joy. Ciaxares would needs ſend unto Perſia to the King his Brother, and Queen his Siſter, to let them know that Cyrus was alive. He then remembred, how at the Birth of Mandana, the Queen did ſend to rejoyce with him for it, and he out of a piece of Gallantry, ſent back this Complement, That he wiſhed his Daughter might hereafter become worthy to be the Miſtreſs of Cyrus: and he gave Madates, whom he ſent thither to preſent the ſame Complement this ſecond time, unto his Siſter. Cyrus alſo deſired the King to give him leave to ſend one of his own Servants, and he pitched upon Arabaces for it, whom Chriſantes did ſend a Letter by, or rather a Hiſtory of the wonderful Life of his dear Maſter, alſo excuſing his long Silence: and telling that there was an unreſiſtible Fatality in it, which prevented him from doing any otherwiſe. After this there was nothing that diſturbed the Mind of Ciaxares, but the Abſence of the Princeſs; yet ſince he relied ſo much upon the Valour of Cyrus, his Care of her was moderated by his Hopes, and his Soul did reſt in great Security: In the mean time, ſince it would be a long time before the Army could march into Armenia, and ſince Cyrus had ſo great a deſire to know preciſely where the Princeſs was, he moved Ciaxares to ſend Araſpes diſguiſed into Armenia, to diſcover where thoſe Women, of whom Megabiſes ſpoke when he returned out of that Country, were placed: for ſince Araſpes was very well verſed in the Armenian Language, he was the fitteſt for that Imployment. Ciaxares then approving of the Motion, diſpatched Araſpes thither with Orders to find out the King, who doubtleſs would ere long be upon the Frontiers: Cyrus, the better to move him with all his Ingenuity, to diſcover where Mandane was, did not only give him all neceſſary Inſtructions, but an hundred good Admonitions beſides; inſomuch, as tho Araſpes had been of the dulleſt Capacity, as indeed he was nimble, yet Cyrus did preſcribe ſuch exact Orders unto him, that he doubted not of a happy Expedition: and as Araſpes uſed to be very familiar with Cyrus, ſo he could not chuſe but tell him, that if Megabiſes had been as well inſtructed by Ciaxares as he was by him, doubtleſs he would have rendered a better account of his Embaſſy, and brought back more Certainty of the place where the Princeſs was, than he did. I do underſtand you very well (replied Cyrus, both embracing him and ſighing) I do confeſs, Araſpes, I have ſpoken too much, when I conſider your Ingenuity; but methinks I have ſpoke too little unto you, when I apprehend how much this Voyage concerns me. If you ever were in Love (purſued he) you will doubtleſs excuſe me for being ſo importunate with you to uſe your beſt Endeavours; but I ſee you are an inſenſible Man, who may perhaps be one day captivated by ſome Beauty or other, who will puniſh you for the Railery you are pleaſed to uſe to your Friends. After this Cyrus embraced him again, and could not forbear Repetitions of what he had already told him. And as ſoon as this faithful Spy was gone, Cyrus knowing that the King was buſie with the King of Phrygia, went unto Marteſia, with whom he deſired to diſcourſe privately, concerning his deareſt Princeſs: As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him come into her Chamber, ſhe would have thanked him for the Honour he did her, but he would not permit her: No, no, (ſaid he unto her) my ſweet Marteſia, you have now no reaſon to complement with me, the Viſit concerns my own Intereſt, and therefore regains no Thanks; and I take ſo much Delight in your Company, that you are not at all obliged unto me for it. Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him in a low Voice, altho there was none but the Daughter of Artucas in the Chamber who addreſſed her ſelf to Feraulas as ſoon as Cyrus entred) I do very well underſtand your moſt obliging Diſcourſe, and to teſtify that I do rightly underſtand it, I will no longer deprive you of that Delight which you take in talking of the Princeſs; and I will ask you, Whether you believe ſhe would grieve for your Impriſonment, and rejoyce at your Liberty if ſhe were here? I dare not believe it Marteſia (replied this Prince with an amorous ſigh and bluſhing) indeed I dare not, leſt I ſhould deceive my ſelf; and unleſs your Goodneſs can diſſipate my Fears, and teſtify the weakneſs of my Hopes, I do not know, either what to think or believe.

Marteſia then preſenting a Chair unto him, and taking another for her ſelf; and the Daughter of Artucas, called Ermice, being gone unto the Window, diſcourſing with Feraulas: Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, I cannot think, but knowing as you do, the Greatneſs of the Princeſs's Spirit, and alſo your own Merit, and many Obligations whereby you have obliged her unto you, that you can poſſibly doubt, but ſhe will be very ſorry for your Impriſonment, and very glad for your Enlargement. Why may I not doubt it (replied Cyrus) ſince you are pleaſed to be ſo inhuman, as that you will not ſo much as lend me the Picture of Mandana? Have I not reaſon to think, cruel Woman as you are, that you do but deal with me according to the Reſentments of our moſt incomparable Miſtreſs? for if you had not known that ſhe conceives only a poor common bare eſteem of me, could you have endured to ſee me a Priſoner, a moſt unfortunate Man; abſent from her I moſt adored, and deprived of all Conſolations, and denied me that Picture which would have been a Cordial in all my Sorrows, and an Antidote againſt any Miſeries? Confeſs the Truth, Marteſia, Was not your Cruelty in that Buſineſs only an Effect of thoſe ſecret Thoughts, which you knew to be in the Heart of our Divine Princeſs? You are ſo very ingenuous to perſecute your ſelf, replied Marteſia, that I do not well know whether I ought or can undeceive you. Yet notwithſtanding, Sir, ſince I muſt needs be ſincere with you, I ſhall ingenuouſly tell you, that all the Cruelty wherewith you charge me, proceeds from my ſelf, and the Princeſs has no part in it: Not but that (and queſtionleſs you would conceive it ſo) ſhe would not take it well, that I ſhould give you that Picture which ſhe gave unto me: yet for all that her Thoughts are diſadvantagious unto you, although ſhe be a little ſevere, ſhe was a lover of Vertue and Glory before ſhe was acquainted with you; and you muſt not think it ſtrange if ſhe continue ſo ſtill. Yet Marteſia (replied Cyprus) would ſhe have been leſs vertuous if you had given me that Picture? No, Sir, replied ſhe, but I had been leſs reaſonable: Well, Marteſia (ſaid he) be more inhuman unto me, than Fortune is unto a King from whom ſhe hath taken away his Crown: for ſhe, notwithſtanding, does allow him the ſight of that Princeſs whom he loves, and has her in his Power: Cruel Woman! muſt the King of Pontus every minute look upon the real Subſtance of Divine Mandana, and do you deny Cyrus the ſight of her Picture? You have again, Marteſia, diſcovered thoſe ſecret Reſentments which are in the Heart of our Princeſs, and are diſadvantagious unto me. Sir (anſwered ſhe, ſmiling) you had ſome reaſon to tell me, that I ought you no Thanks for this Honour you have done me in coming to ſee me, ſince I ſee you came with a deſign to quarrel with me: You may make Conditions of Peace when you pleaſe, ſaid he unto her, and indeed it is but doing what formerly you have done: Lend me that Picture of Mandana unto that day I ſhall deliver her, for I know the King hath reſtored it unto you. Sir (ſaid ſhe unto him) you are very urgent; but, do you not conſider what Misfortune this Picture was like to have cauſed? Do you not conſider (ſaid he unto her) how much Joy it will be unto my Soul? I know it very well (ſaid ſhe unto him) by that Joy which this Picture does uſually afford my ſelf: Ah Marteſia, ſaith he, you comprehend it but imperfectly, if you judg of my Thoughts by yours. Why, Sir, replied ſhe, Do you think I do not love the Princeſs, as much as my Capacity of loving is able? Yes, Marteſia, replied he, I do believe you love her with all imaginable Affection; and I do think Feraulas loves me with the like Affection; but certainly he knows how to love one who you know, more perfectly than he ought to love Cyrus. You are very good (ſaid ſhe unto him, bluſhing) in permitting Feraulas to love any one more than your ſelf. But indeed I am not ſo indulgent; and what reſpect ſoever I bare unto you, I cannot yield that you ſhould love the Princeſs better than I do: But for all that, I do conceive it fit to make my Peace with you; and therefore to compoſe all Differences, I will lend you her Picture unto the day you depart for Armenia; and putting her Hand into her Pocket, ſhe produced it, and gave it unto him. Cyrus was raviſhed with Joy, and received it with as much Reverence as if Mandana were preſent, he kiſſed it, and pleaſed Marteſia ſo well, that ſhe repented not of her Complacency in lending it.

After this, Cyrus having had no Conference with her ever ſince his departure from Themiſcira, asked her an hundred ſeveral Queſtions; he deſired her to relate every thing concerning the taking away of the Princeſs by Philidaſpes; after what manner ſhe was carried unto the City of Opis; how ſhe was entertained at Babylon; in what ſort ſhe lived there; how the King of Aſſyria treated her; how ſhe behaved her ſelf towards Mazares; how they came out of Babylon to come unto Sinope; which way Mazares got her away, under colour of ſetting her at Liberty; and laſtly, how ſhe fell into the Hands of the King of Pontus after he had loſt his Kingdoms. Marteſia did fully ſatisfy his Curioſity, but yet ſhe would not mention that favourable Oracle which the King of Aſſyria received at Babylon, leſt ſuch an averſe Story ſhould too much vex him: ſo that he thought himſelf ſometimes moſt perfectly happy: For when Marteſia did mention with what conſtant Reſolution Mandana had repulſed the Paſſions of three great Princes, and all of them moſt compleat Men, he was wrap'd in unexpreſſible Joy; and endeavouring to make her ſpeak of more Paſſages which were in his Advantage. But yet (ſaid he unto Marteſia, and looking as earneſtly upon her as if he would penetrate into the bottom of her Heart, and know every Truth in it) this noble Fury with which the Divine

Mandana reſiſted all my Rivals, was doubtleſs only an Effect of her Vertue; and the miſerable Artamenes, and unfortunate Cyrus, was not any cauſe of it at all. Would you have me be ſo complacential (replied Marteſia angerly) as not to contradict you? I deſire to know (ſaid he) the pure and perfect Truth, upon condition it drive me not into deſpair. No, Sir, replied ſhe, I ſhall not drive you into deſpair, when I ſhall tell you (tho I had it not from the Mouth of the Princeſs) that I ſee no reaſon ſhe had ſo obſtinately to reject the King of Aſſyria's Affection, unleſs the illuſtrious Artamenes had his entrance into her Heart. But, ſaid he unto her, being full of Joy, certainly the Princeſs did not ſpeak as much, theſe are but your own Conjectures upon which you ground theſe Thoughts, and intend to flatter me: But however Marteſia, I do not murmur againſt Mandana, I have received more Honours from her than I can deſerve: and altho ſhe ſhould treat me courſly, and puniſh me for my raſh Boldneſs, doubtleſs I ſhould not complain. After this manner did Cyrus and Marteſia diſcourſe, as oft as he could; having now only three things to do. The one was to go into the Camp, and give out all requiſite Orders for the Armenian War. The other to preſent all imaginable Humilty unto Ciaxares. And the laſt, to go and viſit Marteſia: ſuppoſing it to be a kind of ſeeing his Princeſs, to ſee her whom ſhe loved and eſteemed ſo much. Indeed, Marteſia was a Lady who was excellent in all things; ſhe was Owner of all good Qualities; her Beauty was none of thoſe who do Planet-ſtrike at the firſt ſight; but it was ſuch as the more one conſidered it, the more freſh Charms they found in it; for ſhe had an excellent Spirit, and a ſolid Mind; exceedingly complacential and diſcreet, and the more one knew her, the better one liked her: Feraulas was not the only Man who courted her; for during the time ſhe was conſtrained to remain at Sinope, all the Court did viſit her; all the Ladies of the Town were obſervant of her; and all the Princes, obſerving with what Civility Cyrus did treat her, came daily unto her, and were much delighted in her Company, for indeed it was ever very pleaſant:

her Ingenuity was not only natural, but much adorn'd with Art, underſtanding moſt of the Languages in all Europe and Aſia. Amongſt the reſt of her Viſitants, Thraſibulus, and all thoſe illuſtrious Grecians of the Army, to wit, Thimocrates, Philocles and Leontidas, were often with her: The Prince Artibies was he who was moſt frequent with her, inſomuch as the Company was full of ſweet Diverſions, being compoſed of Perſons exceedingly pleaſant. One day among the reſt, as Marteſia and Ervnice her Couſin were alone together, the Prince Artibies, accompanied with Thimocrates, Philocles and Leontidas coming to ſee her, the Company queſtionleſs was very delightful, ſince certainly the Grecians of that time were of a much more delicate and refined Spirit than other Nations. Artibies, tho he was a Sicilian, yet he was a moſt compleat Prince, and altho he ſeemed to be very melancholick, yet was very ſociable. Thimocrates had Nature for his Friend, who adorned him with all the advantages of Body, that ſhe could contrive in one of his Sex; he had alſo a quick and nimble Wit, which rendred him moſt pleaſant unto Company. Philocles was not leſs exact and compleat in all things, and the Complacency of his Humour was extreamly charming. Leontidas was exceeding tall and handſom; the Compoſure of his Face was noble, his Phiſiognomy had I know not what kind of furious, ſweet and melancholy Compoſition, ſuch as did not at all diſpleaſe; and altho there was ſome kind of Diſcord in his Humours, and a Phantaſticalneſs in his Mind, yet was he exceedingly pleaſant.

Theſe four being altogether with Marteſia, and the Love of Cyrus being now no ſecret, that was the ſubject of their Diſcourſe; and after they had diſcanted upon the moſt conſiderable Paſſages thereof, or at leaſt, which were in their knowledg, every one began to complain of his Misfortunes according to his own Apprehenſions: For my part, ſaid Thimocrates, that which I think to be moſt lamented in him, is, that he has been almoſt always abſent from her he loves; for as long as ſhe was in Cappadocia, the Bithynian War did abſent him; and after his return unto Themiſcira, he never ſaw the Princeſs whom he loved. This queſtionleſs is a great Misfortune (replied Philocles) but yet ſince he lives in ſome hopes to be beloved, his abſence is not without ſome Conſolation; and he has yet had no Experience of that which in Love is more rigorous. Altho he has had no Experience of it, neither by Abſence, nor the hate of the Princeſs whom he loves, yet doubtleſs he was apprehenſive of it, when he believed her to be dead, as once he did: when I do imagine in what horrid frights he was, when he feared to find his Princeſs reduced into Aſhes by the Conflagration of Sinope; and when I fancy him, hearing from the Mouth of Mazares in the Fiſhers Cabin, how his Divine Princeſs periſhed.

I do confeſs my Compaſſion of him is extream; and I do conceive, that all the Delights which he can hereafter enjoy, cannot equal thoſe Torments which he then endured. It is moſt certain (ſaid Leontidas, who had not yet ſpoken) that Abſence is a very great Affliction: not to be beloved is an angry Fate; and the Death of the Party beloved is doubtleſs a very ſad piece of Mourning: But yet for all this, if the illuſtrious Cyrus was never jealous (as I could never hear he was) then does he owe Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods of Love, for preventing him from that Torment, which exceeds all others a thouſand degrees. But, Leontidas, replied Martesia, do you conceive Jealouſie to be a greater Ill than the Death of the Party loved? Ah Leontidas, ſaid ſhe, think well what you ſay: I have ſufficiently thought upon it, replied he, and I do feelingly ſpeak concerning a Paſſion which I have been too well acquainted with. For my part (ſaid Erenice) I do conceive Jealouſie to be a very great Evil; and do not think it ſtrange that Leontidas ſhould rank it among the greateſt Puniſhments of Love: but that Thimocrates ſhould ſpeak Abſence to be the moſt rigid thing in the World, I do conceive that his Soul is a little too nice and delicate. That Man muſt be moſt inſenſible (replied he) which does not find Abſence to comprehend in it ſelf all other Horrors. That only is his ſhare, who was never beloved, replied Philocles; for, if I may ſo phraſe it, he heaps up all the Evils of Love into one; and he who has had no Experience of this, is ignorant of the ſupream Misfortune. That is a Misfortune, added Thimocrates, wherewith a generous Man will not be long tormented, ſince there is nothing in the World more juſt, natural, and reaſonable than to ceaſe from them that love us not. He who laments for the Death of his Miſtreſs, replied Philocles, if he be wiſe, has moſt reaſon to comfort up himſelf, ſince there is no poſſibility to find a Remedy for his Misfortune: he who is abſent, may find out ſome Comfort from his hopes of return; and he who is jealous, may cure himſelf, either by his knowledg of the Vertue of her he loves, or elſe by his own Merit, or elſe by deſpiſing her. You are not well acquainted with Jealouſie, anſwered Leontidas very fiercely, ſince you imagine it can be cured by ſapient Reaſons; for it perverts all the Reaſons under the Sun, and puts the whole order of Nature out of tune: Other Misfortunes whereof we diſcourſe, have this advantage, that they ſeem no greater than they are; but Jealouſie is of ſuch a capricious, phantaſtical, malignant Nature, that it magnifies all Objects, like unto thoſe falſe magnifying Glaſſes invented by ſome Mathematicans. It does not only make one ſenſible of real Evils, but only of thoſe which are meerly imaginary; it cauſes one to ſuffer in that for which there is no ground at all. I do confeſs, ſaid Martiſia then, that Leontidas has deſcribed Jealouſie unto us, in ſuch an ingenious manner, that I doubt not but if ever he was in love, this Paſſion has not much tormented him. To ſpeak the truth unto you, replied he, I tell my Tale out of my own ſad Experience; and therefore I may the better be believed, when I do maintain that Jealouſie is the moſt horrid Torment that can be endured. If that Authority, replied Thimocratis, be ſufficient to juſtify, that Abſence comprehends all the Evils which Love can afflict, I ought to be believed as well as you; ſince the better part of my Life has been droopingly conſumed in Abſence from her I love. Upon the ſame reaſon, replied Artibius, I muſt not yield unto either, ſince I do but too ſadly know, that the Death of her one loves is the end of all Joys, and an Epitome of all Sorrows. Altho it be but a piece of Folly, ſaid Philocles, to publiſh unto the World, that one could never be loved; yet I am conſtrained to acknowledg that out of my own Experience I have found this Theſis true; as it is the greateſt Felicity in Love to be beloved, ſo by the Rules of Contraries, it is the greateſt Miſery not to be beloved by her one loves. For my part, ſaid Marteſia, I wonder at nothing more, than that each of you ſhould ſo opinionatively maintain his Thoughts; for indeed it is a difficult thing not to think worſe of ones own Misfortune than of anothers; and every one is apt to be partial in his own Cauſe, and therefore I do not think any of you to be competent Judges upon ſo nice a Queſtion; altho I know you all to be Men of much Wiſdom and Ingenuity. Then muſt you be Judge, replied Thimocrates, for I am certain you are accompliſhed with all neceſſary Qualities for the Office, ſince you are of a clear Apprehenſion, and not intereſted at all in any of theſe things. It is true, replied ſhe, but yet I never had any Experience; yet notwithſtanding, I do confeſs, ſaid ſhe, (and looked upon them all) that you have raiſed ſo great a Curioſity in me to know all your Adventures, that if I durſt, I would accept of that Offer which Thimocrates hath made unto me; and therefore I beſeech you all to relate them. For my part, ſaid Artibies, I have nothing to do but to lament and be lamented, and therefore I ſhall be ready to give you ſatisfaction in few words, and afterwards my Reaſons to ſtrengthen my Cauſe. An abſent Lover, replied Thimocrates ſighing, who uſes to engrave his Misfortunes upon the Bark of Trees, and to ſpeak unto the Rocks, rather than not ſpeak at all, refuſeth not to tell you his Diſcontents. For my part, ſaid Philocles, I was never ſo happy as to procure a favourable Ear from any that I loved, but I ſhall hope to find ſome ſweetneſs from another whom I do infinitely eſteem. There is none then but the jealous Leontidas (ſaid Marteſia, turning towards him) who will not ſatisfie my Curioſity. No, Madam, ſaid he, I will not be any Obſtacle unto your Satisfaction; for I am not ſo ſparing of my Words and Secrets, as I am jealous of my Miſtreſs. But ſweet Marteſia, after you have heard the recital of our Adventures, and our Reaſons upon them, you muſt pronounce a ſoveraign Sentence, which is the moſt unfortunate; he who is almoſt always abſent from her he loves; or he who is not loved at all; or he whoſe Miſtreſs is dead; or he who is plunged deeply in Jealouſie; to the end, that he who is moſt miſerable, may have ſo much Conſolation as to be lamented more than the reſt, and that your Pity and Compaſſion be his Prize for the Pains he hath taken in relating his Misfortunes and Reaſons. At the hazard of doing Juſtice through Ignorance, anſwered Marteſia, I do accept of the Honour to be your Judg, upon condition that Ernice, my dear Couſin, will aſſiſt me in giving Sentence. No, anſwered that pleaſant Lady, I will not ſhare with you in your Title, but will reſerve unto my ſelf the Liberty to lament him the moſt, who perhaps you will pity the leaſt. As they were thus in diſcourſe, Cyrus, accompanied only with Aglatidas, entred; and ſince he heard them in the outer Chamber ſpeak with much heat: If there be any Conteſt amongſt you, ſaid he (addreſſing himſelf unto Marteſia) you know that your ſide ſhall ever be mine. You honour me too much (anſwered ſhe); but, Sir, you muſt know that I am ſo far from quarrelling with theſe gallant Men, that they have conſtituted me their Judg; and ſince I ſhall but diſhonour my Office, I beſeech you to undertake it, and to decide a famous Difference, which is riſen between the Prince Artibies, Thimocrates, Philocles and Leontidas. Heavens preſerve me, replied Cyrus, from entertaining any Thoughts ſo unjuſt, as to diſpoſſeſs you from an Imployment ſo honourable; and I ſhould rather take you for my own Judg, if I had any Difference, than take the Office from you. After this Complement, as he was the moſt civil Prince upon Earth, and ſtood in need of the Valour of all theſe Commanders, to deliver Mandana, ſo at this time, to gain their Hearts the more, he doubled his Complacency towards them, conceiving that the more he commended them, the more couragiouſly they would fight for his Princeſs. He demanded them in moſt ſweet and pleaſant terms, what might be the cauſe of their Conteſt, and having in a few words told it unto him; be Judg, Sir, ſaid ſhe, whether I was in the right in thinking you a better Judg in ſuch a caſe than my ſelf. I ſhould be over partial, replied he, and ſighed; and queſtionleſs, your unintereſted Reaſon would judg with more Equity than I ſhould with all my Experience. Afterwards ſince this buſineſs did indeed ſympathize with his own Inclination, he was pleaſed to beſtow an Afternoon in ſuch a Diverſion as was very ſutable unto his own Fortune, having no other buſineſs of conſequence to do that day; for he had been at the Camp in the Morning, and he had already been with the King, and diſpatched all buſineſs to Ecbatan. After then he had placed Marteſia conveniently to hear every one that ſpoke, and ſitting himſelf by her, alſo all the reſt ſeating themſelves in order: It was his pleaſure, that Thimocrates ſhould begin, and addreſs his Speech unto Marteſia as his Judg, altho ſhe did oppoſe it, after a while of ſilence, during which time Cyrus asked Marteſia in a low voice, Whether ſhe did not pity that Man, who ſuffered all the Miſeries which theſe four Lovers did complain againſt? Thimocrates began his Story thus:

The Hiſtories of unfortunate Lovers.

BEfore I begin to relate my particular Misfortune, I do conceive it requiſite to conjure you, that you become not partially biaſſed by the elegant Diſcourſes of thoſe who deny the Condition which I aſſume, in being the moſt unfortunate Lover in the World; for I very well perceive, that they being leſs unfortunate than my ſelf, have more freedom of Spirit than I have, and therefore can better relate their Stories. He who is not loved, will doubtleſs dreſs himſelf in the moſt amiable Language, and will not omit any thing which may perſwade you to Compaſſion; he who laments for the Death of his Miſtreſs, deſiring to move Pity, uſeth all his Eloquence to perſwade unto it. The jealous Leontidas will be ſure to magnify all his imaginary Sufferings with his Rhetorick, ſince he is poſſeſſed with a Paſſion that is accuſtomed to make the leaſt things that can be imagined, ſeem great ones.

Marteſia ſeeing Thimocrates expect her Anſwer, did aſſure him, that ſhe would not be ſo much convinced by words as ſhe would be by Realities and Reaſons; therefore, ſaid ſhe unto him, Do not you rely too much upon your own Eloquence, in ſeeming to fear it in others; and ſo ſhe commanding him to begin his Story: he obeyed, and began thus.

The abſent Lover. The firſt Hiſtory.

THat Abſence whereof I complain, and which I do maintain, does comprehend all the Miſeries which Love can cauſe, is ſo great Puniſhment unto one who exactly knows the newneſs of the Paſſion, as I am not afraid to ſay, that he who can be abſent from her he loves without extream Sorrow, did never receive any great Joy in the Perſon he loved, and does not deſerve to wear the noble Title of a Lover; I ſay again, the noble Title of a Lover, ſince it is moſt certain that he is not capable of that Heroick Imbecility, which hath moved many illuſtrious Perſons,who are ſometimes ſurprized with it, to act ſuch great Attempts as it hath done. Amongſt all thoſe who did ever reſent this kind of Miſery, whereof I now ſpeak, certainly I am the Man, who hath had moſt rigid Experience of it, ſince Love did only ſhew me that amiable Perſon whom I adore, to make me more ſenſibly apprehend her abſence, with all the cruel Conſequences that are imaginable: Therefore I do not doubt, but at the end of my ſtory I ſhall obtain the prize of Compaſſion, and my impartial Judg will ſentence me to be the moſt unhappy of all theſe who contend for this mournful Title.

Since I came into Aſia, commanding the Regiments of the King of Cyprus, and ſent hither by the Prince Philoxipus; perhaps you are yet ignorant how I was not born within that Kingdom. Give me leave therefore to acquaint you that Delphos, ſo famous throughout the World for the magnificent Temple of Apollo, and for the Sanctity of the Oracles, is the place of my Birth; and I muſt needs tell you, that I am deſcended from an illuſtrious Race, ſince I am branched from him whom the Gods thought worthy ſo many Ages ſince, to conduct unto the foot of Mount Parnaſſus, near the Caſtalian Fountain, there to receive the firſt Oracle which was diſpenſed; whoſe Daughter afterwards was choſen to be the prime Pithian, who pronounced ſo many important Verities unto ſo many private Perſons, Towns, Provinces, Republiques, and Kings. Since that time thoſe of my Familiy have ever held the prime Rank in their Country; and moſt commonly the famous Council of Greece, which we termed the Aſſembly of Amphictions, was never held but ſome of my Race were elected in it: I being therefore of a conſiderable Extraction, and the Son of one whoſe Vertue was above his Quality; I was educated with all indulgent Care. And tho it may be ſaid, that the Town of Delphos is an Epitome of the World, by reaſon of that huge multitude of all Nations, which reſort thither, and therefore it was not neceſſary for the Inhabitants to travel, for their further Inſtruction in foreign Cuſtoms, yet my indulgent Father would needs ſend me as a Student unto Athens, and afterwards to remain at Corinth until I was twenty Years of Age; and I did practiſe in both thoſe famous places, all the Arts which one of my Quality could require, as well in all the Exerciſes of the Body, as in the Ornaments of the Mind, and Knowledg of the liberal Arts; ſo that when I received Orders to return unto Delphos, it might be ſaid, that I was a Stranger in my own Country, ſince certainly I knew no body, yet did I know the Names of all the prime Houſes of Quality in the Town, and I remembred alſo ſome old Men and Women; but as for the young Men of my own Rank, or any of the ſpringing Beauties, I had no acquaintance at all amongſt them. Thus came I then unto Delphos, eſteeming Athens and Corinth as my Country, where notwithwithſtanding I lived without any private Engagement, although I had ſeen many rare Beauties in both Places. As I came into Delphos, I underſtood, that my Father having ſome important Buſineſs, was gone unto Anticires, and at his Departure had left Order that I ſhould follow him as ſoon as I arrived. The firſt Night, I was viſited by very many, but amongſt others, one of my Couſins named Meleſander, ſuited beſt with my Diſpoſition: and truly he was a Youth full of Spirit, and Goodneſs, whoſe agreeable Humour, was great delight unto me in my Melancholy; as he did infinitely pleaſe me, ſo I had the good Fortune not to diſpleaſe him; and we did preſently contract ſuch an Amity, as Death only could diſſolve. After our firſt Civilities, I acquainted him with the Orders which I received not to ſtay any longer at Delphos, but to go unto Anticires: but he told me that I muſt needs defer my Departure for one Day longer, for there was a very ſtately Ceremony to be performed the next Day, and I muſt needs ſee it. I enquired what it was; he told me that there were Embaſſadors in Delphos from Cræſus, King of Lidia, who came to conſult with the Oracle, and who had brought with them ſuch magnificent Offerings, as were the richeſt in all Aſia. Since theſe Offerings muſt remain in the Temple (ſaid I unto him) I ſhall ſee them at my return. It is true, replied he, but you cannot ſee in one Day all the Beauties in the Town aſſembled, as they will be to morrow at the Temple, nor can you ever ſee a Ceremony ſo great as this; For they do not uſe to receive private Offerings in ſuch ſtate as they will do the Offerings of Kings. As for the Ceremonies, ſaid I unto him, ſmiling, I can eaſily diſpenſe with them. But ſince you aſſure me, I ſhall ſee all the Beauty of Delphos at once, I will take your Counſel, and not depart until the next Day.

Meleſander and I, parted upon theſe Terms: the next Morning he came betimes, and ſince I was a Stranger, undertook to ſhew me all the Ceremony, and get ſuch a Place where we might ſee all. How indifferent ſoever I ſeemed to be concerning theſe Feaſts, yet I obſerved them with much delight: I went as others did, to ſee the Treaſures of the Temple, which were ſhewed unto the Ambaſſadors of Cræſus, before they brought their Offerings: I admired, as well as they, at a moſt magnificent Chain of Pearl, which once they ſay, the famous Helen was owner of: and at another alſo which called Eriphile Miſtreſs: I ſaw there that ſtately Throne of Gold, which the Grandfather of the King of Phrygia did beſtow, and the ſix great Diſhes which Giges ſent thither, which weighed thirty Talents; alſo ſeveral Statues given by ſeveral Princes: The Sheaves of Gold which they of Smirna and Apollonia offered; two Tuns of Maſſie Gold which were of curious Workmanſhip, and would contain an hundred Gallons of Water, being made uſe of at a Feaſt, which we call Theophanies: I ſaw afterwards (amongſt ſuch a mighty Maſs of Wealth, which I cannot exactly deſcribe, and which were given by all the Repubiques of Greece) Obeliſques of a miraculous Manufacture, given by Rhodophes that famous Lady, with whom the Brother of prudent Sapho was in love; who to make it appear, ſhe was in Egypt, where ſhe lived a great part of her Life, ſhe gave thoſe wonderful Piramids, which are talked of throughout the World. After I had well obſerved all theſe Rarities, and a thouſand others, which I ſhall forbear to ſpeak of; every one went to take his Place, and the Ceremony of the Sacrifice did begin: Thoſe who were to conſult with the Oracle, did come unto the foot of Parnaſſus, which is juſt over againſt the Temple, where they did purifie themſelves at that famous Caſtalian Fountain; from thence they went into the Temple of the Muſes, which is built upon that River, which runs into that of Apollo, and where the Pithian, being under a glorious Canopy, and upon a ſtately Throne; ſhe receives the demands of them who came to conſult with the Gods: after which, ſhe retires behind the ſacred Curtain, where being inſpired by the Gods, ſhe delivers the Oracles unto them who enquire of her. Give me leave, alſo to tell you, beſides the rich offerings of Cræſus, I ſaw the Statue of a Woman of a great ſtature, all of moſt pure Gold, and moſt admirable Workmanſhip: a Lamp alſo of engraved Gold, as rich as is imaginable. But notwithſtanding all theſe Wonders, after the Company began to ſettle themſelves, I left off regarding them, but turned my Head towards the Gate of the Temple, to obſerve all the Ladies which entred, and ask Meleſander their Names : yet becauſe the croud was very great, I could not diſcern them all, and many paſſed by which I could not diſcover ; but I ſaw many Beauties enter, which I looked upon with a very indifferent Eye, and ſerene Mind, without any Penetration of heart : yet when the Ceremony was ended, the better to view all the Ladies, Meleſander and I went cloſe to the Gate, to ſpeak with Two or Three of his Friends ; and I ſaw one come from behind the Pillars of Marble, which ſuſtains the Arch of the Temple, whom doubtleſs thoſe Pillars had obſcured from my Sight as long as the Ceremony laſted ; ſhe was a Beauty ſo admirably fair, that I was dazled at the ſparkle of her Eyes, and magick of her Complection : I no ſooner ſpied her, but without further hearkning unto what they talked, I pulled Meleſander by the Arm, and without taking my Eyes off that wonderful Object which had enchanted them, Meleſander, ſaid I unto him, ſhewing her, Tell me the Name of yonder Miracle : Her name is Teleſile, replied he, whoſe Name is as famous for the Charms of her Wit, and pleaſantneſs of her Humour, as it is for the excellency of her Beauty. At the Name of Teleſile, thoſe who were with us interrupted our Diſcourſe, and looking upon her as ſhe paſſed by us, we congyed unto her, and followed her, that we might the longer ſee her : ſince ſhe was well acquainted with Meleſander, and much eſteemed him, ſhe gave him a Salute with ſuch a pleaſing Smile, and ſo obliging an Air, that as her Beauty did ſeem greater in my Fancy, ſo alſo did my Admiration ; and I perceived ſuch an unquiet Joy in my Heart, and ſuch an interior Tumult in my Soul, that I knew not what I did ; and to excuſe my imbecility at that time, I was forced to tell them, that very few Hearts were ever aſſaulted with ſuch beautiful and powerful Arms as theſe which wounded mine. Teleſile was about ſeventeen years of Age ; her Stature was tall and ſtately ; her Garb was delightful ; her Action was free, and natural; her Hair was the pureſt black that ever Eye beheld: her Complexion was ſo lively Fair, that it was not to be look'd on but with Imagination of Snow and Vermilion, Lillies and Roſes mixed together; for Nature had adorned her Face with her pureſt Colours, adding unto theſe her ſprightly and ſparkling Eyes, mixt with ingenious Sweetneſs, an admirable Mouth, fair Teeth, and white Neck, ſuch as did infinitely captivate my Heart.

But alas, I had no ſooner viewed the faireſt Teleſile, but I could not view her any more; for ſhe went preſently out of the Temple; and the next Day, I went out of Delphos ſo that I was no ſooner in Love but I was Abſent. As we went out of the Temple, and had loſt the Sight of her, becauſe her Houſe was very near it, Meleſander and I going to Dine together, and his Friends having left us alone; Meleſander, (ſaid I unto him) if you be not in love with Teleſile, I muſt needs conclude you are either in Love with ſome other, or elſe you are not capable of loving any thing, for I think it impoſſible, that any Heart which is not either prepoſſeſſed or inſenſible, can reſiſt ſuch an admirable Beauty as hers. If Thimocrates (anſwered he, and ſmiled) did not fall in love at Athens or Corinth, I believe he preſently will at Delphos, and I do heartily thank the Gods, that I ſhall not be his Rival, if he chance to fix upon Teleſile, as I do find ſome likelihood that he will: I do not yet know, ſaid I unto him, whether or no I ſhall love her: but I am ſure I do already infinitely admire her. That is a good degree unto Love, replied he unto me; But yet Thimocrates (added this officious Friend, aſſuming a more ſerious countenance) do not render your ſelf a Captive without ſome reſiſtance, ſince there are many difficulties in the Conqueſt of Teleſile. I will reſiſt, ſaid I unto him, by flying away, for you know I intend to be gone to Morrow; but yet I beſeech you what may thoſe difficulties be in the Conqueſt of her? Is it poſſible that a Lady whoſe Eyes ſparkle ſo much ſweetneſs, ſhould be more ſecure than other Ladies? Teleſile (ſaid he unto me) has hitherto been very indifferent unto all the Courtſhips which any have rendered her; but that is not the Reaſon why I ſpeak of ſuch Difficulties in her Conqueſt, for the merit of Thimocrates might win more upon that ſcore than any other could; but there is ſomething more capricious on her Fortune than ſo: be pleaſed to know then, (ſaid he, ſeeing me to expect his farther Relation) that Teleſile is of a very good Houſe, ſince ſhe is Daughter unto Diophantes, which name you know, and who perhaps is very Poor, and perhaps alſo very Rich. Unleſs you interpret this Riddle, ſaid I unto him, I cannot underſtand it. You will eaſily underſtand it, replied he, when I ſhall tell you that Diophantes, the Father of Teleſile, is very Poor, becauſe he ruined himſelf in the Boetian Wars, and therefore Thimocrates, Teleſile will be alſo very Poor, although ſhe be the only Daughter of her Father, it being moſt certain that although that Houſe do yet ſubſiſt, yet it is abſolutely ruined. I perceive, ſaid I unto him, that Teleſile is very Poor, but I do not ſee how ſhe can be Rich. You will underſtand both, replied he, when I ſhall inform you, how ſhe hath an Uncle,called Crantor, who is very old, and never Married: he is the richeſt Man, not only in Delphos, but throughout all Phocides, unto whom ſhe ſhall be Heir, if he do not dote and marry, or diſpoſe of his Eſtate unto ſome other, as by the Law he may: ſo that ſince Crantor is an old humorous and covetous Man, and will ſettle his Eſtate upon his Niece or any elſe, but doth profeſs much Affection unto her by his Diſcourſe, Teleſile remains between both Hopes and Fears to be either the richeſt or the pooreſt Lady of her Quality. This incertainty is the Reaſon why her Father does not think upon her Marriage, not yet knowing what the deſtiny of his Daughter will be. That which beſt pleaſeth thoſe who are in love (ſaid I unto him) is, that Crantor cannot diſinherit her of her Beauty. 'Tis true, (ſaid he unto me) for ſhe has many Lovers who do look upon the Treaſure of the Uncle, as well as the ſtar-like Eyes of the Neice, ſo that never any had a larger Catalogue of Servants than ſhe: for ſhe is courted, not only by ſuch as her Beauty has captivated, but alſo by all the rich and covetous, and all the ambitious poor ones that are in Delphos; ſome of them not over engaging themſelves, but ſtaying to ſee what Cranter will do; and others do ſtrive to marry her, poor as ſhe is, and will put all their Hopes of the future to hazard; yet either by reaſon of Teleſiles indifferency, or Diophantus his prudence, all her Lovers are-kept at a diſtance, and hope well. See Thimocrates the fate of this fair One, with whom I do adviſe you, not to engage your ſelf inconſiderately. I gave Meleſander thanks for his Counſel, and entring into other Diſcourſe, we dined, and pleaſantly paſſed away the reſt of the Day together: yet do what I could, it was impoſſible to drive the Beauty which I had ſeen out of my Imagination; nor could I forbear diſcourſe concerning her, although I did reſolve it: When we did meet any one of quality in the Streets; there goes a greedy Lover of Teleſile (ſaid I unto Meleſander,) and when I looked upon any Lady, I could not chuſe but ſay, ſhe was not half ſo fair as Teleſile, and named her above a Thouſand times in a Day, before I ever though upon it. Mean while the Morning came, and I muſt go unto Anticira: and although this Place had a Reputatio to recover Reaſon in them that had loſt it; yet it deprived me of mine, I was then ſome ten or twelve Day with my Father, for Love had not yet imprinted the beauty of Teleſile ſo deeply in my Heart, but that I coul endure this abſence; yet would it not ſuffer me to be lon from her: Notwithſtanding, although I can ſay that Sorrow did not much ſeiſe upon me during this Journey, ye I am certain that I found little Joy in returning to Delph where I had yet no acquaintance but with Meleſander: bu to tell you truly, my Heart held greater intelligence wit Teleſile than I was aware of. And certainly there was ſom Sympathetical Power in it, which in a minute did forc me to love her, whom I loved all my Life. I perceive it at my entrance into Delphos; for meeting a Coach fu of Ladies as they were going into the Country, as ſeeme by their Equipage, I looked preciſely into it. But Heavens, what pleaſing trouble did I find in my So when I ſaw Teleſile in it, a thouſand Times more fair than ſhe ſeemed before when I ſaw her in the Temple the Coach went ſoftly by reaſon of ſome ſtop in the wa which of it ſelf was very narrow. ſo that I had leiſure to obſerve her with more Attention than I did at the firſt time, for ſhe had not pulled down her Hood; but alas, I my ſelf did draw a Curtain between me and her Beauty. After I did ſalute her with a very low Congy, I looked upon her ſo earneſtly, and perhaps ſo impudently, that ſhe bluſhed, and pulled down her Hood, as if the Sun had troubled her.

As ſoon as I was in the Town, I went unto Meleſander, and told him that Fortune had as great a Care of my Preſervation as he had; for to guard me from the inchanting Charms of Teleſile, ſhe was gone out of Delphos as I came in. You have better Intelligence of her Actions, (ſaid he unto me, ſmiling) than ſome of her Lovers, that are of more ancient Acquaintance than you are; for ſhe did undertake a little Journey unto one of my Couſins, and I thought that none could yet have known it: but ſo it is, (ſaid I unto him) that I do know of it, for I did ſee her depart; though I do not think that I am yet in love with her, (ſaid I laughing, though I ſpoke it ſeriouſly) yet am I very glad to underſtand her Journey is but ſhort, and will not be long before ſhe return. It will not be above four Days, ſaid he, during which time I muſt ſhew you all the Rarities in Delphos, in hopes if it be poſſible to find an Antidote in the Eyes of ſome other Beauty, againſt the Charms of Teleſile. I did laugh at the pleaſant Invention of Meleſander, and conſented to do as he would have me; and during thoſe four Days, he carried me unto all the Beauties. But the Truth is, his Deſign took no effect; nor ſerved to other Purpoſe, but to let me ſee that there was none in Delphos who came within a Thouſand Degrees of Teleſile. Mean while, this fair One returned from the Country; and her Return did give freſh Invitations of viſit unto all her Friends: Meleſander went to her, and whether he would or no I went with him; though he told me a hundred times that he was unwilling to contribute unto the Loſs of my Liberty: but in Concluſion, my Prayers prevailed with him, and he preſented me unto the Mother of Teleſile, who treated me very civilly; and afterwards, I was preſented unto Teleſile her ſelf, in whom I found ten Thouſand alluring Charms more than I could have imagined, although I fancied her Idea in my Mind, as fair as Fancy could imagine; I ſaw that ſhe was moſt ſweet and civil, moſt modeſt and gallant, and of a moſt pleaſing Spirit indeed; amongſt a thouſand Perfections I found not one Fault: But that which pleaſed above all, was, that amongſt ſo many Servants as courted her, I could not obſerve ſhe favoured any, and by Conſequence engaged me the more; and notwithſtanding her ſweet Diſpoſition, ſhe had ſuch a kind of noble Pride in her Soul, as made her to triumph over all Hearts without Vanity; and ſhe made abſolute Conqueſts of all that ſaw her, without contributing any of her Endeavours to do it. As Love was reſolved upon my Deſtruction, ſo it moved her, that Day to give me ſome Hopes to thrive in my new-begun Paſſion; for, as I told her, that my Intentions were to wait upon her the firſt Day I came to Delphos. You have been a long while (ſaid ſhe) in executing thoſe Intentions, which were a great Honour unto me ſince; If I miſtake not, you were here that Day the King of Lidea offered his Preſents in the Temple; and, if my Memory betray me not, I ſaw you there with Melander; and I did then look upon you as a Stranger, whoſe Name I much deſired to know; and indeed (ſaid ſhe moſt obligingly) I did enquire it of one of my Friends, but could not be ſatisfied. This Diſcourſe, which was only civil, and might have paſſed for Diſcourſe-ſake between two Strangers, had ſuch an Influence upon me, that I conceived it to be a happy Omen. Afterwards I told her for my Juſtification, that I had ſince been at Anticira, and returned not until that Day ſhe went out of Delphos; and that then I did my ſelf the Honour to ſalute her near the Gates of the Town: ſhe then ſeemed as if ſhe did not mind it, becauſe we could not acknowledg it, without taking notice how earneſtly I looked upon her; but afterwards, ſhe was ſo good as to confeſs that it was ſo. This innocent Paſſage cauſed her to bluſh, and from thence I grounded freſh Hopes unto my ſelf. I parted from her as ſtrongly fettered in the Chains of Love as ever Man was, and fully reſolved to dedicate my ſelf unto her Service.

I never endeavoured, as others uſe, to reſiſt my Paſſion; but on the contrary, I cheared up my Soul in the Humour as much as I could. I did imagin, that happily I might chance to be the fortunate Man, for whom her Soul was moſt ſenſible: For, ſaid I, ſince all the Men in Delphos do find their Courtſhips fruitleſs, I may more certainly conclude, that ſhe has not yet met with ſuch a Man as ſhe can fancy. If I do conſider her as rich, it will the ſooner advance my Deſign, becauſe my Father will not then oppoſe it: if I do conſider her as poor, I ſhall be the more eaſily happy, for then her Father will not refuſe the Motion; indeed I did fancy a Facility out of every thing, and ſo much feared leſt my Reaſon ſhould contradict my Paſſion, as that I did never conſult with it at all. I deſired to keep it as a Secret, from Meleſander, but it could not be; the Flame which the fair Eyes of Teleſile had kindled in my Heart, was too great and ardent not to appear in mine, and I expreſſed too many Signs of my Affection, to conceal it, or keep it from being diſcovered; he could not motion any Divertiſement wherein I could take any Pleaſure. Walks were but muſing unto me; Muſick made me only ſigh my ſelf into a dampiſh Study; the Sight of all the Ladies in the Town, moved me no more than a Stone. The Sight of Teleſile only was my Delectable Object, and did with *I*ntereſt recompence me for the Loſs of all other Delights; I was ſo tranſported with Joy, when I ſaw her but one ſingle Minute, that Meleſander ſaw plainly I was in Love, as well as by my Muſings and Melancholy. *I*t was very requiſite therefore to acknowledg it unto him; and to deſire him that he would not oppoſe me in ſuch a thing as could not be remedied, but that he would aſſiſt me in my Deſign: I told him this, after ſuch a manner, as he might well know, his Counſels took no Effect, and therefore, he did moſt willingly promiſe me his Help. Then I went ſeveral times unto Teleſile, and the ofter I went, more Charms and greater Civilities I found. This new Conqueſt which ſhe had made upon my Heart, was quickly divulged throughout the Town, eſpecially unto both our Fathers, who were neither of them diſpleaſed at it; for the Belief which my Father had, that ſhe would be very Rich, was glad in Hopes of ſuch a Fortune, as might repair the Profuſions of his Youth; for truly, his Magnificence, and Liberality had much engaged it. And Diophantes for his part, fearing leſt his Daughter ſhould become poor, was not ſorry that ſuch a Man as I was in love with her: But he carried the Matter ſo cunningly, that he ſeemed not to take any notice of it; and he was ſo well acquainted with the Vertue of his Daughter, that he did not fear ſhe would too far engage her ſelf, though ſhe was courted by a Multitude of Men. But amongſt the Number of her Servants, there was one who was exceeding rich, and indeed much above me; though he was not of any conſiderable Family, yet was he very aſſiduous and violent in his Paſſion: This Man was called Androclides, and had a Siſter who did often viſit Teleſile; and lodging near Crantor, was ſometimes viſited again, ſo that Androclides had a very great Advantage of me; for his Siſter did not only ſolicite Teleſile, but her Uncle alſo: This was a very conſiderable Circumſtance for him, who had as amorous an Eye upon the Riches of Crantor, as upon the Beauty of Teleſile. For my part, it was the Riches of her own Self which I ſought after; and preferred one Sight of Her before all the Treaſures upon Earth. My endeavours to move her Heart, were only by letting her ſee how much mine ſuffered; for indeed a few Days after, I endured as much Torment as a Man in Love could poſſibly do; ſo that I ſaw her no more; and was ſo far from any Hopes, as I abſolutely deſpaired. If I conſidered her as Rich, then I thought Androclides would obtain the Approbation of Diophantes and Crantor, to my abſolute Prejudice. If I thought upon her as poor, then my Father would thwart my Deſign: but the thing which moſt grieved me, was that which at the beginning did moſt pleaſe me, I mean, that cloſe Indifference which ſhe uſed unto all: for finding her the ſame unto me as unto others, the ſame Equality ſeemed ſevere unto my ſelf, which ſeemed a Delight when it was uſed unto others: Yet notwithſtanding, I no ſooner ſaw her, but my Sorrows vaniſhed; and indeed the very ſight of the Perſon beloved, is an infallible Remedy againſt all Miſeries:

ries: There is ſuch a ſecret kind of Charm in it, as ſuſpends the moſt ſenſible Sorrows. I were not able to ſupport my Miſery, unleſs I did ſometimes enjoy her Preſence: My Paſſion is grown to that Extremity, that I am not only unhappy when I am from her; but I am far from Happineſs when I am not alone with her; neither is that ſufficient to diſſipate my Diſcontents, and compleat my Joy, unleſs I be reſpected; nor yet that, unleſs ſometimes my Eyes do incorporate with hers, which moves a Joy ſo pure in my Soul, as uſually the Exceſs thereof produces a moſt pleaſing Diſorder in the Hearts of all them which know truly how to love.

Thus for a long time did I live with her, finding no fit Opportunities to diſcover my Love, otherwiſe than by my Reſpects and Submiſſions: for beſides the Abundance of Servants which were continually courting her, I obſerved, that though ſhe was ever very civil, yet ſhe prevented all Occaſions of my talking in private with her, and the Siſter of Androclides was alſo ſo circumſpect about her, that I could never diſcourſe of any things but ſuch as were indifferent. I intreated Meleſander to diſſemble a Love unto this Siſter, whoſe Name was Atalia; to the end, he diſcourſing often with her, he might take her off, and afford me Opportuuity to talk with Teleſile; but in lieu of doing that Office for me, he returned me an angry Anſwer without any Aſſiſtance. But to make ſome Proofs of the Miſeries of Abſence, as it was the moſt pleaſant time of the Year; and Diophantes having a Houſe under the Mountain of Himelta, which was the moſt pleaſant Seat of all Phocides, he often went thither, and five or ſix of thoſe Journeys, with his whole Family, made me as reſtleſs as any Heart could be capable of; every Minute ſeemed a Day, every Hour a whole Year, and every Day an Age, but ſuch an Age, wherein Melancholy was the ſole Commander of my Soul. When I underſtood that Diophantes carried Company with him, I was ſorry for it, becauſe I feared leſt ſome ſhould plead for my Rival: when none went with him, then I pitied the Solitude of Tileſile; and her Diſcontents which I did imagine ſhe found, did move the like in me. When Atalia went with her, I was deſperate; when ſhe was in Delphos, the frequent Converſation which ſhe had with Crantor, did extreamly trouble me; and I enjoyed not one Minute of Reſt, as long as Teleſile was abſent. Delphos was as a Deſart unto me, the whole Town did put on another Face when ſhe departed, and put on a freſh Luſtre when ſhe returned: If I walked at any time to ſhun Company, my Walk was always towards her Lodging; and I walked ſo far one Day in a muſing Study, that it might rather be termed a Journey, than a Walk. The Sun by its Abſence did not work a greater change upon the Univerſe, than the glorious Eyes of Teleſile did upon my Heart, when they were abſent: Sometimes would I ſay unto my ſelf, Did ſhe but know I loved her, I ſhould have ſo much Satisfaction at the leaſt, as to think, that perhaps ſhe ſometimes thinks upon me, and that though I am abſent from her Eyes, yet I am not ſo from her Soul. But alas, purſued I, I am certainly further abſent from her Thoughts, than from her Perſon, and the unhappy Thimocrates has not Place either in her Heart or Memory: But ah me! would I ſometimes ſay in my ſelf, Do I not ſee Teleſile in every Place? *I*s ſhe not continually in my Mind, in my Soul, in my *I*magination, and in my Memory? Yes, yes, Teleſile is inſeparable from Thimocrates: but for a Conſolation in ſo cruel an Abſence, Thimocrates ought to be as inſeparable from Teleſile, and for a Comfort in my Sorrows, ſhe ought to endure a part of that which I endure, ſo that ſhe might the better judg of my Sufferings, by what ſhe ſuffers her ſelf; yet were there any Equity in wiſhing the moſt amiable and excellent Lady in the World to ſuffer that for me, which I ſuffer for her? No, no, I am unjuſt in my Deſires, and do wiſh things moſt unreaſonable; All that I deſire therefore ſhall be, that where ſhe is, ſhe will not think upon any of my Rivals; that Androclides eſpecially have no Place in her Memory, and that the unhappy Thimocrates have a little Room there. Perhaps it may be ſaid unto me, that in my Complaint againſt the Miſeries of Abſence, I do confound things, and mingle ſome Paſſages of Jealouſy amongſt my Stories; yet it is moſt certain, that none of thoſe jealous Thoughts had ever come unto my Heart, but during abſence; and the truth is, I cannot think it poſſible for any to be abſent from the Party loved, but he muſt be a little jealous; yes, and after a more cruel manner than they are, who are jealous through Fantaſticalneſs, or Weakneſs, in the ſight of the Party whom they love: But I never had the leaſt thought of any ſuch thing in the preſence of Teleſile; my jealouſy did always vaniſh at her appearance, as a miſty Vapour does when the Sun breaks out; and her abſence made my Soul ſenſible of all the Miſeries which Love can cauſe. Mean while, the report of all the Town was, that Crantor did often viſit Atalia, and that ſhe did ſolicite extreamly for her Brother; and it was believed, that within few days Androclides would marry Teleſile. This Report had not yet reached my Ear. Meleſander during this time was gone into the Country; and Abſence was ever ſo fatal unto me, that the Abſence of my Friend, as well as my Miſtreſs, was very vexatious unto me. My Father, who knew of the Buſineſs, and would not have me ſo much diſhonoured as to have Androclides preferred before me; and who alſo knew, that as long as I continued at Delphos, it would be a difficult matter for me to ceaſe my Love unto Teleſile, but that I ſhould never endure that Androclides ſhould marry her, and would oppoſe it by all ways that an amorous Heart could imagine; he therefore determined upon a courſe, which cauſed my moſt ſenſible ſorrow, although in all appearance it ſhould have rejoiced me, becauſe it was honourable.

At that time, when the famous Council of Greece, whereof before I ſpoke, was aſſembled: My Father, to the end he might ſend me away from that Place, where he apprehended ſome Misfortune might befal me, procured me to be choſen by the Amphictions, to be ſent unto Milete, (From whence the Prince Thraſibulus was come, for ſome Reaſons which would be too long to relate) to the end I might bring back a true Relation of all the Paſſages in that famous Town, which then was divided into two oppoſite Factions: for although the Mileſians had ſent a Deputy unto the Aſſembly, which did ſit in the Temple of Apollo, as Judges of their Differences, although the Aſiatiqu ſiatique Greeks did not uſe to acknowledg them to be ſo; yet notwithſtanding, ſince it was the Party oppoſite unto the ſage Thales the Mileſian, the Amphictions would be informed by ſome other way, and I were named for the Buſineſs. Queſtionleſs, there was never any of my Age had ſuch an Honour conferred upon him, and at any other time I ſhould have infinitely rejoiced at it: For indeed, to be choſen by the Grandees of Greece, for an Agent unto the Mileſians, in a Buſineſs of that Concernment, was an Honour, which any Man who was not in Love, might be highly ambitious of. This abſence procured me Miſery inſupportable. It was true, that the Buſineſs was honourable, and very likely not to laſt long. My Rivals were all vexed at it, and it might well procure more eſteem in the Mind of Teleſile, yet did I receive this Honour with extream Sorrow; and ſince it would abſent me from her I loved, all ambitious Thoughts were far from my Heart; and my Miſery ſeemed ſo great, that I could think upon nothing but it: yet there was no Remedy, I could not, without diſhonour, refuſe it, or deny it, unleſs I ſhould loſe my ſelf in the Opinion of Teleſile, and the World. Both my Honour and my Love therefore requiring it, I did obey, and within three days after departed; I endeavoured, as I could, to defer it for a while, but it could not be obtain'd. I had therefore no more to do, but to employ that ſhort time I was to ſtay in Delphos, as well as I could. I committed the Preparations for my Journey altogether unto my Servants, and buſied my ſelf in nothing but watching opportunity to ſpeak with Teleſile in private; being fully reſolved, after a long Conteſt with my ſelf, to acquaint her with my Love, if I could: but I was ſo unfortunate the two firſt days, that I could neither ſpeak with her, nor ſee her, becauſe ſhe was not well. The laſt Day of my being at Delphos being come, I was extreamly ſad: Alas, ſaid I unto my ſelf, muſt I depart, and not ſo much as ſee Teleſile? or acquainting her how that I love her the beſt of any Man in the World? No, no, I cannot do it; Death would then be more ſweet unto me than my Departure. I did riſe that day extream early, although I knew it would be Noon before I could ſee Teleſile, if I ſaw her at all; but indeed the reaſon was, becauſe I was not Maſter of my Reaſon, or my own Thoughts. I went to bid adieu to ſeveral of my Acquaintance; but in what Quarter of the Town ſoever they dwelt, I was ſure to paſs by the Houſe of Teleſile, either in going, or coming, or both, thinking it ſome kind of Conſolation to be near her, though I could not ſee her. I received all Complements concerning my Voyage ſo coldly, as ſurprized every one that obſerved it; and I carried my ſelf ſo indifferently, as I wonder none told the Amphictions, they had made a bad choice of ſuch an Agent, for ſuch an important Buſineſs.
